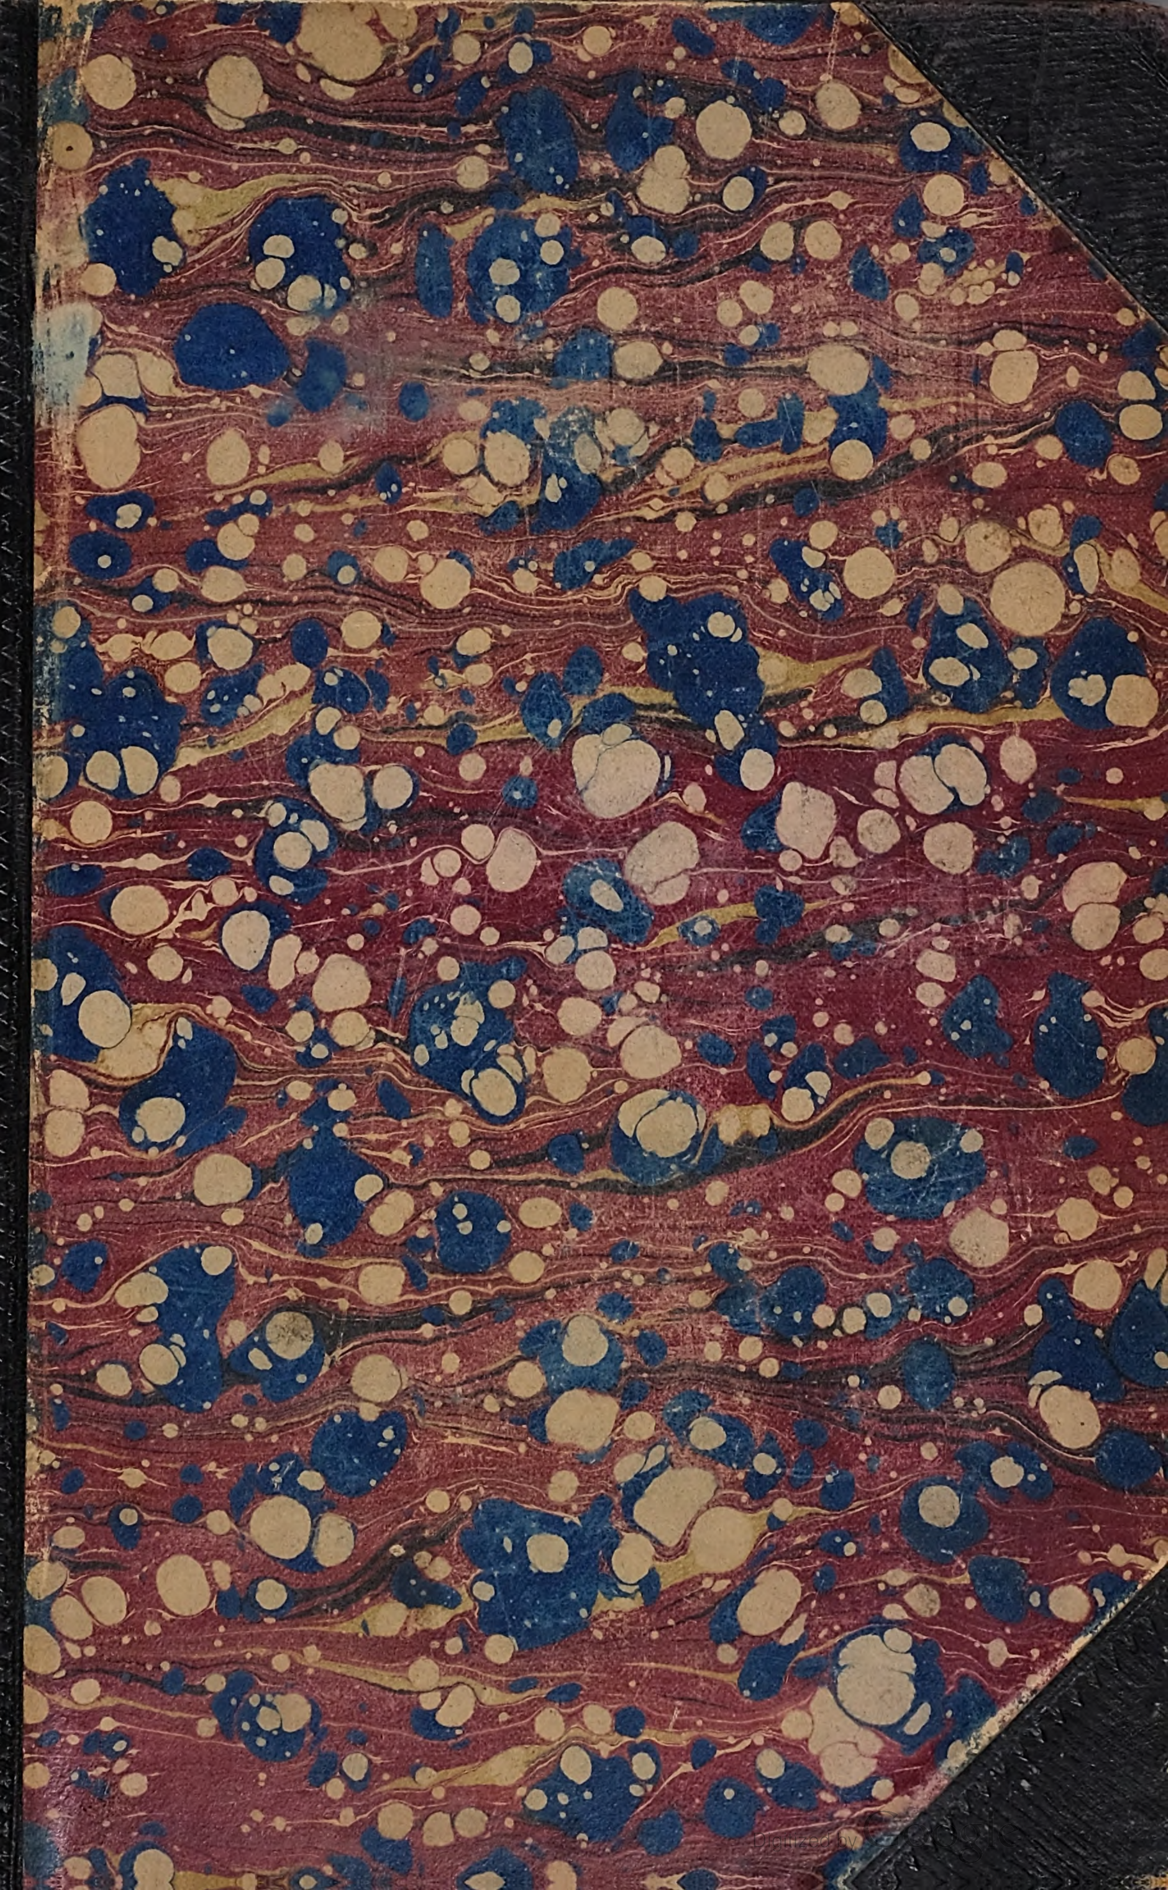
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



Per 2866 d 148

Per. 256 d. 768

NEW SERIAL STORY COMMENCES THIS WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 345. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 10TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

WHAT IS THE NEW ART SET?

SIMPLY

A Tasteful little Box containing the following Requisites for Executing

Lovely Embroideries

SIMILAR TO THOSE ON VIEW AT SINGER'S NUMEROUS SHOWROOMS:

EMBROIDERY HOOPS, TRANSFER,
ETCHING FOOT, 12 REELS OF SILK,
COLOURED STUDY, MANUAL OF INSTRUCTION,

AND A

LIST OF SILKS TO USE FOR VARIOUS DESIGNS.

IT IS THE NEATEST AND MOST COMPACT LITTLE ARTICLE EVER OFFERED FOR PRESENTATION.

APPLY AT ONCE FOR FULL PARTICULARS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

BODLEIAN P 16 MAR 1981 LIBRARY

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation, Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

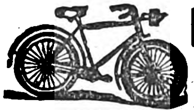
Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.



AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER 2,000 New and Second-hand. EASY TERMS—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 pages) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO, Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England], will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS

FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

ONE BOX OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WATERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

Devonshire Cream.

REALLY GENUINE.

In patent air-tight tins,

½lb. … … …	1/2
1lb. … … …	2/-
2lb. … … …	3/9

including tin & postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton,
Shalton, N. Devon.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's
CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

SHORT STORIES
ROMANCE
LOVE
ADVENTURE
WAR
HUMOUR
PATHOS

No. 345.] [ONE PENNY.

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending August 10th, 1895.

A Study in Pink.

ZIE called her the Pink Nurse. And that settled it. After that it was no longer Annie Durrant, but "Our Pink Nurse," with the whole family, and it even came to pass that she was known throughout the village as "Brigg's Pink Nurse." And the name fitted her well enough, on the whole, as her hospital gown—she was a trained nurse—her plump cheeks, and even her dimpled hands, and the ribbons on her stiff cap were each and all a most lively pink.

It all happened the summer that brought Zie her fifth birthday, when the family were down in our country cottage by the sea, and when a mighty battle was being fought in a big front room upstairs between a strange mystery we call death, and two famous physicians, seconded ably by our Pink Nurse.

For granny was gazing past us all in the gloom, and, dove-like and gentle, with all serenity, was bidding us farewell with a certain stately tenderness which was all her own.

And Zie was the only one who was happy. And she was happy, as she always is happy, because she cannot, for her life, help being so. It is as much a part of her as her freckled little nose, yellow mop of hair, and topaz eyes.

One blue spring morning, after our invalid had had a bad night, and our Pink Nurse was far more white than pink, she was sent into the old-fashioned garden to steal a little colour from the soft air.

Zie immediately extended the hospitality of her hammock, which was stretched lazily between two snowy, blossoming May trees, and there the two sat, and were very glad they were alive, for it was the month of May, which will at once explain that gladness.

"You are very pretty!" said Zie, gravely, by way of being agreeable. "I'm pretty, too. I'm glad. Aren't you?"

"Oh—I don't know."

"That doesn't sound true. Are you married?" pursued Zie.

"No."

"Why don't you get married?" she asked next.

"Nobody wants me!" rippled out the Pink Nurse, with a little laugh.

"But your name is Annie. Hasn't every Annie got a Joe?" remarked Zie, with amazement.

And the story would have ended here before it began if a man at that moment had not been passing. There was nothing singular about his being there, or in the fact that his name should be Joe—Joe Ripley. But after he passed, it was a little singular that the back of his neck and ears should so closely match our Pink Nurse's face, who was blushing also.

"Oh, you awful child! What will you do or say next? That was the gentleman in Mr. Peters' office, and his name is Joe." And the Pink Nurse made a great pretence of being painfully shocked, and ran, with a great rustle of skirts, into the house.

All rights reserved.]

"And her name is Annie," added Zie to herself, while the pupils of her eyes grew very big, and the little bits of gold dust in them disappeared, and the rest of the day she was very quiet.

"That child's got something on her mind!" announced Harriet in the kitchen, as her glances roamed across the green of the lawn, to the hammock under the blossoming May trees. For the hammock hardly moved.

Now the gentleman in Mr. Peters' office lived just up the hill, only a few doors from our cottage, and Zie's hammock was very near the road on which he passed to and fro several times a day.

That evening a surprise was in store for Mr. Ripley. Just at dusk, while all things were assuming the grey-greens of the twilight, he walked soberly home to supper. When exactly opposite a certain hammock a small voice piped up in an authoritative manner:

"Will you please be kind enough to come here?"

Mr. Ripley thoughtfully rubbed his right foot over his left foot, took his handkerchief out of the crown of his straw hat, and, after wiping his face, carefully replaced it. Then followed the suggestions offered by the small voice:

"Well, kid! What is it?"

"I'm not a kid. I'm a girl. And my name is Zie. I didn't know until to-day that your name was Joe. Our Pink Nurse told me. Would you mind telling me if you've an Annie—already?"

"I've no Annie," and Mr. Ripley grinned.

"Would you like one?"

"I don't mind."

"Because—I know one."

"Really?"

"Yes. That's our Pink Nurse's name. She watches you from behind the curtain."

"Really?"

"That's all," added Zie, with dignity. "You can go now."

And Mr. Ripley went home, but he has since confessed that he never felt so queer in all his life.

And in fact Mr. Ripley, the clerk in Mr. Peters' office, began to act as if under some sort of spell. Just in front of our cottage there was a loose plank in the little bridge which crossed the stream. It was a singular fact that the window where the Pink Nurse lurked commanded a view of this loose plank.

Now, avoid that plank as he would, Mr. Ripley no sooner reached that spot each day, in the full consciousness of the eyes behind the window curtain, and the calm judicious aspect of the small figure in the hammock, than some demon lured him to it, brought up his toes against it, and allowed him to pass on, with neck and ears a perfect match to the Pink Nurse.

One day he distinctly heard a titter from behind the curtain.

"Never mind," came the small voice from the hammock, "she likes you just the same, if she does laugh at you. She wouldn't watch for you every day, you know, if she didn't." Which was a sensible conclusion for a five-year-old girl.

But that plank grew to be a nightmare to Mr. Ripley. Every day he found it there.

One night at midnight Zie had a dream. All in the moonlight of a perfect May night she heard the fairies:

"Knock! knock! knock!"

"It sounded real," she announced over her oatmeal porridge. And it probably was, to some extent, for the plank was found firmly fixed in its place that morning by three bright new nails.

"It's coming true," whispered Zie to herself, and she told the same thing in strict confidence to three intimate friends, after the fashion of her sex. But as they happened to be merely a toad, a demure lady-bird, and a gaudy little bullfinch, the secret was still a secret.

That night when Mr. Ripley went home to his supper, Zie sat on the garden gate.

"Did you nail it?" she promptly asked.

"Nail what?" responded Mr. Ripley, with a brief glance at the window curtain.

"The plank. I think it was a fairy. She thinks it was you. Was it?"

But Mr. Ripley passed on speechless.

And as he went he was quite angry to find himself marching to the tune of

Soon they'll be married,
Never to part.

And, on the last day of May, when the hawthorn blossoms lay like silver snow upon the lawn, Zie propounded a remarkable question just after luncheon.

"Do all men say they never kissed anyone else in all their lives? When they get engaged, I mean," she asked, with her mouth full of sponge cake.

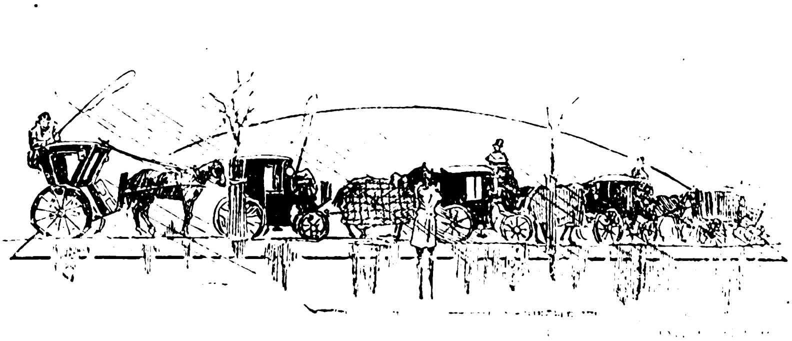
"What can the child mean?" ejaculated Aunt Louise, in amazement.

Zie sat up very straight.

"I mean that Annie's got a Joe, now. Oh, it's true! And they say that I'm a darling—but I knew that—always. And Joe told Annie that she was the very first girl he had ever loved, and she wouldn't believe him—but she didn't mind one bit. Why wouldn't she believe him?"

"Because—they all say that," explained mamma, stirring the cream in a cup of coffee.

Mary Bryan.



IT CAME TO PASS

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

CHAPTER I.

“I WANT to see the world. I want to see life.” It was Charlotte who spoke, leaning back on a mound of hay, with her hands clasped behind her head. “I wish I could grow old suddenly. I should like to be thirty.”

Her companion smiled. He was an elderly man, with a low, melodious voice.

“There are many women of that age,” he said, “who would gladly change places.”

“Not with me?”

Charlotte asked the question wonderingly, raising her tall young figure on her elbow.

“Yes, with you.”

She shook her head.

“I think not.”

“Then the summit of your ambition is to be old?”

“I am not happy,” she replied. “I have no girl-friend now. I do not care to make one. I prefer married women and—and——”

“Men?”

“Yes,” raising her eyes innocently to his. “I like men and boys.”

“You have left school?”

“Some months ago, but I still study. I do not mind working here, because I am allowed to bring my books into the fields and learn in the open air. They say I have outgrown my strength—I am so ridiculously tall!”

“And did you like your school?”

“Like it! Good gracious, no! You have never been to a girls' school, or you would not ask. It is a process of cramping every original idea from term to term, and moulding you in the same groove with the common herd. Your very soul is not your own. You are nothing but a slave of routine, and have only the mark of the beast in place of individuality.”

“Can nothing wipe it out?” he asked, smiling.

“Oh, yes; when you are introduced into Society—or married—or something,” speaking vaguely, as she plucked at the withered grass. “I do not regret my lost childhood, and I long to manage my own life—it will be so interesting. Responsibility never did anybody harm yet.”

“Though the flowing hair is seen no more,” said the man, looking at her beautifully-shaped head, “its past is not dead, but lives in its present, its crowning glory merely supported by the staid and womanly hairpin. So that lost childhood is not lost, but gathered up and permeated by the hairpin of responsibility.”

The sun crept through the hedge, sweet with garlands of dog-roses, amongst which the tiny blue-winged butterflies flitted, and Charlotte watched them with a dreamy smile.

“Do you know, the other girls wonder at my talking so much to you. They say I am too young to have anything in common with a man years my senior.”

“What other girls?” he asked, contracting his eyebrows.

“Oh! my cousins, and the people you are staying with. They would be very angry now if they knew you were here in the hayfield. You won't tell them, will you?”

An anxious expression crept over Charlotte's face.

“My dear child, why should I?”

“You might have mentioned it without thinking, and——” blushing, she stopped short.

“And what?” he asked, eagerly.

“Well, I am supposed to be having a music lesson.”

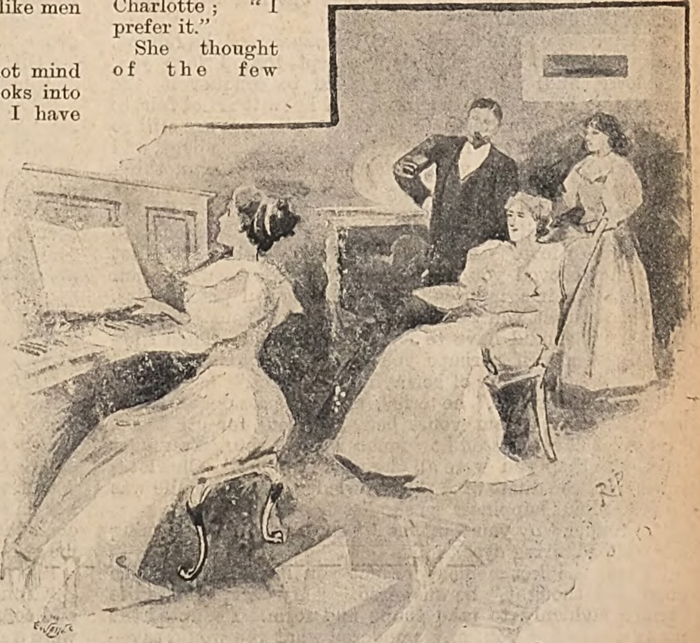
“I will teach you something sweeter than song,” he whispered.

“I don't think you could, for I am very fond of melody, as a rule.”

“Yet you prefer to lie here and dream?”

“Yes,” replied Charlotte; “I prefer it.”

She thought of the few



“My cousins and the people you are staying with.”

enchanting hours that remained to her, before he went, perhaps for ever. All their meetings had been purely accidental—at least, from her point of view, and yet this stranger would leave behind him a dread sense of emptiness in the young girl's heart. She pushed the hay aside and leant forward, her hands clasped together, a favourite pose of hers, and looked at him steadfastly.

"I am supposed to be having a music lesson."

"Where do you live?" she said.

"In London," he replied.

"And is the life there very different to our humdrum country existence?"

"To a certain extent. We have not the same peace and quiet."

"What a comfort! How you must love your life!"

"Indeed I do not. I have everything but the one thing I want, and that I dare not ask for. It is beyond my reach."

"I do not like to hear you talk so," declared Charlotte, twisting the parched grasses through her fingers. "It seems unmanly. If you had any stamina or determination you would never sit there and calmly say those hateful words, 'I dare not.' There is nothing more despicable than a coward! What is it you 'dare not' ask for—you who look so strong and capable?"

She shot a look of disdain at him through her long eyelashes.

"I want you," he said, boldly, gazing at her peach-like bloom, and the pretty mutinous mouth, which became suddenly subdued into calm and serious lines. "That is all, Charlotte—I want you."

"Then—then, it is very unkind of you to say so!" she began, with something like tears in her stormy blue eyes. "Can't you see what a dreadful position you have placed me in? I—I—have asked you to—to——"

She could not finish her sentence, but hid her flushed face in the haycock.

"I have no excuse to offer for my gaucherie," he replied, drawing her to him tenderly, "except that I love you, Charlotte, and, though I have tried to conquer it, the temptation has proved too strong. I know it is not fair to try and make you listen to me now, while you are still so young, in fact not yet freed from schoolroom bondage, and I am old enough to be your father. You have seen nothing of the world, you are too young to judge."

"Young!" she cried, starting up, "young! Why do you taunt me with my youth? Surely I am old enough to understand 'love.' I am not such a baby that I did not know that I loved you from the very first moment we met. I have been imagining all sorts of dreadful possibilities. First I thought you would marry my eldest cousin Rachel, and that I should have to be her bridesmaid. Then I began to wonder if perhaps you were already married, and dared not ask for fear of betraying my secret."

"Dearest, dearest," he cried, raining passionate kisses upon her face, "I am yours body and soul, for all times. You must have guessed how much I loved you. You must have seen that you were all the world to me!" Charlotte sat motionless, dumb with the knowledge, yet her smile was one of radiant happiness as she listened to his words.

"I wonder why you want me?" she said at last, turning her wide admiring eyes to his.

"From the first moment we met you have been my one hope and thought," he answered. "My dark, sunless life seemed suddenly to take shape and form. I counted the hours to seeing you, and wondered what you would say—how you would look—if you would smile. Then I told myself I was old—too old for a sweet unspotted soul—too old to gain the fresh first love of any girl, much less yours! Sometimes I decided never to broach the subject, but to bury it away in my heart for ever. You were, I thought, so gay and high-spirited you would not care for a man of my age. Then to-day you seemed sad and lonely, and I fancied you needed me. Oh! Charlotte, Charlotte! how is it I have found favour in your eyes?"

"Raymond," she said—and it was the first time she had called him by that name—"Raymond, I am not so young as you imagine, but I will tell you something of my life. I am, as you know, an orphan, living under the care of my uncle. His own children naturally prove his first consideration, and there is no real place for me. I am not wanted. The elder girls being still unmarried, I have remained in the background, as a schoolgirl, out of sight. I own I was growing tired of my seclusion, and wanted to feel my wings. Take me away from this cramped, narrow circle, and let me learn what life really is. There is no one to miss me—no one—and they will be glad to see me go."

She spoke a little bitterly, and for the first time Raymond caught a glimpse of her inner life, with its unknown worries and heart-burnings. The knowledge seemed to draw her closer to him.

"You have troubles I never suspected," he said. "I pictured you always like a butterfly here in the fields, without a care or serious thought in the world. But the butterfly's wings are not dimmed because it has begun to think."

"And such wonderful thoughts!" said Charlotte; "a whole new lifetime to consider, a bright, beautiful future, so different—so utterly different to the morning."

"I feel like a boy," laughed Raymond; "you have made me too happy! Do you know, Charlotte, I shall never grow really old, for you will revive my youth?"

"And make you re-live it," she added, tenderly.

A pained expression stole over his regular features, and he turned his face away.

"Not that, dear," he murmured. "It isn't fit to live again, even in fancy. Thank God! we are not punished for the sins and follies of the past by having to drag through them a second time."

"Raymond, how sad and strange you look! What have I said to trouble you?"

"Nothing, dear, nothing. But you are so good and generous, I want to ask a favour of you."

"Oh! I am glad," she cried. "I would do anything! Anything!"

"Then listen. I am a widower, Charlotte. Years ago I married, and lost my wife. Will you let that episode remain for ever dead and buried between us? Never allude to it—never speak of it. I only pray that my future may be better and brighter than my past. Heaven knows I will do all in my power to prove myself worthy of you. I will cherish you, Charlotte, with a love greater than any that could be offered to you in all the world. But make me one promise; never mention my past life. It was a sad and a bad one; let me forget it!"

Charlotte was touched by his evident distress, and poured soft words of consolation into his ears as she gave him the promise faithfully.

"I want to hear nothing that is painful to you," she assured him. "The present and the future are enough for me. I shall live from to-day. There was no yesterday for either of us, and we will only have one long series of delightful to-morrows."

"How good, how very good you are!" he cried, clasping her hands fervently. "But one question more before we close the subject for ever. Would you be willing to take me under any circumstances, darling? If I told you——"

She placed her fingers over his mouth, and smiled.

"You need tell me nothing. See, I have perfect trust and confidence in you, Raymond. I would marry you if you were a murderer, with a list of crimes as long as your arm."

So the old, old story was repeated yet again, as they vowed everlasting fidelity in the soft nest of hay, under the blazing summer sun. With all her heart and soul Charlotte surrendered her entire being to the first love of her young life—that life so scattered with thorns in her uncle's home. The thought of escaping it, and marrying the man she loved, brought such a glorious tinge of scarlet to her naturally pale face, that she had never looked more lovely.

One might have imagined from Charlotte's description that she was a penniless orphan, left on the charity of relatives. This, however, was not the case. She had a comfortable income of her own, which, with her striking appearance, made her cousins fear her rivalship. They always considered her an interloper, and not infrequently Charlotte had fostered wild ideas of living alone, freed from their criticism. She pictured a little hut, among dull-coloured, prickly shrubs, in the heart of a wild forest, where time would pass for her like a fairy tale. And now the darkest passage of her life was over, since one at last would be her very own. She felt almost glad never to have known a parent's or any human love, since her stored up affection was all for him. Raymond gazed up at the summer sky—that deep, azure sphere, blue, open, and cloudless as Charlotte's eyes, while she lay before him, flushed and excited, her bright hair dishevelled from contact with the hay—the most beautiful object in all the green landscape.

Admiration kept him silent for some moments, and then he spoke.

"Tell me your thoughts, Charlotte," he said, gently. "They must be very interesting."

"How do you know?" she asked.

"Something in your eyes told me," he replied, caressingly.

"When a woman marries," she began, emphasising the words with pride, "does she confess her past? Will you answer me that question?"

Raymond smiled indulgently.

"If she is good—yes."

"And if she is bad—no," added Charlotte, imitating his tone. "It would be too dangerous—she might lose him."

"My dear child, what do you know about such things?" he said.

"Very little. My experience is limited, or I should not have asked your advice."

She plucked nervously at the jessamine in her dress, gazing through the soft gleam of bright hazy distance across the fields to where the river filtered through sunlight and shade. An anxious look crept into her eyes.

"Dearest, what troubles you?" he asked.

She turned to him with a little gasp.

"Perhaps," she exclaimed, her face dyed with innocent blushes, "I ought to tell you of the one black spot in my life."

"You can have nothing to reveal," he cried, laughing in spite of her distress.

"So you think. But it is dreadful—positively dreadful!" shuddering, and covering her face. "I must tell you, or I should never have a happy moment. If, when you hear all, you feel changed towards me, don't speak—don't say one word—but just walk quietly away, right away, and never let me see you again."

"Charlotte, for pity's sake, if you are joking, remember my love, and spare me."

The pain in his voice touched her, and she looked up with a faint smile.

"I am quite earnest," she replied; "but perhaps you will look leniently upon my case as I would do on yours. I was very young——"

"You must have been."

"And ignorant. I did not realise my action was worthy of imprisonment."

"Imprisonment! My God!"

"Yes," with a solemn shake of her head, "bad enough for that."

Raymond's hands were trembling as he pressed them to his forehead.

"Go on," he cried, hoarsely. "Tell me all."

The day seemed to have grown dark suddenly and the air cold. It struck a chill to his heart as he feasted his eyes hungrily upon Charlotte, and waited for her to continue.

"Yes," she said, pushing the hair from her temples with a nervous gesture. "I am afraid it will shock you terribly. I feel I have reached a crisis in my life. You won't interrupt me?"

"No; only for Heaven's sake don't torture me longer than necessary. I cannot believe you were ever—in prison!"

"I was—I was. It is true! I will tell you. I had but one real girl friend—she made me her confidante in everything. Oh! Raymond, you would have liked her—she was beautiful——"

"Spare me these details."

"But I want to picture her to you. Her manners were as pretty as her face, and everybody loved her. She was very rich, too, with houses and lands of her own. But I mustn't forget her name. It was Bloom. Don't you think Bloom is a lovely name?"

"Go on! go on!"

"Bloom was a ward in Chancery. I think our orphanhood drew us together. Perhaps you know the law is very strict about wards in Chancery, and they may not please themselves in marriage. Now, Bloom was bent on pleasing herself, well knowing that the law would not approve her choice. She and her lover planned an elopement, and, oh! Raymond, I 'aided and abetted'—that is what the lawyers called it—and so they put me in prison for—one day![*] Now you have heard the worst. I can plead no excuse, except that her sorrow appealed to me. She was the only girl that could still look pretty when she cried, and, oh, how she did cry! I sat up all one night comforting her."

"I 'aided and abetted.'"

---

[*] A Fact.

"My little white-souled darling," he cried, clasping her in his arms, "there is nothing in all this to cause you a shade of sorrow. If the pages of my history were only half as clear I should have needed no promise of silence from you."

"Oh! Raymond, I am so relieved! I did not like telling you, knowing I had done wrong, but nobody could resist Bloom."

So the first cloud rolled aside, and all the world was a blaze of sunshine and roses again as they wended their way back. The little drama in the hayfield was over, and Charlotte had brushed the withered grasses from her cotton gown, and scattered them to the winds. Hand in hand, like children, they passed through the meadows and along the banks of the silent river.

"It is very hot," sighed Charlotte. "I think we shall have a storm."

"Oh! no," he replied, "the sky is too clear." He glanced up and saw a range of purple splendour in the horizon, while a dark curtain of rain in violet-coloured streaks hung from the black edge of a thunder cloud. "It will come," said Raymond.

CHAPTER II.

Charlotte had taken him for better, for worse—Ramond Peel, the widower, in his forty-fifth year.

"Do you remember," she said, glancing over the papers on his study table, "I wanted to see the world. Well, if 'seeing the world' consists of martyring oneself at afternoon 'at home's,' I think I have had enough of it."

Her husband smiled as he looked up from his letters, drawing Charlotte to his side.

"Why did you go?" he asked.

"I promised Lady Logan, and I did not want to appear rude. Besides, it is impossible always to anticipate boredom, occasionally a very slight element dispels it. Town people are so oppressive with their everlasting chatter. I believe our honeymoon has spoilt me, and I only care, dear, to be with you. Lady Logan talked of nothing but her pauper boys (by the way, I promised her a subscription). Then I was introduced to a Dutchman, with a very flat face and yellow hair—great on the subject of vague and hazy impressionist pictures. He pointed out a horrible staring figure over the door, and asked me to admire 'the sweet human look of love and trust' on its emaciated features. I told him it was lamentable, upon which he handed me over in disgust to an exasperating old baronet, who had no conversation above the advance of sanitary science."

"Poor child, I pity you."

"I consoled myself by studying Lady Logan's taste. Her drawing-room is a dream of mellow beauty, and she has an exquisitely carved altar in an alcove, picked up, she told me, in Antwerp. Her husband admired the Madonna's profile. Oh, but I forgot, while bemoaning my stupid afternoon, that it was not all weariness. There was one star."

"And that?"

"A pale, sad-eyed boy, whom Lady Logan hired out of charity, 'to fiddle,' as she expressed it. I am always sorry for professionals when not in the first rank—they look so out of it. He did not seem to belong to the party, and they gave him sandwiches and claret in a separate room. Yet I never saw a more refined face—the boy was a gentleman, every inch of him. They tell me he is not great enough to push his way to the front, but I considered his was the sweetest pathos and expression I had ever heard. He was like a golden-haired angel standing above us playing, with a sad, wrapt look in his eyes. I pictured a halo and a harp involuntarily, with a gown of fine, white linen. I am sure he won't live, he had the sort of complexion that dies young. I fancied him making one wild supplication to the crowd of worldlings through the medium of music—a cry they would never understand—an appeal from Heaven. Oh! Raymond, it made me so angry—everybody talked—I alone listened. The instrument seemed to speak straight from his soul to mine, and the harrowing tales of fever-infested districts fell on deaf ears. My old baronet could not even get a grunt of approval or disapproval out of me. The Dutchman still discoursed in sonorous tones to my left-hand neighbour on Lady Logan's grotesque objects of art, but I was free, drinking in the soft, throbbing notes. I was back once more in a summer hay-field, listening again to the trilling of birds—and then to the low growl of thunder. Gradually, it seemed, the shades of evening gathered, and a broad, red moon rose behind feathery branches. I could hear the lark's good-night psalm. That is what I call music, Raymond! Directly the last strain had died away I asked for an introduction to the talented young musician. My hostess raised her eyebrows and condescended to make him known. The boy flushed crimson, and appeared quite unnerved by my enthusiasm. He played again before I left, and the second time with more confidence and assurance. He said he was greatly affected in tone, touch, and actual execution by his audience. Do you know, Raymond, his eyes reminded me of yours?"

"You must not make me jealous of the rising generation! I strongly object to your starting a handsome young protégé," he said, fondly.

"I like you to be jealous," she whispered. "It is the strongest sign of love. Nothing flatters a woman more than to see her husband suspecting other men of loving her. In his eyes she has such a power to charm that he pictures a victim at every turn, since to him she is the most lovable human being."

"I only care, dear to be with you."

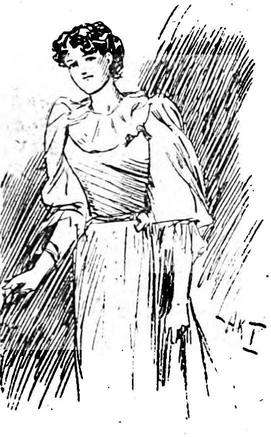
The fresh, unsophisticated country girl looked impressively dignified as she rose and glanced down on Raymond Peel with those strikingly brilliant eyes which first attracted him.



"I became the success of the season."

"I am taller than Lady Logan," she continued, with a return of her childish manner, catching sight of her elegant figure in the glass. "I am five foot nine," with conscious pride. "My height annoyed me in old days. I was branded by that ugly term, 'a strapping girl.' There is something so unromantic in the expression. But one night, shortly after we returned from our honeymoon, I overheard somebody say at a dance: 'That is Charlotte Peel. She is a very fine woman!' which only points the difference between a holland frock in the country and white satin and diamonds in town."

He liked to hear her prattle on, one moment harping back to her strangely recent childhood, and the next playing the part of the over-indulged wife, and exacting from him the homage of a subject to a queen.

Charlotte had walked to the window and pushed back the curtains.

"There is a strange lady at our door," she said, "and it is late for callers."

Her husband was writing a letter, and vouchsafed no reply.

"I shall have to go and talk to her, I suppose," sighed Charlotte, seeing Raymond pre-occupied, "and I am sure I have no conversation to-day. I wish it were man's mission to receive visitors and dispense tea; it would save women an infinity of trouble." She made a wry face, and moved slowly towards the door.

"Who is it?" she asked, as the manservant appeared.

"The lady would not give her name, madam, but she asked for Mr. Peel."

"Raymond, the visitor has come to see you. Who can she be? Ah! perhaps she wants a subscription, and fancies she will wheedle a larger one out of a pliable man."

"Say I am not at home."

"Nonsense!" cried Charlotte, "she has already been admitted, and is probably raging below at your delay. Besides, I am really afraid that laziness is contagious, and you have caught it from me. Shall you see her alone, dear? She is dangerously handsome!"

"Silly girl!" laughed Raymond, pulling her arm through his, "as if I should let you desert me when I most need your support."

"I am frightfully curious," she whispered, "yet I feel rather shy of the woman in red."

As they entered the drawing-room there was a frou-frou of silken skirts, and the lady swept forward with an exclamation of delight.

"Raymond!" she cried, holding out both hands, "I meant to surprise you! Is it not wonderful that we should meet in the land of the living after all these years? I only learnt half an hour ago that you were married, and you could have knocked me down with a feather! Not one of the storms I weathered at sea gave me half such a shock, and I had a rough passage. 'Why! he must be a hundred,' I said. So this, I presume, is Mrs. Peel; glad to see you, my dear."

She had spoken without pausing, in a strong colonial accent, while she emphasised her words with gesticulations.

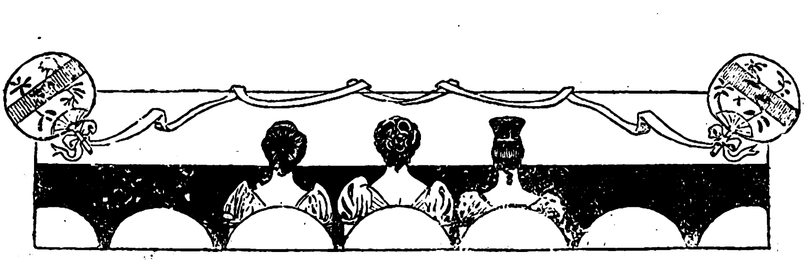
Charlotte glancing at her husband, fancied he appeared less anxious to renew the acquaintance than his voluble friend. To her surprise his face was pale, and for the first time she found him at a loss for words.

"So you knew my husband long ago?" she said, filling in the gap, yet feeling strangely undemonstrative after the Australian's gush.

"Yes, Charlotte, this is Mrs. Donnington-Bain," replied Raymond.

"And he was struck dumb with astonishment when I descended upon him like a whirlwind," continued the visitor, scrutinising Charlotte. "But," turning to Raymond, "after you left Australia, things did not go well with me. I dropped a pile of money in some bogus companies, and was finally wrecked by the failure of a bank. Then I said to myself, 'Augusta, you have wits and talent. Don't let poverty drag you down. Rise up, and see if you can't take the population by storm. Go on the stage.' You may think I was old to begin, but I was always mad about theatricals, and the managers thought my appearance so satisfactory that they took me on spec. Their good judgment was rewarded, and I became the success of the season. At first I appealed to the vulgar taste, and played low comedy; but I got sick of that. My contempt for the whole thing was so profound that it robbed me of all enjoyment. Then I suddenly leapt into tragedy, and from Australia I went to America, where I have toured for the last five years, playing everything but Ibsen. Having established my reputation there, I arranged for a flying visit to London, and find myself free from want and much sought after. Plucky step, wasn't it?"

(To be continued.)



AN ARDENT WOOER

YOUNG, brave, intelligent, Ferreol's principle of life was to be astonished at nothing. Moreover, he lacked nothing. At Paris he encountered Angele. He loved her, and told her so. She listened. He mentioned marriage.

Angele was as good as pretty.

"Have you a family?" asked Ferreol.

"A father; yes."

"Where is he?"

"Brest."

"What doing?"

"Re-fitting vessels."

"I will go at once, then," said Ferreol, calmly.

"Why?"

"To demand your hand. I love you—you love me. You do love me?"

"Yes."

"Good. The train leaves at eight this evening. At eleven to-morrow I land at Brest. Thirty minutes later arrive at the dock; see your father; ask him the question; receive consent at 3 p.m.; take the train back, and the day after to-morrow, at seven in the evening, say to you, 'Angele, thou art mine!"

She blushed, smiled coyly, and softly murmured: "Go, then."

Ferreol took a hansom; the driver was tipsy. It did not astonish him. In the waiting-room his trunk was stolen. Nothing astonishing in that. Then the train ran off the line. Pooh! child's play! Ferreol had his nose half-broken. Ridiculous obstacle!

Briely, it was not till the third day after his departure from Paris that Ferreol arrived at Brest, and swift as a startled zebra, he rushed through the Rue de Siam.

"The ship-refitting shops?"

"Rue de Penfold, third building on the left."

He took it at full speed to make up for lost time, to presently halt before a building on which was the magic word:

REFITTERS.

Before him was a door. He knocked, entered, perceived a gloomy hall, a dingy camp-bed, on that bed a sailor smoking a cob pipe.

"Monsieur Kenezek?" said Ferreol, civilly.

"Yonder, or maybe below."

"Then I'll go and find him at work."

"Thou, my chicken?"

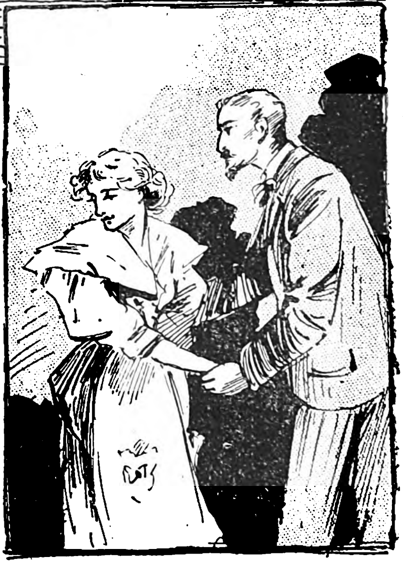
"Why not?"

"It would be——"

"Bah! no phrases! Speak to Monsieur Kenezek I must on business that admits of no delay, and I will speak to him at once, if I have to go to the bottom to do it."

The sailor rose instantly, shifted pipe and quid from right to left, and cried out admiringly:

"Thou, too, then, art of the craft, my chicken?"



Ferreol comprehended nothing, but his principles dictated his answer.

"Yes," said he, turning with decision.

"Come on, then. Two steps away only, but you'll dress yourself here."

Dress himself, and here? Anyone but Ferreol would have let escape him at least a gesture of surprise, but he—never! After all, to present himself to a future father-in-law, perhaps it was more expedient to assume a black coat.

"So be it!" replied he.

The sailor moved a step to the door, but stopped thoughtfully, turned, unhooked from the wall a greasy placard, and with a mumbling, "No humbug this, you see!" began to read and to question Ferreol as follows:

"You are not in a state of intoxication, are you?"

"I!" said Ferreol, indignantly.

"And—more than an hour since you've eaten?"

"Three hours, precisely."

"You are not in a perspiration?"

"Dry as a fish-bone."

"And your health is good?"

"Sound as cast-iron."

"Nerves and temper calm and equable?"

"As an oyster at high water."

"Good. All as it should be. Hurry!" said he, "begin! undress yourself."

Ferreol up to this date had asked no one in marriage, but, sharp as he was, he never supposed that this act—important, it was true—would be accompanied by such formalities.

One of those, however, whom nothing amazed, he did not flinch, but proceeded to strip himself.

Decidedly obscure in this closet, Ferreol was reduced to conjectures, smell, and feeling; still, it was distinctly an under-vest, and other things, and shoes that the sailor drew from a locker and laid before him.

"With these," said he, "you can defy the perspiration."

"In truth I can!" said Ferreol, covering himself with the articles, which exhaled a singular odour of tar.

"Push each button of the pelerine into the corresponding hole of the collarette. Adjust the copper valves, and turn the screw-nuts. Close the latter till the joining of garments, pelerine, etc."

It was long, but Ferreol was patient, and said only:

"You are sure I shall find Monsieur Kenezek there?"

"Certain sure," responded the sailor, grinning; "he can't get away."

Presently they reached a jetty advancing into the bay. At the end of it the round crown of a building, from which, at a shout from his conductor, came running a second sailor, who placed himself without a word behind Ferreol's back.

"All ready?" said the first.

"All ready," responded Ferreol.

"You see the slate and the pencil hung to your side?" queried the other again.

"Slate and pencil both," assented Ferreol, amiably.

It was the last word he spoke.

Click! clack! rattle!

The helmet was over his head, bolted to his shoulders, the screw-nuts hard and fast.

At last a flash of enlightenment! Blinded, stifled, one single instant Nature rebelled against his principles. Too late, however, and protestations inopportune.

For now he felt himself lifted, carried a pace, suspended in space; then a strange sensation of cold mounting from feet to waist and from waist to shoulders.

He opened wide his eyes, and through the helmet's "peepers" saw a fish flit past him.

Preliminaries decidedly not commonplace!

He continued to descend with relative activity.

A monster advanced to meet him. It seized the slate and scratched upon it. Ferreol read, "I am Kenezek. Who are you?"

The moment was solemn. They must come to an understanding somehow. The situation had grown unique. "I am Ferreol," responded he on the slate. "Live at Paris. Income a thousand a year. Love Angele, your daughter, and have the honour to ask her hand in marriage."

"Marry her if you like. I——"

"Consent?"

"Consent? Yes. Good riddance, too. But quick, get off; I've work to finish."

Ferreol shot aloft.

"If I'd been you," said the sailor above, "I'd have waited ten minutes. Kenezek quits work, you know, every day at five o'clock."

Ferreol looked at his watch. Ten minutes to five.

"No," said he, "a man like me never waits a minute."

And he promptly returned to Paris.

To marry the charming Angele?

No. Fifty odd hours late in returning, the charming but impatient Angele had married the other fellow.

M. L.

My First Opium Smoke.

It was not many days after I had landed at Hong-Kong before a strong desire took possession of me to visit an opium den, and endeavour to verify for myself the truth of reports concerning the peculiar effects of that drug upon the nerves.

I accordingly accepted the proffered services of an honest-looking coolie, and, after haranguing with him in every language I knew, eked out with all the pantomimic gestures I could bring myself to perform, I knocked into his misshapen head my wants.

He officiously conducted me through the streets, and in a short time I found myself in a narrow, dirty-looking, evil-smelling thoroughfare, so narrow, in fact, that there seemed barely sufficient space for the passage of four persons walking abreast.

Presently my guide, signing me to follow him, unhesitatingly dived into the dark entry of a low, dilapidated, uninviting-looking building. I trod close at his heels—feeling rather nervous and uncomfortable, I confess—through a passage of uncertain length, and, on arriving at the end, a large curtain was drawn aside, and I was silently ushered into a spacious apartment, luxuriously furnished in the gorgeous Oriental style.

Motioning me to a vacant couch, my guide proceeded to obtain from one of the attendants the articles necessary for my experiments, and soon after returned bearing a small table, upon which was a pipe, with a thick, flute-like stem, but very small bowl, a lamp, and brass box. Opening the latter, he produced from it a small pill of the dark pasty drug, and inserted it into the pipe, which he ignited at the lamp. He gave one or two draws to insure its working, then, ostentatiously wiping the mouthpiece with his greasy sleeve, presented it to me with a grimace, no doubt meant for an encouraging smile.

I reclined back upon the couch, and inhaled, with as much indifference as I could assume, the pungent fumes of the stupefying preparation, experiencing the while the various sensations of the criminal on his way to execution.

Presently I felt a peculiar drowsiness stealing over me, against which I began to struggle at first, but by degrees it overpowered me. Gradually a haze, which every moment appeared to grow more dense, emanating from nowhere in particular, blotted out slowly the objects surrounding me, and I had a dim recollection of someone taking the pipe from my relaxing fingers.

For some time all was blank; but presently I found myself home once more and standing in the library. The only occupant was my father, who was seated at his desk writing rapidly, and although his eyes more than once wandered in my direction, he seemed unconscious of my presence.

I strenuously endeavoured to speak to him, but I could articulate no sound, nor could I stir from the spot where I was standing. I thought that I stood intently watching him until he presently threw aside the pen, and hurriedly folded and sealed the note he had been writing.

So vivid was my dream—so clearly and distinctly did every minute incident impress itself upon my mind, that I even remember noticing my father's hand tremble as he again took the pen to address the letter.

When he had done this he started from his chair, and began pacing nervously to and fro, as though labouring under some great perturbation, passing and repassing me so near that he almost touched me.

Suddenly he paused in his wild perambulations, and, advancing towards the mantelpiece, placed the letter, which he still held in his hand, above the mirror, and as he did so I noticed that it was directed to my mother. No sooner had he turned again, however, than the document slipped from the position in which he had placed it, and disappeared from view between the back of the glass and the wall.

I followed every movement of my father with the keenest interest, wondering what was to happen next.

He cautiously approached the door leading from the apartment, and listened attentively. Apparently satisfied, he next unlocked a drawer in his desk, and produced from it a small revolver (I remembered it well, for it was I who had purchased it for him a year previously as a safeguard against burglars), which he handled caressingly. He then sank into his chair with a deep sigh, and, gazing into vacancy, appeared to be deeply absorbed in thought. In that attitude he remained for some time.

It was not long before I comprehended my father's intent.

I saw him quickly raise the weapon which was in his hand, and press the muzzle to his temple.

Desparately I struggled to save my father from himself. I felt the veins in my forehead swell out like whipcords. With clenched teeth, madly I strove to overcome the influence which held me as with bands of steel.

He held the revolver for a few seconds rigidly to his head, then let it slowly fall again, as if he lacked the necessary courage to carry out his design.

Once more was the revolver raised. Once more did I struggle frantically. I saw my father clench his teeth as he nerved himself for the fatal act. I heard a sharp report, and, concentrating all my energy by a superhuman effort, gave utterance to a loud cry as I rushed forward to catch him ere he fell.

But all faded away, and instead of being in my father's library, I was once more in the Hong Kong opium den, my guide standing by my side.

"Cap'n notee hab nicee dream—bad," said that individual with a grin, as I gazed round vacantly for a moment.

Without deigning a reply to his jocose remark, I rewarded him for services rendered, and, wiping with trembling hands the clammy perspiration from my brow, hurried out into the open air.

It was the next day before I entirely recovered from the unpleasant effects of my first pipe of opium, but many weeks elapsed before the vision conjured up by it ceased to haunt my thoughts. Every detail seemed indelibly stamped upon my memory, and it left an impression which I found difficult to throw off. In fact, I even began to persuade myself that the incident had, indeed, been enacted in reality, and once yielded so far as to commence writing a letter home in order to set my mind at rest; but the next moment, fearing the ridicule which I knew the receipt of such a communication would evoke, I laughed over my superstitious weakness, and concluded at the same time that I was a fool.

* * * * *

Once more I stood on English soil. Nor did I regret it, for the wandering mode of existence I had been practising at length began to pall upon me.

The voyage across the Atlantic from New York was performed uneventfully, and on reaching Liverpool I dispatched a telegram to my people at Highgate, informing them at what time to expect me.

The train was on the point of departure as I entered the station, and I hurriedly jumped into a compartment as the whistle sounded.

The only occupant beside myself was a stout, middleaged individual, who was seated opposite me, seemingly absorbed in the Daily News, but I often caught him peering inquisitively at me over the top of the paper in a manner which seemed very familiar.

Presently he exclaimed with a chuckle, while he extended his hand:

"Bless my soul, Jack, don't you remember me? Glad to see you back again, my boy, safe and sound."

Immediately on hearing his voice, I recognised him as an old friend of my father, whom I often met at home.

"Mr. Tollervey," I answered, taking his proffered hand and shaking it cordially. "I thought your features were not unknown to me. You are the first to welcome me home after my long absence. Well, and the news. There must be quite a budget."

My travelling companion instantly assumed a grave demeanour, and favoured me with a peculiar look, the import of which I was at a loss to understand.

"My dear boy, you must prepare yourself for bad news."

I started and inquired rather anxiously:

"Has anything happened at home?"

"Your father," returned my companion, abruptly.

"What of him? Is he ill?" and a dreadful apprehension seized me.

"Worse," and Mr. Tollervey gazed from the window, as though something we were passing greatly interested him.

Soon he turned from it, and after a few moments' silence said:

"Your father is dead, and they say that he was murdered."

"Murdered!" I gasped; "and by whom?"

"Your brother was arrested for the crime, but I do not believe he did it," answered Mr. Tollervey, in a low voice.

I sank back upon the seat speechless and inert. Great Heavens! What a home-coming for me.

"There surely is a mistake somewhere," I presently said; "my brother cannot be guilty of such an act. Why has he not cleared himself?"

"Ah, he's in a bad fix," exclaimed my companion. "His version of the affair was that your father committed suicide."

"What!" I ejaculated, springing from my seat in amazement; "then it's the truth."

Not knowing the true cause of my emotion, Mr. Tollervey gently pushed me back into the seat, bidding me to compose myself.

"If you will listen," said he. "I will give you the facts of the case from beginning to end.

"It was about eight o'clock in the evening. The coachman was locking up the stable, when he was startled by hearing a pistol shot, the sound apparently proceeding from the library. A light was burning in that apartment, and running as quickly as possible up the walk he peered through the window. The blinds were not drawn, so he obtained a full view of the interior. Your father was leaning forward in his chair with an ugly wound in the temple, and life appeared extinct. Your brother was standing close behind him, his face very pale, holding in his hand a smoking revolver. The coachman immediately gave the alarm, and medical aid and the police were quickly summoned.

"The next morning your brother was arrested for murder. At his trial he swore that he was innocent, and asserted that as he was about to enter the library on the evening in question, he heard the report of firearms. Rushing within, he picked up the revolver, which he saw lying smoking upon the floor, and, as he did so, beheld the condition of his father, who was expiring in his chair. So great was the shock that he was for the moment rendered helpless, unable to act or to think, until the rest of the household appeared on the scene, having been alarmed by the coachman."

"Tell me the date upon which this happened?" I inquired, nervously.

After a moment's thought my fellow-traveller replied:

"Upon the 12th of October last."

Could it have been a coincidence? for upon that very day I had made my opium experiment, which consequently resulted in that horrible vision brought back again so fresh to my memory. At first I thought that possibly I was mistaken; but it was not so, for the entry in my diary destroyed all lingering doubts, and I vainly sought for an explanation of the mystery, for mystery it was.

Eventually the train steamed slowly into the station at which we were to alight, and there I parted with Mr. Tollervey.

Hailing a cab, I was speedily driven home, but my arrival was announced by no boisterous demonstration. That a cloud enveloped the house I saw at a glance upon entering, and although I was quietly received, at the same time my welcome was by no means a cool one.

My mother, who had been prostrated by the blow, was still confined to her room, so the only person with whom I could converse, and elicit the information I required, was my sister.

I learnt nothing of importance from her, however, more than I had already heard, save that my brother's trial had been adjourned until the next sessions, when he would be again arraigned before a special jury; so that I had not much time before me if I wished to do anything towards proving his innocence.

I rose next morning, after spending a sleepless night, and, before the rest of the household were stirring, proceeded to the apartment in which my father had met his death, an unaccountable fascination seeming to attract my footsteps thither.

Immediately upon entering, as my eyes encountered the familiar objects around me, I shuddered involuntarily as the vision of the suicide came more forcibly than ever to my mind.

Mechanically I crossed over to the spot where I thought I had stood whilst under the opium's mysterious influence, and once more in fancy witnessed my parent's strange proceedings.

There, in the same position, stood the desk, upon which he had written the letter, and opposite was the mirror, whereupon he had placed it after completion.

I instinctively glanced upwards, as though expecting to see the letter still there, but I suddenly remembered that it had disappeared from view between the mirror and the wall, as my father turned away.

My heart palpitated rapidly, as, acting in obedience to a sudden impulse, I started towards the mantelpiece and removed the mirror from its resting place.

The next moment it slipped from my nerveless fingers, and fell to the floor with a crash, for between it and the wall, discoloured by the dust, I caught sight of a letter, which, at the same moment, I saw was directed to my mother in my father's hand-writing.

For a time I was completely overcome by the discovery, and sank into a chair until I could regain possession of my faculties. At once I concluded that my vision in the opium den was, indeed, the truth, and I had been a witness of what actually had occurred, although so many miles away.

I placed the letter in my pocket, and wandered aimlessly about the place in feverish impatience, anxiously waiting for the moment to arrive when I could interview my mother in private, and at the same time I was burning with curiosity to know the contents of the strangely-discovered epistle.

After breakfast my mother summoned me to her room, and then in as few words as possible I related how the letter came into my possession, making it appear, however, that my finding it had been purely an accident.

With trembling hands she broke the seal, and, after reading, handed it back without uttering a word, although I noticed that her face was paler than before.

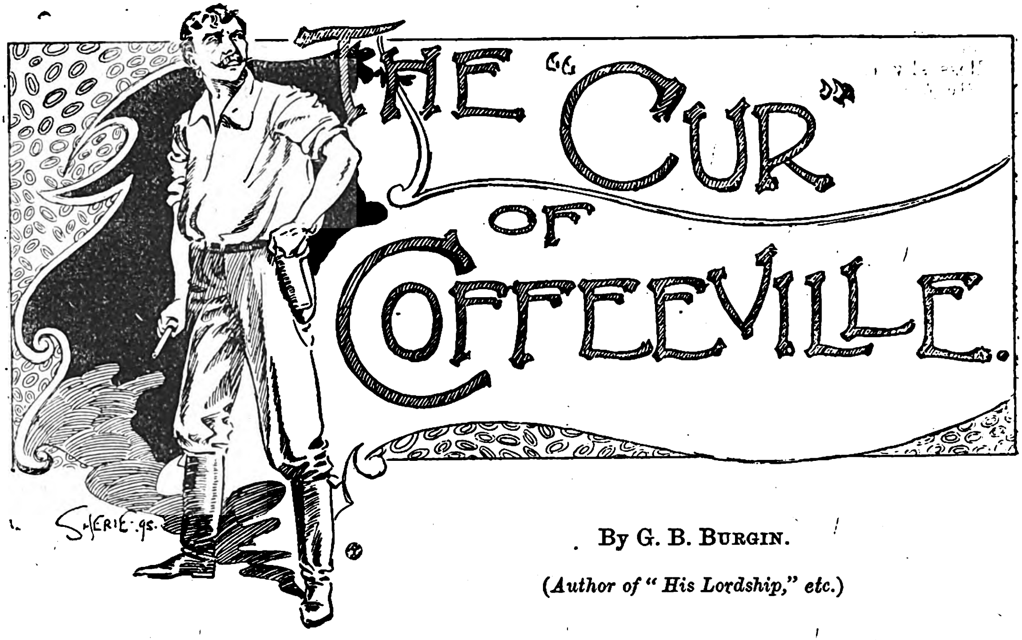
It seemed that my father had been labouring under the delusion that we were ruined, and accused himself of having beggared his family although at the time of his death his affairs seemed never in a more flourishing condition.

The letter ran on in this strain, and concluded by bidding farewell to all, adding that being unable to face the blow he had resolved to meet death rather than live the victim of self-recrimination.

The truth was now painfully apparent. That my father's mind had succumbed to the great strain of business anxieties was plain, for as I have before said, he had incurred no losses, but, on the contrary, had been very successful in his undertakings, so consequently he had committed suicide while temporarily insane.

Needless to say, the letter clearly established my brother's innocence, although by what means the finding of it was brought about I deem it best to hold a secret, and you are the first to whom I have imparted it.

W. H. W



THE "CUR" OF COFFEEVILLE.

By G. B. Burgin.

(Author of "His Lordship," etc.)

ANTONIO and Juanita sat within the dimly-lit room of the ranche, the gambler scowling sullenly, and the pretty vivacious Mexican girl very much in love with the handsome villain her husband, yet bored to death by the monotony of her surroundings. Even the thick adobe walls could not keep out the blistering heat. Antonio chafed at his enforced retirement from the cheating of Gringos (Yankees) in Coffeeville; Juanita pined for the delights of dancing and the gaming tables at which she acted as decoy. If only Antonio's temper were not so bad, they might have been plying their vocation merrily at this moment, and now—Piff! What great children men were with their tempers and jealousies and little barking pistols and sharp ugly knives to let the life-blood slip from out of one another with a few dexterous slits and slashes. Piff! But a girl must be careful how she flirted with a Gringo, or there was an end to everything. No more dancing or gaming, but only a flower-covered bier before the high altar, the swinging of incense by acolytes, the droning voice of the Padre reciting the prayers for the dead; and then a little hole in the ground where even the music of the festa failed to reach one. Piff! again; and she came back to the present with a sigh which did not tend to improve Antonio's temper.

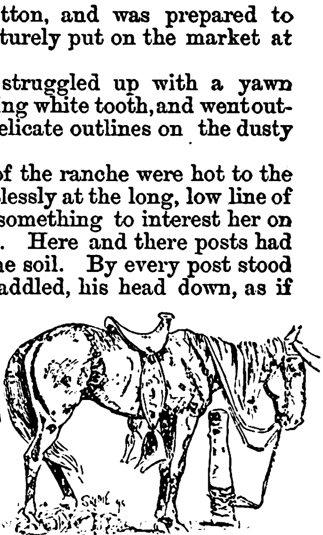
Juanita yawned, let one slipper lazily fall to the ground, and inhaled the smoke of her cigarette. "Mother of God!" she said, "but it is dull—and hot. Almost as hot, Antonio, as when you knifed the tenderfoot at Coffeeville, and had to run for the ranche."

Antonio Pinto, a tall, wiry, athletic scoundrel of great personal beauty, bent his black brows at pretty Juanita, as if she had recalled unpleasant associations. "Take care, light of my life," he murmured, "lest I treat you in the same way. You are overmuch given to the society of Gringos."

Juanita's cigarette fell after her slipper; she followed the cigarette, and lazily wound her way across the mud floor with slow, sinuous movements to the desperado who lay on a rude couch opposite. The girl threw her arms round Antonio and kissed him passionately. "Thou knowest, little lamb, that I should die if aught befel thee," she murmured, caressingly.

Antonio turned over and went to sleep again, one hand clasping a revolver, with the air of a lamb who knew his own value as mutton, and was prepared to defend it from being prematurely put on the market at all hazards.

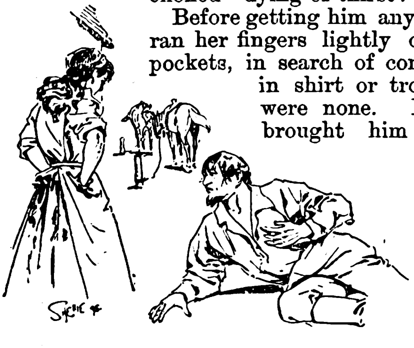
Thus repulsed, Juanita struggled up with a yawn which displayed every gleaming white tooth, and went outside, her bare feet leaving delicate outlines on the dusty floor.



Outside, the adobe walls of the ranche were hot to the touch. The girl looked listlessly at the long, low line of stables, vainly seeking for something to interest her on this dullest of all dull days. Here and there posts had been driven into the alkaline soil. By every post stood a dejected broncho, ready saddled, his head down, as if convinced that he had been tied to the post, and that it was useless to attempt to run away, even should there be an object attainable by running anywhere. The pitiless sun caught the copper-mounted pommels of the red leather saddles until they glowed again. All around it beat down on dusty alkaline plains, sparsely covered with sage brush. Not a tree was to be seen for miles; the level plain simply melted away into the horizon without a break or dip to vary its monotonous regularity. It was a sleepily languid world, in which even the insects were too drowsy to give one sign of life. Above, the cloudless sky, its vertical sun-rays streaming down with deadly force; around, the grey dust of the plains, the sombre adobe buildings, the death-like silence, the utter absence of animation in any living thing. No wonder that Juanita yawned, and wished again that Antonio would content himself with cheating Gringos in a gentlemanly fashion, and not knife them afterwards because they were foolish enough to object to the originality of his methods.

As Juanita stood in the doorway, a yellow, lean, hungry mongrel incautiously approached the nearest and sleepiest-looking broncho, which was apparently meditating on the abundance of spurs and riatas in general, and the scarcity of food in particular. A moment later a thin, yellow, howling streak of something canine disappeared in the direction of the stables, and the broncho languidly raised his head with an air which implied that if dogs would persist in running up against posts, accidents were bound to happen.

Juanita gazed at the sleepy bronchos, the panting dogs in the dust, the copper-coloured sky, and patches of sage bush with another sigh of disgust. Suddenly she noticed a little speck coming from the westward. "Quc demonios!" she muttered, anxiously sheltering her eyes with her hand. After the lapse of half an hour she could see that it was someone on foot, who limped wearily along, eyes cast upon the ground, as if seeking a crack therein to hide him from the perfervid sun. On nearing the ranche the man reeled in his walk. Juanita thought that he must be either tired or drunk, after the manner of the "Americanos" who have been "cleaned out" at the gambling saloons, stripped to the shirt, and then turned adrift to the tender mercies and fellowship of those other social and equally poverty-stricken outcasts, the coyotes. Once or twice he staggered despairingly, and shook his clenched fist at the sky. When near the low adobe walls of the ranche the fellow halted doubtfully, crept forward to the sheltering doorway, and fell in a heap at Juanita's feet. "Water, water!" he cried, hoarsely; "I'm parched—choked—dying of thirst!"



Before getting him any water, the girl ran her fingers lightly over the man's pockets, in search of concealed weapons in shirt or trousers. There were none. Reassured, she brought him a well-filled gourd, and laughed to see the poor fellow gulp it down. When the gourd was empty, she fetched a bucket filled with the sparkling treasure, and dashed some of it over his shoeless feet. "Cleaned out, eh?" she asked, hands on hips, as she leant against the doorway.

As the stranger crawled towards the bucket, here and there a bronzed patch of skin showed faintly through the grey alkali dust, which also streaked his hair, and hung in powdery bags beneath his eyes. The individual who plunged his head into the bucket might have been fifty; the face which emerged from it was that of a man of three or four-and-twenty, worn and thin, but resolutely handsome.

The girl motioned him to continue his way; but the stranger only shook his head, with a muttered "Manana, manana (by-and-bye); I guess it don't matter whether I die here or out in the sun," he said, despairingly. "It's cooler here, that's the only difference."

The girl looked at him significantly. "Madre de Dios, you won't find a bullet very cooling; and it's quicker."

"Yes," said the man, slowly; "it's quicker; that's all you can say for it, I reckon."

"Quien sabe?" doubtfully retorted Juanita.

"Well, get it over and finish me." He threw open the breast of his shirt, crawled outside, as if out of consideration for people who might object to a corpse in their house, and propped himself up against the wall.

"Que lestina!" (What a pity!) cried Juanita. "Why should I want to kill you?" Her velvety eyes rested upon his lean, handsome face for a moment. "Bienvenido. What use is a dead Gringo to anyone? He can't dance, or play the guitar, or," she whispered, "make love."

The man was about to answer, when, with a stealthy cat-like tread, Antonio emerged from the ranche, his pistol ready cocked. "What's all this?" he asked, suspiciously, covering the tramp with his weapon.

The girl shrugged her shoulders indifferently, and turned away with a softly uttered "Adios" to the stranger. "Your successor at the saloon does his work well," she said. "The man is almost naked. He wants to be shot."

Antonio raised the pistol. "Where?"

"Heart's the best place," the tramp rejoined, indifferently. "Get it over, and fling me to the coyotes."

Antonio hesitated. His hands were already red with blood. "Bah," he said; "who's to bury you! Will you eat my bread? If so, bueno."

"I don't seem to have much of an appetite for anyone's bread," answered the tramp, reluctantly. "It's the worst jag I've ever been on." He rubbed his head in a puzzled way.

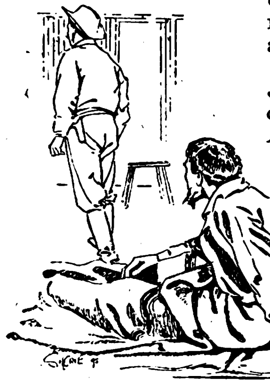
"Like a big ball of fire?" asked Antonio, enviously. During his term of office at the saloon he had never plucked his pigeons so thoroughly as this one appeared to be stripped. "Get up," he said. "Juanita, find him something for his feet. If there is anything wrong, we can settle it afterwards." He tapped the revolver significantly with one brown, thin finger, leisurely rolled a fresh cigarette, and went inside the ranche. The woman followed him. She knew how well that little revolver carried.

Thus left to himself, the tramp curled up inside the door, and fell asleep. When he awoke it was dusk—a cool, lovely dusk, in which the moving figures of people outside assumed gigantic proportions. The night was filled with the odorous breath of distant flowers wafted from the city across the barren plains by the grateful breeze. One or two peons lounged about the fire, clad in huge hats and striped blankets, for after the fierce heat of the day, the air was chilly. One by one the stars began to creep over the darkened plain; there was a savoury smell of cooking outside struggling with and alternately overcoming and being overcome by the breath of the night-breeze. As the stranger sat up and began to realise where he was, Juanita passed through the doorway and joined Antonio in the eating of some savoury mess seasoned with red peppers. When they had finished, Antonio beckoned to the tramp. "Eat of my dish, then you are my man and no cur. If you ever disobey me, I'll blow out your cursed Gringo brains."

He waved his arm in all directions, as if emphasising the distribution of his new retainer's brains. That worthy followed the movement with a grin. "They'd not go so far as that," he said; and ravenously began to eat, the Mexican never relaxing his vigilance for a single second, although, when the meal was over, he tossed the tramp a packet of cigarettes, and lit one of them at his own for the newcomer.

In the middle of the night, the tramp felt someone bending over him. Long, light fingers dexterously searched his shirt and trouser pockets. It was only the Mexican making sure that Juanita had done her work thoroughly. "'Twould be safer to blow out his brains," said Antonio, rising reluctantly, his eyes gleaming in the moonlight. "Bah, this poor devil who calls himself 'Smeeth,' has eaten my bread and may be useful."

As he moved away the tramp sat up. Even in the moonlight his grin was expansive and wide. "That's a close call," he muttered, surveying Antonio's retreating form. "It's getting cold." Then he unconcernedly drew Antonio's old blanket round him and went to sleep again.



In a month "Smeeth," as Juanita called him, had become a member of the family. Antonio paid him three dollars a week to make himself generally useful, and then, with the indifference of his race, awaited the course of events. At times, when the society of Juanita palled upon him, Antonio played cards with "Smeeth" and Juanita's brother, "Smeeth" stipulating beforehand, that, as he was an inexperienced Englishman, who had already been plundered of every farthing he possessed, he was not to pay up if luck went against him. Events showed the prudence of this arrangement, for Antonio always won. "Smeeth's" only consolation under his defeat was to obtain permission once a week to go into Coffeeville to buy whiskey. As he was naturally generous, and never drank it all himself, Antonio always gave him permission to go. "Smeeth" generally returned with the news that the feeling against Antonio (he had knifed two men who had the impertinence to accuse him of having cheated—an accusation which was strictly true) was stronger than ever, and industriously fomented by the new holder of the saloon in the hope of keeping Antonio permanently away from such a promising district. Antonio's language when he heard of this iniquitous proceeding was not pleasant; it required all Juanita's tact to prevent him from throwing himself into the saddle and making a wild rush through the town, revolver in hand. She pointed out that even if he were not killed, such a proceeding would infallibly induce every inhabitant of Coffeeville to attack the ranche, armed to the teeth, whilst now, such was the terror inspired by his marvellous strength and accuracy as a marksman, not one of the Yankee dogs dare come within a mile of the place. Soon the whole affair would blow over; Antonio could make some votive offerings at the next festa, and shortly after resume his honourable and gentlemanly calling. Whereupon Antonio grunted a surly assent, and searched "Smeeth's" pockets with renewed vigilance. He had every confidence in that worthy, but still it was just as well to be careful. The reward set upon his (Antonio's) head was a very large one, and "Smeeth" seemed to be a poor man to whom this amount represented opulence and unlimited whiskey.

When Antonio went away after this proceeding, "Smeeth's" blood was up, although he had snored through the ordeal in his customary ingenuous manner. "I guess I've had enough of this," he said. "It's about time I put an end to it. If I don't he'll end me. I'm afraid, too, of the way that black-eyed girl looks at me, wanting to know if England ain't a beautiful place to live in. It may be comfortable enough for some people to live there, but 'tain't altogether healthy for me, when I'm no more an Englishman than she is, but only a Gringo."

The vision of Juanita, cigarette in mouth, riding through a quiet English lane upset "Smeeth's" gravity altogether, and he laughed until Antonio suspiciously returned to see what was the matter.

"Had a bad dream," said "Smeeth," humbly. "Seemed to fancy someone was tickling me. Warn't it funny, Boss?'

Antonio showed his long knife significantly. "Señor Smeeth, it is this which does not make people laugh when it tickles," he said, gravely.

"Oh, no, 'twasn't like that," said "Smeeth." "Seemed more as if someone was feeling in my pockets. I've dreamed that most nights lately."

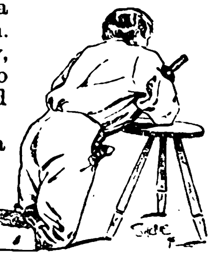
Antonio pretended not to hear, and was striding away when "Smeeth" preferred a humble petition that he might spend the next day in Coffeeville, on the ground that he was dying for whiskey and must have it.

When Antonio had gone back to bed again, "Smeeth" hastily dug a hole in the floor, put a piece of board over the cavity, replaced the earth, and resumed his interrupted slumbers.

He was afoot early the next morning, and departed gaily after a cautious flirtation with Juanita, who, tired of the seclusion of the ranche, pined for the Coffeeville dancing saloons. When he returned late in the afternoon he was in a very hilarious mood indeed. He hurriedly stumbled into his little room, and came out again to see if anyone had noticed his return. "It is plain that the Señor has all he can carry," said Juanita, meeting him on the threshold of the ranche.

"Smeeth" looked at her with drink-sodden eyes, and reeled by again into the little room allotted to his use. When Juanita peeped in she found him bending down in the corner hastily patting the ground. She laughed and thought it very funny. Juanita was accustomed to drunken men. "If you have finished the whiskey, I would not be you when Antonio awakes from his siesta," she said significantly.

"Smeeth" turned to her with a foolish smile. "It'sh or right," he said, thickly. "Jusalittle bit happy; thatsh all. It'sh or right," and he staggered to his feet.



Antonio's voice was heard calling for "the cursed English pig."

"Pig'sh c—c—comin' with his swi—will," said "Smeeth," lurching forward with a jug of whiskey. "Wheresh y'r br—ruther?"

"Guarding the passage," replied Juanita. "When he sleeps, Antonio watches for the Gringos."

"Smeeth" lurched forward into the room, nearly spilling the whiskey in his drunken haste. Antonio snatched the jug away, kicked him into a corner, and drank deeply. "Smeeth" poured a little of the whiskey into a tumbler for Juanita, who sipped it daintily. From time to time the man in the passage, whose duty it was to prevent the revellers from being surprised, put his head in at the door and smelt the odour of the whiskey with dilated nostril. Presently, Antonio's head fell forward on his breast; he slid back with a snore. Juanita also begun to snore, more musically than Antonio, but, for all that, an undisguised snore.

"Smeeth" slipped a pair of handcuffs out of his pocket, clicked them over Antonio's huge wrists, and doubtfully surveyed the doorway. "It's my turn to search now," he said, with a grin, and took away Antonio's weapons. His next step was to go into the passage, and put a pistol to the head of Juanita's brother, who leant against the wall rolling a cigarette. In less time than it takes to relate, that worthy was weaponless and handcuffed also. "Smeeth's" recovery from his drunken fit seemed miraculous in its celerity.

"Now," said "Smeeth," "I ain't agoin' to hurt you as long as you keep quiet. March into that room, and sit down on your bed."

Juanita's brother got up with a scowl, walked meekly into the room, and swore softly as "Smeeth" turned the key on him.

It took "Smeeth" an hour to get his captive into a Mexican cart. "I'm most afraid I drugged that whiskey too much," he murmured, as he drove quietly into Coffeeville, drew up before a certain building, and gave a low whistle.

The cart was immediately surrounded by half-a-dozen American detectives. "What's the use of bringing in a body?" growled one, who seemed to be in authority. "I knew you'd never get him alive."

"Throw a bucket of water over him," said "Smeeth," quietly; "but don't take the bracelets off, whatever you do."

Antonio was dragged out of the cart, soused with a bucket of water, and half-led, half-carried into the house. It was some minutes before he sat up and realised that he had been trapped by a detective for the sake of "blood-money." His lowering eyes roamed restlessly round the room, looking for his betrayer, but "Smeeth" unostentatiously kept in the background. When he saw that the recognition could no longer be delayed he stepped forward, and the two men looked each other in the face.

"Caramba! You Coffeeville cur!" hissed Antonio, straining at the fetters which fastened his wrists. "And I gave you bread!"

The handcuffs did not yield to the enormous strain put upon them. "Take them off for three minutes. Mother of God, only three minutes," Antonio implored the chief of the detectives. "Then you can do as you please with me."

"Smeeth" nodded to his Chief. "That's fair; I caught him by a dirty trick. There's a wall round the courtyard and a door each side. Give him a revolver and put him one side; I'll come in at the other. If he plugs me, you're to let him go; then it's all fair and square."

"I don't hold with this foolishness," said the Chief, irresolutely.

"I've eaten his bread," said "Smeeth," alias Billy Wentworth, the celebrated detective. "It's a dirty trick I played him, and I'll take my chances."

Antonio's eyes lighted up. "Vamos, that is better," he said, bowing courteously to the detective. "Only three minutes; that is all I ask."

"A good deal can be done in three minutes," said "Smeeth," drily, handing a loaded revolver to Antonio, and turning his back upon him with the utmost coolness. "Give him a drink, boys. If he plugs me he's to have a day's start." He turned round again and looked Antonio full in the face as if in response to the other's mute questioning. "Oh, I'll look after her! She was drugged, too."

Antonio took the whiskey handed to him. "Smeeth" did the same.

"To our meeting in the next world, Señor," cried Antonio.

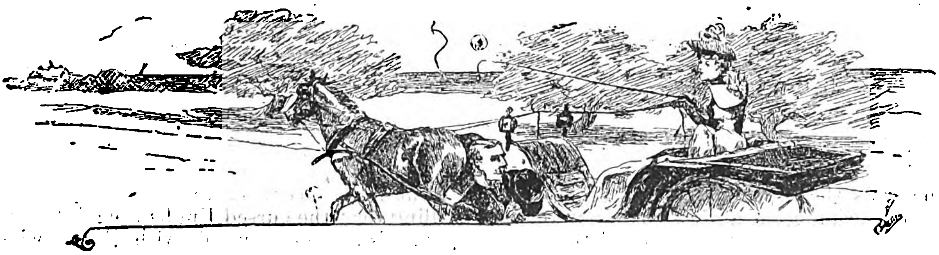
"Amen!" said "Smeeth," flinging his tumbler to the ground, and following Antonio into the cool, open air.

The two men entered the courtyard from opposite sides. In a few seconds their revolvers began to sound with short, sharp, whiplike cracks. Then all was silent.

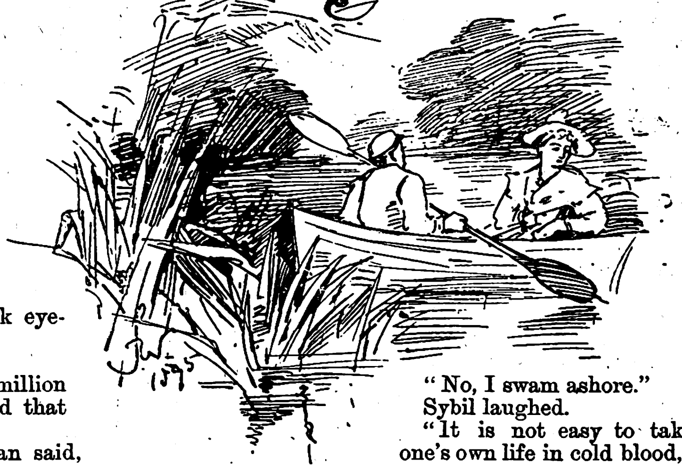
"We'd better go in now, boys," said the Chief, nervously. "He's downed Billy for sure."

They went in—at a run. Antonio lay flat on the ground riddled with bullets. "Smeeth" sat somewhat languidly propped up against the wall, with a wound in his shoulder. The chief regarded him reproachfully. "Plugged by a Mexican!" he said, in sorrowing tones. "Billy, I didn't think it of you."

"Smeeth" grinned apologetically. "I'd eaten his bread," he said; "that sort of stuck in my throat, so I let him fire first. I wasn't going to be shamed by a low-down greaser, not much" and he fainted.



WORTHY O' WOMAN!



“IF you ask me,” the girl was saying, as the canoe glided down beneath the grey-leaved willows, “I think the man who would commit suicide for a woman can have had very little to do with the other sex.”

Percy Wallace drew his paddle out of the water and laid it across his knees, raising his dark eyebrows interrogatively.

“Why?” he inquired.

“Because not one in a million is worth the sacrifice, and that one only by comparison.”

“Nevertheless,” the man said, “you can hardly take up a paper without finding the report of a suicide for which the only motive is a love affair.”

Sybil St. Croix gave a little contemptuous shrug of her pretty shoulders.

“Love has got a bad name, like Monte Carlo,” she said, smiling across the boat at her companion, “and like Monte Carlo it is made the scapegoat for a great deal of iniquity with which it has nothing to do whatever. The world, after all, is blind. It blames the last straw for breaking the camel's back. No man, whose mind was not already unhinged, would ever blow out his brains for a woman, unless, as I said just now, he knew nothing about the sex. There may be a few who are worth waiting for, but none who are worth dying for—none;” and the girl leant back among the luxurious pile of cushions in the bow and laughed.

A rippling breeze had turned the nose of the canoe and driven the little craft ashore among the flat green blades of the waterflags that rustled together by the riverside. The man pushed off mechanically, and they drifted on again between the steep green banks and sloping meadows where the cattle stood knee-deep among a golden crop of marigolds. It was growing late, and the last lingering gleam of sunshine had faded from the fleecy clouds that floated here and there in the pale blue expanse of sky. A light mist was rising from the river, and the early summer heat had given way to the freshness of the evening atmosphere.

“You may be right—or partly right,” Wallace said, at last, taking a few lazy strokes with the paddle and resting again; “but, for all that, exactly two years ago to-day I tried to drown myself for no other reason in the world than because a woman, a mere slip of a girl, thought it amusing or clever to deceive me.”

Sybil leant forward.

“Did you, Percy,” she exclaimed, incredulously. “Tell me?”

“There is nothing to tell.”

“But what happened?”

“Nothing. That's the ignominious part about it.”

“Did you sink?”

“No, I swam ashore.”

Sybil laughed.

“It is not easy to take one's own life in cold blood,” she said.

“And still less in cold water.”

“For which, I suppose, you are duly thankful—now that you have had time to think the matter over?”

Percy Wallace shrugged his broad shoulders.

“I have never been able to make up my mind,” he answered, sadly.

“Then I will make it up for you. Love is fiction—and only fact if you choose to make it so. In another twelve months you will have forgotten all about this girl.”

The man shook his head.

“You would not say that if you have ever known what it was to be in love yourself,” he answered. “I can never adore anyone again as I worshipped Miss Edmunds. Never!”

“Rubbish!” the girl interposed. “Someone else will take her place before long—someone who is a great deal more worthy of your affections than she was.”

They had reached the landing-stage by this time, and Wallace helped the girl to disembark, and fastened the painter before he said, half lightly, half in serious mood:

“Do you imagine, Sybil, that a man who has ever really loved could love again?”

“Twice,” mockingly. “A hundred times! Not in the same way, perhaps, but with equal fervour. Percy, I honestly think that you ought to cease moping for this girl, whom you only cared for as long as you did not know what her true character was. You are making yourself miserable for nothing.”

“You don't understand,” the man said. “It would not be fair for me to ask any girl to be my wife when I know all the time that I love another better. Love her, although I know she deserves only to be despised and hated, and although I believe and hope for my peace of mind that I shall never set eyes on her again.”

Nevertheless, Sybil St. Croix's words had made an impression on Wallace. He thought of them again on his way up to town that night, and he was still thinking the matter over when he reached his rooms in Jermyn Street a few hours later and found a note waiting for him on the table. The handwriting was not altogether unfamiliar, and he tore open the envelope with some degree of interest.

"Dear Mr. Wallace," it ran, "just a line to say we have arrived at the Grand Hotel, and that I hope to see you very soon. Are you engaged for lunch to-morrow? If not, I shall be delighted if you care to come round,—Most sincerely yours, Olive Norton."

Wallace read the letter through twice and then put it down with a smile. It was distinctly gratifying that this girl should remember a promise made six months before, to write and let him know whenever she came to London. They had met at a country house during the winter, and seen a good deal of each other. So much so, indeed, that embarrassing rumours had flown round about a pending engagement. They recurred to Wallace, and possibly it was the recollection of Sybil's remarks that afternoon that made them appear less ridiculous than they had at the time. Now he came to consider the matter he could not see what there was ridiculous about such an idea at all. Perhaps the girl really cared for him. He had never thought of this contingency seriously before. He pulled a long face at the notion, and began pacing up and down the room.

Six months before, if anyone had asked him why he was not in love with Olive Norton he might have given two answers, both of which would have been equally true. He could have said that his affections were set elsewhere, and added, had he felt in the humour, set at nought, or he might merely have answered that so many men were, or pretended to be, in that felicitous state, that he did not care to join the herd.

Now, however, Wallace—setting forth the pros and cons of the matter with careful impartiality—decided that Sybil's view of his own position was the only sensible one to take. That Miss Norton cared for him was at least a reasonable supposition, and of his own feelings towards her he entertained no manner of doubt. He liked the girl and admired her and enjoyed her friendship.

The following day he went round to the hotel for lunch. Miss Norton's reception was certainly flattering, coming from an attractive girl, a girl whom he knew as an absolute fact had been proposed to by several of the most run-after men in London. It had never occurred to him before how absolutely pretty she was, and, charmed by her vivacious manner, and her evident appreciation of his attentions, he promptly proceeded to press his suit, thinking, as all wise men think, that there is no time like the present for making a good impression.

Lunch finished, they drove together to the park.

"I am afraid that it is too early for the fashionable world to be here," observed Wallace, as they alighted from their hansom, and turned together down the long shady avenue beside the Row.

"So much the better. Let us sit down here, away from everybody, and talk."

They selected two chairs in a long empty line against the railings, and sat there undisturbed by the sight of a single human being, save one solitary equestrian who was cantering slowly up and down in the sun.

Wallace was rapidly making up his mind to bring things to an issue. He could see from the girl's manner that she was in love with him, and now and then when she turned and said something, and their eyes met, he felt a thrill run through him which gave him exquisite pleasure. There was a gratifying sense of superiority, too, in having won this girl, when he had watched others try and fail and go away defeated.

Olive Norton was leaning back in her chair, her hands clasped behind her head, her eyes fixed on a bright bed of flowers across the road, supremely happy and contented. She was smiling a little, showing a pretty set of teeth, and an unusual depth of colour heightened the beauty of her face.

"How is Sybil St Criox?" she asked, suddenly.

Percy Wallace looked surprised.

"Quite well, I believe. I have just come back, from their place. But why do you ask like that?" and he turned round a little and gave his companion a quick, furtive glance.

"Because I am told you admire her so."

"Who told you?"

"I don't know. Everyone says so."

The man shrugged his shoulders.

"We are the best of friends," he said, speaking, in a low, lazy voice.

"Friends are people whom we like too much to love?"

"Perhaps——. But it is utterly untrue that Sybil St. Croix is anything to me, in the way you mean. We tell each other everything. Confidence is not the beginning of love. I only adore one person in the world—and that is you."

He did not change his voice or his position; but the little green spider he was chivying with his stick escaped and he did not notice it.

"I wish you wouldn't talk like that," the girl exclaimed, "I like you much best when you are serious."

"I am serious. I mean every word that I say. Olive, I love you."

The girl's heart was beating fast. A hot wave of colour rushed to her face. "I don't believe you," she said a little breathlessly. "You wouldn't say it like that if you did."

Wallace looked up and down. He was anxious not to make himself ridiculous. No one, however, was in sight. He turned quickly and caught her in his arms, kissing her three times before he let her go.

The moment the girl escaped she sprang to her feet hot and flushed, catching her underlip with her teeth.

"I never said that you might kiss me," she panted.

Wallace captured her hand and drew her back to her seat.

"Don't talk nonsense," he said. "If the man may not kiss the girl he is going to marry ——"

"Who said I was going to marry you, sir?"

"You must, now you have allowed me to kiss you here;" and satisfied with this delightful form of argument he released her hand and sat looking at her with love-filled eyes. Sybil St. Croix was certainly right. There was not an atom of doubt about that. So he thought and wondered at his own inconsistency before the day was out.

There was silence for some time and then the girl said:

"Am I the first women you have ever loved well enough to speak to as you have spoken to me, Percy?"

"There was one other," Wallace admitted, truthfully, "but I never asked her to marry me. Thank heaven I found out in time what manner of girl she was."

"Perhaps she would have said 'No,' if you had asked her."

"Probably. I know now that she liked someone else better. But you never can tell."

"I want to hear about her, Percy. I am jealous already."

"It is an old story now," he said, passing his hand over his face and sighing a little. "Three years ago I was wintering at Cannes, and there I met this girl who was travelling alone with her mother. I saw a good deal of her, as people do when they are thrown together in a place like that. Sometimes I would be round at their hotel three or four times a day. We walked together and drove together, and went excursions up the olive-clad ravines.

"From the first evening we spent in one another's company, strolling about the luxuriant gardens in the soft moonlight, I knew that I and my fate had met, and each day I grew fonder of the girl, and by every token she returned my affections. When I was away from her I was miserable until we met again, and she used to tell me that she had counted the hours of my absence.

"Well, when a girl says things like that to you, and apparently means them, you naturally begin to regard her as your special property. About three weeks after we were first introduced I happened to be strolling along the promenade one day at dusk by the side of the picturesque little harbour filled with shipping from which many gay streams of colour were waving gently in the wind. No one except a few peasants and sailors were in sight. I lighted a cigar and sat down.

"Presently my attention was attracted by a little boat which put off from one of the yachts, and was pulled rapidly towards the landing-stage. Thinking the owner would probably be on board, I moved down with some curiosity in that direction, keeping, however, on the further side of the road. As the boat neared the shore I saw that there were two passengers on board—a man and a girl, whose back was turned towards me.

"The man was short and squarely built, with a sallow complexion and a small black beard. For some reason or other the face seemed repulsive to me. He was bending forward and speaking eagerly to the girl, and just before the landing-stage was reached he seized her hand and tried to kiss her. From where I stood it seemed to me that the girl resisted for a minute and then gave way, and the man's arm was still round her waist as the little wooden pier was reached. They got out together, and as she stepped ashore the woman's face was turned towards me for an instant."

Wallace stopped for a minute, coughing a little, and Miss Norton bent forward, laying her hand on his arm.

"Go on," she said.

"I recognised her in a moment," the man continued, speaking in a low, vibrating voice. "It was Miss Edmunds. . . . . . Just for a second I felt sick and helpless, and then a sort of boiling rage came over me, and in my anger I called her all sorts of horrible names. If Heaven had placed a knife in my hands I could have killed her—or myself.

"The two stood together, conversing in low tones. The girl was gesticulating a little; the man's hands were in his pocket, and he was frowning while he listened, and now and then stamped restlessly on the ground. What could it mean? Surely such a man as that could not be attractive. I compared him with myself, and laughed.

"Then I thought of his yacht, and my thoughts had no sooner taken this direction than I began to understand. The owner must be a man of enormous wealth—a millionaire, perhaps. People may say what they like, but there is nothing which money cannot buy—nothing. My heart was beating, my legs trembling. Perhaps it was the sound of my footfall on the gravel which made Miss Edmunds look round. The light fell full on her white face, and I saw that she was crying.

"The sight was more than I could stand in the state of mind I was then in. The moment her back was turned I crept nearer, hardly knowing what was in my heart to do. But before I had time to act, before I had time to think, there was the soft rustle of a lady's skirt behind me, a tall figure brushed by, and stopped as if suddenly transformed to stone in the middle of the roadway.

"At the sight of this apparition I shrunk back into the shadow of the trees, but from where I stood I recognised at once in the new-comer—Mrs. Edmunds. Apparently the man I had been watching recognised her too, for no sooner had she appeared than he turned on his heel without a word or a sign to the girl, and, springing into the boat, was rowed rapidly away across the harbour.

"The two women passed close by me. Mrs. Edmunds was strangely agitated, and I could see that the younger one's face, although wet with tears, was proud and defiant under the other's reproaches. Angry as I was, I felt sorry for her. In spite of what I had seen I could not bring myself to believe that anyone could come between her and me. A scrap of the conversation reached me as the two women disappeared.

"'We must leave Cannes at once,' the mother was saying in a bitter ringing voice, which sounded inexpressibly sad. 'Oh! why does that man haunt us. Promise me, Gertrude, that you will never speak to him again—never. Promise me, darling.'

"The girl's answer was inaudible.

"So they were going away. I threw myself down on a seat, and buried my face in my hands.

"Nearly an hour must have passed when I got up with a shiver, and, buttoning my coat, set off at a brisk pace for my hotel. I had made up my mind then what I would do. That evening I would see Miss Edmunds, and ask her to be my wife. But when the time came I found it impossible to get her alone to myself. It was not her doing. I could see that she was chafing under her mother's vigilant watchfulness as much as I was. At last I had to go. She followed me into the corridor. Her look, her manner, everything set my pulses on fire.

"'I must tell you,' she said; 'we're going away to-morrow night.'

"'Why?' I asked. I watched her face closely, breathlessly. She did not change colour, her eyes met mine fearlessly as ever, only the corners of her mouth dropped a little."

Percy Wallace stopped in his narration. The Park attendant was demanding payment for the chairs. He received the tickets mechanically, and then turned to his companion.

"I don't know why I should weary you with this lengthy recitation," he observed. "Suppose we talk of something else. You are finding the heat too much?" for Olive Norton's face had suddenly turned deathly white.

"No, no," she said, quickly; "go on. I want to hear. You told her that you loved her—?"

Wallace nodded.

"And she said that you were more to her than anyone else in the world?"

Again the man assented.

"And then—"

"Mrs. Edmunds came up behind. I went at once. It was no use stopping longer. When I was back in my rooms again, I sat down and wrote her a brief note, asking her to drive with me the following morning, as we might not see each other again for some time. It was nearly eleven when I received her reply. 'I am extremely sorry,' her letter said, 'but I have to lunch with a relation. Can you come round in the evening before we go?'

"I knew Miss Edmunds too well, or thought that I did, to suspect for a moment that this was merely an excuse to avoid a tête-à-tête. Her sweet admission of affection for me had disarmed even the suspicions which the scene I had witnessed had aroused. The man perhaps had influence over her, but that there was any love lost between them, I could not and would not believe. I had no cause to fear a rival, and disappointed as I was for the moment, I was thoroughly contented and happy.

"For want of something better to do, I went over to Nice by rail, and guided by some miserable instinct turned into the London House for déjeuner. Sitting at a little table together near the window were Miss Edmunds and the stranger. That I tell you frankly was the most miserable moment of my life. She looked up, caught my eye, and half rose from the table with a piteous gesture.

"I went across the room towards her, outwardly calm, but a raging fire within.

"'Your relation, I suppose, has not turned up,' I said, and with that I swung round on my heel and left the room. I heard the man utter an angry oath and spring to his feet, but I did not wait or turn. I loved the girl too much to create a scene there. Yet I was mad with jealousy and hate, and every other passion. Possible it was no longer to deceive myself into believing that this girl, whom I loved with such insane intensity, was not in love with this dark-browed stranger. Nothing short of love would have led her to compromise herself in the way she had done with him; to deceive me; to ignore her mother's entreaties and to disobey her commands.

"From that day to this I have never set eyes on her again. I have told you everything. Let us talk about some more interesting topic—about ourselves—about my love for you."

Wallace rose as he spoke, quitting his seat in that automatic way which implies an absent mind and preoccupied attention. Miss Norton followed his example.

"I would like to ask you one question," she said, with slight embarrassment and in a halting tone: "Do you still love this girl?—perhaps I have no right to expect—"

"You have every right," he interposed, quickly. "But I find it impossible to analyse my feelings. Nothing can ever justify her treatment of me. She is unworthy either of affection or admiration—that at least I know."

His companion did not answer at once. Had he glanced in her direction he would have been terrified at the piteous expression on her face; but he did not look up, he did not even raise his eyes from the ground.

"Suppose," she said abruptly—and her voice was low and tremulous—"suppose that you were to discover, that you had judged Miss Edmunds wrongly—what then?"

The man frowned.

"I do not care to consider such a ridiculous hypothesis," he said, with some warmth. "It is hardly a fair question. Surely you can believe me, you can trust me, when I say that you are all in all to me, now."

A bright, radiant look came into the girl's face, and for a moment the sanguine and delightful reveries in which she had indulged earlier in the afternoon returned with their soft enchantment, and thrilled her with passionate delight. Then the heavenly light faded, the rapt look gave place to one of melancholy.

"Listen!" she said, touchingly; "I have no right to keep back the truth from you—I know Miss Edmunds; she is my best and dearest friend."

The man started.

"How strange," he murmured, half to himself. "I suppose she is married by this time to her wealthy friend. I wish him joy."

"She is not married!"

"Ah!"

A moment's silence, and then Wallace said:

"Why, I wonder," musingly.

"Because the one man she cared for threw her over and broke her heart."

"A just punishment. Who was the man?"

"You!"

"But at least I cannot be held in blame. The stranger——"

"Was her father."

Wallace was about to interrupt, but Miss Norton silenced him with an imperious gesture. "He was divorced from his wife," she went on, struggling manfully against a choking sensation in her throat, which rose up and thrilled her, "and separated from his daughter, whom he loved passionately—devotedly. I need hardly explain more."

The man was trembling from head to foot.

"Cruel, cruel!" he muttered to himself. "How could I have thought so badly of her—ah!" and he turned away with a long indrawn breath of pain. The next instant he laid his hand on his companion's arm.

"What you have told me," he said, tenderly, "must make no difference between you and me."

"That cannot be. In justice to you and to my friend—from my love for you both—I must release you. I am going to call on Miss Edmunds now. Will you come with me?"

Like one in a dream, the man followed her as she stopped a passing hansom and entered. They reached the house and went up the broad stairs together.

Outside the door Miss Norton stopped. Her face was white and, in spite of herself, her lips trembled.

"You go first," she said, and pushed him forward gently. Wallace heard the door close behind him. He turned quickly. Miss Norton had remained outside.

Slowly she descended again into the hall. "Ten minutes," she murmured to herself—"the shortest engagement there has ever been—yet I am content to know that he has loved me."

And Wallace was left alone with Miss Edmunds.

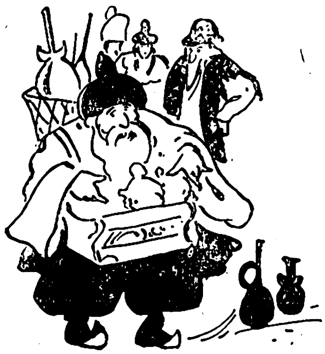
W. A. W.

The Transformed Caliph.

ONCE upon a time, the Caliph Chasid, of Bagdad, on a lovely afternoon, sat comfortably upon his sofa. He had slept a little and appeared cheerful after his slumber. He smoked a long pipe, drank now and then a little coffee, which a slave poured out, and, as if it tasted good, stroked his beard in a pleased way. In short, one perceived from his appearance that he felt in a good humour.

At this hour one could easily have speech with him, because he was then always mild and amiable; and at this time also his Grand Vizier paid his respects. This particular afternoon he came as usual, but appeared very thoughtful, which was not his usual custom. The Caliph took the pipe partially out of his mouth, and spoke: "What makes you wear so thoughtful an expression, Grand Vizier?"

The Grand Vizier flung his arms crosswise over his heart, bowed himself before his master, and spoke: "Sir! whether I wear a thoughtful expression I know not, but there stands yonder at the castle a peddler who has such pretty things that it angers me that I have not more superfluous gold."



The Caliph, who for some past time would willingly have given pleasure to his Grand Vizier, sent his black slave to fetch the peddler. This was a little stout man, swarthy in appearance, and in ragged dress. He carried a chest in which he had all kinds of wares—pearls and rings, richly inlaid pistols, goblets, and combs.

The Caliph and his Vizier examined everything, and the Caliph finally bought for himself and Mansor beautiful pistols, but for the wife of the Vizier a comb. As the peddler was closing his chest the Caliph saw a little drawer, and asked if there were wares in it. The peddler drew out the drawer, and showed therein a box containing a blackish powder, and a paper with singular writing, which neither the Caliph nor Mansor could read.

"Some time ago I took these two pieces from a merchant who had found them in a street in Mecca," said the peddler; "they are at your service at a low price. I cannot accomplish anything with them."

The Caliph, who would gladly have an old manuscript in his library, even though he could not read it, bought the manuscript and powder, and dismissed the peddler. But the Caliph, being anxious to know what the manuscript contained, asked the Vizier if he knew of one who could decipher it.

"Gracious Sir and Master," answered the other, "in the large Mosque lives a man called Selim the Learned, who understands all languages; let him come; perhaps he understands these mysterious characters."

The learned Selim was soon fetched.

"Selim," spoke the Caliph to him, "Selim, they say that thou art very learned; peep a little into this manuscript to see whether thou canst read it. If thou canst read it thou shalt receive from me a new holiday dress; if not, thou shalt receive twelve strokes on the ear and five-and-twenty on the soles of the feet, because, without reason, they call thee Selim the Learned."

Selim prostrated himself and spoke: "Thy will be done, O Sir!" Long contemplated he the manuscript, but suddenly cried out: "This is Latin, O Sir, or let me be hanged."

"Say what is therein," commanded the Caliph, "if it be Latin."

Selim commenced to translate: "Of all mankind whosoever finds this, praise Allah for his grace. For whosoever snuffs of the powder in this box and thereupon says: Mutabor (a Latin word denoting a wish to be transformed), can be changed into any animal, and understand its language. When he wishes to return again to his human form, he bows himself three times towards the East and speaks that word. But let him take care when he is transformed that he laughs not, else the magic word vanishes completely from his memory, and he is and remains an animal."

As Selim the Learned thus read, the Caliph was pleased beyond measure. He made the learned man swear to tell no one at any time of the secret, presented him with a handsome dress, and dismissed him; but to his Grand Vizier he said: "That I call a good purchase, Mansor. How delightful to be an animal for a time.

Come thou to me early to-morrow morning. Then will we go together in the fields, snuff something out of the box, and listen to what is spoken in the air and water, amid the woods and in the fields."

The next morning the Caliph had scarcely dressed himself and broken his fast, when the Grand Vizier appeared, as his master had commanded, in order to accompany him in his walk. The Caliph stuck the box with the magic powder in his girdle, and, commanding his attendants to remain behind, went alone with the Grand Vizier on the way. They went first through the Caliph's large garden; but in vain sought some living thing in order to try the experiment. The Vizier finally proposed to go far away to a pond where he had often seen many animals, especially storks, which had attracted his attention through their grave ways and rattling bills.

The Caliph approved of the proposition of his Vizier, and went with him to the pond. As they arrived there they saw a stork going seriously to and fro, seeking frogs, and now and then clapping his bill together. At the same time they saw a stork high up in the air soaring towards them.

"By my beard, Gracious Master," said the Grand Vizier, "these two long-legs are holding a pretty talk with one another. How if we become storks?"

"Well spoken!" answered the Caliph, "but, beforehand, we will once more contemplate how to become men again. So! Bow three times towards the East, and say Mutabor. So again I am Caliph and thou Vizier. But, for heaven's sake, do not laugh, else are we lost!"

While the Caliph was speaking he saw the other stork flying over their heads and finally alight. He drew the box quickly out of his girdle, took a good pinch, offered it to the Grand Vizier, who likewise snuffed, and both cried Mutabor!"

Then their legs shrivelled up and became thin and red; the pretty golden slipper of the Caliph and his companion became ill-shaped stork feet; the arms changed into wings, the necks grew quickly out of their shoulders, and became an ell long; the beard vanished, and their bodies were presently covered with soft feathers.

"You have a pretty bill, Sir Grand Vizier," spoke the Caliph, with great astonishment. "By the beard of the prophet, I have never seen anything like it in my life."

"Thanks!" most submissively returned the Vizier, while he bowed himself, "but, if I may dare venture, your highness looks like the storks near us, but even more attractive as Caliph. But, come, if it pleases you, that we watch our companions yonder and learn whether we truly understand the stork language."

At this instant the other stork dropped upon the ground, and with her beak she cleaned her feet, preened herself, and then went to the other stork. The two new storks hastened to approach them, and, to their great astonishment, heard the following conversation:

"Good morning, Lady Longlegs. Already so early upon the meadow?"

"Many thanks, dear Rattlebill; I am taking a little breakfast. Possibly you would like a quarter of a lizard or a leg of a young frog?"

"Thanks, but I have no appetite to-day. I come on the meadow upon another errand. I shall dance to-day before my father's guests, and I wish to have a little quiet practice."

At the same the young stork pranced with strange movements through the field, while the Caliph and Mansor watched her with astonishment. But as she stood upon one foot in a picturesque attitude, the while gracefully flapping her wings, they could no longer contain themselves, and incessant laughter broke from their bills. It was a long time before they recovered their composure, but the Caliph composed himself, and said: "That was a sight which could not be bought with gold. It is a pity that these dumb animals have been frightened by our laughter, else had they certainly regaled us with song!"

But at this moment it occurred to the Vizier that laughing was forbidden during the transformation. He therefore imparted his anxiety to the Caliph. "By Mecca and Medina, it will be a sorry pastime if I must remain a stork! Dost thou remember the stupid word?"

"I cannot, I fear. Three times towards the East we should bow, and, in doing so, say 'Mu-Mu-Mu.'"

They then faced towards the East, and bowed incessantly, so that their bills touched the ground. But, O Misery! The magic word had escaped them. As often as the Caliph bowed himself, his Vizier despairingly cried, "Mu-Mu," but remembrance of the magic word did not come to them, and the poor Caliph and his Grand Vizier were and remained storks.

Thus enchanted, they wandered through the fields. They knew not what to do in their misery. They could not get out of their stork skins; they could not return to the city to make themselves known, for who would believe the statement of a stork, that he was the Caliph? And even if they did believe, would the inhabitants of Bagdad want a stork for a Caliph?

So they sneaked about for many days, and scantily supported life on the products of the field, which they could not easily eat through their long bills. As to the lizards and frogs, the human storks had no appetite for such morsels, especially as they feared to disorder their stomachs and suffer from indigestion. The one pleasure they had in this situation, was that they could fly; and they often flew upon the roofs of Bagdad, in order to see what was taking place there.

During the first few days they observed a great commotion and an appearance of mourning in the streets. But on the fourth day of their enchantment, they by chance alighted on the Caliph's palace, and from thence saw below them in the street a gorgeous procession passing. Drums and fifes resounded, and a man in gold-embroidered scarlet mantle sat upon a richly-caparisoned horse and was surrounded by brilliantly bedecked servants. Half Bagdad ran after him, and all shrieked: "Hail, Mizra, the ruler of Bagdad!"

Then the two storks on the roof of the palace looked at each other, and the Caliph Chasid spoke: "Canst thou now guess, oh Grand Vizier, why I am enchanted? This Mizra is the son of my mortal enemy, the powerful sorcerer Raschner, who in an evil hour swore vengeance on me. But I will not yet give up hope. Come with me, thou faithful companion of my destiny, we will wander to the graves of the prophets ; perhaps a holier place may break the enchantment."

They lifted themselves from the roof of the palace and flew towards the country of Medina. Their flying was not very good, as the two storks had had little practice, and, after a couple of hours, "Oh, Sir!" groaned the Grand Vizier, "with your permission, I can endure it no longer. You fly too quickly; besides, it is evening, and it would be well to find shelter for the night!"

Chasid listened to the petition of his servant, and there in the valley perceived a ruin, which appeared as if it would afford shelter, so they flew there. The place where they came down for the night seemed to have formerly been a castle. Beautiful columns towered amid the shattered ruins, and many rooms, which were in a tolerably good state of preservation, bore witness to the former splendours of the building.

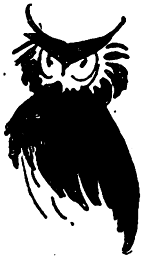
Chasid and his attendant went through the corridor to find a dry place. Suddenly the stork Mansor stopped.

"Sir and master," whispered he, softly, "if it is not foolish for a Grand Vizier to fear ghosts, it is even less so for a stork; but, in truth, I am sore afraid, for I hear a moaning near at hand. My courage has forsaken me, for I surely hear sighs and groans."

The Caliph remained quiet, and clearly heard a subdued weeping that appeared to come from a human being rather than an animal. Full of expectation, he hastened towards the place from whence came the plaintive sounds. But the Vizier pecked him on the wing with his bill, and beseeched him not to venture into new and unknown danger.

But in vain! The Caliph, whose heart remained valiant under his stork-wings, tore himself away with some loss of feathers, and hastened into a dark and gloomy corridor. He arrived speedily at a door, which appeared to be only on the latch, and from whence distinct sighs and low hootings were heard.

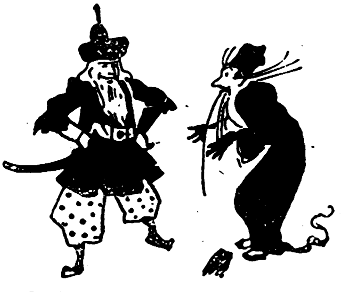
He pushed open the door with his bill, but stopped, surprised, upon the threshold. In the dilapidated room, that was only scantily illumined through a little lattice window, he saw, sitting upon the floor, a large night-owl. Big tears rolled out of her large round eyes, and in a hoarse voice she poured forth her complaint from her crooked beak.



As she perceived the Caliph and his Vizier she raised a cry of joy, and with elegance of manner wiped the tears from her eyes with her big spotted wings. Then, to the great astonishment of both, she cried in good Arabic: "Welcome, O Storks. You come as a token to me of my deliverance; for it was prophesied to me in my childhood that a great happiness would come to me through storks."

When the Caliph recovered from his wonderment he brought together his thin feet with great dignity, and, bending his long neck, spoke as follows: "Night-owl, from thy words I believe I see in thee a fellow sufferer. But, alas! thy hope that through us salvation is secured is in vain. Thou wilt perceive our helplessness when thou hast heard our story." The Caliph then began to relate what we already know.

When he had ended his story, the owl thanked him, and said: "Hear also my story, and learn why I am no less unhappy than thou art. My father is the King of India; I am his unhappy and only daughter, named Ra. That sorcerer, Raschner, who has enchanted thee, has also doomed me to misery. He came one day to my father and desired me as wife for his son Mizra. But my father, who is a passionate man, had him thrown down stairs. That evening he prowled in the neighbourhood in another form, and, as I was in my garden taking refreshments, a disguised slave brought me a drink which transformed me into this detestable form. He then brought me hither fainting with fright, and in a frightful voice, cried: 'Here shalt thou remain, ugly and despised of all animals, until the end, or until someone shall take thee to wife in order to set thee free. Thus I revenge myself on thee and thy haughty father.'



"Since that time, many months have passed, and I live solitary and sad within these walls, detested by all the world, and looked at with horror by even the animals; beautiful Nature is shut out from me, as I am blind by day, and only when the pale light of the moon is reflected on these walls does the veil fall from my eyes."

The owl ceased speaking, and with her wings wiped away the tears which the narration of her sufferings had drawn.

The Caliph was plunged in deep thought by the narrative of the princess. "If all things do not deceive me, I perceive a certain connection between our unhappiness, but how can I find the key to this mystery?"

The owl answered: "Oh, sir! this my heart also foretold. It was prophesied to me in my youth by a wise woman that a stork would bring happiness to me, and possibly I know how we can save ourselves."

The Caliph was very much astonished, and asked what means she could suggest.

"The sorcerer who has made us both unhappy," said she, "comes to these ruins once every month. The banquet-hall is not far from this room, and he uses it for feasting with many companions. Already I have often heard them relate to one another their infamous deeds, and perhaps he may chance to speak aloud the magic word which has changed thee."

"Oh, dearest princess," cried the Caliph, "tell me when he comes again and where is this place to be found?"

The owl was silent for a minute, and then spoke: "Take it not unkindly, but only on one condition can I fulfil your wish."

"Speak, speak!" cried Chasid, "I am content with anything."

"It is this: I am desirous of being set free at the same time, and that can only be done if one of you will wed me."

The storks appeared perplexed by this proposition, and the Caliph beckoned to his servant to step aside with him. "Grand Vizier," spoke the Caliph, behind the door, "this is a foolish affair, but thou couldst certainly take her."

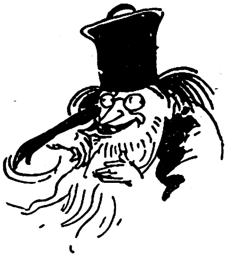
"Indeed," answered the other, "that I certainly could not do, for if I return home my wife would scratch my eyes out! Besides, I am an old man, and you are yet young and unmarried, and could easier give your hand in marriage to a pretty young princess."

"That is true," sighed the Caliph, while he sadly hung his wings, "but who told thee that she was young and pretty? I call this buying a wife in a sack."

They tried to persuade one another for a long time, but finally, as the Caliph saw that his Vizier would rather remain a stork than marry the owl, he resolved to fulfil the condition himself. The owl was overjoyed, and she confessed to them that they could not have come at a better time, as probably the sorcerer would arrive that very night.

She then left the room with the storks in order to conduct them to the banquet-hall, and they went for a long time through a gloomy corridor. Presently a bright light beamed upon a partially fallen wall, and as they reached the spot the owl advised them to keep very quiet.

From the opening upon which they stood they could overlook a large room, which was surrounded with gorgeously-decorated pillars. Many coloured lamps made up for the light of day, while in the middle of the room stood a round table covered with a great abundance of choice dishes. On a sofa encircling this table sat eight men, and in one of these men the storks recognised the peddler who had sold them the magic powder. His neighbour now called upon him to relate his latest deeds, and, among others, he told the story of the Caliph and his Vizier.



"What word hast thou given to them?" asked another sorcerer.

"A right strong Latin one—it is called Mutabor."

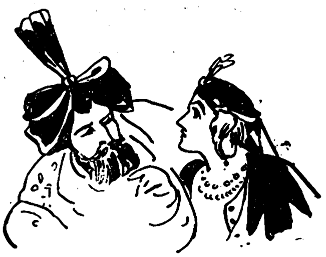
As the storks heard this through the broken wall they were nearly beside themselves with joy, and ran, so quickly upon their long legs to the door of the ruin, that the owl could scarcely follow. Then, said the Caliph, with emotion, to the owl: "Saviour of my life, and of the life of my friend, accept our eternal thanks, and for what thou hast done for us, take me as thy husband."

But soon they turned themselves to the East; three times the storks bowed their long necks towards the sun as it was rising from behind the mountains. "Mutabor!" cried they; and instantly they were changed, and in the great joy of returning life, master and servant lay smiling and weeping in one another's arms. But who can describe their astonishment at what they now saw. A beautiful lady, elegantly dressed, stood before them, and laughing, gave her hand to the Caliph.



"Do you not recognise your night owl?" said she.

It was she, indeed!

The Caliph was so delighted with her grace and beauty, that he cried out, "that it was now his greatest happiness that he had been a stork."

The three then drew near Bagdad, and the Caliph found in his dress the box with the magic powder, and also his money-bag. In the next village he bought what was necessary, and so they soon came to the gates of Bagdad. But there the arrival of the Caliph was witnessed with the greatest astonishment. The people had given him up for dead, and were overjoyed to have their loved ruler once more with them.

But for this reason their hatred towards the impostor, Mizra, raged all the stronger. They rushed to the palace, and took the old sorcerer and his son prisoners. The Caliph sent the elder to the same room in the ruins where the princess had lived as an owl, and left him hanging there. But the son, who understood nothing of the father's necromancy, the Caliph gave the choice whether he would die or snuff the powder. As he chose the latter, the Grand Vizier offered him the box. A suitable pinch, and the magic word of the Caliph transformed him into a stork, and the Caliph shut him in an iron cage and placed him in his garden.

Long and happily the Caliph lived with his wife, the princess. But his happiest moments were always when his Grand Vizier visited him in the afternoon. Oftentimes they spoke of their stork adventure, and if the Caliph was in a happy mood he condescended to imitate the Grand Vizier as he saw him as a stork. He stalked earnestly with stiff feet about the room, clapping his jaws together, fanning with his arms like wings, and showed how they uselessly bowed themselves towards the East and cried "Mu-Mu." To the wife of the Caliph and their children this representation was a great pleasure, but if the Caliph too long clapped and cried "Mu-Mu," the Vizier threatened to communicate what transpired behind the door about the princess owl.

W. H.

KEEP YOUR EYE ON SHORT STORIES

LIST OF SERIALS SOON TO APPEAR.

IT CAME TO PASS.
The story of a runaway wife. (Commences to-day.)

THE TREASURES OF THE WHITE GOD.
The story of a shameful crime. (Commences September 7th.)

THE WRONG THAT WAS DONE.
The story of a loveless marriage.

SINBAD'S VALLEY.
A story of marvellous adventure.

THE MAN WITH THE CAMERA.
The startling story of a stolen fortune.

THE GREAT MIDDLEWICK BANK ROBBERY.
The story of a man hunt.

A GRAND NEW SERIAL STORY OF ADVENTURE BY GEORGE GRIFFTH.
Author of "The Outlaws of the Air," "The Angel of the Revolution," etc., etc.

A GRAND NEW SERIAL STORY BY HEADON HILL.
Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," etc., etc.

A GRAND NEW SERIAL STORY BY JOAN BARRETT.
Author of "Tales of Monte Carlo," "The Great D.M.S. Lottery."

The Heart of a Maid

THE sun had not yet risen, and a broad grey mist, extending even to Naples, and darkening the little villages along that coast, stretched over Mount Vesuvius. The sea was still, but on the wharf, beautifully located in a narrow bay under the high, rocky cliffs of Sorrento, fishermen and their wives were busy pulling ashore the boats with the nets that had been left out over night.

"See, Rachel, there is our priest," said an old woman to a little child of ten, who was wringing her distaff near by. "He is just getting into a boat. Anthony is to take him over to Capri. Goodness gracious! how drowsy the worthy gentleman looks!" With that she waved her hand in a friendly manner to the little priest, who had just taken his place in the boat. The others on the shore stopped their work to return the cordial greeting that the father had for them all.

"Are we to have fair weather, my boy?" asked the priest, looking doubtfully towards Naples.

"The sun is not yet up," replied the young fellow. "It will soon make way with the fog."

"Then row rapidly that we may reach Capri before it becomes hot." Anthony was just about to push the boat out into deep water, when he suddenly stopped and gazed towards the steep path leading from Sorrento down to the shore.

A young girl was visible there, walking rapidly down the steep ascent and beckoning with her handkerchief. She had an almost haughty, but rather uncouth manner, of tossing her head, and her black locks, hanging gracefully over her forehead, became like a diadem.

"Why are we waiting?" asked the priest.

"There comes someone towards the boat who wishes to go with us. With your permission, father, she may go, it will take no longer; she is only a young girl of scarcely eighteen."

At this moment the girl stepped from behind the wall that bounded the path. "Laurella!" said the priest, "what calls her to Capri?"

Anthony shrugged his shoulders. The girl hastened forward, her eyes fixed straight before her.

"Good morning, Laurella," said the priest. "How are you to-day? Are you also going to Capri?"

"If I may be permitted, father."

"Ask Anthony, he is the owner of the boat. Everyone is master of his own possessions, and God is ruler over all."

"There is half a lire (5d.)," she said, without looking up, "if I may go for that."

"You can make better use of it than I," muttered the young fellow, pushing aside some baskets of oranges to make room for her. He was to sell them at Capri, as the rocky island did not produce enough for the demand of the numerous visitors.

"I don't want to be carried for nothing," replied the girl, with a twitch of her black eyebrows.

"Come along, child," said the priest, "he is a generous youth and does not want to make money out of you. There, get in"—as he reached her his hand—"and sit down here by me. See, he has thrown down his jacket for you, so that you may sit comfortably. He has not treated me so well, but with young people that is always the way. For a young lady more pains will be taken than for a dozen clergymen. Well, well, Anthony, you need make no excuse. It is God's will that like should take to like."

Laurella, in the meantime, got in and seated herself, pushing aside the jacket without saying a word. The young boatman let it lie and murmured between his teeth. Then he pushed powerfully against the pier, and the boat sped out into the gulf.

"Has that artist, the Neapolitan, who wished to marry you, been heard of lately?" asked the priest.

She shook her head.

"He came once to paint your portrait. Why did you refuse him?"

"What did he want of it? There are others more beautiful than I. And then—who knows what he would have done with it? He might have bewitched me with it, and charmed my soul, my mother said."

"Do not believe such horrible things," said the priest, earnestly. "You could easily see that he loved you. Would he otherwise have wished to marry you?"

"I want no husband, never!" she said, quite haughtily, and yet almost to herself.

"Have you made a vow, or do you wish to become a nun?"

She shook her head.

She had nothing more to say. The priest also became quiet.

When after a two hours' journey they glided into the harbour of Capri, Anthony carried the reverend gentleman over the shallow waves and set him down on the shore. Laurella, however, did not wait for him to wade back and carry her in the same manner, but gathering up her skirts, holding her bundle in one hand and her wooden shoes in the other, splashed hurriedly to shore.

"I think I shall stay at Capri," said the priest, "and you need not wait for me. Perhaps I shall not return until to-morrow, and you, Laurella, when you return, remember me to your mother; I will try to call this week. You will return before night, I suppose."

"If I have an opportunity," she said.

"You know that I must go back," said Anthony, in what seemed to him a very indifferent tone. "I will wait for you until sunset, but if you do not come it will make no difference."

"You must come," interrupted the priest. "You must not leave your mother alone over night. Is it far to the place where you are going?"

"To Anacapri."

"And I am going to Capri. God protect you, my child, and you, my son."

Laurella kissed his hand and uttered a farewell parting, in which the priest and Anthony might share, but the latter took no part of it for himself. He lifted his hat to the priest, but paid no attention to Laurella.

When they had both turned their backs on him, he allowed his eyes for a short time to follow the priest, who stepped carefully over the coarse gravel, and then turned them towards the girl, who had wandered up the steep bank at the right, holding her hand over her eyes to protect them from the sun. Just before the path was lost between the walls on the hill-top, she stopped, as if to catch her breath, and looked about her. The sea lay at her feet: round about her towered the rugged rocks; the water was blue, and in rare splendour—it was, indeed, a spectacle worth beholding. By chance her glance glided by Anthony's boat and met his gaze. They both started as if to excuse themselves, and Laurella resumed her journey with firmly-closed lips.

It was only an hour past noon, and Anthony had already been sitting for two hours in front of the fisherman's tavern. Something seemed to occupy his mind, for every few minutes he would jump up, step out into the sunshine, and look carefully over the two roads that lead, on the right and on the left, to the two island town.

Suddenly he sprang up. "I must go," he said. "Here is my passenger from Sorrento, who came over with us this morning, and who wants to go back to her sick mother before night."

"Oh, well, it is a long time before night," said the fisherman, "she will have time to drink a glass of wine. Wife, bring a glass."

"Thank you, I do not care for any," said Laurella, and remained at some distance.

"Fill up the glass, wife; she will drink it."

"Let her alone," said Anthony, "she is stubborn; what she does not want to do, no saint can persuade her to do." Thereupon he took a hasty departure, went down to the boat, loosened the rope, and stood waiting for the girl. She waved a farewell to the tavern keepers, and with trembling steps followed him. She looked about in all directions as if expecting other company, but the landing was deserted; the fishermen were either sleeping or fishing, a few women were sitting in the doorways dozing or spinning, and the strangers who had come over in the morning preferred to wait and return in the cool of the evening. She had not time to look round long, for before she could prevent it Anthony took her in his arms and carried her like a child to the boat. Then he jumped in, and with a few brisk strokes of the oars they were out on the deep water.

She seated herself in the prow with her back half turned towards him, so that he could see only the side of her face. Her features were more serious than usual; her hair hung down over her forehead, a haughty expression played around her nose, and her mouth was firmly closed. After they had been some little time on the water she began to feel the heat of the sun, and taking the bread from her handkerchief, she put the latter over her head and began to eat the bread, for, as she had not stopped to eat anything at Capri, she was very hungry.

It was not long before Anthony took two oranges from a basket that had been full in the morning, and said: "Eat these with your bread, Laurella. Do not think that I have saved them for you; they rolled out of a basket into the boat, and I found them here when I put the empty baskets back again."

"You eat them; my bread is enough for me."

"They are refreshing on a warm day, and you have walked a long distance."

"They gave me a glass of water up there, and that refreshed me."

"As you like," he said, and dropped them into the basket.

Again there was silence; the sea was as smooth as glass, and there was scarcely a ripple at the keel. Even the white seagulls flew silently after their prey.

"You might take the oranges to your mother," continued Anthony.

"We have some at home, and when they are gone I will go and buy some more."

"Take them to her with my compliments."

"She does not know you."

"Then you can tell her who I am."

"I do not know you, either."

This was the first time that she had denied knowing him. A year before, when the artist had first come to Sorrento, it happened that Anthony and some other young fellows were, one Sunday, playing ball near the principal street. There the Neapolitan first met Laurella, as she passed by without noticing him, carrying a pitcher on her head. The artist, struck by the sight, stopped and gazed at her, forgetting that he was on the ground occupied by the players. A rough ball striking his ankle reminded him that that was not the place to lose oneself in thought.

He looked round, expecting an apology, but the young boatman who had thrown the ball stood silent and defiant among his companions, and the stranger thought it best to depart quietly. The event, however, was talked of, and recently, too, when the artist wooed Laurella.

"I do not know him," she said, when her suitor asked if she had refused him on account of that impolite fellow. She, too, had heard of that gossip, but afterwards she certainly did recognise Anthony when she met him.

Now they sat there in the boat as bitterest enemies, and the heart of each was beating violently. Anthony's kind face was greatly agitated; he beat the waves with his oars, and splashed the spray all over himself, and his lips frequently trembled as if he were on the point of saying something unkind. She pretended not to notice it, looked somewhat embarrassed, leant over the edge of the boat, and let the water run between her fingers. Then she loosened her handkerchief and arranged her hair, as though alone in the boat. Her eyebrows twitched, and in vain did she put her wet hands to her burning cheeks to cool them.

Now they were far out on the water. Not a boat was to be seen; the island was far in their rear, and the coast lay far off in the hazy sunlight. Not even a seagull broke the loneliness. Anthony looked around him, a thought flashed into his mind, his redness suddenly left him; he let the oars drop. Laurella involuntarily looked up, anxious but fearless.

"This must come to an end," said he. "It has lasted altogether too long, and I am really surprised that I have not been ruined by it. You do not know me you say. Have you not seen for a long time how I have conducted myself towards you, and have you not known how full my heart is? and yet you always treat me coolly and turn your back on me."

"Have I ever encouraged you? Am I to blame if you lose your head? What claim have you over me?"

"You will not talk in that way long," he said, trembling from head to foot. "I am man enough not to let my life be destroyed by such an obstinate girl. Do you realise that you are in my power and must do as I wish?"

She started up and gazed at him, saying slowly: "Kill me if you dare!"

"One must not do things by halves," said he, and his voice became hoarse. "There is room for us both in the sea. I cannot help you, my child, but we must go down together, and now!" he cried, in a loud voice, and quickly siezed her in his arms. But, in a moment, he drew back his right hand; it was bleeding—she had bitten him.

"Must I do as you wish?" she said, pushing him from her. "We will see if I am in your power!" and then she jumped into the water and disappeared for a moment.

She soon came to the surface; her clothes clung close to her; her hair was dishevelled by the waves, and hung over her neck. She struck out boldly with her arms, and, without uttering a word, swam away from the boat, towards the shore. A sudden fright overcame the would-be lover, who stood there leaning over, and followed her with his eyes, as if a miracle were being unfolded before him. Collecting his thoughts, he grasped the oars and pulled towards her with all the strength he could summon.

In a moment he was at her side, although she was swimming very fast. "By all that is sacred," he cried, "come into the boat. I have been a fool; like a flash from heaven something came into my head, and I knew not what I did. I do not ask for forgiveness, but I beg of you to get into the boat and save your life."

She swam on as though she heard nothing.

"You cannot reach the land, it is two miles away. Think of your mother. If any misfortune should happen to you it would kill her."

With a glance she measured the distance to the shore, and then, without answering, swam to the boat, and seized the edge of it with her hands. He rose to help her; his jacket, which had been lying on the seat, slipped into the water when the boat was drawn to one side by the weight of the maiden. Quickly she climbed up and regained her former seat. When he saw that she was safe, he took up the oars once more, while she wrung the water from her dripping skirts and from her wet hair.

Then she looked down and noticed the blood. She cast a hasty look at the hand, which, as though unwounded, was pulling away at the oar. "There!" she said, and handed him her handkerchief. He shook his head and rowed onward. She rose, stepped towards him, and bound the handkerchief about the deep wound. Then, although he objected, she took the oar from his hand, and without looking at him, but looking at the oar all stained with blood, she pushed the boat forward with powerful strokes. Both were pale and still. As they came nearer to land they were met by fishermen, who greeted Anthony and teased Laurella. Neither of them looked up or made any answer.

The sun was high in the heavens when they reached the wharf. Laurella shook out her skirts, which had now become nearly dry, and sprang to shore.

"Good-bye," said Laurella, and turned to the path leading up the hill towards her home.

"Good-day," answered Anthony, without looking at her. Then he carried the things out of his boat and climbed the stone steps leading to his cabin.

He was alone in the two rooms through which he now passed back and forth. Through the little open window the air was blowing much more refreshingly than it had been out on the water, and, on the whole, he was well pleased with the solitude.

Time was heavy on his hands; he longed for the darkness, for he was tired, and the loss of blood had weakened him more than he had supposed. He felt a violent pain in his hand, sat down on a stool and loosened the bandage. The blood gushed forth again, and the hand was badly swollen round the wound. He washed it carefully and cooled it a long time. When he drew it from the water, he could distinguish clearly the prints of Laurella's teeth.

"She was right," he said, "I was a beast, and I deserve nothing better. I shall send her her handkerchief to-morrow, for I don't want her to see me again."

The bright moonlight and the pain in his hand awakened him from a restless sleep, and he was just springing up to quiet in cold water the throbbing in his hand, when he heard a noise at his door. He opened it, and Laurella stood before him.

Without saying much she entered, and threw off the wrap she had worn over her head, and put a little basket on the table. Then she stopped to breathe.

"You came for your handkerchief, I suppose?" said he. "You might have spared yourself the trouble, for I would have sent it to you in the morning."

"That had nothing to do with my coming," she quickly replied. "I have been out on the mountain, gathering herbs to heal your hand. There!" and she raised the cover of the basket.

"Heavens!" cried he. "Are you ill? You are trembling from head to foot."

"It is nothing," she said. "I am going now," and she tottered towards the door. Here she burst into a fit of weeping, which so overpowered her that she pressed her brow against the doorpost and sobbed loudly and violently. Before he could reach her she turned suddenly and threw her arms round his neck.

"I can't stand it any longer," she cried, and pressed him to her, passionately. "Strike me, trample me under foot, or, if it is still true that you love me even yet, after all the evil that I have done you, then take me and treat me as you wish, make of me what you will, but do not send me thus away from you!"

Silently he held her awhile in his arms.

"Whether I still love you?" he cried, finally. "By all that is sacred! Do you suppose that all my heart's blood has run out through that little wound? Don't you feel it beating there in my breast, just as though it would come out and to you? If you say this merely to tempt me, or because you have pity on me, then go. I will forget even this. You must not imagine that you owe me this because you know what I suffer on your account."

"No," she said, firmly, and looked up from his shoulders with her moistened eyes. "I love you, and now that I have said it, I will confess that I have long striven against it. But now I will become different, for I cannot longer stand it not to look at you when you meet me in the street. Now I will kiss you, too, so that when you are in doubt you can remember 'she kissed me,' and Laurella kisses no one except him whom she wishes to marry."

She kissed him thrice, and then freed herself, saying: "Good-night, my dear; go now to sleep, and nurse your hand, but don't go home with me, for I am not afraid."

With that she darted through the door and disappeared in the darkness.

When the little priest left the church after Laurella's next confession, he smiled quietly to himself.

"Now may the Lord bless her," he said, "and let me live until Laurella's eldest boy can row me across the bay in place of his father."

P. H.

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

SUMMARY.

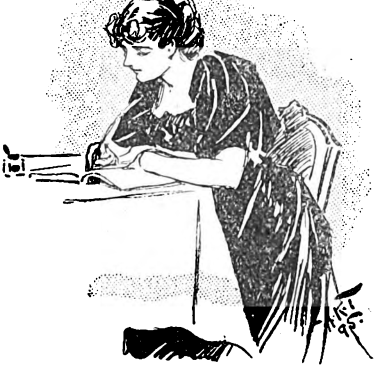
The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train —Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men, set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot. Squirrek arouses the citizens of Cornwall, who make their way to the outlaws' hiding-place. One outlaw is found and killed, and the cabin is set fire to. Squirrek discovers a piece of paper with the following cryptogram: "1——0——1. Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg." He afterwards falls in with the two remaining outlaws, and has them arrested. They are lynched by a furious mob. Both Florence Woodland and her father have dreams of Señor Almanaz in connection with Fred Weldon's disappearance. The Señor leaves Somerville professedly for Cuba.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(From the Journal of Florence Woodland.)

FLORENCE SOLVES A RIDDLE FOR TWO PEOPLE.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER ———.—The days come and go, with their sadness to some and their joys to others. There seems no reason why I should not be as happy as a young person in the best of health, with the kindest and most indulgent of parents, should be.



The journal of Florence Woodland.

And so I am except that I feel for the grief of poor Mrs. Weldon, who still clings to the belief that her son is living somewhere, and is in need of her help. Poor soul! I have given up the faint hope that I once shared with her, and I pray that her Heavenly Father will heal the great woe which has fallen upon her.

Yesterday I received a letter from Señor Almanaz, written in Chicago, where he said he was compelled to remain a few days to settle up some business affairs. It was very polite, and he was gentlemanly enough to make no reference to our last interview. After giving me his best wishes, he asked as a personal favour, which, as he says, will be the only one he will ever ask. I cannot refuse to grant it, as it is in my power to do so.

"I have been told," so his letter reads, "that you have a special aptitude in solving enigmas, riddles, and cipher-writing. A friend placed in my hand, some time since, some cipher, with the request that I would translate it for him. I confess that I cannot do so. If you find yourself able to make out the meaning, and will be kind enough to send it to me, you will make me ever your debtor. Here it is:

"'1—0—1.'

"'Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg.'

"May I ask further that you will let this little matter remain a mutual secret."

As this seems to be a harmless request, and I felt that perhaps I had been a little unjust towards him, I set to work to unravel his riddle for him.

It was not the hardest thing of the kind that I ever undertook, and I succeeded after a few hours. The figures "1—0—1," at the top, contain the key, which I discovered after pretty severe labour, and then I read it without trouble. There does not seem much meaning in it; but such as it is he is welcome, and I simply wrote out my translation and posted it to him, only adding that I was glad to do him so slight a favour.

SATURDAY EVENING.—What does it mean? The letter to Señor Almanaz has scarcely left my hands, when the following reaches me:

"Chicago, November ——.

"Miss Florence Woodland,—Please undertake a task, which although it may not be difficult to you, I am unable to accomplish. Your father once remarked your singular ability at unravelling difficult problems and riddles, which he said you displayed in early childhood. Here is something that has floored me:

"'1—0—1'

"'Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg.'

"I have racked my brains over it in vain. If your fortunate faculty in hieroglyphical lore will enable you to decipher this, I may succeed in getting you a commission upon what future rosetta stones the English Government may discover in Egypt. But, seriously, you will do me a greater service than you imagine by unravelling this mystery, and, above all, let me caution you to keep this a secret, and should you receive a request from any other source, pay no attention to it. Don't forget this! You, no doubt, will be willing to trust me in this matter. "—— SMITH."

This is certainly a strange letter, and it made me feel uncomfortable. As soon as I had read it, I went straight to the post-office to intercept the one I had sent to Señor Almanaz, but I was just too late.

Feeling that I might have done something very wrong, I went to father, explained the whole thing, and asked him what it was best for me to do.

"Telegraph to Smith," he replied, "and we can then head off this other letter."

We made ready to do so, but an insuperable object presented itself. Mr. Smith had simply dated his letter "Chicago" without giving the least indication of where he was stopping, so that it was impossible to tell where to direct the telegram. It looks as if he had taken pains to get an envelope which contained not the least reference to his hotel.

"There is no use in crying over spilt milk," said father, in his philosophic manner. "What's done can't be helped, and all you can do is to send your reply to Smith, stating what has happened, so that possibly it may be in his power to rectify the mistake."

I did so at once, and the next mail to Chicago carried my translation and explanatory letter to Mr. Smith. I only hope it has not been sent too late to accomplish all that he wishes.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(From the Journal of Adolph Squirrek, Detective.)

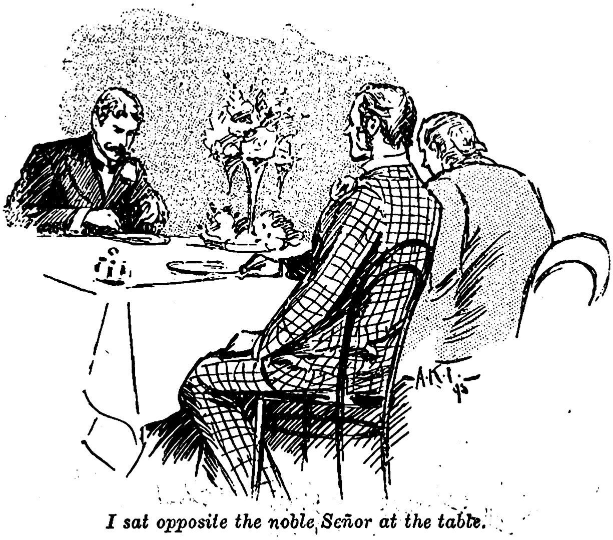
Senor Almanaz Pays a Visit to a Doctor.

Chicago, November.—Señor Alvarido Almanaz is the bird for me to pluck. If I lose sight of him I lose all. He carries the secret of Fred Weldon with him until he is forced to give it up.

It was the handsome Señor who sent the note of warning to the judge and witnesses in the trial of "poor Tom Borie," and it was the same individual who penned the note which led Fred Weldon to the High Bridge over Devil's Creek on that night, a couple of weeks ago, when I failed to warn him in time. The noble Señor was connected with the late Mulligan brothers, in precisely what character I can only conjecture. I can see how convenient such a fellow would be to make away with money and jewels that were likely to be identified, while his tastes led him to keep aloof from intimate association with the members of the gang themselves.

As the noble Señor strongly suspects me of dogging his footsteps, it becomes necessary for me to put on one of the best disguises at my commnnd. I think I have succeeded in "closing up his eye," as the vulgar phrase goes.

On Thursday evening the Señor called upon Miss Woodland, and bade her good-bye, as he proposed starting for Cuba next morning. I suspect she gave him his dismissal, as he strode very angrily down the lane, not even glancing up at the coarse-looking drover that he encountered on his way, and who bade him "good-evening" so civilly.



I sat opposite the noble Señor at the table.

The same night the handsome foreigner started for his Cuba, which, in this instance, means Chicago, and in the same carriage with him rode the humble individual who is just now engaged in writing up his journal.

The Señor bought a through ticket, as also did the humble individual referred to, and when we were fairly under way, he took out the piece of writing which is so difficult to read, and began studying it. By glancing over his shoulder I saw that it was precisely the same as the one held in my pocket-book; but as I became convinced sometime since that it was altogether beyond my skill, I contented myself with reading the Chicago Tribune.

Nothing further worthy of note occurred on our journey to Chicago, save that we ran over a cow, and the noble Señor turned pale with fear at the remote prospect of all of us going down the embankment, and into eternity.

We both took rooms at the same hotel, and without attracting suspicion, I secured one adjoining his. When a man sets himself up to keep guard over another, it is well to have him as close at hand as possible.

Both of us were well tired out with our journey, and as the evening was well advanced, I concluded he would need rest as much as myself, and so I tumbled in for the night.

On our way from the distant town of Somerville to this teeming city, the eye of the noble Señor more than once fell upon me. It follows, as a matter of course, that if he runs against me in the hotel, he will have his suspicions awakened, no matter how perfect I may make my disguise.

As a matter of business, therefore, I came out in a new rig—a sort of free-and-easy man of the town, who had an abundance of leisure upon his hands, and to whom, therefore, it might seem natural that he should be given to wandering about the city.

In my new get-up I sat opposite the noble Señor at the table, and tested my disguise by attempting to open a conversation with him. He replied politely, but coolly, and, I am sure, looked upon me in no other light than that of a perfect stranger.

After being at the hotel a couple of days, I have learned that the noble Señor has friends in this city, and once or twice he has visited them, and on each occasion has given me the slip, for which I deserve to be kicked by the first man I meet.

Yesterday he went inside the bar and wrote a letter. He took such precautions while engaged in doing so that I could not get a glimpse of the sheet, but when he had directed it he banged the blotting-paper down upon it, and hurried out of the room.

After a moment's thought I concluded to follow him, as I could afford to lose a little time with the blotting-paper, while there was none to be lost if I wished to keep him under my eye.

He went straight to the post-office, and then came directly back again, and retired to his room. Immediately after this I found occasion to go behind the bar, and took up the blotting-paper pad and examined it.

The pad showed that the noble Cuban had written a letter to Miss Florence Woodland, at Somerville.

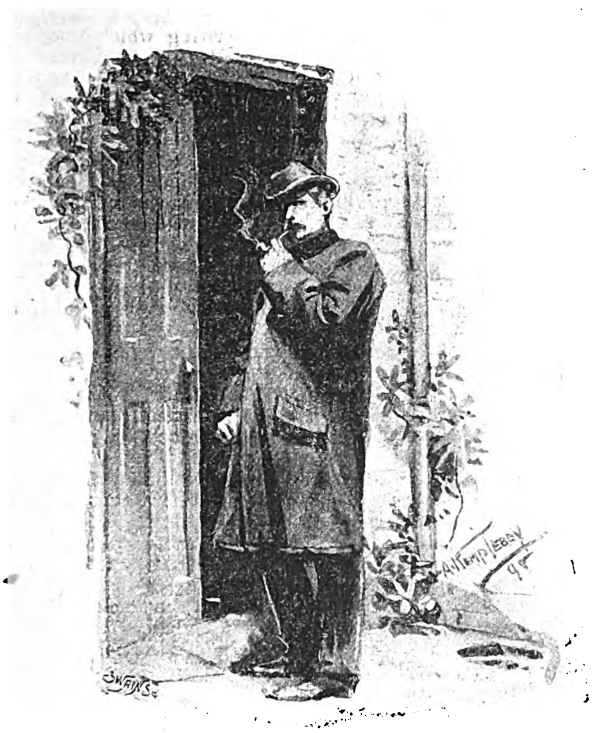
And what business has he to write to her? If she has rejected or repulsed him she has done it in a manner which leaves no room for him to renew his attentions. It can't be that; it must be upon a matter of business.

Hold!

That evening of the party at Judge Woodland's, when he and I were engaged in a game of chess, he remarked upon the great skill his daughter displayed in the game, she never having been beaten by anyone. He added that she also had a more extraordinary ability in reading ciphers, and had more than once assisted him in tracing crime by this gift.

Now, the noble Señor has probably learned the same thing, and has applied to her for assistance in making out the puzzle which has baffled both him and me.

He has got the start of me here, and it will be hard work for me to head him off; but it does not seem possible that the skill of Miss Woodland is such as to enable her to unravel the puzzle without several days' study, and I can reach her in time to stop this little game of the gentleman from the Gem of the Antilles.



I had a glimpse of his confederate.

FRIDAY.—My letter was written and sent, and at the office I learnt the precise hour when the post from Somerville reaches Chicago. A little figuring shows that if a letter leaves that goodly town on the afternoon of Saturday (which will give Miss Woodland several hours to work upon the cipher, providing it promptly reaches her), it will be ready for delivery at the Chicago post-office at precisely six o'clock in the evening of Monday, providing no unforeseen accident occurs to prevent.

This is rather favourable, as that is the hour of tea, and the Señor is a healthy eater, and, I observe, does not go out until about an hour after his evening meal, when he lights his Havanna, and saunters so far away that it is almost morning before he gets back again.

Provided he does not wait for the post at the office, this will give me a chance to forestall him. As such a man has no business to send anything to Miss Woodland, it follows, as a matter of course, that he has no right to receive anything from her, and I must do my utmost to prevent it.

EVENING.—Miss Florence Woodland has more skill than I imagined.

She received this puzzle from the noble Señor by one mail, translates and sends the reply the next day, and the whole mystery is unveiled and in my possession this evening.

I took the precaution to give a new touch to my whiskers when I went to the post-office, and called at the window-slide, as it hardly would have done for me to have been identified by the post clerk.

On my way back to tea I met the Cuban, who, I think, wore quite an expectant look on his olive countenance. Ah, me! disappointment comes to all in the affairs of this world.

I am sorry that Miss Woodland will have to lie under the apprehension of having made a bad mistake, but I trust I shall soon be able to set her mind at rest.

All that I am afraid of is that, failing there, the noble Señor may turn elsewhere for help in this matter. If he should get it, he may make a good deal of trouble; but, as he is now in Chicago, he will be likely to remain there until his business is fully settled. At any rate, I do not think he will take up his abode in the gem of the Antilles for some months yet.

I have had a glimpse of his confederate, or perhaps more properly his tool—a low-browed, brutal-looking man, who waited on the outside of the door for him, and the two walked off together. This man answers to the name of Manuel, and is a Spaniard, so that I could not understand anything that passed between them, except an occasional "Tiene usted," "Yo tengo," "Si, señor," "El le tiene," and a few other simple phrases of this language which I have picked up here and there.

They led me a long tramp, going across the river, and to the outskirts of the city, where they halted at a respectable house, rang the bell, and passed in. Walking by the door, I saw on the plate the name, "S. S. Ruthven, M.D."

I waited on the other side of the street for about half an hour, when my two friends emerged to view, talking very earnestly. If I were only barbarian enough to understand the language of Hispaniola, I might have gained a clue to what they were driving at, but it was all "Greek" to me, and as incomprehensible as the cipher submitted to Miss Florence Woodland. I wonder now whether she wouldn't translate their gibberish for me if I should take it down and send it to her?

The noble Señor and his friend Manuel were engaged in such earnest conversation that they came near walking into the river before they discovered that the drawbridge was open.

They kept company until they reached the hotel, and there they went in together, and side by side ascended to the room of the Cuban. I could overhear their words, but, as it was in that wretched foreign tongue, it did me as little good as it did the silent banisters beside me.

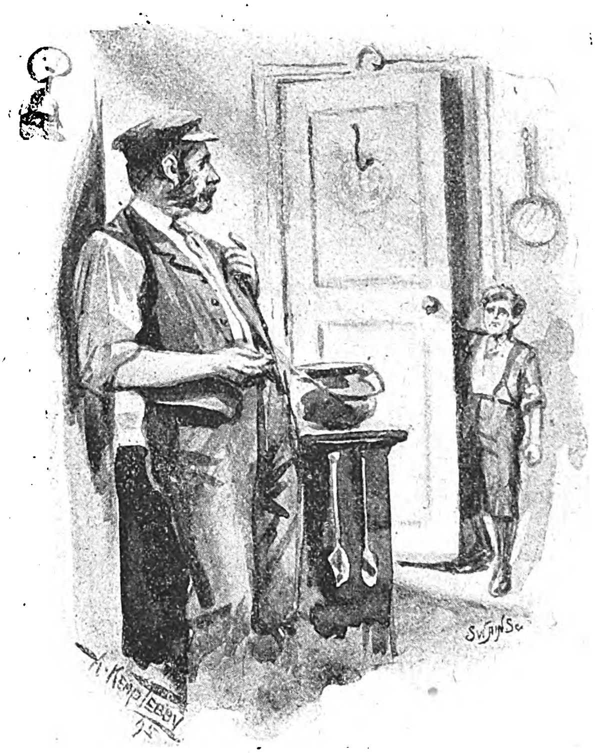
CHAPTER XXV.

AN IMPORTANT BIT OF INFORMATION.

I CALLED on Doctor Ruthven this morning, to procure some medicine for the rheumatism.

As I rang the bell during his regular office hours, I was fortunate enough to find him in, and to be received with considerable blandness and consideration.

Just step back into my private office.



A dirty-faced urchin entered the room.

I was in a sort of ministerial costume, with my white neckerchief and golden spectacles, and I have no doubt the physician supposed I belonged to the cloth.

After procuring the medicine and paying his fee, I picked up my hat as if to go, but kept my seat on the sofa, and looking steadily towards him, and speaking as though the idea had just entered my head, I asked:

"Is there much general sickness at present in Chicago?"

"Nothing more than usual; in fact, the public health is rather better than it was during the corresponding quarter last year."

"Is there much fever encountered in your practice?"

"No; I have but one case on my hands."

"Typhus?"

"Yes, or rather the indications are of that nature; but—is there anything more that I can do for you this morning?"

This abrupt answer, together with a sudden flushing of the physician's face, proved conclusively that he had unwittingly revealed something which he should have kept to himself, and his curt query was not only intended as a check to any curiosity upon my part, but as a hint that he would be glad to see me go.

I was on dangerous ground, and prudence told me to retreat. So I rose to my feet, buttoned my overcoat, and drew on my gloves.

"I am obliged to you for your kindness, doctor; hold, there is a little matter upon which I would like to speak to you."

This sudden changing of mind upon my part was caused by the jingling of the surgery bell.

"You'll have to excuse me for a few minutes," he said, walking towards the door to answer the signal himself. "Just step back into my private office until I am through with my visitor." This was the very thing for which I was manœuvring, and I gladly obeyed, while the doctor drew the door behind him.

The minute he was far enough away I rose and softly opened the door the slightest crack in the world, so as to give me a chance of overhearing what passed between the physician and his patient.

A detective police officer must take advantage of every means offered him for obtaining information.

Just what I was praying for! The visitor was the noble Señor Almanaz, who bade the physician good-morning in his usually bland manner.

"You haven't been there since last evening?" was the inquiring remark of the Cuban.

"No; there is no necessity for it. Have you seen him this morning?"

"Yes; I came from there an hour ago."

"How does he seem?"

"I don't know how to answer. The truth of it is," said the Cuban, in a voice so low that I barely managed to catch it, "we can't keep him this way much longer. He must either get well or do the other thing. You see what a constitution he has. The minute we give him a chance he rallies, and then you have to dose him so hard that it takes him to the very border of death."

"Yes, that is true," was the indifferent reply of the doctor. "How much do you expect to make by this speculation?"

"I can't tell. There is a detective on the track and I'm waiting for him to offer a reward, but he hangs back. I've been disappointed in another place," added the noble Señor, somewhat dejectedly, and with his Spanish "Cara-a-a-h!"

"Ah!"

"Yes, if I hadn't been thrown off the track, I would have made enough to let this fellow go to the dogs; but, as it is, we must nurse him along, in the hope of hearing something from this detective."

"Have you taken any means to let him know that he is in Chicago?"

"Yes; a letter was sent to him several weeks ago, stating positively that the young man for whom he was searching was in this city."

"Didn't he bite?"

"Not a bit of it."

"Don't you think he is in Chicago?"

"I have scrutinised every suspicious person I have encountered since I have been here, but have seen no one that looks like him. I am afraid he has given over the search."

A short, stumpy, red-faced man.

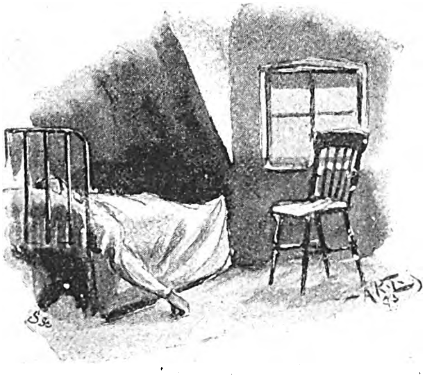
"Why don't you advertise? You know that is the fashion nowadays in a matter like this. Make the conditions that you are to receive a handsome figure, and no questions asked, or rather no prosecution guaranteed."

"I have thought of that," added the Cuban, after a pause, "but there is too much risk in it."

"Why so?"



The poor fellow was at the very door of death.

"I don't see how it can be done without setting that infernal detective on the track, and making a trouble. If you can think of any way, I'd like to hear it."

"It ain't likely he'll advertise at this late day," remarked the doctor, "and if he should get on your track, the best thing you can do is to leave. I don't see where my chance is to come in, and I would rather throw up my whole connection with the business than to continue any longer in it."

"I should think you were getting pretty good pay for your services," was the angry reply of the Cuban.

"If I continue my services I shall expect better remuneration than I have received."

There seemed to be a sullen silence for a few moments, and then Almanaz arose to his feet.

"We will call on him together this evening, and in the meantime I will take a look at him myself."

With this he departed; and as the doctor followed him to the outer door I managed to close the inner one, and when he opened it I was busily occupied in exploring "Doctor Dunglison's Dictionary of Medicine."

"Now, my friend, I am at your service."

"You must pardon me," I replied, taking out my watch, "but the hour is later than I imagined. I will call again."

He looked rather curiously at me as I passed out; but no doubt took me for an erratic Pickwickian dominie.

My great anxiety was to reach the street in time to follow Señor Alvarido Almanaz.

Fortunately, I succeeded in doing so.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The Missing Man is Found.

I followed the Cuban at a safe distance, for I felt that matters were approaching a crisis, and a false move ment at this point might spoil all. He walked rapidly for fully half a mile, when he turned into one of the lowest and vilest streets of Chicago.

I felt that I was now upon the right trail, and it would not do to let my man escape me. Being in a disguise somewhat similar to that worn in Somerville when the gentleman from the "Gem of the Antilles" penetrated it, I was a little fearful of encountering him at this time.

But he never once looked behind him, and all at once dropped out of sight in such a sudden manner that I thought at first he must have gone through an opening in the pavement; but a little nearer approach showed me that he had only descended into one of those subterranean eating houses so common in all large cities.

I was upon the other side of the street, and when I reached a point about opposite to where my acquaintance had vanished, I dropped into a bellhanger's shop, which had a powerful smell of brass filings and onions, the latter odour no doubt percolating upward from the kitchen.

A grimy-looking man in his shirt sleeves answered the sharp ting-a-ling of the bell as I pushed the door open. He had shaggy eyebrows and enormous yellow whiskers, and surveyed me very keenly. Taking his station directly in front of me, he did not speak, but waited for me to ask my question.

"Can I get you to repair the gas-pipe of my house?"

He slowly shook his head from side to side, shut his eyes, and answered in a sleepy tone:

"I ain't in that business—'tain't in my line. You'll have to go to the plumber's and gasfitter's."

"Oh—ah! thank you."

I turned to go, but with my hand upon the door, paused, as if a sudden thought had struck me.

"A person wished me to inquire whether there was any property for sale in this street."

The man shut his eyes, slowly swayed his head from side to side, and answered in the same drowsy manner:

"Dunno of any."

He was on the point of moving away, when a dirty-faced urchin entered the room, and I took the occasion to present him with a few pennies, which at once conciliated the parent.

"My friend wishes to purchase a restaurant or eating-house. Are there any in this neighbourhood?"

"There's one just across the street," he replied, looking out of the window, "but I don't believe Dick wants to sell it."

"What Dick do you mean?"

"Dick Muggens."

"Has he any name for his place?"

"He calls it the 'Shades,' and does a pretty good business there."

"Does he own the place?"

"I think he does—ain't sure, though. He's made enough to buy it, if he wanted to, long ago."

"Do you think it a desirable property?—here, sonny, are a few more pennies—there is a good run of custom, I suppose?"

"Yes," was the hesitating reply, for the man was answering at random now. "You'd better go over and see Dick yourself."

"Thank you, I will. What did you say his name was?"

He pronounced it very carefully, and I have no doubt would have spelled it, had he possessed sufficient ability, without waiting for me to ask him to do so.

As may be supposed, during the conversation I was keeping a sharp look out for the Cuban. I saw him come out of the door, ascend the steps, and walk rapidly away, while I dallied in this aimless manner until I could make sure that the Señor was beyond danger of discovering me.

It was my intention to personate a gentleman in search of a restaurant, but the information I had gleaned from the bellhanger decided me to change my tactics and adopt a bolder course—one that incurred more risk, but, at the same time, offered the chance of greater success.

I walked slowly up the street until Almanaz vanished round a corner, when I crossed, and walked swiftly towards Mr. Muggens' restaurant, like one who was in a great hurry.

Stepping hastily down the steps I pushed open the door and found myself in an ordinary cheap restaurant, with a short, stumpy, red-faced man standing behind the counter, opening oysters. He and I were the only persons present.

"Good-day, sir," said I, as he looked inquiringly at me. "This is Mr. Muggens, I believe?"

"Yes, sir. What do you want?"

"You have a sick man in the house?"

The man stared impudently at me, and then demanded in a gruff voice:

"What's that to you?"

"Doctor Ruthven is unable to call, and I consented to look in upon him, in his place."

"Oh! be you the doctor?"

"I am somewhat in a hurry; I will look at him, and, if necessary, leave some medicine."

Mr. Muggens threw down his oyster-knife, wiped his hands upon a dirty serviette, and walked through a door behind him, I following close in his rear.

Up several winding stairs, through several filthy apartments, and he softly opened the door of a room, with the whispered remark:

"He's sleeping."

I controlled myself as well as possible, but I could not avoid pressing close upon him, and peering into the bed, where I caught sight of the form of a man.

"Good heavens!" I gasped.

"What's the matter?" demanded Muggens, turning rather fiercely upon me.

"Nothing at all."

No one can imagine my disappointment, as I scanned the features of the pale, sleeping man, and saw that it was not Fred Weldon!

Still, to carry out the part I had undertaken, I drew a chair up to the bed, and felt the pulse of the poor fellow, who, it was evident, was at the very door of death.

"I fancy you know the way out," said Muggens, after watching me for a moment. "There ain't nobody in the shop, so I'll go back, and you can follow yourself."

"Very well," I nodded, and the next moment I was left with the sick man.

"Can it be that I have been going astray all this time?" I asked myself, and stared absently round the room. "Is it possible that I have been led upon a false scent? Is my young friend indeed dead? Can it be——"

I paused, for at that instant I heard a slight movement in the adjoining room, and with a strange feeling I arose, and pushed open the door.

The apartment was precisely similar to the one into which I had been introduced. There was the low, narrow bed, and stretched upon it, worn to emaciation, pale, with his large, dark eyes wandering round the room, lay Frederick Weldon.

The poor fellow stared at me with the wondering look of a man whose senses are wandering, and it was plain that he did not recognise me.

Stepping hastily to his bedside, I placed my brandy flask to his lips.

"Drink! it will do you good!"

He obeyed, with the meekness of a child, and the hot fluid warmed him almost instantly into life.

"What is your name?" I asked, anxious to test him; but he made no answer until I repeated it several times.

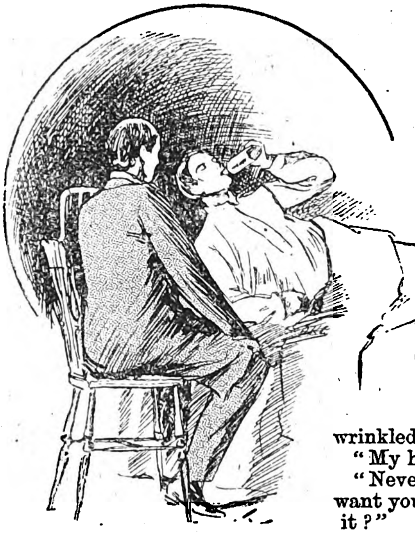
"My name; yes, my name is Weldon—Frederick Weldon, Counsellor-at-Law."

"That is right; I see a wound upon your head. How did you get that?"

"I don't know; yes—let me see. Someone struck me on the head last night, when I was walking towards the High Bridge. Here, I put it all down here; you will find it here."

And, reaching under his pillow, he brought a small blank book, in which I saw he had written a good deal in pencil. Placing it in my pocket, I said:

"I will read it when I go home. How do you feel?"



"Drink! It will do you good."

"I have been very ill, but your brandy has helped me. Give me some more, won't you?"

Another good draught, and he was visibly strengthened.

"Why doesn't mother come?" he asked, the next moment.

"She cannot very well do so just now. I came in her place."

"Who are you?" he asked the next moment, looking very earnestly at me.

"I am Adolph Squirrek, the detective, and your friend."

"Are you?"

A smile overspread his handsome face, but the next moment it vanished, and his forehead became wrinkled with pain.

"My head hurts me very much."

"Never mind; don't try to think, then; only I want you to promise me one thing. Will you do it?"

"I will promise you anything."

"Understand now what I say. There will be some other folks in to see you pretty soon. They will offer you medicine, but you mustn't take it. Do you understand?"

"Yes," was the feeble response.

"Do you promise me?"

"I will remember what you say."

"Don't forget; I will be in to see you again this evening, and am going to take you to your mother as soon as you are able to move. Remember not to take a drop of anything until you see me."

And with this parting warning I left him.

(To be finished in three weeks' time.)

THE BIGGEST, BRIGHTEST, AND BEST.

This applies with special force to PEARSON'S WEEKLY, published every Saturday, price 1d. Among the numerous advantages P.W. offers its readers are a £2000 Insurance and a £100 Cycling Insurance. Articles of special interest to Cyclists, Cricketers, Stamp Collectors, Smokers, and the Army are appearing, besides interesting and humorous articles on all subjects. A serial story by Headon Hill, entitled starts in the next number.

"GUILTY GOLD,"

WHICH EVERYONE SHOULD READ,

A Rattling Novel for Sixpence.

Ask for the latest issue of Pearson's Library and see that you get it. "Lady Elaine's Martyrdom," complete in over 200 pages, is just out. A most absorbing story, with numbers of full-page illustrations.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to th

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

HAIR DESTROYED root and branch absolutely exterminated without injury to the skin, entirely new treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyle Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 49a, Union Passage, Birmingham.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, etc., with advice form for Treatment, to Dr. Horn, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, and all who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint, should write to Dr. Howell, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.

RUBBER STAMPS
FREE BY POST.
AGENTS WANTED.
Liberal commissions.

Your Monogram, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

NOT A TOY

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.	FOR 6s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet ...	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsom

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

"GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

◆ ◆ ◆

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

TWO SERIAL STORIES, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 346. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 17TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A GEOGRAPHICAL VIEW OF A GLOBE=ULAR ANTIDOTE.

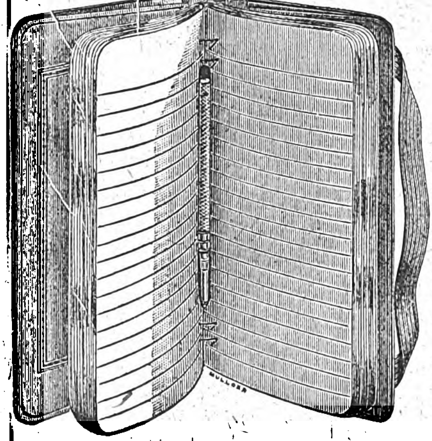
BEECHAM'S PILLS always BRIGHTON you up like a summer's BATH.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will lift you from the SLOUGH of despondency
BEECHAM'S PILLS make a bright EYE and a BLYTHE step.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make you WARE like an IRON BRIDGE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are good travelling companions wherever you may ROME.
BEECHAM'S PILLS bring a NICE complexion; take one during your IDLE moments.
BEECHAM'S PILLS should accompany FLORENCE and VICTORIA on their summer TOURS.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are known from TASMANIA to SPITZBERGEN.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have been over ANDOVER again admitted to be worth a NEW GUINEA a box.
BEECHAM'S PILLS should accompany every ship's CREWE, in case illness "springs a LEEK" on them.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make your constitution as hard as FLINT or STONE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS find a NEW-MARKET and a NEW-PORT daily; their SALE is immense.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are decidedly calculated to bring a DEAL of benefit to you.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are grand nerve reposers when you cannot SETTLE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are likely to exist as long as STONEHENGE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have no BOURN, no limit, as to their effectiveness.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have invariably the power to take all the MOLD off you.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make your spirits light as AYR and buoyant as a CORK.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly take all the WALES and cries out of SYDNEY and ADELAIDE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS annual Sale of Six Million Boxes yearly surely LEEDS the way.
BEECHAM'S PILLS when you have ETON too free, or imbibed too DIEPPE, will right you at once.
BEECHAM'S PILLS truthfully MALAY claim to saving thousands of lives yearly.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are the best present for SUEZ handsome BOW when he is indisposed.
BEECHAM'S PILLS preserve you from the MENAI STRAITS a neglected system is subject to.
BEECHAM'S PILLS glide DOWN as pleasantly as a LONDON oyster.
BEECHAM'S PILLS never fail to cool the system when you BERNE with HITCHIN sensations.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will suit either MISSIS-SIPPI or MISS-OURI at home or travelling.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are pacific in their action; once tried you never TYRE of them.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will benefit either an ASIA MINOR or an adult AMAZON.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have the power of bringing you to a NEW-HAVEN of health.

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST
AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST
AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

Advertisers should write for particulars of spaces to let in "Short Stories."

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

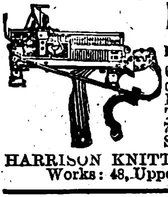
MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.
KNITTER



KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birminghan.

ONE BOX OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's
Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment; total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, &c. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. HOWELL, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days.

ROMANCE
LOVE
ADVENTURE
WAR HUMOUR
PATHOS

SHORT STORIES

No. 346.] [One Penny.

Edited by

C. Arthur Pearson.

For the Week ending August 17th, 1895.

Without Precedent.

“THINGS can't go on any longer as they have done,” was Ralph Eggleston's remark to himself, as, after a more than usually unsatisfactory tête-à-tête with his fiancée, Miss Marsh, he at length took his departure, resolving as he left the house that he would never visit it again.

The fact of the matter was Miss Marsh was an heiress in her own right, and realising her social importance, was somewhat exacting in her demands upon her lover, who, it is but fair to say, was no mere fortune-hunter, being a rising young barrister and possessed of a fair income of his own, so that his motives could not be regarded as purely mercenary.

They had met originally—he and Miss Marsh—at the house of a mutual acquaintance; had taken to each other, as the saying is, and in course of time the liking had extended into courtship, and when Ralph had proposed marriage the answer was a favourable one.

For a time after the engagement had been announced, all went pleasantly enough; but of late there had been more or less frequent bickerings between them, not the sort of lovers' quarrels which often tend to unite two young people more to each other in the end, but an amount of exaction on the lady's part against which the independent spirit of her lover rebelled.

At length things seemed to have arrived at a climax, as evidenced by the remark at the commencement of this story.

Having relieved himself by its deliverance, Ralph strode moodily along in the direction of his own home, when an inspiration suddenly seemed to occur to him, as he said aloud:

“And why not? A capital idea! I will give it a trial, anyway. To meet a woman who would really care for one would be to have new interest in life. There must be hundreds of girls in this city who would be only too glad to go in for a little innocent flirtation; it need not go any further than that. Anyway, I'll give the thing a chance,” and stepping into the office of a daily paper, he quickly wrote out an advertisement for the matrimonial column, paid for its insertion, and set out for home again, feeling well satisfied with himself at having done a satisfactory thing.

“It will be a delightful change,” was his mental comment; “that is, if I get any replies, and there should happen to be one amongst them from a really nice girl.”

On Monday morning he called at the office and presented his ticket, in case there were any answers to his advertisement.

Any answers, indeed! Why, there were a shoal of them, and it took him several hours to master their contents. There were letters from ladies in all ranks of the social scale.

All rights reserved.]

Some of them he threw aside contemptuously, after reading the first few lines, others he reserved for further consideration, finally deciding to reply to one signed Rose Attwood, the wording and tenor of which most appealed to him.

In due course he received an answer, whereupon he wrote, suggesting an appointment for an early date, naming as a rendezvous a spot where he did not anticipate he was likely to meet anybody he knew.

Punctual to time he put in an appearance there, only to find the lady awaiting him; to his astonishment, and no less agreeable surprise, she was a young girl of decidedly prepossessing appearance and ladylike demeanour.

"You got my letter," he stammered out; "I am R. E." He had given his initials only.

"Yes," she replied, with a becoming blush, "otherwise I should not have been here."

"Well, we can't stand talking here very well, what do you say if we go and have some lunch; I know a capital place not far off."

"Thank you very much," and they went.

The strange acquaintanceship thus formed rapidly blossomed into friendliness. Although always neatly and nicely dressed, Ralph soon discovered that Miss Attwood was by no means well off, and that to be taken about to theatres and other places of amusement, not omitting cosy little dinners before, or suppers afterwards, were delights to which she had never before been accustomed; and in this way the weeks sped into months without either being apparently aware of the flight of time.

Ralph had gathered that she supported herself as a music teacher, having left her home in the country to reside with friends in town, and from a casual remark she had made one day he had an idea she was, or had been, married, but whether she had a husband living or not never bothered him; he found her companionship an agreeable change to that of his fiancée, and that was enough for him.

An exacting lover.

She, on her part, had never sought to pry into his affairs in any way except what he told her about himself. She listened to him with interest, and what he did not care to tell her she evinced no anxiety to know.

On this convenient basis their friendship existed. They were, in fact, very good friends indeed, and as nobody but their two selves knew of their intimacy, there was no "Mrs. Grundy" to point out that they were living in a fools' paradise which could not very well exist for ever.

Strange as it may appear, Ralph had not broken off his engagement with Miss Marsh, and despite his resolution never to go to her house again, he nevertheless called there from time to time, although his demeanour had not much of the ardent lover about it. Not that this was likely to give his fiancée any great amount of uneasiness, seeing that she was not very much in love with him. They were going to be married some day, she supposed, and that was enough for her.

One evening when dining alone with Rose, an occurrence which came regularly two or three times a week, Ralph casually alluded to his engagement.

The colour left his companion's face as she replied:

"And are you really engaged to the lady you spoke of?"

"Well, I suppose so. She has never broken it off."

"And you will marry her some day?"

"Oh, I don't know. I might do worse. She is very rich, and I—well, I'm a poor man, comparatively speaking, you know. I have to work hard at my profession, and one doesn't want to slave away all one's life."

"No."

"Don't think for a moment I am nothing but a fortune-hunter. I really did like the girl once, but she's so hard to please."

"Do you try to please her?"

"Yes, honestly I do. For a long time I did everything I could think of to meet her wishes."

"And you failed to succeed?"

"That's so. She is so difficult to satisfy. Sometimes it's one thing, sometimes another—from politics to preaching."

"Is she what you call very goody-goody?"

"My dear girl, she's anything but that."

"Oh!" followed by a pause of some moments, during which Rose toyed idly with a spoon in front of her.

"What are you thinking about, my pet?"

"You," was the simple rejoinder.

"And what about me, little woman? And why so serious over it?"

"You will be marrying soon, I suppose, and—do you know I would like to go home now, please."

"Nonsense, child, why you are going to the theatre. You have forgotten."

"No, I have not forgotten, but after what you have told me, I would rather not go, thanks. Would you mind walking with me as far as our corner as you call it?"

It should be explained that in their various outings, the final farewell had invariably been spoken at the corner of a certain street where they always parted, Rose, on leaving, running along swiftly until she came to the steps of one of the flat houses, all exactly alike, that loomed solemnly in a row, then having turned round and waved her hand, she disappeared indoors.

She had told Ralph on the occasion of his first escorting her to the corner, that she wished her exact residence to remain unknown to him, and he was enough of a gentleman, having given his word, not to attempt to discover it.

"Good-bye, and thank you very much for all the kindness you have showered upon me, for which I am deeply grateful; but," with a choking sob, "I would rather not see you again, please;" and darting off, she had reached the house and run up the steps without so much as looking back, almost before Ralph had realised what her last words meant to him, or how fond he had become of her.

After standing motionless for a few moments he appeared to have come to some sudden resolution, and striding off the way he had come, hailed the first passing vehicle, telling the man to drive him to 301, Blank Street, the home of Miss Marsh and her mother. The former was in one of her "touchy" moods, and took him severely to task for not coming to see her oftener. Exasperated beyond all endurance, he at last blurted out: "Well, there's only one way I can see out of it. We had better get married as soon as possible."

Now, this was not quite what Miss Marsh wished for, and she endeavoured to temporise; but Mrs. Marsh happening to come into the drawing-room when the discussion was at its height, promptly settled the matter by deciding the date for them—six weeks hence—not wishing to lose her prospective son-in-law, who, if not equal to her daughter in the matter of wealth, was in every other respect a most desirable connection.

An hour after Ralph found himself on his homeward way, and inwardly blaming himself for having allowed his pique to get the better of his real feelings.

"I must see Rose once more, and then it will be all over, one way or the other. It would be a caddish thing to go and ask for her at this time of night. I'll write a letter. Fool that I am! I don't even know her address. No, but I know what I'll do: wait for her to-morrow as she goes out; she always gives a music lesson each morning about nine o'clock; she told me so herself."

Just before nine o'clock the following morning Rose appeared with her music portfolio under her arm. On seeing Ralph her colour visibly heightened, and she would have passed him by had he not interposed himself before her.

"Well, the damage is done at last."

"What has happened to you? Is it very bad?"

"Oh, no, quite the contrary, I suppose. I am to be married to Miss Marsh in six weeks from now; her mother has settled it all for us."

"Oh," said Rose, trying to smile, although she was now deadly pale.

"I suppose you don't care much," in a forced tone.

"I do, indeed."

"Well, it need not make any difference to us, need it? I shan't want always to be tied to my wife's apron string, and we can resume our pleasant friendship just where we left it off."

"It's wrong of you to say that, and you know it. Oh, but if things were only different!"

"If things were only different!" A light seemed to suddenly break in on him. "By heavens! they shall be; why was I ever so blind; you are worth a dozen of her, and I will tell her so to-day. Yes, this very minute." And before she could stop him, he was gone.

"Ralph, come back! please, come back!"

But if Ralph heard, he did not appear to.

"Mr. Eggleston called just now, mamma, and it's all over between us; this comes of your good-natured interference—not that I mind a bit; I never really cared for him, and it is his loss, not mine."

"What nonsense you talk, child. Mr. Eggleston has a great future before him, and he is a husband any girl might be proud of. Did he assign any reason, may I ask?"

"Only the usual conventional excuse—he had come to the conclusion we were not suited to each other."

"Fiddlesticks! there's a woman at the bottom of it, I'll be bound, and it will be my duty as your parent to find her out and expose him."

"Please do not trouble to do so on my account, he is not worth it."

Once more Ralph and Rose are together. This time it is evening, the time he knows she comes home from her afternoon music lesson.

"Thank goodness I am well out of it, and I shall never marry anybody now, unless," with a short uneasy laugh, "I could marry you, which is impossible."

"Why?" with a startled look on her face.

"Because you are married already, I believe; at least, you told me so."

"I have no recollection of the fact," was the demure reply.

"Do you really mean that?"

"Indeed I do. I am not twenty till next birthday, and I have never been engaged, let alone married."

"Oh! my darling, what an awful mistake I might have made; but it is not too late yet to repair it. Brute that I have been to you, Rose. May I hope that in time you may forgive me, and——"

"Please don't say any more; it can never, never be. I know I have been to blame quite as much, if not more so, than you have; I only answered your advertisement in a joke, but when I saw you, you were so nice and so respectful to me, and it was so dreadfully dreary and dull at home, and so pleasant going about with you, that I——"

"Oh! Rose, my darling! only hear me. I love you more——"

"No, dear, no! You may think you do, but you would never forgive yourself if you were to marry a girl who had so far forgotten herself as to answer an advertisement in a matrimonial journal. You have been very, very kind to me, and I shall always remember the happy hours we have spent together. And now it must be all over, please. Let us say good-bye once for all. Remember, you promised me once, as a gentleman, never to try and find out the number of the house I live at, and I shall expect you to keep to your word. Not that it would matter much, as I shall go away at once. And now, good-bye," and her fortitude having at length utterly broken down, she left him without another word.

Ralph's mind was made up without delay. He would remain where he was until he saw her again, all night and all next day as well if need be, for did she not say say she was going away.

All through the long night he paced up and down, and then just before the city was awakening into life his vigil was rewarded by seeing a maid servant emerge from one of the houses—the house he knew the position of so well—and, having obtained a cab from the nearest rank, return with it.

Presently one or two modest looking boxes were brought out and placed on the roof, and then, and not until then, did Ralph make up his mind what to do. Engaging the only other cab on the rank, he gave the driver instructions to follow and on no account lose sight of the laden one, giving him at the same time a substantial tip to accelerate his movements. On and on, through what seemed an endless number of streets, and then cab number one entered the terminus of a big railway station. There were not many passengers about so early in the morning, so that Ralph had no difficulty in keeping Rose in sight without himself being seen, and having ascertained her destination, obtained a ticket, and waited until the train was almost starting.

"Stand back there! stand back!" the guard shouted excitedly. But Ralph was not to be denied, and managed to get into the already moving carriage.

Before the journey was ended, his eloquence had not been wasted. At any rate, he said with a smile, as he helped his companion to alight, "I think we may safely say our love-making has been carried on in a style without precedent."

S. J. F. NEWBERY.

IT CAME TO PASS

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

SUMMARY.

Charlotte, a young girl just out of the schoolroom, is married to Raymond Peel, widower, in his forty-fifth year, notwithstanding the knowledge that his past life has been a bad one. Entering London Society, she meets at Lady Logan's and elsewhere a young musician in whom she is much interested. Mrs. Donnington-Bain, an effusive American actress, calls on her husband.

CHAPTER II. (Continued.)

While the mysterious lady visitor related her adventures her eyes were riveted on the pale face of the man. He wore a troubled expression, and seemed ill at ease. The past, which had so nearly been forgotten, came back with a rush, and memories long dead woke afresh to life.

"You are to be congratulated," said Charlotte, coming again to the rescue.

"It isn't a bad life on the whole," declared Mrs. Donnington-Bain. "You meet a variety of people, and the perpetual change of scene is invigorating."

She ran her fingers up and down the silver cord outlining her scarlet bodice, and occasionally bit at her white veil.

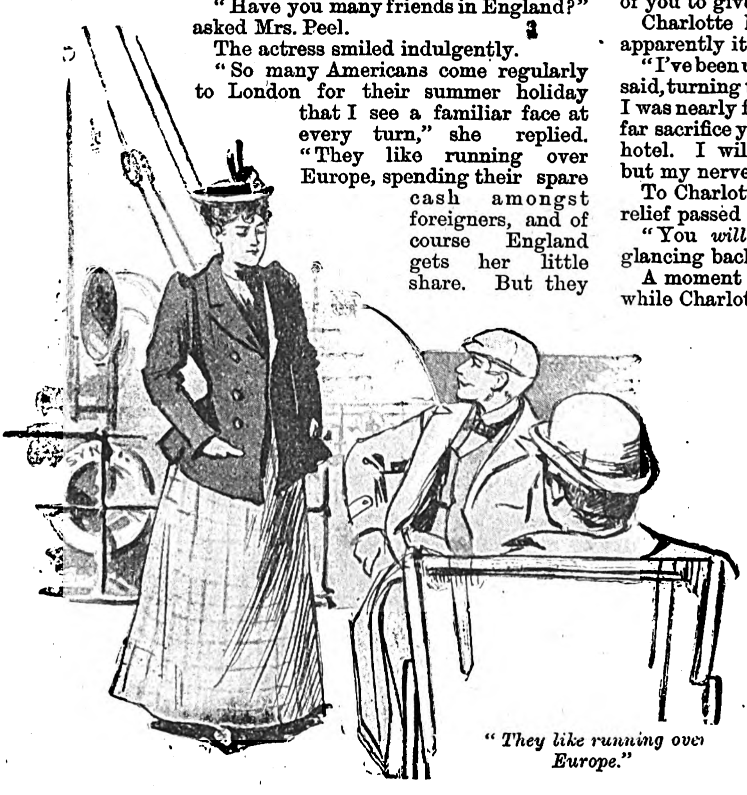
"You do not look a day older than when I saw you last, Augusta," Mr. Peel vouchsafed, after a pause.

She shot a grateful glance at him.

"Have you many friends in England?" asked Mrs. Peel.

The actress smiled indulgently.

"So many Americans come regularly to London for their summer holiday that I see a familiar face at every turn," she replied. "They like running over Europe, spending their spare cash amongst foreigners, and of course England gets her little share. But they did not make me forget your husband, Mrs. Peel—old friends rank first. It has been delightful seeing him, and when I am happy I cannot repress my feelings—I feel just inclined to hug you both!"



"They like running over Europe."

Charlotte devoutly hoped she would not carry out her threat, and palpably stiffened.

Mr. Peel cleared his throat, and was about to speak, when Mrs. Donnington-Bain sprang suddenly to her feet.

"Heavens! look at the time," she cried, pointing dramatically to the clock. "I only intended to fly here and see you for two minutes, just to let Raymond know I was in town—I shall be late for dinner! I am tired to death of dining, but it is one of life's most essential duties, and I never shirk it. But, oh! what indigestible dishes they give you in these English hotels, and always under the eternal glare of electricity. I like feeding by candle-light, for eating time is resting time with me. It is my only quiet hour. If I were under housemaid in a lodging-house I couldn't feel more fagged when I go to bed. Life's socialities are killing me!"

Charlotte smiled at her tragic tone, and submitted to a fond embrace.

"I must kiss you and wish you joy with this dear husband of yours," she said, squeezing her hand. "It was so sweet of you to give me such a cordial welcome."

Charlotte looked for a touch of irony in her tone, but apparently it was non-existent.

"I've been using my cousin's, Lord Northtown's, horses," she said, turning to Mr. Peel, "and they were so fresh coming that I was nearly frightened to death. I wonder if you would so far sacrifice yourself as to drive with me to the door of my hotel. I will promise not to detain you a moment longer, but my nerves are so unstrung after the voyage."

To Charlotte's surprise he assented readily, and a look of relief passed over his features.

"You will forgive me, Mrs. Peel?" she exclaimed, glancing back over her shoulder as he followed her.

A moment later they were side by side in the carriage while Charlotte stood alone in the deserted drawing-room.

Raymond Peel addressed the woman in a half whisper.

"Why did you not tell me you were coming?" he asked.

Mrs. Donnington-Bain gave a wicked little chuckle, and shrugged her shoulders.

"That was my whim!" she replied.

"I was simply on thorns. I suppose you were sharp enough to see that, Augusta?"

"Rather; but cheer up, old boy. I had no intention of giving you away."

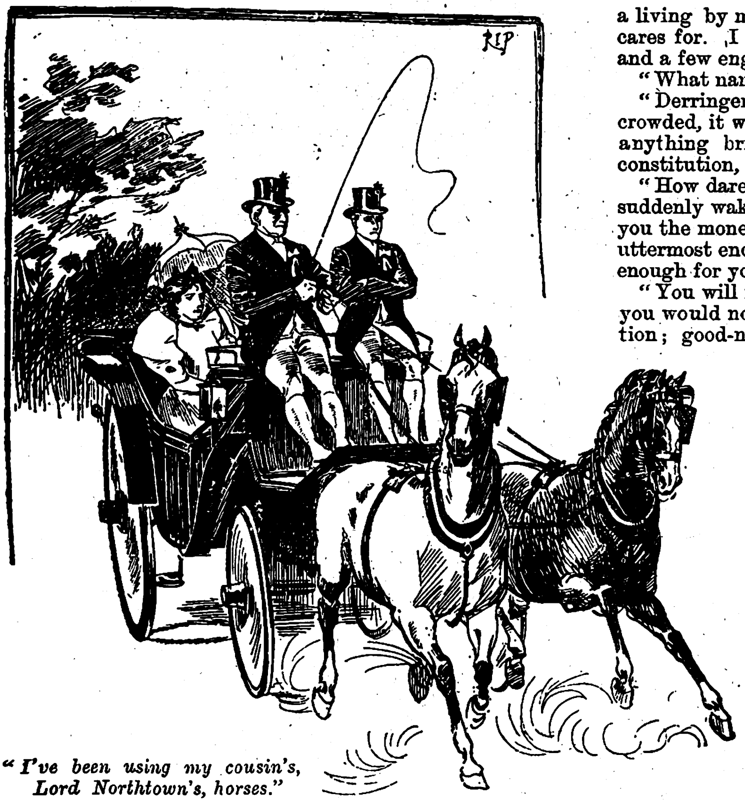
"Listen. My wife knows nothing, absolutely nothing, of the past. Not one word to her on the subject—remember that."

His voice, though low, vibrated with intensity.

"Of course," she answered, impatiently. "What do you take me for—a chattering schoolgirl?"

"Have you anything to tell me?" asked Raymond.

"Yes; Lynch is in England."



"I've been using my cousin's, Lord Northtown's, horses."

"This day is evidently destined to be one of bitter memories and unpleasant revelations. I wanted to wipe out the past, Augusta; but it's no good. The world is too small, far too small to hold us all."

"I did not wish to cast a gloom over your spirits, but you must learn to take things as they come. Try to be more philosophical—like I am, for instance. We have both known trouble in our day. I have been through the Bankruptcy Court and the Divorce Court. My husband is now sleeping with his fathers—he can no longer be the curse of wretched women. Then I have seen my nearest and dearest sentenced to death!"

A groan escaped his lips. He seized her arm, and dug his nails into her flesh. "For the love of Heaven spare me these reminiscences!"

Augusta's lips parted tranquilly in one of the saddest smiles he had ever seen. All her affectation disappeared, and for once she became natural.

"Forgive me," she murmured, with a little catch in her voice. "I have grown hardened and accustomed to disregard the feelings of others. By the way, Raymond, you have not asked after the boy."

He shuddered perceptibly.

"No," he muttered between his teeth; "I did not wish to."

"If I were not so disgracefully extravagant—and I cannot root out my darling sins now in my old age—I would do something handsome for him," she said.

"I have paid you the money regularly."

"Yes, yes; but you hate the very thought of him, and it is not likely you will double—or shall I say treble the sum?"

"No, by Jove!"

"And yet I love the boy."

Augusta's eyes drooped, but there was a false ring in her tone.

"He is in England with me now," she continued, "and I am trying to work him up a connection, that he may make a living by music. It is the only thing in the world he cares for. I have succeeded in getting him some pupils, and a few engagements."

"What name does he go by?"

"Derringer; Hugh Derringer. But the profession is so crowded, it would need a very optimistic mind to imagine anything brilliant resulting. Besides, he has a weakly constitution, and can work but little."

"How dared you bring him to England?" said the man, suddenly waking up to the fact of his injuries. "I gave you the money to keep him out of my sight, away at the uttermost ends of the earth. Have I not paid you interest enough for your trouble?"

"You will not see him," said Augusta, confidently, "and you would not know him if you did. This is my destination; good-night, Raymond. How cold your hand is! It chills me through my glove, yet the evening seems close and sultry."

"Yes," he replied. "I can hardly breathe."

"Good-night," she said again, and he re-echoed the words as he turned away.

"Good!" he muttered to himself, sardonically, "good! As if everything connected with this night was not evil."

"I never saw such a woman!" cried Charlotte, discussing Mrs. Donnington-Bain after dinner, "so loud and vulgar, my dear, and what golden hair! I dare say she looks lovely on the stage; large features show to advantage behind the footlights. Even from your study window I pronounced her dangerously handsome. The distance lent enchantment."

"Poor creature! She has seen some rough weather, and is much to be pitied. Her husband ill-treated and deserted her. That is enough to harden a woman at the outset."

Charlotte's eyes softened, as she crept into Raymond's arms.

"I won't say another word against her—I, who have such a good, devoted husband!"

"Leave out the first adjective," he replied, contracting his brows.

"No—good always to me. Do you remember, dear, before our marriage you made me promise never to mention your past life? You told me it had been 'a sad and a bad one.' Yes, those were your words, and you asked me if I were willing to take you under any circumstances. I said I would marry you if you were a murderer, with a list of crimes as long as my arm. I do not want to break my promise of silence; but I cannot bear to think of that strange Augusta having known you then, when I was not part of your life."

"Poor little woman! Do not worry your head over the follies and failings of an old man's youth."

"Old!" she laughed, fixing her eyes on the smooth, clear-cut face, which the hand of time had left unfurrowed. "You are only a boy to me! Now, if you come to talk of ancient people, look at that poor, decrepid creature with the grey beard, squeaking a wretched violin under the gas lamp in the street." She leant out of the window as she spoke, and threw him some money. "I wish," she said, with a sigh, "that I had a magic wand, and could transform the lame beggar into Hugh Derringer."

"Hugh Derringer! Where—where did you hear that name?"

It was with a strong effort that Raymond steadied his voice.

"Why are you surprised? He was the blue-eyed boy I fell in love with at Lady Logan's."

He bit his lip.

"I should like you to hear him play," she continued, eagerly. "May I give a musical party, and engage him for the evening?"

"No. Certainly not."

"That is decisive!" she replied, laughing at his stern tone. "I would delight in slipping a ten-pound note into his violin-case like Joseph with his brothers' sacks. He only asks a guinea, and it is not often he gets that. I call it sweating. Oh! Raymond, are you ill?"

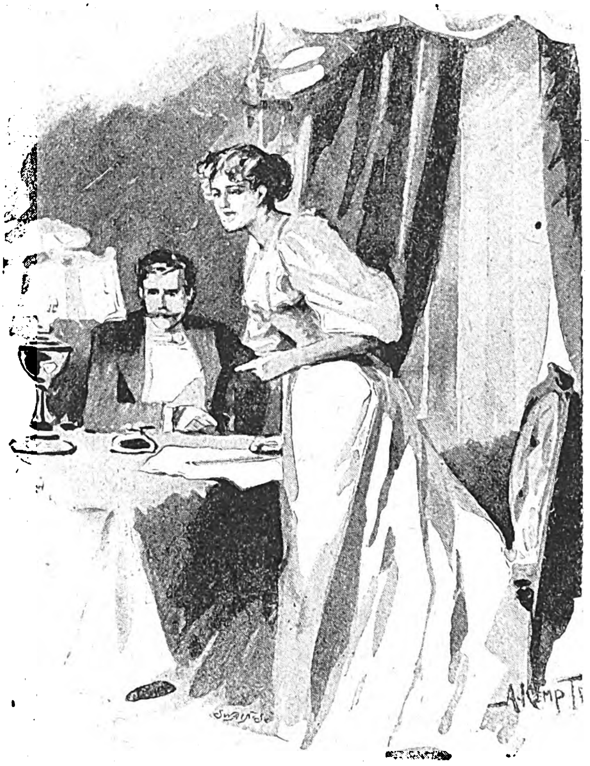
"Why do you ask?"

"Your face is so pale, and I felt your hand tremble in mine. Dearest, what is the matter?"

"I have rather a headache; it is very sultry to-night."

"Come and lie down and close your eyes. I will promise not to talk."

She drew him to the sofa. He felt glad to obey her, for his head was in a whirl. But the pain across his temples had no connection with the atmosphere without; it was caused by harrowing thoughts within, deep down in his secret soul.



"That is decisive," she replied.

CHAPTER III.

Mr. and Mrs. Peel had driven to Sandown. It was a lovely summer afternoon, and the first person they met was Augusta Donnington-Bain. Elaborately attired in purple, shot with peacock green, and surrounded by an admiring group of eminently frivolous young men, the actress planked her money down freely, and appeared in boisterous spirits.

"A la bonne heure!" she exclaimed, catching sight of Raymond in the paddock. "My predictions have been verified, for I counted on meeting you to-day. Mrs. Peel, why are you looking so serious? Have you been unfortunate in your selection of winners?"

"This is my first racing experience," replied Charlotte, frankly. "It is bewildering, and I am lost in contemplation."

"Then you have a lot to learn!" laughed Mrs. Donnington-Bain, glancing at the tall young figure with a sense of envy. "You have a great advantage over the blasé women around you; it is everything to be fresh in the pursuit of pleasure."

"Do you ever bet?" asked Charlotte, casting a suspicious glance at the actress's pencilled card.

"Such a question," declared Mrs. Donnington-Bain, turning to Raymond, "surprises one by its simplicity! If you want to start a charitable institution, Mrs. Peel, inaugurate a 'Distressed Gambling Ladies' Guild,' and I will apply for a pension on the score of having wasted more money on the turf than any woman in the world. Now, Raymond, are you going to escort me to the stand? Lady Logan is sweeping down upon us, and will keep you here for half an hour. She is like a New Woman let loose on a platform. My nerves become seriously affected in her presence, I assure you."

As she spoke Lady Logan's voice fell on Charlotte's ear.

"How are you, my dear Mrs. Peel—none the worse for this intolerable heat? I feel thoroughly shattered and exhausted, but you always look blooming."

With a sigh of relief Charlotte returned the greeting, while Augusta drifted away with Raymond.

"We came in quite a party on Harry's drag," continued Lady Logan, indicating her husband, "and I am sure I got sunstroke on the way down. Isn't it annoying for me? Two tiresome girls failed us at the last moment, and so now I have half-a-dozen men on my hands. It would be but christian charity to let me introduce them, Mrs. Peel. My head racks, and talking is torture."

Charlotte readily assented, glad to escape Mrs. Donnington-Bain.

"This is my old friend Dr. Lynch," said Lady Logan. "He has scarcely been in England a week, and we are making the most of his stay."

Charlotte inclined her head, and smiled graciously. She had a particularly fascinating bow. Dr. Lynch was very tall, very commanding in person, with an air of distinction, and clever, searching eyes. He smiled pleasantly in return, and made some casual remark upon the racing.

"So you have driven through all this dust and heat to see a few horses scamper past a post!" she said, glancing at the upright figure towering above her. He was a modern giant, she thought, with a very noble physique.

"On a day like this it is one of the prettiest sights imaginable to my mind," he replied.

"But there is something unwholesome in the excitement and anxiety," declared Charlotte. "It is only another form of speculation moulded into a pleasure afternoon."

"I am afraid you are too good for this world," he said, with a twinkle in his eyes. "Still, you are wise in your generation, for no vice clings faster than a passion for the turf. I have known it ruin many a rich woman, and yet, on the other hand, I met a sporting old lady who managed to live by it; but she preached the most dreadful doctrines."

His voice and manner pleased Charlotte; they were so frank and unaffected.

"Won't you say you are enjoying yourself in spite of this wicked diversion?" he murmured, as they wandered towards the lawn. "Let us sit here; there are fewer people, and the stand is crowded."

"How long are you staying in England?" she asked.

"Only a month or two, and it is my first holiday for years. I am doctor of a gaol in Sydney. It is rather a gruesome trade."

"Write a book on your experiences of gaol-birds. Poor creatures! I dare say you have reminiscences worth relating."

"Yes, had I the time or the energy."

For a long while they sat together, Charlotte both interested and amused by her new friend's conversation, while he was equally content with her society.

"She is altogether charming," was his mental verdict, Charlotte being a good listener. The art of listening is less common than the art of talking.

"I hope we may meet again," he said, with a certain fervour that surprised her, as she rose to go.

"I should like to introduce you to my husband," she replied. "He went into the paddock after the last race. Will you come and help me find him?"

"With pleasure. Strange to say I did not catch your name. Reade, wasn't it?"

"No, but here is my husband."

Looking up, he saw Raymond Peel standing before him with Mrs. Donnington-Bain. At the same moment Charlotte casually murmured an introduction. Her husband bent his head slightly, paling beneath the doctor's look of hatred, who neither bowed nor spoke, but glared into Raymond's face, which was white as death. Would that moment never end? There was an expression of unutterable loathing and contempt in the darkness of his eyes as Dr. Lynch turned sharply on his heel, slightly raising his hat to Charlotte, and was gone.

"Well!" declared Mrs. Donnington-Bain, "if that is not a straight cut," breaking into a short laugh. "It has given me a chill feeling of antiquity. He might have done the civil for the sake of my beaux yeux! Civility is cheap, but Lynch only indulges expensive tastes. Take me away—that man has disgusted me!"

Charlotte could hardly realise the insult offered to her husband. Her first sensation was horror that anyone should treat him with such terrible disdain. Then a sickening sense of dread suddenly overcame her, an instinct that all was not well with Raymond, as she looked up at him, a deadly fear knocking at her heart. Mrs. Donnington-Bain, sharply observant, was startled by the expression in Charlotte's eyes, having regarded her as cold, reserved, and incapable of feeling.

"What was the meaning of it?" she asked, clasping her hands together, and trembling from unusual excitement.

Her husband's lips quivered, and his eyes shifted nervously. He seemed at a loss for words. His marked reticence dismayed her, as Mrs. Donnington-Bain spoke with quick precision.

"It is quite an absurd story," she said. "Dr. Lynch and Raymond quarrelled over some land in that wild and savage country we call Australia. The doctor made himself ridiculous, and went to law about it. He was mad at losing the case, and has cut his adversary ever since."

Charlotte appeared only half-satisfied with the explanation, for the doctor's manner had frightened her, and she was watching Raymond's face. Already she dimly suspected some unknown shame and disgrace.

"Come, it is time we went," he said.

The thought of a dark irrevocable past of which she must never speak rose up now spectre-like before Charlotte, while her face blanched at the remembrance of the insult she had witnessed.

"Good-bye," she murmured, giving her hand to Mrs. Donnington-Bain, with a smile plainly covering a heavily-burdened heart.

As Charlotte turned to follow her husband, she found herself facing Lady Logan.

"Going already, Mrs. Peel?" she cried. "Shall we meet at the Wilson's to-night?"

"No, I'm afraid not. Raymond does not like musical evenings."

"But if you have no other engagement, do come with me. It is a great mistake to stay at home, and you can easily send your husband to the club. May I call for you at half-past ten? Hugh Derringer is going to play."

"I should love to hear him," said Charlotte, trying to speak lightly. "But are you well enough?"

"My dear, I never let a headache interfere with existing arrangements, or I should not be here to-day. That is one of my little perversities."

"Is Dr. Lynch going?"

"No; he has a Freemason's banquet to-night, and will speechify till the early hours. He has robbed me of Harry's escort, so let us be grass widows together."

Involuntarily a sigh of relief escaped Charlotte.

"Didn't you find Dr. Lynch delightful?" asked Lady Logan. "Nobody could be dull in his society. He is such a dear creature!"

"Do you think so?" speaking coldly.

"Yes; but I see you don't agree with me."

"He has no manners," Charlotte explained, with a pitiful glance towards the retreating figures of Augusta and her husband. "Good-bye. I will come to-night."

"Do not fail me!" cried Lady Logan, waving adieu. "You must not let Mr. Peel grow fogeyish. Oust him when he suggests a quiet evening at home, there is nothing better for the nerves than life, gaiety, and movement."

Hugh Derringer had so strangely interested Charlotte that she could not resist the temptation of accompanying her friend that evening.

"It will divert my mind," she thought, "and I must try to drown annoyance in dissipation."

So, determined to shake off her worries, she sought the silver lining to her cloud, and as Raymond would give her no further information concerning Dr. Lynch, ceased questioning him, and endeavoured to forget the unpleasant incident.

Being cheerful by nature Charlotte decided to enjoy the evening, and found herself once again listening to the young violinist with the sad eyes.

"He is one of my charities," Lady Logan informed her. "I champion his cause pecuniarily."

Determined to renew her acquaintance with Hugh Derringer, Charlotte found him after his performance in a deserted boudoir, leaning against an open window, alone, and meditative.

"What are you thinking of?" she asked, coming gently behind him, unobserved.

He started visibly.

"You have not forgotten me?" she said, holding out her hand.

"No," he replied. "I could never forget your kind words of encouragement; but I fancy if I answered your question my thoughts would somewhat surprise you."

"Then may I be surprised?"

"I am speculating on my own identity—what I am, and whence I came. You see before you merely a waif and stray—just a spar of wreckage on life's shore."

"But rich in genius," she interpolated. "No mean inheritance!"

"Yet I am more forlorn than you imagine, for I know nothing of my parentage. I doubt if I was ever born!" with an attempt at a smile. "I believe I was invented."

Some intonation in his voice brought Raymond to her mind.

"Can it be possible that you are entirely ignorant of your origin, nameless, in fact?"

He bowed his head.

"But how were you brought up?" she asked, with sympathetic interest.

"A beautiful woman adopted me, a stray child from the workhouse, and treated me as her son. She was not rich, yet never repented her generosity. Remarkably self-sacrificing, wasn't it, Mrs. Peel?"

"Then why do you speak so bitterly of her?"

"Because in reality she is neither charitable nor good. Why, then, did she burden herself with the care of a child? Children I have more recently discovered are her greatest aversion. I can conceive no other reason for the so-called act of benevolence, than that I am her son, and she is ashamed to own me."

His words were checked by a low, deep cough that shook the slender form, and contracted the muscles of his face with pain.

"How ill you seem!" said Charlotte, whose heart ached for him.

"It is down here in my chest," he replid, apologetically; "and my throat is weak—relaxed, you know. It hampers me with my work."

"Would you mind shutting the window?—I am cold," she declared, shuddering to think he had been breathing the night air. "I suppose," she continued, "that I ought not to ask the name of the lady who adopted you?"

"She makes no secret of it, and, even if she did, I could trust you before all the world."

"On what authority?"

"My natural instinct, which has never played me false."

"And her name?"

"Augusta Donnington-Bain."

Charlotte stared at him dumfounded, with a certain fervour of conviction. That look which seemed so strangely, horribly familiar to her, what might it not mean? Her eyes were blinded by a mist—she could see nothing, and the room swam round.

During the momentary pause a graceful woman in white entered the boudoir.

"Will you oblige us with some more music, Mr. Derringer?" she said, not pausing for a reply, since he was paid to wait upon her pleasure.

"Give me your address," murmured Charlotte, faintly. "Or are you at Mrs. Donnington-Bain's hotel?"

He smiled at her question.

"Oh, no! I have a room over a baker's shop. It is not romantic."

Charlotte shuddered as she took his card.

"Thank you," she said. "Good-night."

"Why are you going so soon, Mrs. Peel?" asked Lady Logan. "You look very pale. I hope you are not ill."

"Oh! no; only tired."

"Has General Wilson been fatiguing you with his endless comments on science and politics?"

"I have been studying the science of sciences —humanity!" replied Charlotte.

"No doubt you made some excellent investigations, well worthy of solution! Remember me to that nice husband of yours, my dear, and bear in mind that rest and sleep are advantageous to the young. I am old, and will, therefore, wait for a skirt dance and a French recitation."

With her mind in a whirl of mingled feelings, Charlotte sought solitude. Though trembling at her own thoughts, she still hoped they might be due to an over-wrought imagination. Until her doubts were proved not a breath of suspicion should fall upon Raymond, and so she drove sadly home, shutting her sorrow away in her heart. Till daylight dawned she lay sleepless and miserable, trying to deaden the anguish of her soul, but the darkness into which her wide, open eyes stared was peopled by visions of ghastly possibilities.

She rose late, painfully conscious that her struggle to live these suspicions down had ended in failure.

Raymond noticed Charlotte avoided him, but could not account for her manner. The crushing blow of the previous evening seemed to have frozen her. Once or twice when he addressed her she was conscious of a deep flush on her cheek, while her answers were short and hurried. There were dark lines, too, under her eyes, and her expression was strained and hard.

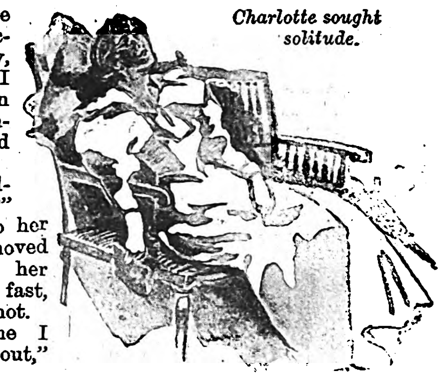
"What are you going to do this afternoon?" he asked.

"Drive, most probably," she replied, with a slight intonation of uneasiness.

She crossed the room and opened the piano, as though to avoid further conversation.

"Then do not expect me back before dinner," he said, after a pause.

"Very well. I have several calls to pay, and much else to think of."



Charlotte sought solitude.

"Why are you so pre-occupied to-day, Charlotte? I have never seen you more constrained and quiet."

"Must I be always laughing?"

He came to her side, but she moved away quickly, her heart beating fast, and her face hot.

"It is time I dressed to go out," she said.

Raymond did not pretend to understand women, and he supposed the fatigue of the season was affecting Charlotte's temper. She was pale with anxiety as she drove off in her brougham, leaning back with a sense of prostration, her hands clasped in nervous weakness on the unopened book in her lap. Presently the horses drew up before a baker's shop, where she alighted, and entered with faltering steps.

"I have come to inquire for Mr. Derringer," she said. "He seemed unwell last night."

"It was a chilly evening for July," replied the woman behind the counter, shaking her head solemnly, "and the young gentleman was not fit to be out of his bed then, with the weather so changeable, too—one day cold and the next 'ot. He looked real bad when he came in, so I sent for Doctor Potts. It's the consumption, ma'am, but 'e won't take no care of 'isself, and 'im such a nice young gentleman —a real young gentleman!"

She pressed a dirty duster to her eyes, and sniffed ominously.

"Is Mr. Derringer at home now?"

Charlotte's voice shook slightly as she spoke.

"No, lady—no," continued her informant, with a long-drawn sigh. "I only wish 'e were. The doctor told 'im to stay in bed, but 'e's gone off to give a lesson in Terra Cotta Villas."

"Then give me the doctor's address," said Charlotte, in a calm deliberate tone, suddenly making a resolve.

"Yes, ma'am; 23, Southampton Gardens. Doctor Potts thinks as it's the sooty air what's got in 'is lungs. The rain was coming down 'ard last night, but 'e just didn't seem to notice it."

Charlotte waited to hear no more, but drove straight to Dr. Potts, from whom she received a very grave report. If Hugh Derringer remained in London he could not be expected to live, and the only chance of saving him was an immediate change.

As she left the doctor's house Charlotte decided to consult her husband upon the mystery of Mrs. Donnington-Bain's adopted child, and seek his advice as the surest means of getting at the truth. She let down the brougham window, and gazed out with a stony stare, as one accustomed to commanding emotion.

Suddenly her eyes fell upon a man on the pavement.

Though confusion all but took her breath away, Charlotte's first impulse at sight of him was to stop the carriage. Dr. Lynch had seen her, and, acting on a swift determination, she pulled the check string. His consternation was evident, as Charlotte, feeling terribly conscious, addressed him with a desperate effort. Already she was covered with vexation at her hasty act, but it was too late to draw back.

"I want to speak to you, Dr. Lynch," she began, hesitatingly. "Will you drive with me a little way, that I may have an opportunity?"

Keenly alive to the awkwardness of the situation, Dr. Lynch sprang into the carriage, and seated himself with a sense of incongruity at her side.

(To be continued.)

THE MAN WHO WAS REALLY GREAT.

By G. B. Burgin.

(Author of "His Lordship," etc.)

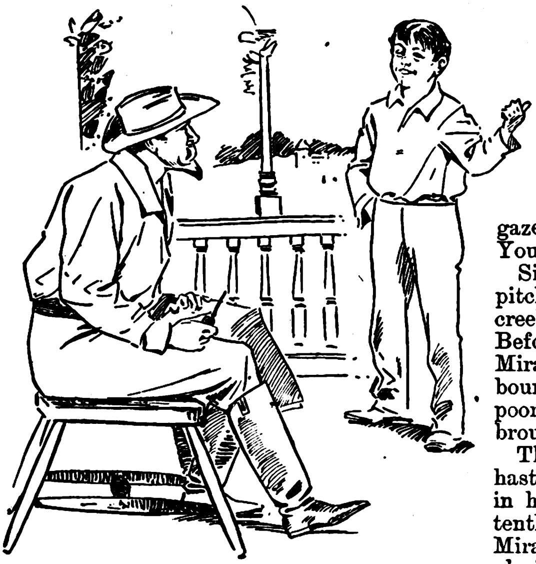
I.

Silas Hubbard was a sublimely, heroically great man. He maintained this point himself on many a hard fought political field; and if one cannot believe such a personal statement, then some of the world's so-called heroes have lived and lied in vain. Four Corners folk knew that Silas meant what he said; if they failed to realise his meaning, he reluctantly supported it with revolver shots. To use a technical illustration, he was accustomed to "lead out"—with his revolver—the intervening spaces when anyone presumed to doubt his veracity. As he lived alone (save for the society of his beautiful daughter, a girl of thirteen) on the brink of the swamp, his audiences, though select, were generally small; but there was always the mitigating consolation of the post-office within a quarter of a mile; and there Silas Hubbard could hold forth on most subjects, secure of the silent sympathy of Constable Wrong, who received a free copy of the Four Corners Gazette every week, and felt morally bound to support the editor's opinions in return for so munificent a gift.



"You run this thing?"

Soon after Silas had bestowed this great boon on Constable Wrong, The Gazette secured an addition to its staff in the shape of a boy of thirteen, who burst through the Bush at the back of the house, one evening, nodded slightly to Silas, and made himself very much at home on the verandah. His deeply-set dark eyes shone out beneath penthouse brows, and his chin had a cleft in the centre. One bleeding toe appeared through his boot; the left foot lacked a sole; and his general appearance suggested that a bath would not be an inappropriate or superfluous step.

Although the snow had but recently gone, the brief Canadian spring clothed every inch of ground with swiftly-growing blades of grass. Already myriads of mosquitoes pestered the sleek kine as they emerged panting from the Bush and slowly sought the village, their swollen udders craving the customary pressure of human hands. Fire-flies flickered through the long grass, or faded away into the dewy dusk of oncoming night, whilst the musical monotone of the never-satiated little sawmill in the creek, as the "night-shift" came on, and the circular-saw ate its way through monster tree-trunks, mingled with the roar of the Falls and the faint lap-lap of the river. The village itself was situated parallel to the river, and consisted of one row of wooden houses, a disused and dismantled fort—sole remnant of the time when the red man was feared in the land—a Presbyterian church with a tin spire, ten taverns, a court-house and gaol in one, six stores, and a rough stone Catholic church with painted windows on which the setting sun shone redly down.

The boy comprehended the village with one glance. "You run this thing?" he queried. pointing in the direction of the printing office. (A tame turkey, with literary tendencies, was making a light supper off the broken types which strewed the ground, whilst a long-bearded, patient-looking goat tried to digest a tin tomato-can containing printers' paste). Silas was taken at a disadvantage, and stammered "Ye-es."

"I'll stay," said the boy. "Guess I can run you in some new wrinkles. Don't mind thanking me. Got any pie about. Genuine pie, not printers'."

"Maybe," sarcastically said Silas, "you'll join the staff and edit me."

The boy fixed a frank gaze on him. "Guess I will. You need it badly—with a razor."

Silas's first impulse was to pitch his unbidden guest into the creek at the back of the building. Before he could carry it out, Miranda appeared bearing a most bounteous provision of pie. "The poor fellow's starving, Dad. I've brought him some of my pie."

The hot-headed adventurer's hasty answer died away unspoken in her presence. He gazed intently, not at the pie, but at Miranda's beautiful blue eyes, the glorious masses of black hair which hung over her head and shoulders, and noted the proud curve of the girl's upper lip, her gleaming teeth and dimpled chin, not cleft like a dint in granite after the fashion of his own. She wore a frock of grey homespun, on her head a red ribbon; in her hand was the platter heaped with pie. As the boy's eyes dropped, hers fairly danced with fun and the consciousness of coming empire, the proffered pie remaining between them in mid-air.

"Eat," said the girl, shyly, her long lashes dropping in their turn.

The boy mechanically took the plate. "May I ask what place you hold in this house?"

"You want to edit Dad," replied the girl: "I'm going to edit you as a punishment for your impudence."

Silas grimly regarded them. "She'll do it, my boy. Better go away—you're welcome to the pie—and chop wood."

The youth's retort was scarcely warrantable. He looked apprehensively at the pie on his plate. "Did you make it?" he murmured.

"Yes," the girl faltered, with a sense of fearsome guilt lying suddenly on her soul.

"Show me the heroes of a nation," said the youngster, taking a huge bite out of a slice—"Show me the heroes of a nation, and I will show you the men who have managed to survive the ordeal of home-made pie."

"Does it disagree with you?" faltered Miranda.

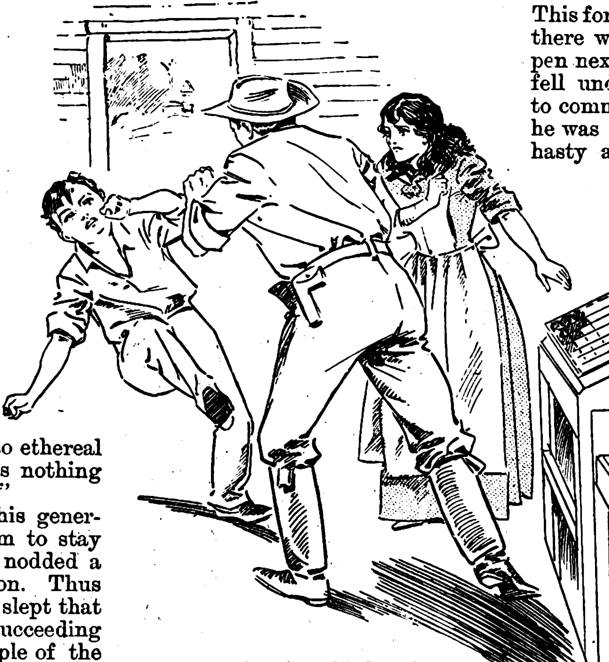
"Not yet." The young fellow looked at her critically. "Confess now, and I will absolve your soul. Didn't you say to yourself this morning, 'To-day I will arise and make my first pie and try a piece of it on father.' Didn't you, now?"

"Ye-es."

"As the day drew on, and you knew what you had deliberately put in that pie, you hesitated. In the heat of the noontide you could doom your father to destruction; but as the calm shadows of night fell about this peaceful home your purpose failed you. You said, mindful that this white-headed man is your father, 'My soul shall be spared so monstrous a crime. I'll try it instead on the first tramp who comes along.' Can you deny it?"

"You know I can't."

"Well, you needn't (he took another bite out of the pie). So far, it is a very good pie—very good indeed. I don't remember to have partaken of so ethereal a pie for weeks. There is nothing at all paleolithic about it."



With one blow from his leg-of-mutton fist.

The girl, mollified by this generous compliment, asked him to stay for the night, and Silas nodded a surly assent to her invitation. Thus it was that Fergus Crane slept that night and for many succeeding nights with the faint ripple of the wandering Ottawa river in his ears, and the sweet west wind, laden with piny odours, blowing softly through the open lattice as the stars peered solemnly over the tree-tops into his little room.

But after that first meeting Silas lost all faith in this pretentious boy, who knew so much more about the way to manage a newspaper than he himself did. Silas would not admit, what everyone else shrewdly surmised, that jealousy was the dominant reason for his dislike. Miranda loved the boy; he was her constant companion and delight; her father held the second place in her heart. The night which brought Fergus such peaceful repose occasioned Silas nothing but the saddest unrest. He loathed the very sight of the lad, although for more than a year there was no open manifestation of their mutual dislike. Moreover, on one or two occasions Silas felt a glow of almost parental pride in Fergus's ability when a more than usually trenchant article from the pen of that truculent youth had aroused a desire on the part of Four Corners' folk to lynch the legally-responsible head of the concern. Fergus, however, regarded the matter as a joke, boldly avowed the authorship of the article, borrowed a big shot-gun, and expressed his willingness to receive a committee of any six citizens, with or without revolvers, to discuss the question, provided they would permit him to open the argument. The lad's laughing defiance had the desired effect, although many leading citizens went about vowing that he was not destined to die in his boots.

Miranda vainly did her best to mend matters. Then something occurred which might have been foreseen by anyone but Silas, who was always ready to under-estimate the personal charm of this waif from the Bush—a charm which, in spite of his jealousy, often made him wish that Miranda had been born a boy with all Fergus's tremendous dash and obstinacy. When Fergus stated that he was about to do something, it was generally done. Silas had a dim prescience that the boy could revolutionise the universe if he chose to set about it. This foreknowledge made him uneasy; there was no telling what might happen next. One day, the thunderbolt fell under his nose, and caused him to commit an act of brutality of which he was ashamed afterwards when his hasty action could not be remedied, and Miranda, for the first time in her life, ceased to think that her father could do no wrong.

One summer evening about fourteen months after Fergus's arrival at the Four Corners, Miranda was in the printing office talking to him. The turkey—it weighed four or five pounds more, owing to its constant accumulation of broken type—which was a disinterested spectator from the doorway, noticed that Fergus's arm was round Miranda's waist. "I'm going to marry you," he said, flinging back his handsome head; "but I shall never make money enough to do it here. Besides, every night the river calls me: 'Come away into the world. You're a stranded log here. Come and taste the world's delights. There's Fame in the world—and Fame is good; there's Love in the world—and Love is good; there's Wealth in the world—and Wealth is good; they all wait for you. Get up. Seek them. Taste them. They're not here, save Love; the world passes this place by as it passes the monks of La Trappe at Two Mountains. Don't ripen and rot here. Come!'"

Miranda drew without the shelter of his arm. "Go. I don't wish you to stay; you would only break your heart and hate me. Come back some day; you've promised. Bring your world with you, lay it at my feet; I shall decide whether to pick it up. But I will be second nowhere. Go to your world, embrace her, weary of her; then come back and ——", she laughed—"tell me whether you prefer her to me."

The lad drew her to him. "You are right. Some day

I'll bring you the world—as much of it as I can carry, at least—or (he pointed to the moon as it sailed over the pine tops) would you prefer that?"

The girl stretched up her pretty hands to it with a longing gesture. "It's as yellow as gold, but, ah me! how lonely to be up there with only the little stars."

"Ah, but they look at it."

"The moon doesn't want to be looked at unless ——"

"Unless?"

"She can look back at her peer."

The boy kissed her. "I will remember that."

"And this," cried a furious voice, as Silas smote him to the floor with one blow from his leg-of-mutton fist.

The boy bounded to his feet and laid hold of an iron crowbar as Miranda rushed between them. Then he laughed lightly, tossed the bar into a corner, and wiped away the dust from his face. "I've eaten your pie, or I'd kill you."

Silas walked to the door. It hurt him that Miranda should shrink away as he passed. "Git," he said, relapsing into the vernacular of his boyhood and utterly disregarding the laboriously-acquired grammatical culture of half a century. "Git out of this. I don't want to see your face agin."

The boy laughed and kissed Miranda. "I can catch the night-boat for Montreal. Look out for me, Miranda. I'll return and bring the world with me."

He ran hastily up to the garret, emerged with a bundle containing his few goods and chattels, waved one hand with gay good-nature to Silas, who was too proud to bid him stay, and turned towards the wharf after again kissing Miranda. "Don't you hear the night-boat coming? the churning of her paddles? the roustabuts' cries? Those old screech-owls, the Fates, are whistling for me; the river's calling 'Come!' Remember, Miranda, if anyone but yourself uses my garret I'll never forgive you. It's going to be a show place at a dollar a head some day. Good-bye; good-bye." And he set off at a run, as the boat fussed up to the wharf and the deck-hands began to dump down apple barrels with lightning-like rapidity.

Miranda gazed after him through a mist of tears, passed her father without a word, and entered the house.

An hour later Silas went to Miranda's door to bid her good-night, but she was not there. He climbed to the garret and looked in.

Everything was strewn about. Miranda had moved her dainty belongings up the rough stairs, and was arranging them one by one. He would have remonstrated, but a glance at her firm-set features and resolute chin deterred him from all speech. Once Silas awoke in the middle of the night. It seemed to him that he heard someone sob away up in the roof. He stuffed his fingers in his ears, resolving to follow Fergus Crane to Montreal in the morning and entreat him to return.

But when Silas carried out his intention there was no tracing the lad. He had not been to any of the city printing-offices; no one knew anything about him. Miranda greeted Silas affectionately on his return.

"You've done all you could, dad. You never heard Fergus say a thing he didn't carry out, did you?"

"N-no, can't say I have," answered the old man. "Sorry I hit him."

"You'll be sorrier for it some day when he brings me the world."

The old man sniffed. "What!"

Miranda smiled. "He'll bring me the whole world or—nothing!"

"Guess he'll find nothing easier to carry," said Silas, turning away to the pump.

II.

Miranda waited the traditional seven years for her world, but without getting it. During these seven years she became a beautiful young woman much sought after by the gilded youths of the Ottawa Valley. Her father sometimes taunted her after the manner of the heathen when railing at a Christian's god. "Perchance he sleepeth or tarrieth in strange lands, seeking a lever wherewith to raise the world." Then the old man would become more colloquial and lament Miranda's infatuation for Fergus Crane. From time to time he read her extracts from English papers, showing the great growth in reputation of one Sylvanus Tree, who had taken the literary world by storm with an insolent confidence which almost courted disaster. "Now, if that fellow Crane had had the gumption of this chap," the old man declared, "he might have made a living, and brought you back something worth having. That's the sort of man I like. Now, listen while I read you the opening chapter of his great story, 'Why Did She Do It?'"

Miranda put her fingers to her ears. "I won't! I won't! I won't!" she said. "I don't care what she did or why she did it. I know she oughtn't to, anyway. If Fergus has been unfortunate you ought to pity him, not jeer at his failure when you know his success is everything to me. I mean to marry him whether he succeeds or not. I hate that man Tree's stories, although I've never read them. I'm sure he's cruel and bumptious, and doesn't deserve success."

Silas doggedly turned over the paper, readjusted his spectacles, and continued to read. Presently he looked up. "I'll eat my hat if that fell—hulloa!"

A bronzed, footsore, dusty, dirty tramp came limping out of the Bush just in the same way that Fergus Crane had done more than eight years ago. A fierce moustache hid his mouth, his cheeks bristled with a three days' beard, his clothes were tattered; in short, a timid man passing this tramp in a city would have thrown him alms, a country farmer would have let loose his dogs, a merchant locked up his wares. Miranda's heart leapt within her. Her hero had returned defeated, dirty, footsore, yet indomitable as of old. She felt ashamed of her dainty and delicate summer dress, with its pretty ribbons and billowy waves of muslin. Ought she not to descend from the verandah, don her coarsest garb, stand beside him, and attune her circumstances to his, lest he should think that she condemned him for being defeated in the battle of life?

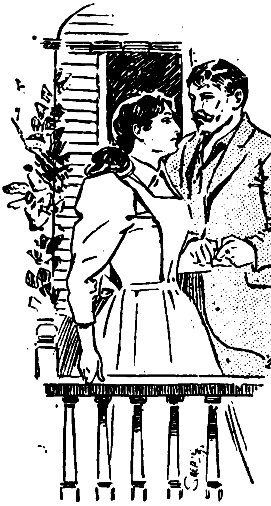
Fergus halted, cast a quizzical look at Miranda, and—waited.

Moved by some magnetic force in Miranda's glance, Silas grunted a surly welcome. "Got the world with you?" he asked, "or left it down on the wharf?"

Miranda's hand was on the old man's lips before he had finished speaking. Then she turned to Fergus, who stood comically and shamelessly holding out a bronzed paw, and put her slim, cool fingers in his. "Sit down here a minute, and I'll have your old room ready for you. No one but myself has used it since you left home."

She slipped hastily away into the house, leaving Fergus Crane and Silas sitting just where they had sat so many years ago, with the exception that directly Miranda disappeared Fergus lost his somewhat jaunty air. He seemed fatigued, disappointed, faint of heart. "I reckon I talked too tall," he said, tickling his bristly chin with the end of a long grass.

"The old place is open to you—you and your world!" said Silas, continuing to read with secret annoyance. It was a disappointment to him that the armour of youth had been stripped from this once dashing free-lance, who was now little better than a broken-down tramp. Only success could justify Miranda's attitude towards Fergus Crane; and Fergus Crane was not clad as a man who has succeeded; he did not come with costly jewels on his fingers, in his mouth an expensive cigar, on his feet the shiny patent-leather boots beloved by millionaires. There were no servants to obey his slightest nod, no regal piles of trunks to be brought up from the wharf. No; the man was just a broken-down, wandering printer, who had, doubtless, an unlimited power of drinking whiskey; and not even Miranda could inspire him to attempt anything better. Miranda would marry Fergus—that was Miranda all over; and the only thing to do was to secure the property to be settled on her so that Fergus Crane could not touch it. Curiously enough, before Miranda came back, Silas felt himself far more kindly disposed towards Fergus than if that braggart had returned in a blaze of glory. Fergus had always held the whip-hand before; now it was different; and Silas meant to use the whip that Providence had placed in his hands.



"Is my world!"

But the irrepressible Fergus, complacently ignoring the past, worked cheerfully away in the office of the Four Corners Gazette, setting up his own leaders with a slowness which lacked all his former precision. The old man was not inclined to forego the advantages which this fact gave him, but Fergus never retorted. There was a gleam of amusement in his eyes, that was all; and he went on setting type with a clumsiness which convinced Miranda that it was long since he had done an honest day's work. Not that the knowledge made any difference in her feeling for him. Whatever Fergus did was right; if the Fates had been unkind, his luck must change. Gifted with a woman's keen insight, she soon saw that her father was struggling against a positive affection for Fergus—an affection which he was so fearful of displaying, that he led him the life of a dog. One of the villagers, seeing much patient forbearance on the part of Fergus, attempted a similar course of action. The next moment he went sailing through the air, and landed on his back with a sickening thud which nearly jarred his teeth out. Silas, who witnessed this feat, chuckled, and became more unbearable than ever, well-knowing that for some inscrutable reason Fergus would endure all his quillets and gibes, and never treat him in the same way.

It was some time before Miranda secured an interview with her fallen knight. He did not avoid her, but simply failed to make opportunities. At last she found him alone on the verandah one evening, smoking the pipe of contemplation, instead of "setting up" inspired leaders about a barn which had just been erected in the village.

"When are we going to be married?" Miranda demanded, abruptly.

Fergus looked at his shabby clothing with undisguised amusement. "You don't think we ought to risk it under present circumstances?" he asked. "Besides, I've broken my word."

"How?" inquired Miranda.

"I promised to bring you back the world."

"Well?"

"Well?"

"Must I tell you" (the expression of her eyes was something wonderful to behold) "that this"—she touched his ragged coat lightly—"is my world!"

Fergus drew a long breath. "You mean it?"

"Of course I mean it. You don't think I'm going to insult myself by doubting you?"

He drew another long breath. "I never thought of it in that way," he said. "I—I wanted to try an experiment."

The unlooked-for appearance of Silas put an end to the conversation for the present, and Fergus walked away. Silas carried a letter in his hand.

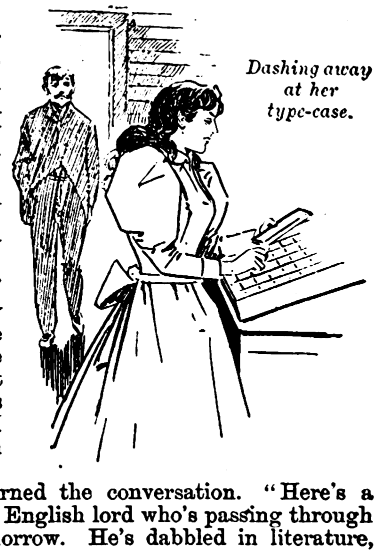
"What is it?" asked Miranda, discontentedly. "Do you know, I had almost made Fergus consent to marry me." She looked bitterly at her father. "I have almost to ask him to keep his word, because he is poor and won't take advantage of the situation. What do you think he cares more about than making a success? I'm sure you'll never guess."

"N-no," said the old man, dubiously; "don't know that I can."

"He wants to make you believe in him. That is partly why he has come back."

The old man looked at her in sudden anger. "Ain't I trying to believe in him? Haven't I been striving to, for your sake, all these years?" he asked. "He's a miserable skunk, or he'd have succeeded. The world's generally right—it doesn't make mistakes. Now, you've taught him to think it doesn't matter a shuck."

"It doesn't," said Miranda, calmly. "When people love, nothing matters. I love him more than ever for the way he puts up with your brutality. If I were a man, and you were not my father, I'd horsewhip you myself."

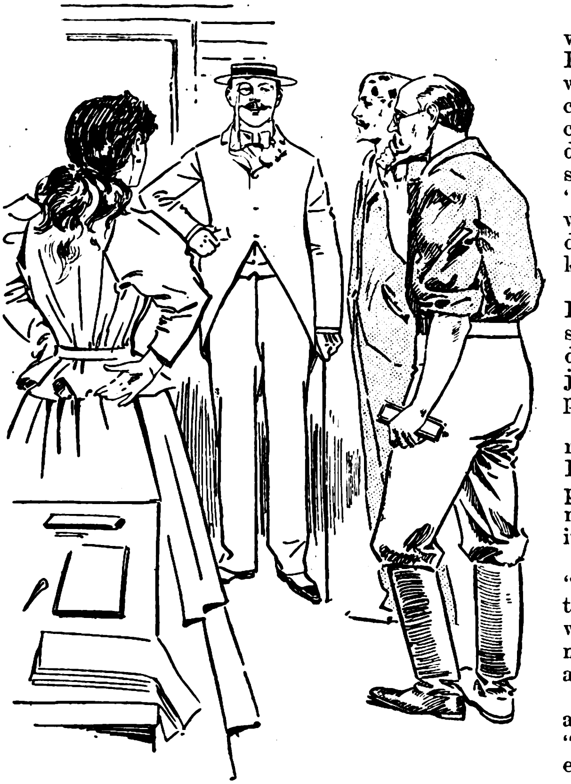


Dashing away at her type-case.

"I've only been trying to rouse him," said Silas, slightly ashamed, "to get up and do something."

"I wouldn't try that way if I were you, Dad," said the girl. "You might go too far. He's very patient, but I think he looks upon you as a penance."

The old man turned the conversation. "Here's a letter from a young English lord who's passing through to the Springs to-morrow. He's dabbled in literature, and has heard so much of 'the primitive simplicity of Canadian printing offices from his friend, W. D. Howells, that he will do himself the honour of calling on me to-morrow.' I'm not a truckler to the British aristocracy," continued Silas, with modest pride, "particularly hereditary aristocracy; but I'm going to show this man our office at its best. Fergus sets type so badly now that I daren't trust him to show off. You must come in to-morrow morning—he'll be here at eleven—and set up a column as fast as you can. Don't say anything to Fergus, mind. It might hurt his feelings. I don't know whether I ought to address this fellow as 'Your Lordship;' I fancy the best way will be not to call him anything at all. His name's Donnington. Crest, an eagle upside down, with a rat in its claws. Wonder what that means?"



"That's vewey good—vewey good."

Miranda thought that it must mean something unpleasant for the rat, but offered no explanation. The next morning found her, clad in a snowy apron and sleeves upturned to the elbow, dashing away at her type-case with a speed that roused Fergus's admiring envy. "I'd no idea I'd fallen off so much myself," he said, leisurely flicking a few letters into the type-holder. "I've almost forgotten how to feel for the nick in the letters, so as to get them right side up."

Fergus's easy-going expression changed to one of horror as Silas appeared in the doorway preceding a sandy-haired, tall young fellow, who was dressed in a light, thin, grey suit, and wore white spats over shining shoes.

"Hang it!" muttered Fergus, trying to slip behind a case.

Lord Donnington gave an amused stare of recognition at Fergus, and screwed a little circular glass into his right eye. "Bai Jove, Twee," he said, "so this is your twip to Patagonia! Vewey good! Vewey good! You're taking time enough to get there, bai Jove. Vewey good. Vewey good, indeed!"

"Who's this well-dressed idiot?" demanded Fergus, abruptly. "And where's his keeper?"

Lord Donnington put up his eyeglass again, and let it drop with a dismayed expression. "Ha! ha! Sylvanus; that's vewey good—vewey good. 'Well-dwessed idiot' is good. Personal, but good, bai Jove!" He turned and saw Miranda looking at him with widely-opened eyes. "Intwoduce me, my dear sir," he said to Silas; "intwoduce me, if Twee won't."

"My daughter, Lord Donnington," said Silas, stiffly. "This machine, O Lord——"

"My lord," prompted Miranda, in a very subdued whisper.

"Nevah mind the machine," said Lord Donnington, with a courteous bow to Miranda. "I want to know, you know, why Twee's callin' me names—callin' me nasty names, bai Jove."

"Who is this man?" asked Silas, seizing Fergus by the arm, and pulling him roughly into the middle of the floor.

Lord Donnington put up his eyeglass again. "Oh, come, I say," he said, feebly, "who is he? Why, you're havin' a game with me, bai Jove. He's——"

"Yes?" eagerly demanded Miranda, clasping Fergus by the other arm. "Who is he, my lord?"

"Sylvanus Twee," said his lordship. "Bites wooks—I mean wites books—you know. People go mad about 'em. Nevah could see much in 'em myself."

Silas seized the bewildered peer by the arm and loosed his hold of Fergus. "He isn't the author of 'Why Did She Do It?'"

"That's the man, and a vewey good fellow, too," said Lord Donnington; "though what's he up to, bai Jove, I can't make out, I weally can't, you know. 'Well-dwessed idiot,' and all that sort of thing you know, Twee. 'Where's his keepah!' It's wude. Beastly wude; and doosid bad form, too, you know."

"It is, Donnington," said Fergus; "but if you weren't such an ass you'd have seen I didn't want to be recognised just yet. I was trying an experiment."

"You're a twyin' expewiment yourself, Twee," said Lord Donnington, only half placated. "Bettah come with me to the Spwings and have it out."

Fergus held out his hand. "All right, old fellow. You took me by surprise. I wanted to introduce you to my future wife myself, that's all."

Lord Donnington smiled and produced his note-book. "Ah," he said, making an elaborate entry, "I compwehend. I'm goin' to be a week at the Spwings. Been eatin' too much, and all that sort of thing; got to dwink too much of the beastly wataws to make it wight again. Come and see me."

"Thanks; afraid I haven't time," said Fergus. "Shall hope to meet you at 'The New Vagabonds' dinner in London during November. Good-bye."

Lord Donnington made another note in his little book, fixed the eyeglass in his left eye this time, bowed gracefully to Miranda, and slowly went out to the stage-coach, the eyeglass again falling as he climbed to his seat.

Silas looked at Fergus; Fergus looked at Silas Miranda looked at them both.

"You needn't apologise," said Fergus, to his future father-in-law. "'Tisn't at all necessary."

"I wasn't going to," said Silas, intractable to the last.

"Let me be his apology," smiled Miranda, to the man who was "weally gweat."

AN IDYLL OF THE SEA

Night on the ocean; a gentle breeze swelled the white sails of the Seagull as she ploughed her way steadily southward over the restless bosom of the Atlantic. I lay stretched lazily upon a bale of sail-cloth, my eyes fixed far overhead upon the delicate tangle of ropes and yards etched against the starry sky.

The waves, parted by the good ship's prow, dashed in measured beats against her sides; from the rigging arose at intervals a deep musical murmur, as from the strings of a gigantic wind-harp.

Beautiful and revivifying, after the fierce glow of day, is the summer night on tropic seas, and I was enjoying it to the full. We were bound for Rio, and the voyage was two-thirds over.

I was thinking, as I lay there under the stars, of many things—of the home which I had left in search of health and distraction from painful thoughts, and perhaps in the hope of restoring my shattered confidence in human nature; for things had gone wrong with me, and I was indulging at the time in that sort of spurious cynicism which besets some men when life first presents itself stripped of shams and illusions.

All at once my reverie was disturbed by the wail of a child from the cabin below; I knew the sound. Among the passengers was a young woman in widow's weeds, accompanied only by a boy of four or five years. Nothing was known of her beyond the self-evident fact that she was young and beautiful, and that by the advice of physicians she was taking the boy—her only child—on this voyage, in the hope of restoring his strength, wasted by a long illness. A forlorn hope, indeed. It was plain to the most indifferent eye that the boy had been failing from the day we left London, as it seemed from sheer lack of vitality and consequent wasting of the tissues.

It was a sight to move the hardest heart—this young mother, worn to a shadow with long watching, her whole being absorbed by the passionate mother-love that refused, in the very face of despair, to relinquish hope.

Urged on by sympathy for her sad and solitary state, I, like other passengers, had offered such services as suggested themselves; like the others, I had been gently, but firmly, repulsed. To no one would the mother for a moment delegate the charge that was sapping her own life.

Shrinking from notice and avoiding all other companionship, she brooded over the fragile being who was slipping surely and all too rapidly from her clinging grasp.

The cry came up from the cabin again and again, shattering my reverie and filling me with uncomfortable forebodings. It was evident that the end was near, and, physician that I was, and cynic as I tried to believe myself, the thought of the young mother's despair disturbed and pained me.

With a selfish, yet perhaps natural prayer that the child might live at least until the land was reached, I rose on my elbow, and by way of diverting my thoughts, addressed myself to the sailor who was on watch at that hour. He leant against the foremast near me, a stalwart fellow, with handsome bronzed features and a pair of blue eyes as frank and clear as a child's.

By the light of the lantern swinging above his head I saw that his face was overspread with a look of melancholy quite out of keeping with the rôle of jolly Jack Tar that belonged to him, and it was not the first time I had noticed this expression on honest Tom's countenance. It may have been that, coupled with other unusual characteristics, which from the first day had attracted me to the fellow; whatever it was, I had found pleasure in studying this sturdy type of man, and had enjoyed many a quiet chat with him during the long voyage.

"A fine night, Tom," I began by way of opening conversation.

"Ay, sir, a fine night!" answered Tom in his deep tones, saluting me respectfully.

"It isn't often that you make a better trip than this, is it, Tom?"

"Well, no, sir. But we ain't there yit," he answered, significantly.

"You are familiar with these waters, I presume?"

"Well, sir, tol'able familiar. This makes my eleventh trip, I'm restless an' oneasy on shore, sir; all sailors is that, but 'pears to me, I'm a little more restless an' oneasy than most of 'em. Mebbe," he went on, his gruff voice softening a little, "mebbe, it's all along o' my not havin' any folks on shore belongin' to me. The ship is all the home I've had this many a year, sir. There was a time when it might a-been different, if so be—" At that moment some one hastily ascended the stairs leading from the cabin, and called my name. "It's the doctor, sir; Dr. Claas," said Tom, touching his cap, and turning away.

Dr. Claas, the ship's physician, hurriedly approached the place where I was reclining.

"Pardon me, sir," he said, extending his hand as I rose to meet him, and giving mine a hearty pressure, "but I believe you are a practising physician?"

As the doctor, a singularly grave and reticent man, had until now shown no desire to extend our acquaintance, I was unprepared for the cordiality of his greeting, but I answered at once in the affirmative.

"Then you are the only medical man besides myself on board, and I beg of you to consult with me in a most interesting case. I am not mistaken—you will do me this favour?"

As a young and comparatively inexperienced practitioner, I could not but feel flattered by the doctor's manner, and answered without hesitation:

"Certainly, with the greatest pleasure."

"Then, come, I beg," he earnestly said. "There is no time to lose."

As I passed Tom to follow Dr. Claas, I noticed that he was leaning forward, as if listening to what we had been saying, and I fancied that I heard him mutter some indistinct words as he resumed his position.

A moment later I stood with my colleague by the side of the sick child. He no longer moaned, but lay motionless and almost pulseless, upon his pillow. The mother sat by him, her dark hair falling loosely, her small hands lying listlessly in her lap, her face pale and tense with unutterable grief and pain. Physician though I was, and already inured to the sight of human suffering, I could not meet the look that was turned upon us as we entered.

On examination of the little sufferer I agreed perfectly with Dr. Claas in his diagnosis of the case; the child, though under the influence of no organic disease, was perishing from inanition. His life's small taper was flickering; in a few days at most it would go out in darkness unless—a sudden thought flashed across my mind, sending the blood bounding through my veins. I looked quickly into my colleague's face and met his eyes full upon me; a glance of quick intelligence passed from one to the other, and at the same instant one and the same word passed our lips. That word was—transfusion!

The thought had been simultaneous. To restore the child's almost extinguished vitality, the famishing frame, deprived of nutriment by the incapacity of the organs of digestion and assimilation to do their work, must be supplied with fresh life-material already prepared for assimilation. In other words, the warm, ruddy stream of life must be led direct from the arteries of a living, healthy being into the child's own depleted veins.

Only a physician can comprehend the glow of enthusiastic joy that pervaded our whole beings as this theory, then comparatively new and untried, presented itself before us with all its glorious possibilities.

The grave face of Dr. Claas fairly shone for a moment, then darkened again, and he shook his head gravely.

"A magnificent opportunity!" he said, in a tone of regret—"magnificent! But, unfortunately, impracticable. Being so near the end of our voyage we have not a living animal on board!"

A sharp cry interrupted my answer. In our professional zeal we had forgotten that the mother's ears were drinking in every word that was uttered. In an instant a slender arm, bared to the elbow, was extended towards us.

"I know what you mean," the little woman hurriedly said, her face flushing and paling again, "I have read much about it. I remember that it need not be an animal—a human being will do as well—even better!"

Even Dr. Claas was not proof against this. I saw his eyes grow moist as he took the extended hand gently in both his own. "It cannot be, madam," he said, as if speaking to a little child. "Compose yourself. We will retire and consider other means; something may yet suggest itself."

It was very hard to convince her that not from her fragile, exhausted frame might flow the invigorating stream that should give new life to her dying child. But we left her at last, sitting in listless despair by the little couch, as before, and returned to the deck, where Dr. Claas joined me in a long discussion of the subject that had been under consideration.

Tom, the sailor, was still on duty, pacing the deck at times, or leaning against the foremast, taking no apparent notice of our presence. At a late hour I bade Dr. Claas good-night, and retired to my berth, but not to sleep. The piteous face of that mother as we left her, having given the deathblow to her last hope, was constantly before me; her plaintive voice mingled with the monotonous splashing of the waves.

For what seemed hours I lay listening to every sound, longing for daylight, though it was not yet midnight, but finally eight bells sounded, and steps and voices overhead showed that Tom was being relieved from duty.

A moment later there was a knock at the door of my room, and in response to my astonished "Come in" it was opened, and Tom himself, looking very awkward and uncertain, stood on the threshold.

"Beg pardon, sir," he said, in a husky whisper, fingering his cap like a bashful boy, "beg pardon, but I made sure you wasn't asleep, an' there was somethin' I wanted to ask ye right away, sir, if I may make so bold."

So far from being angry with Tom for his intrusion, I was glad of any interruption to my painful thoughts, and bade him enter and close the door.

"And now what is it, Tom?" I said, when he had done so.

"I wouldn't have ye think, sir, that I meant to listen to your conversation with the doctor," he began, after much preliminary shuffling and clearing of his voice, "but bein' where I was, some words came to my hearin', sir, an' after that I couldn't but lis'en, feeling an interest in the little chap myself. An' from what I heard I gathered as how there was somethin' that 'ould save his life, sir, if it could be had, an' because it couldn't be had, sir, the poor little chap must die."

Tom made a little halt here, and then continued:

"I—I couldn't rightly make out what it was as was wanted an' can't be had."

Tom's gruff voice trembled a good deal as he stumbled through his clumsy speech, and he shifted himself from one foot to the other a good many times.

It was impossible for me to feel either amusement or vexation at what might have seemed to some very like presumption. I did not hesitate to explain to Tom as simply and clearly as possible the theory of transfusion, the obstacles in the way of its application in the present case, and the regret of Dr. Claas and myself at the loss of so fine an opportunity.

Tom listened breathlessly, leaning forward, his eyes fixed upon me, his lips moving in unconscious imitation of my own. When I had finished, he straightened himself, putting one hand to his curly head with a perplexed air.

"Ay, ay!" he slowly said; "that was it! I wasn't sure as I got it right end up, sir, but that was it! Ye see it has a powerful strange sound to a man like me; but jest let me once git my bearin's, sir, so't I don't run agin no sunken rocks nor sandbanks, an' I'm all right, sir. You say that the blood of a livin', breathin' healthy animal, beast or human, pumped, so to speak, into the veins of an ailin' creatur', beast or human, will save life. Wal', sir," and drawing himself up, he bared for my inspection one magnificent muscular arm, freshly tattooed with all a sailor's taste and ingenuity. "Wal', sir, here am I, eight-and-twenty year of age, tough as oak, an' though I say it as shouldn't, mebbe, as sober a man as ever trod deck, an' the little chap yonder is welcome to the last drop o' blood in my veins, so be it might save him to the poor little woman that is breakin' her heart over him, as any man can see."

I sprang from my berth and seized Tom's hard brown hand.

"My brave fellow," I cried, "you will do this for the sake of a child who is nothing to you, and a woman you never saw before and never will see again?"

A strange smile came over Tom's face, and his eyes sought the floor.

"I will, sir," he answered, hoarsely, "for the sake of that same woman—as I shall never see again, mos' likely."

In an incredibly short time I stood again with Dr. Claas at the door of the state-room we had left a few hours before in so different a mood. It was opened by the child's mother, who had been prepared for our coming, and welcomed us with eagerness. Already reviving hope had given some brightness and colour to her face.

"You have found someone who is willing to render this service?" she began, excitedly. "A sailor, you say? Oh, where is he? Let me see him and speak with him. I must thank him for his noble kindness——"

Meantime Tom had remained in shadow, but, as she came forward, looking eagerly about her, he stepped out into the light, and stood awaiting her, cap in hand. She sprang towards him with extended hands. "Oh, you good, brave fellow; God bless you!" she began, fervently. "God must and will bless you for your kindness to a poor despairing mother——"

She stopped abruptly, as if suddenly turned to stone. The full light of the lamp fell over the sailor's athletic figure and pale, agitated face. His eyes were fixed upon her with an inscrutable expression. For some time the two stood gazing at each other in silence, then, with a loud cry, the woman started forward, wavered, and would have fallen but for Tom, who seized her in his mighty arms and laid her on the nearest sofa.

For a moment he stood bending over her, his form perceptibly shaken, his face hidden; then, at a summons from Dr. Claas, with whom the necessity for prompt action superseded all other emotions, he left the unconscious woman in charge of the stewardess, and followed us into the state-room.

A half-hour later the operation had been successfully accomplished.

We found the mother still lying on the sofa where we had left her, but at the sound of our steps she started up wildly expectant.

"Be calm, madam," said Dr. Claas, his very voice and mien expressing the satisfaction he felt, "all has passed off well. Your child is sleeping peacefully, and we have every reason to hope for the best."

"Thank God! Oh, thank God!" said the happy mother, with streaming eyes.

"But the man—the sailor—where is he? I must see him—there is something to be explained," she continued, in deeply agitated tones.

But Tom had slipped silently away, and was not to be found.

"It is better so," said the doctor, returning to the saloon. "You have had enough excitement for to-night."

Then, after administering a sedative, we left the now hopeful woman to return to her child, while we sought such rest as the brief summer night might have yet in store for us.

In the course of the next morning, having made an early call with my colleague upon our little patient with the most gratifying results, I found myself on deck.

Suddenly the dull silence was broken by the sound of excited voices, which I recognised as those of the Captain and Dr. Claas.

"For the last time, sir," the captain was saying in angry tones, "I repeat, that such conduct is entirely unbecom ing, and against my wishes. Yesterday you led one of my men on to an act of romantic foolhardiness, and to-day, without consulting me, you send him down below to his hammock, to recover from the consequences of this eccentric and absurd experiment. Why, sir, you are exceeding your authority. You are encouraging insubordination. Once more, sir, it cannot be allowed!"

"Allow me to say, captain," said Dr. Claas, with great self-control, "that there was no leading on in the matter, whatever. As I call this gentleman to witness (turning towards me) the man having overheard us as we discussed the subject on deck, not dreaming that he would hear, or at least comprehend what we were saying, came forward and offered himself for the experiment—an act which not one man in a hundred would be capable of, sir. To send him aloft to repair a broken yard under a sky like this, after such a loss of blood, would be simply brutal, sir."

The doctor's earnest speech had its effect upon the testy but kind-hearted officer, and after some further efforts on our united parts, the captain returned to the quarter-deck in a somewhat mollified mood.

At the suggestion of Dr. Claas I went below to look after Tom. The brave fellow lay stretched in his hammock in the close, small cabin, in a troubled sleep. The open collar of his blouse exposed to view a throat and chest of statuesque proportions; his curling brown hair was matted over his forehead; his face, haggard beneath its deep bronze hue, wore a look of gentleness and suffering.

The interest I had felt from the start in this fine specimen of Nature's nobleman had mounted to enthusiasm, and I was impatient to know more of the man and of his relations with the woman, seemingly so far removed from his own sphere in life, upon whom his appearance had produced so startling an effect.

Not to disturb the sleeper, I was withdrawing noiselessly, but at the moment Tom stirred and opening his eyes, gazed at me, with a bewildered stare. His glance was uncertain, his lips trembled, as with fever.

"What time is it?" he asked, feebly. "Have I slept long?"

"It is twelve," I answered. "You have slept two hours, and can lie and rest as long as you feel like it. It is the captain's order. How are you feeling?" I added, seating myself on the blue-painted chest that doubtless contained the sailor's worldly possessions.

"Better now," answered Tom; "but a while ago my legs would scarcely bear me, and my head whirled round like a rusty capstan. It is powerful kind o' you, sir, to come an' ask after me. An' how is the little chap gettin' on?" he added, his voice softening suddenly.

"Very well indeed, Tom. I have been with Dr. Claas to see him, and unless we are much mistaken the tide has turned, and the boy will recover. And if he does, Tom, it is to you he owes his life."

Words cannot picture the look that transfigured the sailor's sun-bronzed countenance—a look of deep and perfect content. He kept his eyes on the ceiling over his head for some time, his lips smiling like a child's.

"Good!" I heard him whisper. "That does me good to hear. The boy will live, an' she will be happy. Good!"

But after a while he turned to me again.

"Mebbe," he began, doubtfully—"mebbe you might a-guessed, from what you saw, that the little chap's mother an' me wasn't no strangers, sir; an' if ye don't mind lis'enin', I'd like to tell ye how things is, an' was, sir; for I wouldn't have ye go to think harm of her, not knowing."

I assured Tom that I was only too glad to listen to his story if it would not fatigue him too much in the telling.

"No, sir," he said; "it'll be a powerful relief to git it off my mind, along of her that might be misjudged, if ye didn't know the true facts. No, sir; Nell—that's her—Nell an' me is no strangers. We was born an' brought up in a little village ye likely never heard of, away down on the coast. Ay, different as things is now; our folks was neighbours, an' Nell an' me was playmates an' friends as long ago as I can remember, though her folks was better off than mine, an' Nell had a better chance at books an' the like.

"So when I grow up an' began to follow the sea like my father an' gran'father afore me, it come about quite natural that I should begin to look on Nell as my sweetheart, an' she on me. Every time I got home from a voyage I found her prettier an' sweeter, an' fonder of me—leastways, I thought so then.

"She was a beauty in them days, sir, as ye can judge for yourself now, though she's changed powerful, poor girl! But in them times she led the fleet, sir. The city folks that come down to the coast o' summers took a deal o' notice of Nell—she was that proud an' sperrited, an' could hold her own with the best, her father bein' a retired cap'n as had made his pile, but warn't in no way stuck up, an' favoured me, poor sailor though I was.

"Well, sir, there come a time when I started off on a three years' cruise. It was pretty tough, that was, but we was to be married when it was over, an' with that look ahead, sir, bein' young an' ambitious, the time passed pretty quick. It's a rough life, a sailor's, as every man knows, an' I'm free to own as I've been a bit wild in my time, sir, but as I'm a livin' man to-day, I was true to Nell all through that three years' cruise. Whenever we made port, instead o' foolin' away my money with the rest, I was hangin' round shops an' bazaars, a-pickin' up pretty things for Nell—silk handkerchiefs, an' carved boxes an' fans, an' all kinds o' furrin' notions that women love.

"Nell never got to see 'em sir; they're stowed away in that there blue chest as you're a-settin' on this minute; for, as mebbe you've guessed by this time, when we made port I found Nell married an' gone—ay, sir, married to a fine gentleman from the city, an' gone to live amongst his kind of folks. Ay," he added, with a husky laugh, "if I'd got home a month sooner I might a-danced at her weddin'.

"An' I forgot to mention that the old man was dead, or mebbe it mightn't 'a' happened—though I don't know as it would have made any odds. No, sir, I never laid no blame on to her, though I own as it hit me hard, an' sent me a-careerin' over the world like a ship that's lost rudder an' compass.

"It's a-goin' on seven years since it happened, sir, an' I'd begun to git in a way used to it, though it sorter took me afresh when the ship was homeward bound, an' I remembered as no one was a-waitin' an' a-watchin' for me, my folks bein' dead and gone long ago, when there was she a-comin' on board this here ship, a lone woman at her age—she's only twenty-six, sir—an' lookin' so peaked, an' a-holdin' on for dear life to that there little youngster as a stout breeze might blow away! An' now you know how it is; an' why I was willin' to do what I've done; not for a strange woman (though I ain't sure as I wouldn't a-done the same), but for the little woman that was to a-been my wife. The little woman I ain't never forgot, an' never shall forget, though she never can be aught to a rough sailor like me."

"But she asked for you, Tom, this morning. She wishes to see you," I said.

Tom laid his bandaged arm across his face, but his deepening colour did not escape me, and I saw how the burly frame was shaken with sudden emotion.

"No, sir," he said, huskily, after some moments. "No, sir; it's better not. Tell her I say it's better not. Tell her she's free an' welcome to all I done, an' if 'twas to do over again, she'd be free an' welcome to the last drop o' my heart's blood, so be the little chap was flourishing an' she was happy. An' tell her," he continued, softly, "if so be as she should say anything to you about what's past an' gone, that I ain't never harboured nothin' agin her, first or last, an' wishes her well an' happy wherever she may be."

In my interest in Tom's narration I had not observed the gradual darkening of the cabin, but now all motion seemed suddenly and strangely suspended.

It needed not Tom's sudden, excited cry to tell me the meaning of this. I knew intuitively that we were at the mercy of a hurricane.

At the first sound Tom had leaped from his hammock, and flung open the door. Above the roar of the elements could be heard a confusion of voices, a hurried rush of feet, then clear and distinct came the captain's voice, shouting through his trumpet:

"All hands on deck."

Instantly Tom sprang towards the stairs, turning only to say as I would have followed him:

"No passengers allowed on deck! Take care of yourself, and keep cool, sir: Ay, ay, sir!" he shouted back, as the trumpet-call sounded again.

I tried to detain him, to speak some words of caution and protest. My voice was drowned by the storm, and Tom shook off my hand with a laugh. With one spring he mounted the stairs and lifted the hatchway.

Stumbling and pitching along the narrow, dark gangway, I made my way to the state-room of our little patient, and with the aid of cushions and pillows made the position of mother and child as secure as possible; then I turned my attention to the women and children in the saloon.

Towards sunset the hurricane seemed to have expended it power, and though the ship continued to pitch frightfully, the passengers dragged themselves to their respective state-rooms, myself among the rest; and against my will, for I meant to seize the first possibility of reaching the deck, I sank, from sheer exhaustion, into a sleep, which lasted until daybreak. As soon as I was conscious I left my room and hastened on deck.

Almost the first person I saw was Dr. Claas, who was coming in search of me.

At sight of his face a sharp pang went through me.

"We are safe, yes," he said, seizing my hand; "but the storm had its victim."

"Tom?" I barely whispered.

"Yes, Tom!"

It seems that at the very height of the storm one of the sails became loose from its fastenings, and, sweeping the deck, caused the ship to careen dangerously to leeward. The captain called for volunteers to climb the topmost and cut away the sail. It was a perilous undertaking in such a wind. Of all the crew only one man came forward. It was Tom. Firm and sure he made the ascent, and cut away the ropes; the sail flew swiftly off over the frothing sea, and the ship righted herself at once.

Hand over hand, swinging himself gallantly from yard to yard, the brave fellow descended; but when half-way down he was seen to miss his grasp, to clutch at the ropes, to fall heavily to the deck.

* * * * * * * * *

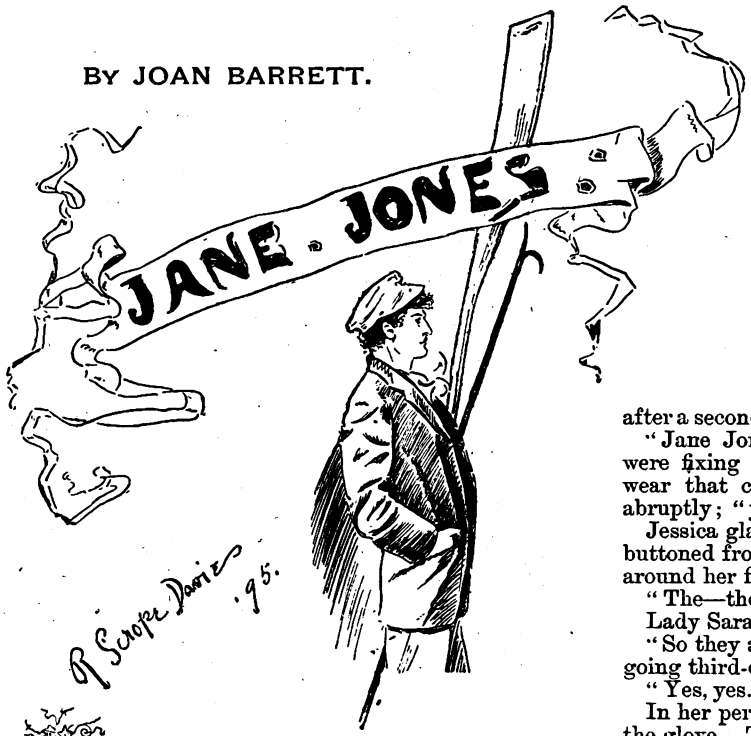
The sun was setting when, wrapped in the ship's flag, a tribute rendered to his heroic worth and splendid seamanship, the dead sailor was consigned to his unmarked grave.

In low tones the captain read the burial service; for a moment each head was bent in silent prayer; then, at a signal, there was a swift gliding of ropes, a splash, and the laughing waves closed above all that was mortal of the humble hero of this simple tale.

N. N.

JANE JONES

BY JOAN BARRETT.



“I HOPE you will be back in time to give the dear children their tea,” said Lady Sarah Chesney to her young governess, Jessica Dene. “And do pray be careful about making inquiries as to the nature of your friend’s illness before you enter her room. With so many little ones in the house we dare not risk their taking any ailment.”

Jessica’s beautiful little face flushed crimson. She bent her head almost confusedly over the long suède glove which she was pulling upon her hand. Lady Sarah looked at the gloves in disapproval.

“The extravagant girl must spend quite half of her salary for gloves,” she thought, with a tightening of her thin lips. “That pair must have cost at least six shillings. I have to be content with cheap ones!”

Lady Sarah’s grim regard wandered over Jessica’s grey dust-cloak and broad sun hat. She asked herself what it was in Miss Dene’s appearance that seemed so holiday-like that morning. The grey dust cloak was far from new, and had been worn by Jessica for two summers, and the straw hat was merely a cheap affair of a few shillings, scarlet poppies, grey tulle and all included.

“It must be those gloves,” said Lady Sarah, mentally. “Of course you will not think of seeing your friend if you hear that she is suffering from any infectious malady,” she said aloud to Jessica. “You will come home at once.”

“Yes,” Jessica replied in a low tone.

“And when you pass by old Mrs. Gregg’s,” continued Lady Sarah, “pray make her understand that soup is only given away once a week at the Vicarage, and not every day, as she seems to expect. I wish you to mention at the same time that I desire her grandson to come round to the servants’ entrance. I found him waiting at the hall door with a great water-jug only yesterday. Please tell Mrs. Gregg that for the future she must send a basin only for the soup.” Lady Sarah paused a moment, half closing her eyes in reflection.

“Oh, yes, and don’t forget to leave the list at the stores and to call at the dyer’s about Mary’s dress. It will not take you long,” she added, suddenly aware of a troubled expression in Jessica’s eyes. “And walking about in the open air will be far better for you than remaining in the close atmosphere of a sick-room. By the way, what is your friend’s name?”

The colour died in Jessica’s cheeks. She tugged nervously at her glove.

“Jones,” she answered, hesitatingly, and after a second of silence, “Jane Jones—yes—Jane Jones.”

“Jane Jones,” repeated Lady Sarah, as though she were fixing the name in her memory. “How can you wear that cloak upon such a hot day?” she asked, abruptly; “you will be stifled.”

Jessica glanced apprehensively at her cloak. It was buttoned from head to foot, yet she drew its folds closer around her figure.

“The—the—carriages are so—so—dirty,” she faltered.

Lady Sarah’s stern features relaxed.

“So they are,” she said, in a kinder tone. “You are going third-class?”

“Yes, yes.”

In her perturbation, Jessica pulled more roughly at the glove. The kid, resenting the ill-treatment, split in the palm. Jessica looked at it and laughed stupidly.

“I must get another pair,” she murmured, moving hastily towards the door.

“What a sad pity!” Lady Sarah exclaimed, thinking of the glove, and almost as much vexed in her frugal soul as though it were her own. “Perhaps you could draw it neatly together with silk.”

“I will try. Have you any other commission?”

“The Vicar has a letter for you to post. You will find it in his study. Oh, bring back a small jar of marmalade from the stores. It is not heavy, and you can carry it beneath your cloak. I promised the dear children that you should bring them something from Walton.”

“Very well. Good-bye, Lady Sarah.”

Lady Sarah watched Jessica from the room.

“There really is something odd about the girl this morning,” she said to herself. “She looks as though she were going on a visit of pleasure instead of answering a call to a sick-bedside.”

The Rev. Hugh Chesney was composing his weekly sermon when Jessica entered the study. He raised his thin, careworn face from the partly-covered sheet of ruled paper, and pushed his spectacles higher upon his nose, as Jessica came to his side.

“Going to Walton to see your sick friend?” he asked, kindly. “I trust you will find her in better health, Miss Dene—do you mind waiting a moment—I’ve a few leaflets somewhere which I think your friend may find both profitable and entertaining to read.” He began to turn over a pile of tracts as he spoke. “‘Advice to a Drunkard.’ Hum, that will hardly do! ‘Jane Blair, or the Converted Washerwoman,’ that is not quite suitable perhaps; but these small books your friend cannot fail to derive instruction from. She need not return them.”

Jessica took the flat parcel of tracts, with a faint smile dawning round her pretty lips.

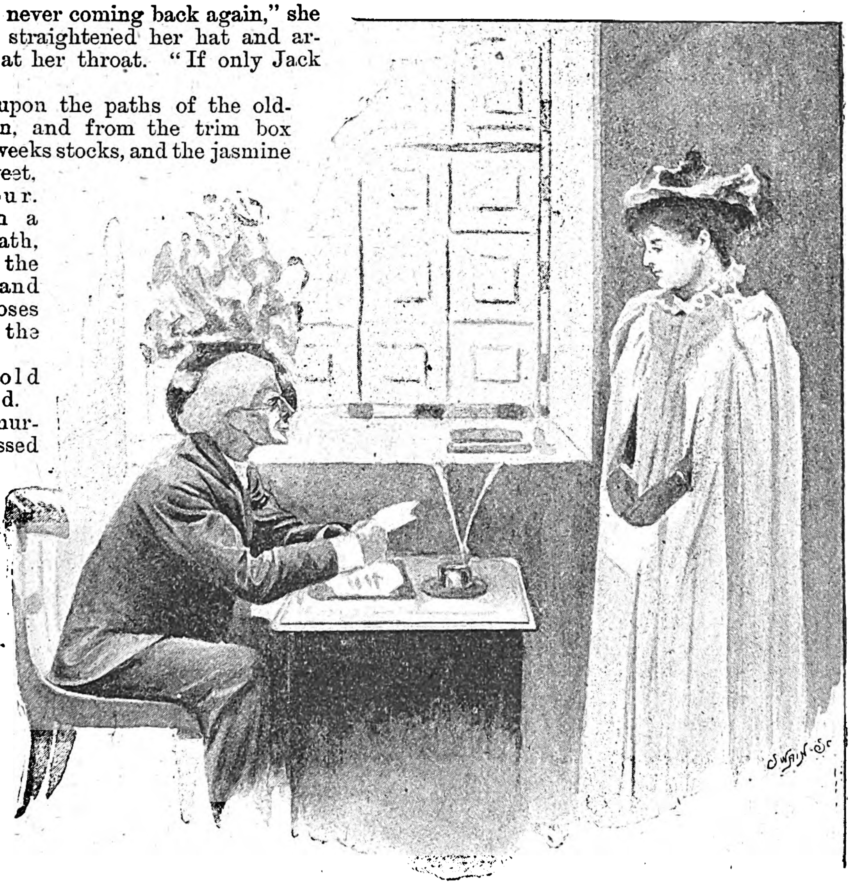
"Thank you, Mr. Chesney," she said, and there was a suspicious tremble in her voice.

The Vicar looked after Jessica as she went from the room. Like his wife, he was puzzled at the indefinable change in her appearance.

"She grows prettier and prettier every day," he murmured to himself, with a shake of his head. "Poor child!"

In the hall, Jessica paused to cast a glance at herself in a mirror which hung there. She smiled saucily at her reflection.

"I wish I were never coming back again," she declared, as she straightened her hat and arranged the bow at her throat. "If only Jack were rich——"



The Rev. Hugh Chesney was composing his weekly sermon.

The sun lay upon the paths of the old-fashioned garden, and from the trim box borders, the ten-weeks stocks, and the jasmine bushes came a sweet, confused odour. Jessica drew in a long, deep breath, looking back at the red brick house and the tangled roses that covered the porch.

"Hateful old prison!" she said.

Her step was hurried as she passed down the straggling village street. The women standing in little knots gossiping at their doors, nodded to her. Jessica barely noticed them, so great was her hurry.

Old Mrs. Gregg, from her window, made frantic signs to the clergyman's governess to enter her house. Jessica quickened her pace at this moment.

"I can't stop! I can't stop!" she cried aloud; but Mrs. Gregg could not hear her, and hobbled to the door to call after her.

At the sound of that weak, piping voice, a very demon of fear entered Jessica's heart. She could see the steam issuing from the station. The train for Staines was waiting. She dare not lose it. Regardless of Mrs. Gregg's cries, she began to run, and at last she entered the station panting and breathless.

Someone half lifted her into a compartment. A porter rushed up with her ticket, and Jessica took it with trembling fingers. It was most vexing that attention should be directed to her in this manner. Lady Sarah or the Vicar might hear during the day that she had asked for a ticket for Staines. Everything that one did or said was always talked over in the village. What a very tiresome place Chessington was!

She was pushing the ticket into the palm of her glove, when a well-known voice exclaimed, in a half-amused, half-vexed tone:

"After my lifting you into the carriage, too! It is really unkind of you, Miss Dene, to snub me in this manner."

Jessica raised her eyes in startled surprise. She had been too much flurried to observe the other occupant of the compartment; indeed, she was hardly aware that she was not alone. She looked at the man facing her with a vivid blush crimsoning her cheeks, and her heart began to flutter in a most unreasonable way.

"Oh, Doctor Mordaunt," she faltered, with sweet shyness in her voice, "I—I—am so sorry!"

"If you are really and truly penitent I must forgive you," Doctor Mordaunt said, holding out his hand. "May I ask where you are going?"

Jessica's under lip began to tremble.

"Lady Sarah has very kindly given me permission to spend the day with a—a—friend — Jane Jones," she answered, hurriedly.

"I thought you had no friends in the neighbourhood."

"Jane Jones is my only friend—and she does not live here—she is only visiting," explained Jessica, becoming more and more confused and rosy.

"Miss Jones is an old lady, I suppose?"

Jessica shook her head, and attempted to withdraw her hand from the doctor's clasp. He seemed to have forgotten that he was still retaining it. Her cloak had become unfastened in her run to the station, and a loose, white flannel blouse was visible beneath, quite a nautical looking garment.

"This is the first occasion that I have had the pleasure of meeting you alone outside the Vicarage," said Doctor Mordaunt, suddenly. "I wonder if you know how happy

I feel at having you all to myself, even for so short a time."

Jessica's eyelids dropped. She evaded the doctor's glance.

"I wish you felt as pleased as I do. I wish——" he paused, for Jessica had wrenched her hand almost roughly away, and, with the abrupt movement, the little packet of leaflets had fallen to the ground. Each bent for them. A tress of Jessica's hair brushed the doctor's cheek. He looked up, and met her eyes fully. The packet fell once more to the floor; as Doctor Mordaunt took the girl's hands.

"Jessica!" he exclaimed. She interrupted him with a nervous laugh.

"Oh, if you please, do give me Jane Jones's tracts," she said. "The Vicar asked me to carry them to her. There is room for a lot of improvement in Jane. That is why I am taking them to him—to her, I mean."

"Never mind those things. I want to tell you——"

"But I do mind!" she cried. "Jane will be so disappointed—and——"

"She will get over her disappointment. You know what I am trying to say to you—don't make it more difficult for me——"

"If it is difficult at all, please don't bother about saying it," she advised, foolishly. "I—I—wouldn't."

"But I must tell you. I have been wanting to tell you for many months," said Doctor Mordaunt, in an earnest voice. "It ought not to be hard to say, 'I love you.' I want you to understand that I love you very dearly, Jessica."

The train stopped. A porter ran past the window, shouting, "Staines!"

Jessica was dimly aware that Doctor Mordaunt had descended and was holding out both hands inviting her to alight. In her confused trouble she hesitated. She had caught sight of a handsome young man in flannels, who was pushing his way roughly among the people, as he peered anxiously into the various carriages.

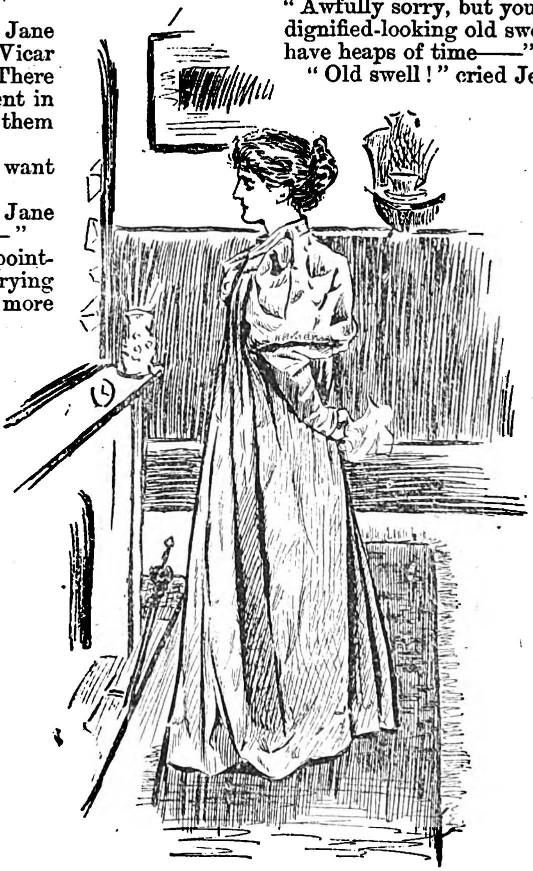
"There is Jane Jones!" exclaimed Jessica, abruptly and joyously.

She was sorry the next moment, for Doctor Mordaunt, after glancing at the young man in amazement, had drawn back with cold sternness written in every line of his face.

Jane Jones heard Jessica's cry. He elbowed the doctor aside with unceremonious brusqueness, placed his foot upon the step, and seizing Jessica by the waist lifted her bodily to the ground.

"Your train's a good ten minutes late," said he. "Come on. I've had the boat waiting for the past hour."

She half raised her face as though she expected him to kiss her. He drew back with a laughing, protesting gesture.



Standing in her dressing-gown before a looking-glass.

"For shame, Jess, and before all the people too! You really make me blush, my dear. Now, don't begin to cry; you shall hug me to your heart's content in the boat when the camera fiend is not in sight."

Jessica cast a troubled glance at Doctor Mordaunt. He had only waited for that. Slightly raising his hat, he turned away, but not before Jessica had noticed the icy contempt of his regard.

"Oh, Jack!" she cried, and half turned as though to follow the doctor's retreating figure.

Jane Jones caught her by the arm, and dragged her from the station.

"We can't afford to lose a minute, old girl," said he. "Awfully sorry, but you must put off making eyes at dignified-looking old swells until I've left you. You'll have heaps of time——"

"Old swell!" cried Jessica, wrathfully. "He's not at all old! He is only thirty-eight!"

"I did not remark that he was growing bald, sweetest," said Jane Jones, in a soothing tone.

* * * * *

How it came about no one could tell, but about a week after Jessica's visit to Staines, she sickened with typhoid fever.

Lady Sarah, well versed in the symptoms of most maladies, was the first person at the Vicarage to detect that a serious illness lurked in the little governess's heavy eyelids and flushed cheeks. Despite the Vicar's remonstrance, she sent Jessica away to an old farmhouse, many miles from the Vicarage.

"One cannot be too careful," she said to the Vicar, "and we have ourselves and the dear children to think of before our governess. Every care will be taken of her, and Doctor Mordaunt is sure to bring her safely through."

The Vicar rubbed his thin cheeks. He was filled with pity for poor, pretty Jessica.

"I begged her to be careful in visiting her sick friend, Jane Jones," continued Lady Sarah. "She could not have carried out my instructions. Without a doubt, she has caught Jane Jones's malady, and we shall be extremely fortunate if we escape ourselves."

But no other inmate of the Vicarage became ill, and while Jessica lay fighting for life in the old-fashioned farm bedroom, the Vicar's babies were racing about in the Vicarage paddock, lusty and healthy, rejoicing in their absolute freedom from the school-room and lessons. Doctor Mordaunt fought hard for Jessica's life. The grey hairs grew thicker among the brown ones that covered his head, and a tinge of the same colour appeared in his moustache.

Once when she lay feeble, but conscious, in the white dimity-hung bed, he became aware of the wistful expression in her sunken eyes. His thoughts flew at once to the young man in flannels, whom she had been so anxious to kiss.

"Do you want to see anyone?" he asked, gently, as he bent over her.

She shook her head, and it seemed to him that the sadness deepened in her wasted face.

"Are you quite sure? I could so easily bring anyone to you if you wished."

"I have no one to visit me, except Lady Sarah and the children," Jessica answered, in weak tones. "I don't want to see them—just yet."

Doctor Mordaunt was puzzled. Had the puppy in flannels only amused himself with Jessica?

One day when she was stronger he entered the room, and found her standing in her dressing-gown before a looking-glass. She was examining her pinched features with a self-pitying, wistful air, that amused even while it saddened him.

"Come, come," he said; "this will never do. You must not over-tax your strength, you know. Let me help you back to the sofa."

Doctor Mordaunt had never studied the varying expressions of any patient's face as he studied Jessica's. He became aware that she was shy and ill at ease in his presence, she had nothing to say, and appeared painfully embarrassed. "It's that train affair," he thought in vexation. "She can't forget that I once told her I loved her."

When there existed no possible danger of infection the Vicar's eldest boy Bobby came to see Jessica. He brought her a letter with a foreign postmark upon it. Doctor Mordaunt was in the room. He heard the low, glad cry of joy she gave, and saw the happy colour that crept into her cheeks.

"That fellow's letter will do more good than all my tonics," he said, almost jealously to himself.

Bobby had climbed upon the sofa, and was regarding Jessica with an inquisitive look in his round, ruddy face.

"I say," he said, "you have got thin, Miss Dene. Didn't they give you lots of jellies and custards and things?"

Jessica nodded as she fingered her letter.

"Mother said you were costing a lot of money. I wish I'd been ill, too. We only get sago and babies' puddings up in the nursery. Mother said you would die. We were all going to your funeral; and Milly was going to give all the flowers from her own syringa bush. She made a lovely wire cross, and when mother told us that Doctor Mordaunt had saved your life Milly got awfully wild. She and Dolly had been playing at your funeral for ever so long. I say, are you really devoted to Miss Dene, Doctor Mordaunt? Mother said you were. She said that a bat could see it! but bats are blind, aren't they?"

Doctor Mordaunt refused to meet Jessica's eyes.

"Of course I am devoted—to all my patients, Bobby."

"I say, did Jane Jones die?" asked Bobby, with startling abruptness.

"Jane Jones!" repeated Jessica.

"Yes, your friend at Walton who was ill, you know."

Jessica began to laugh hysterically.

"No, no—he didn't die."

"He? Jane Jones is a she," said Bobby, contemptuously.

Jessica laughed again. She could not control her merriment. But it ceased suddenly when she met Doctor Mordaunt's regard. The stern coldness of his face forced her to remember that he knew of the deception which she had played upon Lady Sarah—knew it, and despised her. Oh, she was sure of it!

"I'm tired, Bobby," she said. "Thank Milly for wanting to give me the flowers, and tell her that her cross may come in for me yet."

When Bobby had gone, and Dr. Mordaunt was collecting his hat, stick, and gloves, Jessica sat upright upon the sofa.

"Please don't look so angry," she entreated, in a very small voice. "I've been wanting to explain to you about Jane Jones for ever such a long time. Oh, if you frown like that I shall never find the courage to tell you."

"I am not interested in Jane Jones, Miss Dene."

"But you are interested in me," said Jessica, bravely, "and so you must be in Jane Jones. I am very fond of him——"

"I am quite aware of that."

"I am more fond of Jane Jones than of anyone else in the world—I mean I used to be more fond of him at one time, you know, and he's a sailor, poor boy, and when he wrote to me and asked me to spend just one day with him before he sailed for France, I—I—went, and I told Lady Sarah a fib about it, but she doesn't matter, it is you," said Jessica, a little wildly, and passing her hot hands over her eyes. "I can't bear that you should think me wicked just because I told a story in order to get away. I had asked once before to see him, and she had refused; she said that she could not have my family coming to the——"

"Your family! Who is Jane Jones?"

"Who!" Jessica repeated. "She is my brother Jack—who did you think she was?"

Doctor Mordaunt was kneeling by the sofa before Jessica quite knew how it came about. I am afraid that he had kissed her, too.

"Oh, Jessica!" he said. "I have been so jealous."

"And I've been so miserable," whispered she. "You used to scold me for not getting strong. I felt that I could never get quite well while I feared that you despised me."

"I never despised you, dearest. I was jealous. I thought that Jane Jones was your lover."

"My lover! Didn't you see that he wouldn't let me kiss him at the station, though he is very fond of me, and spends a lot of money, poor boy, in buying me gloves and things. You ought to have known by the way I wanted to kiss him that he was my brother. Any woman would have guessed our relationship at once."

"But I'm only a poor foolish man, sweetheart! I was actually stupid enough to believe that you didn't care a pin about me, and that I had been an exceptionally conceited individual ever to dream of making you my wife."

"And don't you think that you are conceited now, sir?"

"Do you?"

Jessica gave a low happy laugh.

"Oh, I only know that I'm very happy," she said. "I do think that you're quite the cleverest and the nicest doctor in existence——"

"Only the cleverest and the nicest doctor, Jessica? Nothing more?"

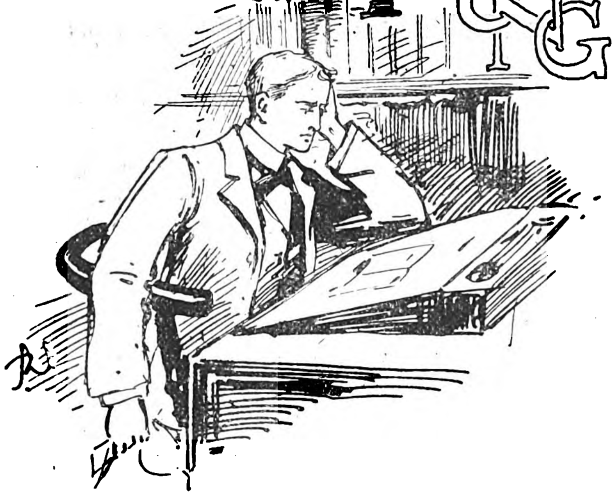
"Why, you vain old thing, what do you want me to say?" she asked. "Would you feel a little more satisfied if I just happened to observe in a casual kind of way that—that you are the very dearest person in the world?"

"Dearer even than Jane Jones?"

She hesitated a moment before answering, but it was only to tease him.

"Lots dearer," she answered. "Poor Jane Jones!"

YOUNG DR. JARVIS



He sat alone in his office, reading, perhaps for the twentieth time, the note on the desk before him. The afternoon sunshine touched with pale radiance the familiar objects in the little room. In a faint, flickering fashion it illuminated the shelves of books, the dusty cases of specimens, the stiff row of pictures that adorned the walls, the ragged rug, the worn oil-cloth carpet; but it seemed to linger on the solitary figure in the office chair.

It revealed a sensitive, restless face, with signs of great weakness, great passion, and great tenderness; such a face as men like and women love. It was dark with pain and anger now, for the note had roused a host of sleeping memories. The air seemed full of odour, the remembered odour of hyacinths; and in every shadowy corner Jarvis could see the insolent, smiling face of the woman who had written it.

He crushed the perfumed paper in his hand, though it was only a kind invitation to the poor, struggling country doctor to take charge of a good case, consult with a famous surgeon, and cure—if he could—a sick man. It read simply enough:

> Dear Dr. Jarvis,—Mamma wishes me to ask you to come up to-day to see Mr. Morton, who is very ill, and to meet Dr. Linyard, the specialist from the city. We fear an operation is unavoidable, and desire the benefit of your skill.—Sincerely yours,
> Estelle Morris.

Jarvis had many other notes with that signature hidden away in his private drawer. Estelle Morris had never taken the trouble to ask for her letters, when she had sent him his curt dismissal two years ago. How faithfully he had loved and served her, how he had worked and economised, and strained every nerve to hurry through college, that he might begin the life struggle for fame and fortune that should bring him his heart's desire! She had seemed to return all this passionate devotion, and they had been sworn lovers. Would she wait for him? How often she had told him so, the full, white lids drooping over her soft, shining eyes.

Then, three years ago, a sudden change of fortune had come to her mother. They went abroad, and after a few months her letters altered in tone. Finally, there came a short, cool epistle. "She did not love him," she said. "It was wrong to marry without love, and so—good-bye." In silence, in anger, and in bitter despair he had accepted his fate.

Estelle had come back to England, the promise of her girlhood magnificently fulfilled in the beautiful woman who dazzled the quiet old village. She had many courtiers, and she had chosen the richest of them—a man many years older than herself. The engagement had been proclaimed far and wide. All summer long, from his office window, Jarvis had watched her drive by, benignly arrogant and radiantly handsome. A few days ago he had heard that her future husband was seriously ill. To-day this letter had come. Should he go?

He longed with an intense longing, born of his youth and wounded pride, to show her that he was indifferent to her insult, cold to her neglect. If a half-defined instinct warned him that neither his anger nor his contempt might be proof against the deadly power of the old love, he crushed it, as he crushed the letter in his hand. Go he would, and the future might take care of itself.

The first meeting was easy enough. Jarvis' cold politeness was accepted without a trace of embarrassment.

"Oh, Dr. Jarvis," said Estelle, "it is more than kind of you to come. We hear so much of your skill, and we—I am so much distressed about poor Mr. Morton. You will help him, I am sure?"

He bowed in answer. Yes, he would do his best.

He scarcely dared to look into her eyes. Did she love this old man, he wondered? At the thought, a sudden, uncontrollable hate sprang up in his heart. He fought against it desperately. Medically considered, Morton's case was intensely interesting, rousing his professional pride and surgical daring; and he knew the patient to be a gentle, sweet-natured man.

But Jarvis did not tread the downward path unaided. With all her tact and self-composure, it angered Estelle Morris that the old devoted lover, the humble suppliant of past days, should pass her with careless indifference. Without deliberate thought of the mischief she might do, she felt that she must teach him how dangerous it is to forget a woman.

Morning after morning she would meet him, ostensibly to inquire after the sick man, while the tones of her voice were full of an alluring harmony, and her eyes seemed to pray for pardon although her lips were silent. Each day Jarvis quitted the house more hopelessly miserable, more degraded in his own sight, yet eagerly longing for the hour of return, the fresh torture of her presence, the misery of her welcoming smile.

"It is all over, Miss Morris, and safely, I trust," said the famous surgeon, as he hurried downstairs. "That young Dr. Jarvis helped me wonderfully. I prophesy that he will make his mark. I am quite content to leave the case in his hands. Unless there is more heart trouble than we think, Mr. Morton will rally, and be a happy man yet," he added with a chivalric bow.

Estelle thanked him profusely, and stood listening in the hall until the sound of his carriage wheels died away. Then she swiftly glided up the long staircase. In a small anteroom, next to the sick chamber, she found the nurse and the doctor.

Jarvis was dropping some liquid into a glass and started at her entrance. In his nervous manner and white face were plainly visible the strain and excitement of the great surgical crisis he had just witnessed. His hand trembled. He was horribly conscious of her presence.

She stood by the curtained door, her slender figure outlined against the sombre velvet.

"Dr. Linyard tells me," she began, "how much we owe to you and your skill. You are so kind"—her voice grew low—"so generous."

The doctor's hand grew more unsteady. "I will bring this in presently," he said, turning to the nurse.

The woman softly slipped away, and the two faced each other. White and haggard, Jarvis gazed at Estelle. Every fibre of his body seemed to thrill under the look she returned to his.

"Harry," she said, "for the sake of old times, will you forgive me? I know now how badly I treated you, but girls are fools, and——"

He sprang from his chair, the tightly tensioned cord of self-restraint snapping as she spoke.

"What do you mean?" he asked, coming closer to Estelle.

"I only want to be friends once more," she murmured.

But her white fingers had pulled the flood gates too far apart. Jarvis caught her in his arms and clasped her almost savagely. She pushed him aside angrily; yet she listened to his pleading.

"Do you care for this old man? Is the old love dead? Sweetheart, listen to me," he said, passionately.

"How can I listen to you?" she answered, all her diplomacy on guard again. "I have promised to marry Mr. Morton." With a slightly melodramatic sigh she went on, "I am bound by circumstances, but, Harry, I cannot bear to have you hate me. Indeed, it breaks my heart. You will forgive me?"

She paused, for some subtle danger threatened in his face; and turning, she vanished from the room. A few minutes later, as she stood before her long mirror, carefully twisting her heavy coils of chestnut hair, she smiled exultantly at the face in the glass.

Meanwhile, Jarvis sat stiff and silent, mechanically dropping the medicine he was preparing into the glass before him. It was a powerful anodyne; and as Jarvis held the bottle a sudden deadly inspiration seized him. She had promised to marry the old man. If he were dead——

Drop by drop the liquid fell into the glass. Now, the dose was large enough for a healthy organism; now it had passed the limit; now—Jarvis stopped. The nurse stood by the door.

"He is sleeping, doctor," and she took the glass from him. "I am to give him this as you directed, when he wakes, the first dose?"

He did not look at her face. "Yes," he said, and left the room.

In the street outside he met a boy, breathless and excited.

"Doctor," the lad called, "come quickly! There's been a big accident down at the mill. They think Jim Corrigan is killed."

Jarvis hurried away, and in fifteen minutes was fighting for the second time that day the strange, cold mystery of death. There was little time for thought now. On the floor of the mill, surrounded by weeping women, and rough, yet sympathetic men, he exerted his skill, and struggled desperately to save the life of the young Irishman. After some hours of hard work he was again successful, and finally helped to carry the patient to his own house. It was late when Jarvis entered his study and saw the supper his sister had prepared waiting for him on the little table. Worn with excitement, cold, hungry, and exhausted, he ate voraciously, and soon sank into a heavy sleep.

A little after midnight he awoke with a start. The fire was low, the room chilly, and his madness was past. An unspeakable horror came upon him as he remembered his day's work. By this time Morton must be dead. He paced the room in agony, but there was no woman's face to charm and lure him now; only the cold air, the silence, the darkness, which seemed to wrap him in on every side. Surely it must be a dream, this hideous memory of a trust betrayed.

He wondered why they did not come hurrying after him to call him to look at the dead. He strained his ears to listen, expectant, yet alarmed at every distant sound. He could see Morton's face, as he knew it must look, cold and white! Even when he tried to think of Estelle the dead face rose menacingly before him, blotting out every other thought.

Jarvis was the descendant of an honourable race. His nature, naturally weak and sensitive, had been strengthened by an old-fashioned, provincial education, and a simple country life. As the temptation died away, conscience asserted its power, and remorse and horror overcame him. Was there any escape? Yes, one, cowardly as it was, and he slowly moved towards the box where his pistols were. Then he started with a cry, for the door opened and his sister came in. He knew her husband was away, and wondered if her baby was ill, for she held it in her arms.

"You poor boy! How worn and miserable you look, and what a day you have had of it!" she said. "You came in so late, your supper must have been stone cold. I have been upstairs, hearing you tramp up and down here, until I decided to come down and drive you to bed; and baby, little rascal, would come too."

Jarvis watched them stolidly—the mother's pure and gentle face and white, caressing hands, the baby's rosy cheeks and darkly sparkling eyes. This was his only sister. She loved and honoured him. Suppose she knew!

"How is Mr. Morton?" she asked, suddenly.

"Dead by this time," he answered, harshly.

She played with the baby's curls and said slowly, "I am sorry. You and the surgeon have worked so hard; but after all he has been spared much unhappiness, for," she went on hesitatingly, "Estelle Morris cannot help it, perhaps, but she is a heartless girl. I was thankful enough two years ago when—forgive me, Harry, is it possible you love her still?"

"Love? If you call it that," Jarvis answered, wildly. "For her sake I have done murder—murder, do you hear? Do not look at me so. Take the child away. Go, go!"

She stared at him, unbelief and horror mingled in her gaze.

"Murder? Impossible!"

"It is true," he went on ruthlessly, but with a sense of grim relief. "After the operation this afternoon, Linyard left. Morton showed signs of fever. I gave him aconite. I gave enough to kill three ordinary men. There's no doubt about it; he's dead by this time."

Helen gave a low cry, and seemed to shrink and grow older before his eyes. There was a long silence. The baby played with the ribbons of her gown, and Jarvis realised that his cup of punishment was full. He knew he had slain the future happiness of this tender, loving woman in confessing a crime which he need never have revealed.

His sister stirred at last, a momentary gleam of anger flashing in her eyes. "She tempted you—I know it," she cried; then her head drooped, and with a flood of tears she crept out of the room. Again Jarvis was alone.

As he expected, the summons came in the early dawn. He heard the wheels of the carriage outside, and opened the door himself to the sleepy servant who stumbled up the steps.

"We want you to come up to the house, sir. Mr. Morton is dead."

"Yes," said Jarvis. "When?"

"Last night, sir. I was coming after you, but I heard you were gone to the mill, and Mrs. Morris said wait till morning."

Jarvis led the way out, and they drove through the sleeping town. He, too, was as one dead, for his youth, his ambition, his desire for life, and the mad love that had caused his ruin—all these were gone from him for ever. This, then, was to be his punishment—this misery of hopeless remorse; yet, as he shuddered before the thought of the future, he acknowledged the eternal justice of God.

They reached the house at last. With a supreme effort of will Jarvis entered the dark hall. At the top of the stairs the nurse met him. She greeted him nervously. "Oh, doctor, after all your trouble, to think he should die this way—so soon, too!"

"When?" said Jarvis.

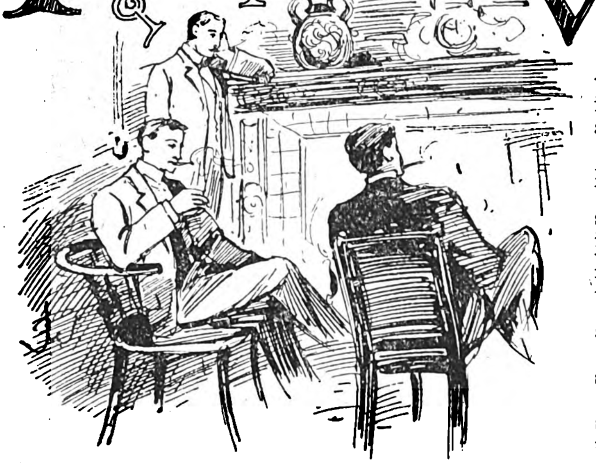
"Last night, about seven o'clock, and—I must tell you, doctor, for I have rather worried over it. He was sleeping so nicely, I did not disturb him at first; and by accident—I never did such a thing before—I upset one of the medicines you left—the fever medicine. We were just going to send for you when he gave a sigh, and all in an instant he was dead. Perhaps if I had given him the medicine——"

She paused in surprise, for the doctor leant forward, and took her hand suddenly in his.

"I think," he said, "I think it was the will of God."

M. W.

PRAYING FOR WEALTH



THE conversation was getting intensely interesting in the smoking-room of the Brighton Metropole. The subject under discussion was an uncommon one, dealing as it did, with the efficacy of prayer.

"I remember when I was a boy," said a stout commercial, removing the cigar from his mouth, and staring at the chandelier overhead, "I remember once chasing a butterfly for two miles, over a heath, in order to capture it for my collection. It was a magnificent specimen, perfectly marked, and of more than ordinary size. But, despite my persistent efforts, it eluded my net for nearly an hour, and finally disappeared in some mysterious way altogether.

"I remember throwing myself impetuously on the rugged heather and crying heartily over its loss; but, being then of a rather religious turn of mind, I found solace in a boyish prayer that I might eventually secure it. When I got up, the butterfly was hovering over my head, and the next moment it was safely within the little specimen box I carried."

The speaker looked round upon the silent company, and watched the impression of his story.

"A coincidence; a mere coincidence," said a small, sharp-featured man, sipping his whiskey.

"You are wrong, friend," returned the commercial, stolidly. "I regard it as a most striking illustration of the efficacy of an earnest and heartfelt prayer."

The short silence which followed was broken by a clean-shaven, lean man, who spoke with a strong American accent.

"It may, or it may not interest you, gentlemen, to hear an experience I had some twenty years ago in America, which appears to me to, in a measure, support the theory of my worthy friend here who has just given his experience. Would you like to hear it?"

A murmured acquiescence, and a rustling of chairs, as the company settled down to listen, followed; and the American began:

"It was in the winter of '75, and I was carrying mail from Gorman's, over to the Brown Bear and Roundout camps, and made the round trip once a week on snow-shoes. When I was at Gorman's, which was four days in the week, I stopped with a Frenchman named Pirot, who worked a mine on the river. We shared a cabin at the back of the hotel, and got along middling well for the first month we were together. In the evening we'd generally turn up at the hotel, and after sitting by the fire with the rest in the saloon for a while, we'd finally drop into old Gorman's private parlour, and listen to Kitty Gorman playing on the organ. I always liked music, but I had no faculty at producing it, so I'd just sit and listen while Kitty would play, and Pirot, who had a good voice, would now and then sing to Kitty's accompaniment.

"This was all well enough at first, but after two or three weeks I found it dull and uninteresting, sitting there by myself on the cold, slippery, black hair-cloth sofa, with never a word nor a chance for one with Kitty, who seemed all taken up with Pirot and the music, and only would speak to me when she wanted another stick on the fire. Then, after a while, I stopped going into the parlour, and would sit in the saloon till bed-time, feeling as cross as I could be to hear Pirot singing and Kitty playing away for dear life to keep up with him on the old organ in the next room.

"Then I grew bitter, because I knew that, while naturally Kitty liked me best of the two, at the same time she was worldly-minded, like her father, old Gorman, and felt Pirot was a better match on account of his river claim, while I wasn't of much account, from a ready-money point of view. Then, of course, I had a falling-out with Pirot about nothing in particular on the surface, as I can recollect of. I did pretty much all the quarrelling, I must admit, for Pirot said nothing but just laughed in a way that made me more angry, and I moved out of the cabin to an old adobe higher up the hill.

"Next day I started off before sunrise on my regular trip with the mail for Brown Bear and Roundout. I always got the best start I could, so as to get up the range while the crust was hard, and before the sun had been up long enough to make it too hot for me, for I wasn't very handy even yet with the long Norwegian snow-shoes. I never stopped on the trip, being always more anxious to get through than to rest; but this particular morning I had started out feeling languid and dispirited, and by the time I'd reached the summit I felt dead beat. My feet were cold and cramped from too tight buckling of the shoes, and altogether I made up my mind to sit down for a minute or two and get pulled together again before I started on.

"There wasn't much wind, and the sun was out warm and comfortable, and the idea of stretching out there on the snow for ten minutes' rest just suited me. I sat down with my back resting against an old dead stump that came up through the snow, unbuckled the shoes, unslung the mail-pouch from my shoulder, and took out the little snack of bread and meat I'd brought along, and which I generally ate on the way, without making any special stop for it.

"While I was eating, looking down the slope I had just climbed up, and thinking what bad luck I'd had during the last few months, my eye caught some lines in the scrap of newspaper I'd wrapped round my lunch, and which was lying out on my leg, under the second piece of bread, just within good reading distance. I don't just recollect now how the words read, but the drift of it was that lots of men failed in getting what they wanted in this world, just because they didn't want it hard enough, and didn't keep asking and praying for it until they got it.

"Those lines, somehow, applied to my case, it seemed to me. I hadn't had much early religious training, and the idea of praying hard for what you wanted and getting it, struck me as something new and simple and very satisfactory. There was no end of things I wanted, and wanted badly, and if they were to be had by just wanting them badly enough, and asking for them hard enough, I was going to get them.

"Then I said to myself, why not start now with a silent prayer? So I set at it. I closed my eyes and squeezed my lids together hard—I was so dead in earnest. It was a terrible, sweeping, vigorous prayer. First, I wanted good luck in a general way, and asked for it hard. Then I got more down to particulars, and asked to be rich and prosperous, and wound up with a sort of incidental suggestion that it would suit me down to the ground to have Pirot fall off his luck and get poor, while I grew rich. All this wasn't right, of course, as I see now. But I wasn't so much praying for bad luck to Pirot for its own sake, as for the effect of it all on my getting on with Kitty Gorman.

"When I prayed for Pirot's downfall, I was so wrought up by the whole business that—just, I suppose, to give things a particular point—I kicked out my right leg so vigorously, and struck the snow-shoe to which I'd buckled the mail-pouch so hard, that, zip-whizz! like a shot it was on its way down the hill. It made a clear shoot for about five hundred feet, every now and then spinning about, when an end would strike a snag, until it brought up short against a ledge that stood out across its track, sending splinters of stone all about when it struck, for with the mail-pouch buckled on to it, it picked up considerable speed, and hit hard. It bounded up and turned clean over and then stopped altogether, held from sliding any further by the croppings.

"Well, while that snowshoe was pirouetting down the slope, I was that surprised and angry that, although I'd just been indulging in prayer, I let loose a line of language which was so strong and pointed that if there had been any feeling to that snowshoe, it would have brought up within fifty feet. I mention this with regret, because I see now that if I hadn't been moved to make those remarks, just fresh on top of the prayer, things would have turned out different; but being young and hot-headed and thoughtless then, of course I didn't look ahead for consequences.

"There was nothing to do but go down to the ledge where the snowshoe lay, pick it up and the mail-pouch, and get on my way again. The ledge was rotten with the weather and pretty well broken up already, and aside from the small pieces just knocked out of it, there had been one chunk loosened up, which had rolled just away from the ledge, and lay with the fresh break turned up to the sun, and dazzling me with its brightness.

"That piece of rock was just crossed all over and through with coarse wire-gold. I stood staring at it a full minute before I could realise that I was looking at rock that would go over a £1,000 to the ton; that I was the discoverer and owner of that ledge, and that finding it just meant to me everything worth having, including, of course, first and foremost, riches and Kitty Gorman.

"While I stood there I recollected, with a start, that riches and prosperity and Kitty Gorman were what I had been praying for hard five minutes before, and here it all was within reach in answer to that prayer

Naturally I was somewhat excited, but I kept cool enough to put up monuments and a location notice all right, and christened the claim the 'Heavenly Snowshoe,' as being appropriate to the situation.

"You can imagine I wasn't very anxious after this to keep on with the mail to Brown Bear and Roundout. I wanted to get back to Gorman's, and let them know about the discovery. So I climbed up the hill again for the other shoe, knocked off some good specimens to show what I'd found, and was back again at Gorman's a little after sunset.

"When I went down to the hotel after I'd cooked supper and cleaned up at the adobe, I could hear Pirot singing and Kitty playing the accompaniments as usual; but instead of riling me, as it had all along, I just laughed to myself when I thought of the 'Heavenly Snowshoe,' and of how quickly all this would be knocked on the head when Kitty and old Gorman learnt of my good luck. I went into the saloon first, where I could generally count on finding the old man of an evening; but they said he was in the parlour with Pirot and Kitty listening to the music.

"When I went in, after knocking, they all looked surprised, and didn't seem very pleased; but I knew what had come to me, and what was coming to Pirot, and didn't mind, but began and told him what I'd found, and opened up my flour-sack I'd brought my specimens down in, and laid them all out on the table under the light of the hanging lamp, where they showed up richer than any specimens I ever saw. They all got round the table and admired them, and Kitty was very friendly, and old Gorman got very much interested and excited over it all, although he was generally pretty cold-blooded about most things.

"There wasn't any more singing or playing that evening, and pretty quickly Pirot said good-night and left us, not looking cheerful. Old Gorman asked me all kinds of questions about the size and dip of the ledge, and the nature of the croppings, and Kitty sat by the table, and was brighter and chattier than I'd seen her in a month. When I told the old man I'd locate him in with me on the claim he was delighted, and we arranged to meet next morning and talk up the best way of dealing with the property. Then at last we said good-night, and I went up to my adobe feeling very satisfied at the style in which my prayer was working.

"Next day old Gorman and I had our talk out, and it was settled between us that we were to locate extensions of the 'Snowshoe,' start in developing and incorporating the whole business at once, setting aside part of the stock for what old Gorman called a 'working capital,' and, meantime, the old man was to put up for expenses. Things went on almost too smoothly for the next month. The ledge opened up very nicely, Kitty was more friendly every day, and as for Pirot, he never turned up nowadays—anyhow, when I was about.

"Now my folks at home had been writing on an average once every six months for the last five years, urging me to come home and see them before they all died; but I'd never had any means to go, or any way to get any up to now. But when another letter came about this time, still nagging me to come on, I showed it to old Gorman, for he and I had got to be very friendly, and he said I ought to go, and he'd lend me the money to go with, and look after things while I was gone. The old man kept his word; he did look after things, as you'll see.

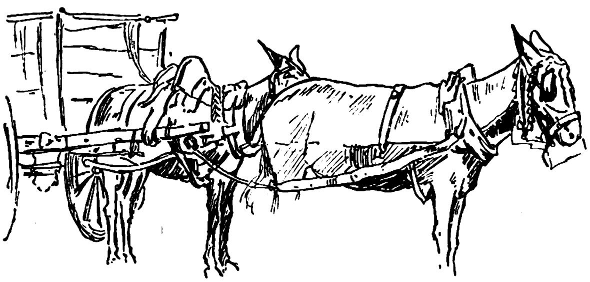
"Well, this was in April. I got back and saw the folks, took a little general passear all round, and it was August before I arrived one evening on the stage at Gorman's again. At the first glance, before I got down, I could see there'd been some considerable changes in the hotel since I'd been gone. The main building had been repainted, and there was a complete new outfit of red settees in the front porch. A strange man, with the air of owning the whole plant, came out from the office, and there was no sign of old Gorman or Kitty standing in the front door, as was usual when the stage came in.

"I felt a sinking at the heart at all this, as though something bad was going to happen to me. I wasn't kept long in doubt, though, about the state of things. I hadn't been off the stage five minutes when I learnt it all. Quickly as I'd left, old Gorman sold Pirot all the 'working capital' as a starter. Then between them they worked up a scheme to sell me out on a delinquent assessment. Then they struck an English syndicate and sold out the property at a big figure. Next thing, Kitty became Mrs. Pirot, old Gorman closed the hotel, and the three disappeared for no one knew where.

"Well, I won't dwell on my feelings, or how I expressed them when I heard all this and found it true; but that's neither here nor there. I could see, after I'd cooled down and reflected, just how it all came about. I'd spoiled everything up there on the summit by asking for bad luck to strike Pirot, and by using the pointed language I've referred to so close on top of my prayer when the showshoe went waltzing down the hill.

"This, I think," concluded the American, as he rose, "will illustrate my remark, that while there's nothing prayer won't do, if you're really in earnest and pray hard enough, at the same time it's just as true that if you overload your prayer, or show temper on the top of it, it's just bound to go balky and make trouble for you."

A. Maitland.



THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers names Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who had struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men, set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot. Squirrek arouses the citizens of Cornwall, who make their way to the outlaw's hiding-place. One outlaw is found and killed, and the cabin is set fire to. Squirrek discovers a piece of paper with the following cryptogram: "1——0——1. Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid X gjsf Nbg." He afterwards falls in with the two remaining outlaws, and has them arrested. They are lynched by a furious mob. Both Florence Woodland and her father have dreams of Señor Almanaz in connection with Fred Weldon's disappearance. The Señor leaves Somerville professedly for Cuba. He writes from Chicago to Miss Woodland, asking for a solution to the cryptogram. This is sent, but is intercepted by Squirrek, who has been tracking the Señor, and who at last discovers Fred Weldon, more dead than alive.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(From the Journal of Frederick Weldon.)

WHAT HAPPENED AT DEVIL'S CREEK.

On the —th of October a telegram reached my office in Brampton, purporting to be sent by my friend, Detective Squirrek, requesting me to meet him that night near the High Bridge, which spans the Devil's Creek, between Cornwall and La Grange.

Without the slightest suspicion of the authenticity of the message, I took the eastward-bound train, just as night was closing in, and shortly after stepped out of the station at Cornwall, and started on foot for the bridge, which was several miles distant.

The night was clear, and a bright moon was in the sky, so that I had no difficulty in making my way along the track.

When about half the distance was passed, I encountered the express, which thundered by with a shock like that of an earthquake. I caught a passing glimpse of several figures standing upon the platforms of the cars as they shot by, and I fancied that one of them shouted to me, but it must have been only a fancy.

Resuming my journey, I walked rapidly along the railway, and shortly after came in sight of the skeleton-like structure known as High Bridge, but saw nothing of any person.

For the first time a suspicion flashed through my mind that I was wandering into a snare, and I slackened my footsteps and walked more carefully, as if afraid of being heard.

My uneasiness was not diminished when I heard footsteps behind me, and looking over my shoulder, saw two men a few yards distant coming towards me.

I felt myself in a predicament. I could not continue walking directly ahead, as it was too dangerous to cross the bridge, while I instinctively shrank from turning either to the right or left, and descending into the dark swampy valley.

The only thing that remained for me was to turn about and boldly face my pursuers as though I suspected no danger, and I still hoped my fears were unfounded.

I walked slowly forward until I came to the very edge of the structure, when, placing my hand upon the revolver, and holding it ready to whip out at an instant's warning, I turned squarely about, and began my retreat, or more properly my advance.

By this time less than a hundred feet separated the two men from me. They were walking side by side, and I heard one of them say something in a low tone at the moment I turned about.

When we had approached somewhat closer I was not a little astonished to observe that the taller of the two was my acquaintance, Señor Almanaz.

I cannot say that this discovery was a relief. On the contrary, it was decidedly the reverse, as I felt that if the Cuban hated me as intensely as I did him, he would not hesitate to take every advantage of my situation.

The express thundered by.

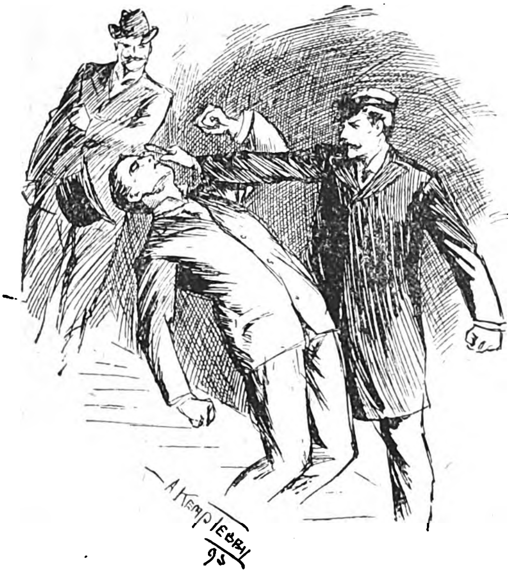
A few seconds later we were face to face. Without either party halting the two men separated, so that I was compelled to walk directly between them.

"Good evening," said the Cuban, lifting his hat with the most ceremonious politeness.

"Good evening," said I in return; "a rather strange place for friends to encounter——"



I was struck a blow on the head.

I remember thus far, and no further. Beyond a doubt I was struck a blow on the head, which stretched me senseless upon the ground. What followed is mainly conjecture on my part; but as I lie here in bed, with barely enough strength to write, and to think cogently only at intervals, I have run back over the "shadowy past," and putting together all that I can think out for myself, with what I have been able to gather from my attendants and by surmise upon my part, I have come to the following conclusions:

After I had been felled to the ground, my assailants must have picked me up and carried me to the right of the railway track for a considerable distance until they reached a waggon road, where I was placed in a vehicle of some kind and taken a long distance over the road until I reached some house, where I remained, I suppose, for several days, so weak and vague of mind that only the slightest fragment of a recollection remains of my sojourn in that place.

Then comes a dream-like memory of the whirl and rattle of a train, which satisfies me that, as soon as I was able, I was placed in the train and taken to this place, which I judge to be Chicago from a remark or two that has been dropped in my presence.

These lines have been written at one sitting, or rather at one lying, in bed. My first impression was that my home was in a hospital, where I was under medical treatment, but this proved a mistake.

My head is bandaged up, and from the sharp pain that occasionally shoots through it, and the curious, bewildering train of thoughts, I judge that the wound must be a severe one.

Furthermore, the medical treatment I am receiving does not seem to be helping me much; but while I am able to think with some coherence, it is a relief to put my recollections upon paper, and when they fail, give free rein to fanciful conjecture and the imaginative explanation of my curious situation.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Recollections while in Bed.

Thus far I managed to write yesterday when my weakness overcame me, and I dropped back in a sort of swoon.

When I recovered, a medical-looking gentleman was sitting beside the bed, holding my wrist in his hand, and looking earnestly in my face, while a bullet-headed, repulsive man, who was addressed as Muggens stood beside him, engaged in the same occupation.

He asked me no questions, but leaving me some medicine, took his departure, first speaking a few words in a low tone to Muggens.

Before taking his draught, and while in the mood, I will sit up in bed and use my pencil, which Muggens has been kind enough to sharpen for me.

Why am I here?

This is the question which comes up first and foremost, and the solution of which turns my head topsy-turvy.

I can't answer it. What would I not give for the cool-headed, keen-witted Squirrek at this moment! How he would unravel everything, and set me in a whirl of delight at his lightning-like explanations of everything!

Where is Squirrek? Does he know I am here? Why doesn't he come to my assistance? He cannot fail to get traces of me if he sets himself at work to do so.

And my poor mother—has she any intimation of what has befallen her son? If so, I am afraid her heart will break. Is there no way that I can reach her and the rest of my friends? Am I shut out from the world, placed here at the mercy of enemies who can work their pleasure with me without fear? Is this a prison, from which I am never to emerge except by the gate through which, sooner or later, we must all pass?

Such and similar were the questions that presented themselves in bewildering rapidity to me as I attempted clearly to reflect upon my singular situation. While thus occupied I heard footsteps approaching, and when they were accompanied by a creaking noise I knew at once that my shadow was approaching.

A medical looking gentleman was sitting beside the bed.

The door was open, and as I turned my head to meet the new comer, he quickly withdrew his face, but not in time to prevent my seeing the sallow complexion and black eyes and moustache of Señor Alvarido Almanaz!

He, then, is my shadow; but he does not always wear creaking boots, else I would have heard him when he approached me on the railway track, and would have identified him when we occasionally met during the day at Brompton.

Almost instantly he turned, and the creaking of the footsteps grew fainter and fainter, until they died out, and I was left alone again with my journal.

Upon examining my wardrobe I found blood upon it, which probably came from my wound. None of my effects were removed; even my revolver was there, although each chamber had been carefully emptied of its charge.

How long I have been here cannot even be guessed; but it is certain that a gross outrage has been perpetrated, and if I am spared the guilty ones shall suffer.

It undoubtedly is the work of the Mulligan brothers, and it is equally certain that this suave Cuban is linked with them. He has managed my abduction, although why he did not slay me outright is more than I can understand. It would have caused him far less trouble, and what vengeance he chose to wreak upon me would then have been completed and secured without his incurring the personal risk which certainly must attend such a proceeding as bringing me so many miles here to Chicago, where my appearance could not have failed to attract attention in the train.

I cannot date my journal, for I have no idea what day of the month, or even of the week, it is. Muggens is impenetrable, and will not answer any question, or bring me a newspaper.

By paying him liberally he gave me some stationery, and took my letter, addressed to my mother, and promised to drop it in the post-office; but I don't believe he had the least intention of doing so.

The doctor, who calls once or twice a day, tells me that I am dangerously ill, and enjoins strict quiet upon me. He forbids me to read or write, but, when awake, it is impossible to avoid thinking, and what harm can there be in giving expression to my thoughts?

I wish I could free myself of the suspicion that the medicine I am taking is doing me more harm than good, but it does seem to me that I am growing steadily weaker, and sinking lower, instead of improving in health.

Perhaps it is well that this suspicion has taken possession of me.

This morning I became enraged, and demanded of the doctor and Muggens to know where I was, by what right they deprived me of the society of my friends, and what their ultimate intentions were regarding myself.

Their only answer was a warning to me to keep quiet, as excitement was highly dangerous. As if a man in my situation could prevent himself from being carried to the highest pitch of exasperation.

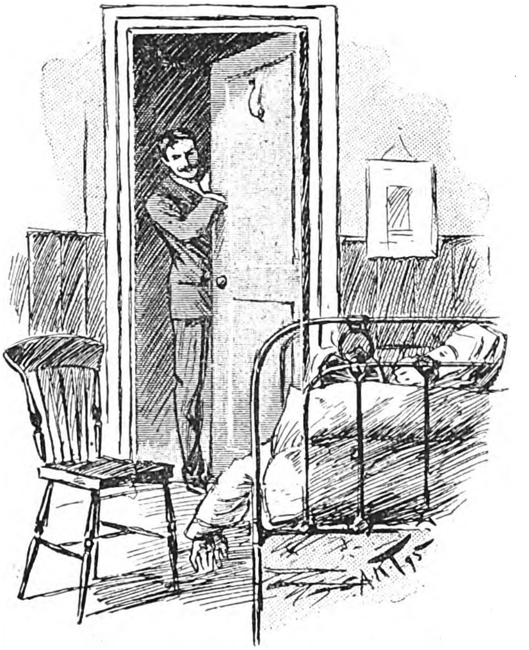
Oh, if my revolver were only loaded! What a pleasure it would be to shoot these two villains, together with the prince of criminals, the Cuban, Almanaz, whose creaking steps are frequently heard, but who never comes in, unless it be while I am slumbering! The shadow has resolved itself into a reality which is not impervious to powder and bullet.

I find that I am growing more stupid than usual, and sleeping longer and more frequently than when first brought here. The conviction fastens itself upon me that I am a victim of some species of slow poisoning, which ultimately will carry me away.

Why do not my friends come to my assistance? I have prayed earnestly to Heaven for help, and every footstep startles me into the thought that perhaps it is Squirrek.

And yet he does not come. Has he forgotten me, or does he care nothing for my welfare? Is he so engaged in running down the Mulligan brothers that he thinks I can afford to wait his pleasure?

It must be that he, in common with the others, has given me up for dead. My disappearance is such that there must be reason for their believing that to be my fate. So far as I can remember, the Mulligan gang were never in the habit of taking prisoners. When they took a dislike to a man they had a short way of disposing of him. If I cannot understand why I am still living, no one else can, unless it be Squirrek.



As I turned my head to meet the newcomer.

My head seemed somewhat clearer to-day, and I made a resolve to submit to this outrageous imprisonment no longer.

After I was left alone I summoned all my strength for the purpose of dressing myself, intending to make my way to the street, and if Mr. Muggens or the doctor attempted to thwart me, I would ascertain precisely how much strength I had left. I could kick up a rumpus at any rate, which might attract attention from the street.

Ah, me! I miscalculated sadly. The moment I stepped upon the floor I fainted and fell, and lay there until picked up and placed back by Muggens, who came in shortly after.

This little occurrence made me realise my helplessness more vividly than ever before. Without the power to walk across the room, with not voice enough to make myself heard further than the next room, what can I do?

Nothing but pray and wait.

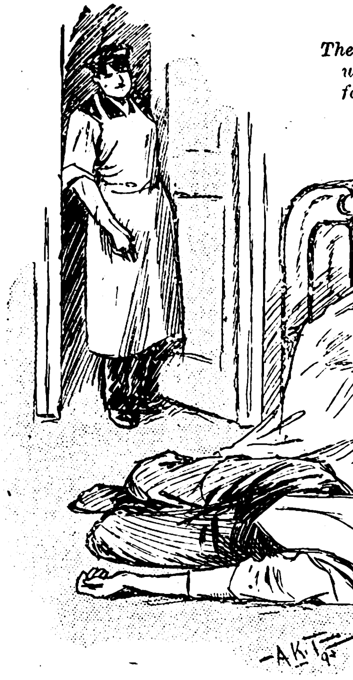
Like the old shadow, which ran me to the ground, I cannot tell how long ago, comes the conviction over me that all this medical treatment that I am undergoing is slowly and surely carrying me towards the Dark Valley.

If so, why do they hesitate? There must be some object in it, but what it is passes my comprehension, and this single fact makes me doubt somewhat my own convictions. If Señor Almanaz wished my death, and the doctor is in connivance with him, why all this delay?

Which brings back the question, Why was I ever brought to this city? Why was I not left when felled to the earth?

Again and again have my brains been racked over these questions, but with the same futile result. Heaven help me—I will think no more about it.

I am much weaker to-day, and my mind is still clouded. Occasional gleams of sharp mental perception, followed by blank forgetfulness, alternate with each other. I cannot finish a sentence without reading it over several times, so as to keep the connection. A great deal of what I write has no connection at all, and whoever undertakes to decipher this page will have a difficult task.



The moment I stepped upon the floor I fainted and fell.

Well, this can't last much longer. The end isn't far off. O, mother! can't you come to your boy? Come, rock me to sleep, let me lay my bursting head upon your lap, let me sleep—mother—night is closing—take my hand—lead me—O, mother!

Hark! I hear footsteps—can it be mother? No; they sound like those of Squirrek—can it be he? He comes too late.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(From the Journal of Adolph Squirrek.)

The Detective Lays a Trap for Almanaz.

It is a good many years since my blood has boiled as it has while reading over this journal of the unfortunate Fred Weldon. Up to this point I have experienced a sort of sympathy for the scamp Almanaz, and have not been particularly anxious to punish him for his rascalities.

But I mistook him; there is no punishment too severe for such a wretch, and there is none which it is in my power to inflict that I shall not visit upon him.

* * * * *

The above was all I was able to write before I proceeded to action. Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away, I can sit down calmly and write its history.

When Fred Weldon handed me his journal, and told me that I would "find it all there," he spoke the truth. One would be blind not to read the heartless revelation contained in those miserably scrawled lines.

Alvarido Almanaz was resolved on leaving the United States, but he was equally resolved before doing so to raise a large amount of money to take with him. He had several intimate confederates, besides a general connection which he maintained with the Mulligan brothers. It is plain that this gang determined on the death of the young lawyer, in consonance with their line of conduct with their enemies, but he had the intention changed to that of abduction.

The Cuban laid the trap which brought Weldon to the High Bridge, where he was stricken to the earth by a fierce blow from a life preserver (as I judged from the appearance of the wound), which came within a hair's breadth of killing him outright.

He was carried down the bank, placed in a waggon, and driven rapidly away to the house of someone, where he was kept several days, until the fever of excitement regarding his disappearance had partly subsided, when he was driven to a distant station, transported to Chicago, and put in charge of Muggens, the keeper of the restaurant.

Here my own blundering stupidity comes to the surface. By suitable inquiry, I could have gained a knowledge of this abduction, and checked it ere it was really consummated. Fred Weldon, I have reason to believe, was taken to Chicago disguised in woman's clothes, and his face carefully concealed from view.

Señor Almanaz entertained grave doubts from the first of his getting any of the immense wealth of the Mulligan brothers, and so he entered into a little scheme of his own. His plan was to take Fred Weldon to Chicago, there keep him securely concealed, under the belief that a large reward would be offered for his recovery, and then to act as a go-between, securing his own immunity from arrest at the same time.

The expected reward was not offered, and he dallied and hesitated, and all this time Fred Weldon was steadily sinking. Doctor Ruthven was a man who engaged in anything, no matter how disreputable, that gave him the requisite cash, and he hesitated not to use his utmost skill to prevent the recovery of his patient. The strong vigorous constitution of the latter would have caused him quickly to rally but for this.

In the meantime the Cuban was becoming desperate. His prisoner must either die or get well, and, if the expected reward failed to reach his hands, he meant that he should do the former. Although pretty well provided with funds at the beginning, his enormous expenses were rapidly running them down, and as poor Weldon remarked, a crisis was close at hand.

At this juncture my humble self appeared upon the scene, and it was high time that I did so.

Having found Fred Weldon alive, and made myself acquainted with his condition, I left, with my mind made up to allow no more delay.

My first proceeding was to telegraph Judge Woodland that Fred Weldon was alive, and would soon be at his home in Somerville, and requesting his daughter to break the tidings as gently as possible to his mother.

And after this I proceeded to business.

My first step was to make myself known at the police headquarters, and to ask for assistance. This was readily obtained, and just at the dusk of evening a close carriage, containing two policemen besides myself, was driven rapidly through the streets in the direction of the restaurant of Mr. Muggens.

We had quite a distance to go, and it was dark when we drew up several streets away. I observed, too, that a fine rain was falling as we stepped out upon the pavement.

We were all dressed in private clothes, and we proposed to enter the restaurant, take a few oysters, and make sure of the presence of either the doctor or Almanaz before we proceeded to anything

As we walked down the steps and pushed open the door we discovered several loungers within, some playing dominoes at a small table, with their glasses of beer beside them, while a tall countryman was swallowing bivalves so rapidly that Muggens was in a perspiration from his efforts to keep him going.

We glanced round the apartment, but none of our men were there.

CHAPTER XXX.

The Trap Remains Empty.

A half hour passed by, and still there were no indications of the coming of our men. By this time I began to suspect that a trick had been played upon us, and I asked Mr. Muggens to show us to a private room.

He very willingly did so, leading us into a small apartment, and turning up the small point of light into a flaring jet, he stood ready to receive our orders.

"Mr. Muggens," said I, "we wish to have a few words with you."

"All right," was his response, as he looked rather cunningly at me.

"We may as well tell you that we are three police-officers"—here his eyes opened wide, and he put on a scared look—"and we have come to take away that sick man."

"Which one?"

"The one that Señor Almanaz, the Spaniard, brought."

"Why, he isn't here!"

"Where is he?"

"They took him away this afternoon."

"Where did they take him?"

"I don't know, upon my word."

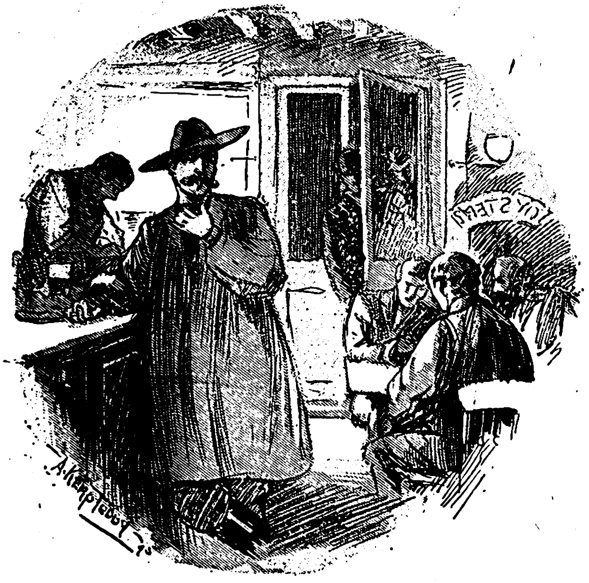
"Who carried him off?"

"Why, the Spaniard and the doctor."

"What is the doctor's name?"

"I—I don't recollect."

"Come, that won't do," said Runkle, one of my men; "we ain't so green as all that. If you can't think of the doctor's name we shall lock you up until you can polish your memory. The fact of it is, Muggens, you are mixed up in rather a bad piece of business, and the best thing you can do is to make a clean breast of everything. It may save you a great deal of trouble."

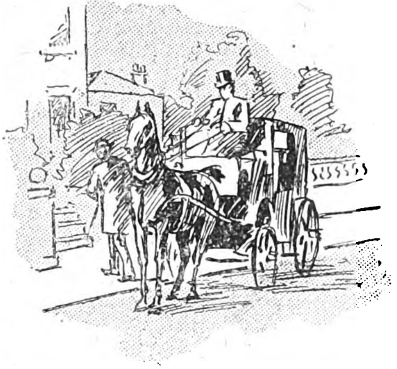


Pushed open the door and discovered several loungers within.

"Oh, I recollect—Doctor Ruthven!" exclaimed Muggens, his face lighting up, as if with the sudden inspiration.

"I know him very well," said Runkle; "he and I have met before. You are sure, Muggens, that you don't know where he has gone?"

"I would tell you, gentlemen, if I did."



It seemed a long time before we halted.

It looked as if the man spoke the truth, and we saw there was nothing more to gain in that direction; but I put a few more questions to him, which I knew he would not dare refuse to answer.

"How long ago was this sick man brought here?"

"About a couple of weeks, as near as I can remember."

"How was it that they came to bring him here?"

"I have kept Doctor Ruthven's patients once or twice, and there's one of 'em in the house this minute. He brought this young man one night, and said I must keep him. He wouldn't take any refusal, and so I was left no choice about it at all; but I never felt easy about it, gentlemen, and I am glad he has been taken off my hands."

"Did the doctor ever tell you his name?"

"No; that's what I didn't like about it."

"I suppose he paid you quite liberally?"

"I wouldn't have the care of another man for double the amount; the fact is, Doctor Ruthven needn't bring any more of his patients here."

The attempt to curry favour on the part of the restaurant-keeper was so transparent that it amused us.

As we rose to depart, Runkle placed his hand upon the man's shoulder, and said, half in jest and half in earnest:

"You'd better take my advice, Muggens, and close up this partnership with Doctor Ruthven. We've had our eye upon you for some time, and one of these days you'll be taking a coach drive before you know it."

A few minutes later the same three individuals who had entered the restaurant something like one hour before came out into the street. We found it raining quite hard, and it was very dark.

Runkle directed the driver, and away we went, rattling through the streets at a speed which struck me as nothing less than dangerous. Fast as we went it seemed a long time before we halted; but when my brother professional pushed open the door, and we followed him out, I recognised the neighbourhood.

It was still raining, and our clothes glistened in the lamplight as we hastily ran across the pavement and up the steps.

The bell was furiously rung, but in answer to our inquiry the servant made answer:

"Doctor Ruthven isn't in."

"Confound the luck!" exclaimed Runkle. "How soon will he be back?"

"Can't tell; perhaps in a few minutes, and perhaps not before morning. Will you come in and wait?"

While we were debating whether to accept the invitation or not, we saw the shadowy figure of a man approaching through the rain, and hoping that he might be the individual we were seeking, we waited until he came opposite.

Sure enough he was our man, and came behind us, rattling a bunch of keys in his hand; but seeing his servant standing at the door, he replaced them in his pocket.

"Good evening," he remarked, looking rather dubiously at us as he ran the gauntlet between us to reach the door. "Do you want me?"

"We will explain inside, if you please," said Runkle, shoving open the door, and walking in.

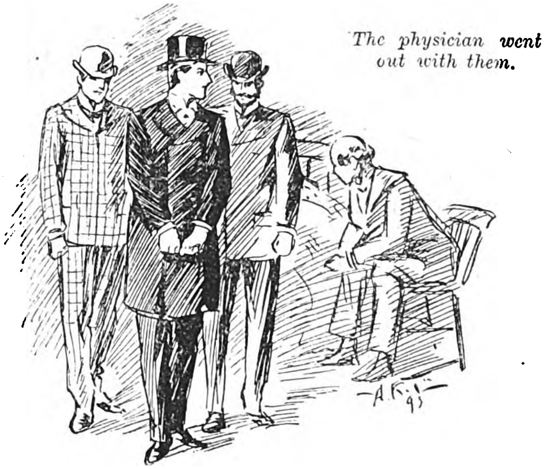
As this proceeding made the doctor the invited party, he followed, and the others brought up the rear.

Inside his office, he reached his hand up to the gas, and as it flamed up, looked sharply into our faces.

"Well, gentlemen, what can I do for you?" he asked, stepping back so as to face us, and coolly taking off his overcoat.

Runkle motioned to me to answer.

"You had better sit down, Doctor, as what I have to say concerns you more than it concerns us. To-day you had a call from a ministerial looking gentleman, who made some inquiries regarding the general health of Chicago. That man was a detective police officer, who was seeking out young Mr. Weldon—a patient of yours, and a friend of his—and he overheard every word that passed between you and Señor Almanaz, who called shortly after. In short, that gentleman was myself! From your office I went straight to Muggens' restaurant, where I found the man lying in a critical condition. The symptoms to me were that he was dying of a slow poisoning, although, not being a medical man, I cannot speak with any certainty. I remained a short time with him, and then went out for company. Early in the evening we returned, but in the meantime you and the Cuban had removed him."



The physician went out with them.

"Yes; I found he was not mending as fast as desirable, and thought it best to change his quarters."

The impudent coolness of this man commanded my admiration. He sat paring his finger nails while I was speaking, and showed not the slightest embarrassment at what I said.

"To cut our story short, we are looking for Mr. Weldon, and have come to ask you to direct us to him."

"I haven't the least objection to doing so," was the reply, uttered with the same refreshing coolness; "but the night is rather stormy ——"

"We have a carriage waiting at the door," interrupted Runkle.

"And I have several engagements," continued the doctor, "one of which is very important."

"Not more so than this," said Runkle. "We cannot excuse you."

"Very well; as you seem greatly interested I will do my my best to serve you. I must speak a moment to my servant," he added, rising hastily and walking to the door.

There was some reason to suspect a trick, and the instant he passed into the hall I stationed myself near the door so as to dart out and intercept him if he made any attempt to leave.

But he halted very near me, and spoke a few rapid words to someone, who made an indistinct reply. Then, as the doctor came back, smiling and polite, we heard the door open and someone pass out.

"Who is that?" I asked, with an uncomfortable suspicion that some game was being played upon us.

"Merely my servant. I have sent him to ask Doctor Barnes to take my place in the consultation that I was to attend this evening."

"Do you propose to wait his return?" I asked.

"It is not necessary. I am ready to accompany you," he replied, drawing on his gloves. "Fortunately we have not a great way to go."

We passed out into the misty rain, where a surprise and disappointment awaited us. The carriage was gone!

An exclamation of fury escaped Runkle.

"That stupid blockhead! he must be afraid the rain will hurt him. Well, we shall have to take it afoot."

Immediately after Doctor Ruthven's servant passed out of the door, I fancied I heard the near roll of carriage wheels, and I then suspected what afterwards proved the truth. The fellow, at the suggestion of the physician himself, made the driver believe that our party had sent him out upon some important errand, and had taken this means of warning the Cuban of his danger.

On this point we had been outwitted, and my two brother professionals held the same suspicions that I did, although neither gave any expression to it.

Doctor Ruthven, as a matter of course, took the lead, and ur nocturnal tramp began.

After leading us through several dark, winding streets, he abruptly halted, and exclaimed:

"By George! I've gone astray."

"Where do you wish to go to?" inquired Runkle.

"No. 19, Blankton Street, I believe is the place."

"If you had told me that when we started out I could have saved all this loss of time," muttered Runkle, who, of course, understood the ruse. "Your actions, Doctor Ruthven, show, beyond all question, that you are engaged in a criminal business. However, I'll take the place of guide, and it isn't likely this mistake will be repeated."

Runkle proved the truth of his words. In less than twenty minutes he halted in front of a restaurant, almost the counterpart of Muggens'.

"Doctor Ruthven seems to have a penchant for turning eating-houses into hospitals," he remarked, turning towards that individual. "Please lead the way."

A few minutes after we were in the presence of Fred Weldon, who was stretched upon a small neat cot, apparently asleep.

"I will remain with him," I said to Runkle. "Can you send me a good physician and nurse?"

"I can," was the reply, "and will do so at once; and as soon as you feel it safe to leave your friend, come to headquarters. We shall need your testimony. Doctor, will you be kind enough to accompany us?"

The question was a command, and the physician went out with them without uttering a word, while I remained by the bedside of my young friend, Frederick Weldon.

In the course of an hour, a genial, pleasant faced medical man made his appearance, accompanied by a matronly lady, who it was easy to see, without any questioning, was the nurse that was so badly needed.

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE MISERY OF CORPULENCY.

A copy has come to hand of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (246 pages), the clever little volume which, more than anything else, has brought a revolution in the treatment of obesity. That the still larger circulation implied by the issue of the new edition of this popular work is necessary is proved by such a paragraph as the following. It appears among the answers to correspondents in the "Dress and Fashion" column of a Sunday newspaper with a large circulation: "Miserable.—A young girl of 18 ought not to have such a large stomach that no dress looks well. Perhaps you require exercise and dieting." The helpless vagueness of this reply to a young girl who is naturally "miserable" on account of her unseemly obesity is a sufficient evidence that Mr. Russell does well in seeking to make known, even more widely than they are at present, the simplicity, the efficiency, the rapidity, and the delightful surroundings of his treatment for the reduction of superabundant fat. The young girl in question, who might exercise and diet herself for months without any appreciable improvement, may easily learn to imitate the example of thousands of ladies of all ages, who, by the use of Mr. Russell's pure vegetable preparation, have reduced their weight at the rate of pounds per week, and sometimes (but only when necessary, for the working of the cure is virtually automatic, stopping its effects when the normal limit is reached) stones per month. She may acquire this open secret—for the author makes no mystery about the ingredients of his recipe, by sending six penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when a copy of the book will be sent post free. If she follows his instructions, "Miserable," without any fasting regimen, and without excessive exercise, will find herself being quickly reduced to shapely proportions, with an improved appetite, and full liberty to gratify it.

LONGEVITY AND CORPULENCY.

We have received a copy of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). This issue is in itself indicative of the widespread influence which the author now exercises as a successful expert in the treatment of obesity, while the additions to the evidence which, as a statistician, he is in the habit of collecting on the subject are suggestive of some curious reflections. It is evident that Mr. Russell is annually treating thousands of cases of excessive fat with a success which, in the rapidity and the permanence of its manifestation is truly marvellous. That the enormous popularity of his system is likely to increase in the future is most probable, because it is free from all the drawbacks which have rendered the Banting and other methods of reducing corpulence unacceptable to the majority of the sufferers, who have regarded these cures as rather worse than the complaint. By attacking the causes rather than the symptoms of obesity, he strengthens the digestive organs, thus actually increasing, instead of decreasing, the appetite, while the surplus weight is being reduced at a wonderfully rapid rate, amounting to pounds per week, and often stones per month. Add to this that there is no mystery about the nature of the absolutely innoculous preparation, the recipe for which Mr. Russell supplies in his capital little volume (256 pages), which may be obtained post free by sending six penny stamps to the author's offices, at the address given above. It seems certain, therefore, that, as a result of the happy revolution which the patient research of this specialist, with the aid of a distinguished physician as a collaborateur, has effected, the average of longevity will, before long, be appreciably raised. Obesity is, indeed, one of the few antagonistic influences remaining which, especially among the more prosperous classes, prevent the great majority of people of both sexes becoming centenarians. With advanced ideas in regard to wholesome food, clothing, and sanitary arrangements, it only remains to get rid of clogging fat to live an ideally hygienic, and therefore, a very prolonged life.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fails to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In patent air-tight tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

TWO SERIAL STORIES, PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 347. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 24TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S
CAMOMILE
PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Limited. 21, Spital Square, London, E.

NORTON'S
Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

THREE GREAT BOONS

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun
METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS. BORAX. GUM. WAX. &c &c.

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST OVER 2,000 New and Second-hand. EASY TERMS—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 pages) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
REALLY GENUINE. In patent air-tight tins.
½lb. ... ... 1/2 | 2lb. 3/9
1lb. ... ... 2/- (Including tin and postage.)
MRS. CONYERS, Kilkhampton, Shalton, N. Devon.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

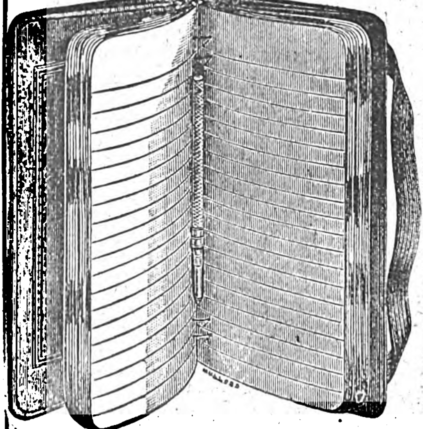
Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

COLLINS'

"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SHORT STORIES

ROMANCE
LOVE
ADVENTURE
WAR HUMOUR
PATHOS

No. 347.] [ONE PENNY.

EDITED BY

C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

For the Week ending August 24th, 1895.

Reforming * a * Lover.

MARGARET BARTRAM was trying hard to understand her own heart, and was talking freely to Kilby Brooke. They had drawn their chairs close to the open fire, turning their backs on the snowy streets which the parted damask curtains showed under a cold afternoon's sun.

"You see, Kilby, I am loved to quite an extravagant degree. It is pleasant to be loved. I have always felt in harmony with St. Augustine since I came across his confession that he was in love with being loved. To be no less frank, so am I. It may be that that was before he became a saint," she added, reflectively, "but no matter. Now, I want to choose the best love that I can get—something that will satisfy me all my life long. What do you think of Lucien Hargreve, to begin with? He is a bric-à-bracky sort of man, you know; ornamental, always going in for the unique and the beautiful. He works hard for me, Kilby, he really does. And there is no end to his versatility. Now it is a book, or a box of flowers, or some happy suggestion for an afternoon or evening—or it may be an exquisite letter marked "special," to tell me that he loves me. It must cost him a pretty sum just for messengers."

Margaret laughed. Kilby looked as if he was thinking hard, his brow fixed in a reflective frown.

"But, Kilby, I love to be sought after and waited upon—my passing words treated as things of importance—and I don't want it to be a matter of six months or a year, but for my lifetime. Now, if I should marry Lucien, there would be a stop to the messengers and things. He would naturally come to the end of his resources in the course of time, and as his surprises are his chief charm, there would be nothing left."

Kilby looked relieved, and unbent his brow a little. Margaret went on discursively from one admirer to another, striking off their characteristics with a careless but unerring touch, laughing at them all, her mind showing the variability of the magnetic needle before it has found its true direction. Kilby sat quite silent, his face showing that he was intently considering the eligibility of the different aspirants to Margaret's affections as they were separately brought before him. He seemed to relax, mind and body, when Margaret said, with a glance at the clock: "But it is time for me to dress. Thank you so much for helping me to think. Somehow you always make things plain to me. If you care to wait, you may see my new gown."

"I will wait," Kilby said, and reseated himself as Margaret left the room. It was a matter of vital importance to him what Margaret should wear. He smoothed his glossy dark hair, parted evenly down the middle, away from his serene white forehead, flicked off a speck of dust from his trousers, and took out a cigar. For an hour he sat before the fire, smoking thoughtfully.

When Margaret returned, her exquisite neck showing white and graceful above the new gown, the colour deepened in the clear olive cheeks, the finely curved mouth red with health and vigour, she said: "Now, Kilby, don't say that I look beautiful. You always say that. Lucien Hargreve would convey the idea that I was a vision of loveliness without so much as a definite word. That is what one calls charm. You have absolutely no charm. You are too matter of fact. You suggest nothing to the imagination. You have no mysterious reserves."

All rights reserved.]

"Oh, I say, Margaret, don't talk like that to me. Keep it for Hargreve. He will know what you mean."

Margaret saw that Kilby was teased, and said good-naturedly: "Oh well, dear, we won't quarrel. You will insist on being yourself. You are nothing if not Kilby Brooke. You are such an absurd creature, that if you did not take yourself seriously you might be laughed at. Do you want to go with me into the carriage? I can drop you at your street corner. Or would you prefer to stay and take dinner with father or mother? They would be glad to have you."

"I will go with you." He put on his overcoat and followed Margaret to her carriage.

Three years before Brooke had asked Margaret to marry him. She refused him, and he went down with a low fever. When he recovered he went back to Margaret like some poor faithful dumb creature, to the hand that had struck it. She permitted him to take his old place, because she thought that a man who had had a low fever on her account was entitled to some consideration. One of his friends said to him: "The next time it will be brain fever, Kilby."

"There won't be any next time," Kilby replied.

"Oh, then, you are sure that she won't refuse you again?"

"Miss Bartram will not refuse me again," Kilby said in his slow, sententious way, "because I shall not ask her again."

Not a day passed but Kilby was at the Bartrams', if only for half an hour. He did not often see Margaret alone, but he was satisfied if he only saw her at a distance, or could talk to some one who knew her.

Kilby had other trials besides those which his loving cost him. When he came of age, which occurred two or three years ago, his allowance was stopped, he was plunged into mercantile business on the sink or swim principle, and told to strike out for himself. That was Mr. Brooke's idea of making a man of his only son. Kilby tried honestly to come up to his father's expectations, but his salary was wholly inadequate to supply what he had learned to regard as the necessaries of life. His debts piled up and up, and when they reached a certain point they periodically toppled over, and bore him down under their accumulated weight. The last crash had been so terrific that Mr. Brooke was forced to come to his son's rescue. The stern old man sat before the pile of bills; Kilby stood there, very grave, very dignified.

"Your tailors' bills I expected to have to pay—it would be too much to ask you to clothe yourself," Mr. Brooke said, with biting sarcasm, turning over the discreditable pile of paper, "but flowers at thirty shillings a dozen, two or three times a week, seem to me an extravagance which I should not be called upon to settle. And confections—look at this bill. The girl must live on confections—of course, it is Margaret Bartram. Really, Kilby, you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

Kilby looked depressed. He was sorry, but he did not see how he could help it. Margaret had to have those things—that was all about it.

"Well, I will help you out this time. But the next time they may sue you, do your hear?"

The fact was that had not the bills expressed Kilby's devotion to Margaret Bartram, it would have gone much worse with him. Mr. Brooke looked upon Kilby's love for Margaret as his one saving grace, and he secretly cherished the hope that some day his worthless son might win the girl, who, even to the prim and precise old man, was hardly less admirable than Kilby thought her.

It had been some time since Kilby's last unpleasant interview with his father. He had made a weak attempt at curtailing expenses, but he could not persevere in any resolution, however worthy in itself, that so nearly affected what he considered Margaret's welfare. The bills accumulated silently and unobtrusively, like a snowstorm in a night, and one day Kilby was confronted with a scene of widespread desolation. He was blue when he called on Margaret Bartram that evening.

"What is it, Kilby? Have you had another row with your father over your debts?" Margaret asked compassionately.

"No, but there is a fine one in prospect. It will have to come, Margaret. I don't mind it so much on my own account, but the old gentleman always seems so cut up."

"It is too bad. Do you know, Kilby, I have an idea. I am going to help you to save. I know how most of the money goes, you foolish boy. Those last Gloire de Dijon were twenty-five shillings. I priced them. You told me that they cost you a mere song. You must have alluded to one of Calvé's or Melba's. But I am not going to scold."

Margaret talked to him seriously. She took his shortcomings so much to heart that he solemnly promised to try and get out of debt and live within his income. When he rose to go, he said: "By the way, I have some tickets for the opera to-morrow night. I felt so blue I had to do something."

"Oh, Kilby!" she exclaimed in a shocked voice.

"They are paid for. I don't expect to be blue every day. A fellow couldn't stand it, you know."

Margaret looked thoughtful.

"If I go with you, it must be on my own terms. There must be no carriage. We will go in the 'bus, and if you send me flowers I will throw them in the street."

"Oh, come, I am not such a beggar as that!" he exclaimed, with a look of wounded pride.

"I don't say you are. But it is to be your first lesson in saving—a mere matter of discipline, as your father would say."

Margaret saw that Kilby was really suffering when he called for her the next day and saw her in her quiet walking costume instead of the usual elaborate toilette.

"Now don't be foolish, Kilby," she said. "I think it is a great lark, and we are not to have any chaperon. Mother says she does not feel well enough to go to-night. Of course, it is the 'bus."

Margaret was never in a happier mood. She felt a peculiar sense of elation as she sat beside Kilby in the stalls in her unpretentious costume. If she had been in an analytical frame of mind, which she was not, she would have probably found that it sprang from her having come unexpectedly upon a new capacity in herself—that of self-sacrifice. She had refused a box and a carriage for this very opera to give Kilby his first lesson in saving.

When the performance was over, they were surprised to find a rainy sky and wet pavements awaiting them. They had no umbrella.

"You will have to let me get you a cab," Kilby said decidedly.

"No, I will not. It would be such a failure—our first attempt. Now, Kilby, if you love me, don't get a cab," Margaret said, almost in tears.

"But you may get your feet wet and get your death of cold," he said, in an agony of apprehension. But he was forced to let her have her own way. When the rain abated they started out, but they did not reach home until a sharp shower had caught them and wetted them thoroughly.

Margaret let Kilby pull off her wet gloves, and gave him her hand for a longer interval than usual when he said good-night, promising, with a mischievous air that mocked his solemnity, to follow minutely his urgent directions as to draughts and mustard footbaths before going to bed, and do all that she could to escape the imminent danger of pneumonia or rapid consumption.

The next day, when Kilby sent his clothes to be pressed and his hat to be ironed, he said, with a satisfied smile, "Margaret is a dear."

Margaret did not weaken in her determination to help Kilby to save. She denied herself many an invitation that she might teach Kilby to have an inexpensive evening at home. Kilby was very happy. He told Margaret that he had never suspected that the mere saving of money could become so fascinating, and that he feared that it would end in his becoming a miser. But after a while a cloud crossed his serene sky. Kilby had something on his mind. Margaret saw it in his eyes, his abstracted manner. One evening he came without the invariable flower in his buttonhole.

"Kilby," Margaret exclaimed, "what is the matter?"

"It is nothing. Let me have one of those roses. Whose are these, dear—Brown's, Hargreve's, or some other fellow's? They are lucky to be able to give them to you," he said, carefully adjusting the rose in his buttonhole, and thereby regaining somewhat of his mental equilibrium.

The truth was that Kilby was under a great strain. Margaret's birthday was approaching. He had always shown his remembrance of that sacred anniversary. This birthday must be no exception—that he was determined upon—but how to get a suitable gift without going into debt for it was a new problem. He had never done it before. He could not break his word to Margaret—that was clear. He struggled on alone under his heavy burden. He forgot his flower altogether after a while, and grew pale and thin. Margaret respected his silence and never questioned him.

On the eventful day, Margaret received a heavily-chased card-case, with the donor's compliments and best wishes for many happy returns of the day, from Mr. Kilby Brooke. When he called to express his congratulations in person, Margaret treated him with extreme frigidity, and did not mention his gift.

"Margaret, you are angry about the card-case," he said, fixing his calm, affectionate eyes upon her.

"Yes, I am. I should have sent it back were it not for the monogram. As it is, I shall never use it."

"I thought you were a man of your word. From this day I give you up entirely. You may pile up your debts mountain high for all I care."

Angry tears were in her eyes. Then she added forcibly, under an impulse to say the cruellest thing possible, "I don't see how you've got credit for it!"

"I did not—I paid for it," he said, with a deeply injured air.

"You paid for it! Where did you get the money? I suppose it's nothing to you that you promised me never to borrow again."

"I did not borrow. I saved that money, Margaret, every penny of it."

"You did! Oh, Kilby, I am so sorry. Don't you believe me?" Then after a moment's thought she said gently: "But don't you think it would have been wiser to let the money go towards clearing off the debts?"

He stared at her blankly: "Why, I did not save the money for that purpose. I saved it for the card-case. You can't eat your cake and have it," he said, as if uttering a self-evident truth.

"Tell me just how you got the money together," she said smiling, and making him sit down on the couch beside her.

"Well, there was the carriage we saved, and the sweets. Why, the money fairly piled up, dear."

Margaret looked a little mystified, but as she knew that she had not a very good head for figures, she let her doubt go unexpressed. He did not tell her that for the last month or so he had done without cigars and weekly papers (his choicest literature), and lived on two meals a day, and walked instead of paying cab fare.

It was not long before Kilby again forgot his buttonhole. He looked so despairing that Margaret asked him if he was saving up for her next birthday.

"Margaret," he said desperately, "things have come to a climax. All our efforts have gone for nothing. We might as well try to keep back the ocean with a couple of mops. I have not contracted any new debts, as you know, but that has not paid off the old ones. My creditors are getting rabid. There is nothing for me to do but leave the country—and I don't know how to go, Margaret."

His voice faltered—he recklessly smoothed his hair the wrong way, quite obliterating the even parting.

"Kilby, does your father like me?" Margaret asked in a liquid voice. (She knew quite well what Mr. Brooke thought of her.)

"Yes—only yesterday he said that he did not see how such a fine girl could tolerate such a fool as I am."

"If you should tell him that we are engaged, do you think he would be likely to help you?"

"Fast enough. He would not only settle my debts, but take me into business with him. He would believe in me then. He has said as much. But of course it is not to be thought of. I would not impose on an old gentleman like that. I have never done a dishonourable action, Margaret."

"Of course not. But I am in earnest. It would not be an engagement to be engaged, but an engagement to be married."

"Oh, it is not so bad as that! You are a dear to offer to make a sacrifice of yourself. It is just like you. But I cannot consent to it. I will get through somehow."

"You place me in a very awkward position," Margaret said, getting red. "You force me to tell you what, if you were not as blind as a bat, you could see for yourself. I love you, Kilby. I found it out long ago. So please tell your father, and if you have a pocket-comb about you, do for goodness sake comb your hair!" Kilby turned pale and faint. A cold perspiration broke through every pore and stood in drops on his forehead.

"Oh, Kilby, don't look like that! Anyone would think that I had refused you!" Margaret said in distress, putting out her hands and drawing him down beside her.

"Oh, Margaret, if you only knew!" was all that he could say. With a tremulous smile he bent over her and pressed his lips and his face against her hands, scattering Hargreve's last roses, which she wore at her belt in a crimson shower of petals about her feet.

Isabel J. Roberts.

IT CAME TO PASS

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

SUMMARY.

Charlotte, a young girl just out of the schoolroom, is married to Raymond Peel, widower, in his forty-fifth year, notwithstanding the knowledge that his past life has been a bad one. Entering London Society, she meets at Lady Logan's a young musician, Hugh Derringer, in whom she is much interested. Mrs. Donnington-Bain, an effusive American actress, calls on her husband. She tells him that an old enemy, Dr. Lynch, is in England. Mrs. Peel meets Lynch at Sandown. She calls on her protégé, Hugh Derringer, to learn his history, and his doctor tells her that he is dying of consumption. When driving home she again meets Dr. Lynch, who accompanies her.

CHAPTER IV.

"I HAVE no doubt," said Charlotte, coldly, "that you are surprised at my asking you to join me. I acted on a sudden desire to question you. Why did you insult my husband? What have you against him?"

The blood was coursing rapidly through her veins, and her eyes were alight with a strange fire.

"Are you sure you wish to know?" he asked; and as he spoke she felt her hopes crumbling, and her happiness insecure.

His eyes, keen and searching, looked her through and through.

Charlotte was trembling as she replied:

"Yes. It is necessary to my future peace of mind, and I cannot for ever remain in ignorance of his past. I must learn the truth from someone. It is humiliating to seek it from a stranger, perhaps dishonourable." Her voice faltered, betraying her distress.

"Some people," said the doctor, "have almost aggressive ideas of honour."

"I will abandon the word for to-day," she declared, a hard look creeping over her face. "I ask again, what has anyone to say against Raymond Peel? When I know the worst I will defend him, but at present I am powerless."

"It is a long and painful story," replied Dr. Lynch, "and though I shudder to think you must hear it, I have no desire to screen the man whose enemy I shall be for life. Yet all I am about to tell you is the truth, 'the truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me God!'"

"There is no time to lose," she said.

"You are indeed brave, Mrs. Peel, to face the bare facts, but I warn you, if you value your happiness, consider well first. Would it not be better to try and escape from these torturing doubts, and return in ignorance, content to forgive?"

"Impossible. If it kills me death would be better than a life of suspicion."

Charlotte had sealed her fate, and waited in trepidation to hear the secret. There was a pause.

"For pity's sake," she cried, "do not keep me in suspense! Whatever this revelation may be, I am prepared to face it."

"Then I must carry you back to his first marriage, of which, doubtless, you know little. His wife was an Australian, and they lived in Sydney. I was their friend. So long as he remained faithful to her she was passionately devoted to him; but I had a sister, a fair girl, young and beautiful as yourself. He loved her, and to her sorrow, poor child, she loved him in return. I cannot dwell upon the painful subject, for she was nearer and dearer to me than all else in the world—an only sister, motherless, and living under my care. God knows I would willingly have died to save her, yet absorbed with my own work I never guessed the tragedy being acted under my very eyes. I suspected nothing, until Raymond Peel's wife, discovering his infidelity, was so completely overpowered by jealousy that she practically lost her reason. She was a good woman till he woke the devil in her. Smarting from her injuries, and maddened by hatred, she robbed him of the life that had come between them. Making no secret of her ghastly crime, the murderess gloried to the last in her cold-blooded revenge, and the little sister whom I loved was sacrificed, the victim of a cruel fate!"

An exclamation of horror escaped Charlotte's blanched lips. Dr. Lynch bent his head in his hands, hiding the expression on his face.

Where had she ordered the coachman to drive? Ah! yes, she remembered now. They were turning into the Park, and the gay world masquerading in smiling guise, contrasted strangely with the bitterness of sorrow. She sat far back to avoid scrutiny, endeavouring to penetrate the space of years, and living with Raymond through that haunting chapter of his career, in which he had sinned and suffered punishment.

"There is something more," said Dr. Lynch. "Long after I had looked for the last time on the countenance of my dear dead sister, and sentence of death had been passed upon her murderess, Raymond Peel's wife lingered in prison —unhanged! Then God tried her for her life, and left her living, with a new-born son, her only offspring. That was the life I pitied, the life of the murderess' child."

Charlotte roused herself as from a stupor, and became suddenly animated.

"Where is the child? What of him?" she asked, watching the doctor curiously.

"Raymond Peel refused to see his son. He provided for his maintenance, and the wretched mother commended her baby to the care of her sister, a thoroughly worldly woman, and most unsuitable for the charge. The boy's father stipulated that he must never learn the disgrace of his birth and parentage, and I believe to this day Mrs. Donnington-Bain has kept faithful to her promise. It is the fear that his son will seek him out and claim relationship that makes Raymond Peel so imperative on that point."

Charlotte's head sank back, and she clasped her hands in an attitude of prayer. This harrowing intelligence cast a new light upon everything.

"Then, Hugh," she murmured, apparently speaking to herself, "Hugh is my stepson, Raymond's child, his first wife's, unowned, deserted! while Mrs. Donnington-Bain is Raymond's deceased wife's sister."

Involuntarily a sensation of deep relief passed over her.

"Yes. You have much to think out Mrs. Peel, and much to forgive."

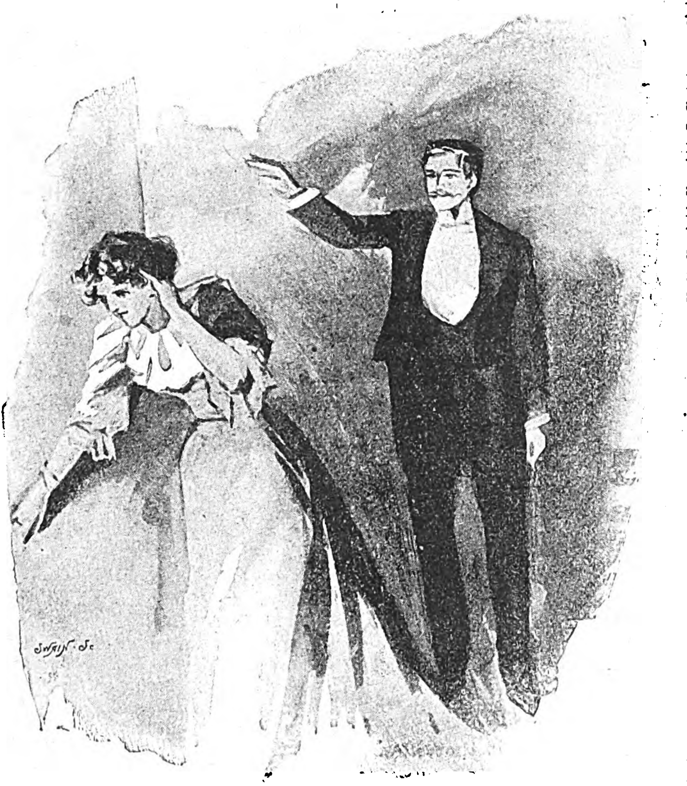
"It is a woman's mission to forgive," she replied, thinking how much easier it was to pardon this offence than the one she had suspected, since death had parted the offenders for twenty years. Besides, had she not sworn to love him under any circumstances, even though he warned her his past was evil?

"You can understand now," said Dr. Lynch, "that Mr. Peel and I could never exchange a friendly greeting—that to my dying day I shall hate the man who robbed me of my dearest earthly treasure. May the world reserve for you a better fate, Mrs. Peel, than that of your predecessor."

He seized her little gloved hand, and held it for a moment trembling within his own. Her lips quivered, she tried to speak, but her breath fled.

"Poor Dr. Lynch!" she faltered at last. "You have tasted the bitter reality of life. I was living in a dream—a very happy one!"

"God bless you in your first sorrow," he murmured, a weary sadness in his tone. He had spoken in earnest when he said, "the truth and nothing but the truth." Yet it was not the whole truth, for as he unfolded the past, watching the young wife's pale cheeks and dilating eyes, a horrible repulsion arrested him ere he completed the story. How could he wreck her life utterly with the words now trembling on his tongue? She had listened bravely to his tale, though her lips twitched with strong emotion. Dr. Lynch drew his hand across his brow, and a sudden dread seized her as she watched his expression.



"Once and for all, Charlotte, let the subject drop!"

"There is nothing more?" she gasped.

"I have finished," he replied. "Heaven knows enough has been said!"

A moment later he had alighted, and Charlotte was driving towards her home.

That evening she decided to broach the subject of Hugh Derringer's illness to her husband. It would be a difficult task thrusting her newly-acquired knowledge upon Raymond, and half an hour passed in comparative silence before she could bring herself to commence.

"You asked me to-day," she began, fixing her eyes on the rings of smoke from his cigarette, "why I was silent and constrained. You observed a change in me."

Raymond held out his hand to her.

"Truthfully speaking, I thought you were a little cross," he replied with a smile.

"Oh! no; only worried and anxious. Hugh Derringer is very ill."

"What have you to do with him?" he asked sharply. "Millions are suffering in the world without exciting our compassion. Their wants are nothing to us."

"But the wants of a son," she ventured timidly.

"Charlotte, what do you mean?"

"That I know all you would have hidden from me"—speaking very tenderly—"I am willing to forget the sad past, dear, utterly and entirely; only let us think what is right for the future."

"How much do you know?" he said, coldly, avoiding her eyes.

"The closing chapter of your first marriage. I learnt it from Dr. Lynch. You have neglected a life for which you are responsible, for Hugh Derringer is nevertheless your son, though you have forsaken him."

Charlotte's courage was stimulated by her husband's injustice, and she continued without wavering:

"There may be little time in which to retrieve the wrong. Your son is dying slowly but surely, in a wretched lodging, while we fatten on our dainties. It is monstrous that such things should be! You are visiting your own sin and the mother's on an utterly innocent and defenceless being."

"I make him a very good allowance," muttered Raymond, when he had sufficiently recovered from his astonishment to speak.

"Half of which is probably spent on Mrs. Donnington-Bain's back, since she is a recklessly extravagant woman—minus a conscience. The boy is consumptive, yet she leaves him to toil for his daily bread in the suffocating atmosphere of London. As soon as he will move I shall have him here."

"You would bring him here—under my very roof?" exclaimed her husband, confronting her with flashing eyes.

"What roof more suitable?" she asked. "Is he not your own flesh and blood?"

"But he must never know it," declared Raymond, excitedly. "I could bear anything but that!"

"Hugh, though young, is already a man of the world," she replied; "and cannot for ever be kept in ignorance. I must acquaint him with the mystery of his birth, though the motive of his mother's crime shall never pass my lips."

"Charlotte," he said, firmly, "the boy shall not come here. I couldn't stand it! Your promise was easily forgotten when put to the test, and you have broken faith with me by looking into the past."

She knitted her brows, and her face changed.

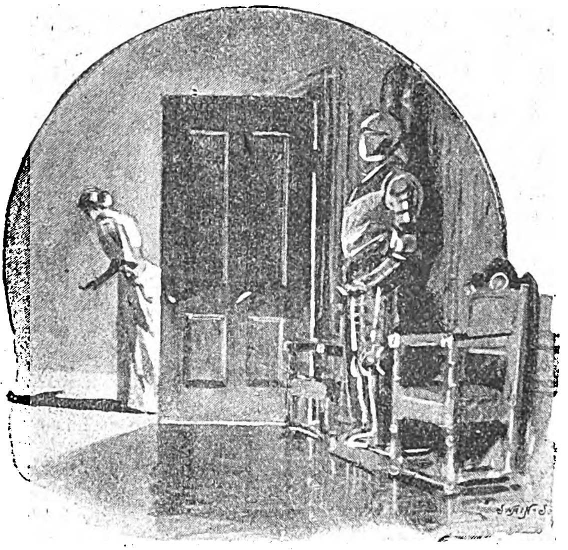
"The knowledge came to me," she said; "and I accepted it in a forgiving spirit, believing I might influence you to redeem the wrong. I thought you were man enough to face your faults, and take back your son. Instead, I find you imbued with a selfish desire to hide your neglected child from the world, clinging still to outward esteem, at the loss of self-respect. Raymond, I cannot banish this cloud and remain with you unless you consent to own him. That alone is my condition."

Charlotte spoke hotly, yet she looked so helpless, so beseeching, that he did not believe her threat.

Unconquerable anger took possession of him, as he struck the table heavily with his fist.

"Once and for all, Charlotte, let the subject drop!"

She did not reply, but, with a crushed look of disappointment left the room, closing the door very softly.



With a crushed look of disappointment left the room.

For many hours Raymond sat gloomily contemplating this fresh turn of events, and it was late into the night before he became alarmed at Charlotte's non-appearance.

"She could not have spoken in earnest," he thought, rising as from a stupor.

At first he went from room to room, momentarily expecting to meet his wife, till suddenly a terrible dread seized him, and calling her loudly by name, Raymond hurried hither and thither in a frenzy of despair. When he discovered she was no longer in the house, the truth of her words dawned on him. He had lost her love. He had lost a wife.

All that night he waited, sleepless and distracted, the victim of an overpowering remorse; but Charlotte did not return. Was this to be the disastrous consequence of his decision? If so, his punishment was harder than he could bear.

Early on the following day, his face worn and furrowed by anxiety, Raymond called upon Mrs. Donnington-Bain, only to be told she could not see him for three hours, as she did not rise until twelve. Before that time, however, he sent an urgent letter, imploring for an interview.

Augusta received him swathed in a loose silk wrapper, her hair flowing below her waist.

"You cruel man to drag me from my slumbers!" she cried, jestingly.

"Give me Hugh Derringer's address," he said, ignoring her remark. "I think Charlotte may be there, and I want to fetch the boy home. Quick! the address—do you hear?"

"Fetch him home!"

Surely, she thought, Raymond could not intend robbing her of the comfortable allowance she had so long shared with her unsuspecting nephew?

"Well, you are a specimen!" she declared, looking him up and down. "Whatever is the matter?"

"I have no time to answer questions, and I want my son's address."

"This is a fresh phase of imbecility, Raymond, which I really cannot humour."

"Augusta, for Heaven's sake drop your bantering! Can't you see I'm in earnest? I mean to make amends."

"Oh! a penitent!" laughed she. "Then why come to me? Do I look like a Father Confessor?"

"Will you or will you not give me his address?"

"No, you old humbug! It is nothing but despicable curiosity. You want to sneak round and see the boy unrecognised. Well, it is not my fault if his surroundings are hardly aristocratic. He gets the money right enough."

Augusta spoke unblushingly, with eyes fixed upon his face.

"I don't doubt it, but in the future all will be different. I mean to make a clean breast of it, for Charlotte's sake."

"You can find him yourself," she hissed, sweeping from the room.

Then commenced an active search, after which Raymond finally procured the desired address from Lady Logan, and hastened to the baker's shop in a state of nervous trepidation.

"Is Mr. Derringer at home?" he asked.

"No, sir; he left this morning with a lady. He is not returning."

A terrible look of distress passed over Raymond's face.

"Did you know the lady's name?"

"Yes, sir. He spoke to her as Mrs. Peel."

Raymond's eyes stared before him with a fixed expression of despair.

"Where did they go?" he questioned, anxiously, pausing breathless for her reply.

"I do not know, but they talked of leaving England," said the woman in the baker's shop.

CHAPTER V.

RAYMOND PEEL sickened with fear and doubt, as he staggered from the baker's door, dazed by the astounding news of his wife's flight. At first he could hardly grasp the meaning, and beads of perspiration gleamed on his forehead, while misery numbed his nerves into a half unconscious state.

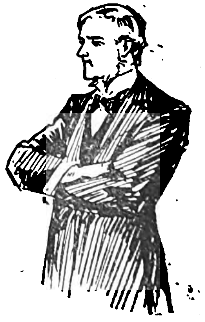
A drunken man reeling down the street lurched against him.

"She is far away on the ocean wave!" he shouted to the tune of a popular music-hall air. Raymond listened, arrested by some horrible fascination, till the words sank into a mumble, and the unsteady figure vanished down the street. He shivered as he glanced with repulsion at the house in which his son had lodged, and hastened on. It was humiliating—horribly humiliating! With dogged obstinacy he determined to seek Augusta once again, convinced she knew more than she cared to own. Prepared not to be admitted, he resorted to stratagem, and gave the name of her manager, which brought Mrs. Donnington-Bain smiling into his presence. Her countenance changed as she caught sight of him, and a hardened expression compressed the lips that a moment since were parted with spontaneous greeting. She shrugged her shoulders impatiently.

"Why have you returned?" she asked.

"Why?" replied Raymond, with sudden fierceness. "Didn't I tell you I wanted my son? Now I want my wife. They are both missing."

"Lost, stolen, or strayed?" cried Augusta, a cruel laugh escaping her. "You are simply a mass of contradictions, Raymond, neglecting the boy from his cradle, and then howling because he happens to be out when you call."



Dr. Lynch.

The anxiety he had struggled to repress now made itself clearly felt as he paced the room, his fingers nervously interlaced, and his head bent.

"I tell you, Augusta, Charlotte knows all!"

"All?" exclaimed Mrs. Donnington-Bain, suddenly.

"Yes. She learnt the details of my wife's death, and the reason for the murder. Lynch divulged it! She besought me to own my son, but I refused. Ah! I know it was cowardly; and that same night she left me. I believe she has gone abroad with Hugh Derringer. If you have heard anything of all this, for the sake of the good that is in you, don't keep it from me!"

"I am not as indifferent as I seem," she replied, with a graceful shake of her well-poised head. "But supposing I told you I am utterly unacquainted with the movements of your erratic young wife—what then?"

"It is impossible the boy could leave England without your knowledge, since he is dependent on you for money; unless, as I begin to imagine, he lives upon his own energies, and the allowance goes elsewhere."

"Since when have you developed these absurd suspicions?" she retorted, a sneer curling her lip.

"Since this morning," answered Raymond, ceasing his quick, even strides, and standing rigidly upon the hearthrug.

"You want rest and sleep," Augusta declared, "for Mrs. Peel's playful little whims have evidently affected your brain. You are over-wrought, my dear Raymond. Take an effervescing mixture to cool you down, and go to bed; things will right themselves in a day or two."

The calmer she grew the more exasperated he became.

"I do not believe I am wronging you," he said. "At any rate, since you are unable to help me, and Hugh Derringer has left England without a word, the money will cease immediately, Augusta, understand that."

A flush rose over her cheek, creeping down the delicate curves of her throat.

"You dare not stop it," she hissed, with a sudden intaking of her breath. "I say you dare not, Raymond Peel! Do you forget you are in my hands, utterly and entirely? You will double the payment if I choose."

A dead cold pallor stole across his face.

"Look here," he said, sharply. "What do you mean?"

"That the world is still in ignorance of your identity. Your past discreditable history is known to Dr. Lynch and myself alone. He will not mention it to slur his dead sister's character. But I am bound by no such tie."

"Have you not a dead sister also?"

Augusta's face twitched. Raymond thought it looked almost ugly for a moment.

"Her memory is blackened already by crime. When sentence of death was passed upon her you had not even the nerve to wait until your child was born. After arranging with me for its maintenance you left the country, and hid your grief in the wilds of Africa. Finally you took your passage to England under a new name, and have lived here ever since."

"It seemed like beginning life again," he said.

"Be sure your sin will find you out," quoted Augusta, mockingly. "It is difficult to bury a living child, and harder still to escape from a hidden past. So long as you are in the world, the days that have been will cast a reflection on the days to come. You are a pitiful creature, Raymond, and for the sake of your pretty, wilful Charlotte I do not wish to drag your name through the mire; but I cannot honestly afford to keep silence for nothing. Leaving Hugh Derringer out of the question, that allowance must continue."

"You demand hush-money? I should not have thought a woman of your spirit could have sunk so low."

"Perhaps not. We live and learn. Now, let me recommend you change of air, for this room is unhealthily hot, and doubtless your carriage is waiting."

But Raymond was not to be put off so easily.

"Before I go," he said, "can you swear you know nothing of their movements, that you are not tricking me with lies, and merely feigning ignorance?"

"I would swear anything to be rid of you, mon ami!"

"Augusta, you are the most exasperating woman that ever trod this earth."

"Yet, still a woman, and, therefore, naturally inclined to torment mankind, for women were made to give trouble. They live and revel in the fact till life ebbs out of their bodies, and a handful of dust in a mouldering coffin is all that is left of the dear distracting creatures."

She laughed as she spoke, though Raymond's clear-cut, hard-featured face grew dark with hatred.

"Are you at the bottom of this or not?" he muttered, rather speaking his thoughts aloud than questioning.

"You men are so persistent that you end by gaining your way. Once and for all, then, I know——"

"What?" he asked eagerly, as she paused, glancing at him from the corners of her eyes.

"Nothing!"

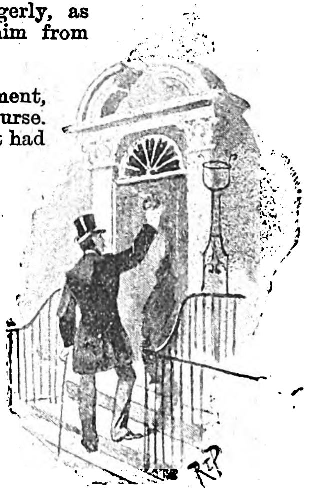
His hope kindled for a moment, sinking with a muttered curse. The faint fleck of colour that had risen to his cheek faded away, and he moved mechanically to the door.

"May I offer you a glass of liqueur brandy?" cried Mrs. Donnington-Bain, laying her hand on his sleeve. He drew his arm sharply away, while the sternness in his eyes deepened.

"I hardly know whether to laugh or cry!" Augusta continued. "You are half tragic and half grotesque."

"You have always seen humour in tragedy, and tragedy in humour," he replied.



Raymond called upon Mrs. Donnington-Bain.

"Alas! I am compelled to, or I could not live!"

He refused her outstretched hand, and turned silently away.

Raymond Peel looked ten years older as he left the hotel.

That night he mentally re-acted his interview with Augusta, and came to a conclusion. He would refuse to leave himself in her power and be stretched for ever on the rack. Charlotte knew the worst—why not then the whole world? She was his world—his all in life! What cared he for any other? If his heart must be torn out, the carrion vultures might scream their miserable story at will!

"I was mad," he thought, "to momentarily contemplate bribing Augusta."

So he wrote Mrs. Donnington-Bain a curt letter, and dispatched it that same evening.

A singular smile played round her lips as she scanned its contents.

"He little knows his adversary!" she said, opening her desk and drawing a sheet of paper towards her. "Poor fool! Does he fancy I have only one weapon!"

Then she wrote with firm, unflinching fingers:

DEAR RAYMOND,

It is only fair to warn you before blackening your character, that I have a graver, more terrible secret in the background, which I think you would give your whole fortune to conceal. I shall not act hastily, as I wish you to have time to recover your senses, and meet my terms. I can faithfully assure you that this is no brag, and believe me I hold you in the hollow of my hand.

Your friend—or enemy?

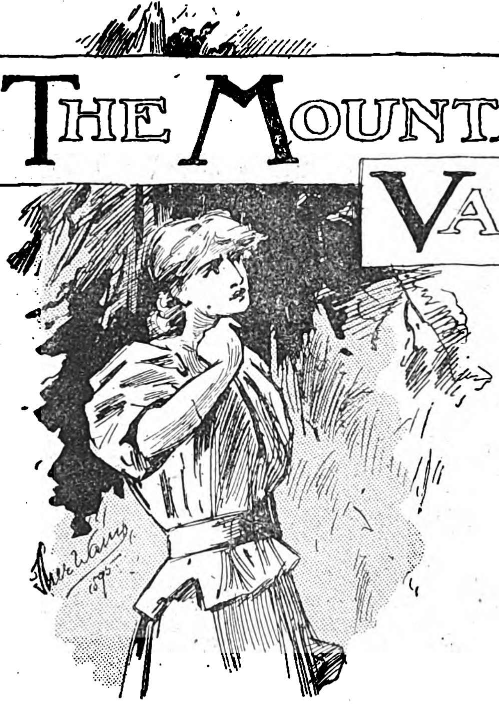
AUGUSTA DONNINGTON-BAIN.

"Does the woman think me crazy?" exclaimed Raymond, flinging the letter in the fire.

So Mrs. Donnington-Bain waited fruitlessly for the result of her bomb-shell.

(To be continued.)

THE MOUNTAIN VALKYRIE



WHERE the rough mountain road led up from the valley beneath it turned abruptly into a narrow gorge, and there, in the dusk of the falling evening, Kendal Trance came upon a strange scene. At first he scarcely distinguished the two figures and the respective attitudes they held. He saw an arm raised, saw it descend with most astonishing vigour, then, urging on his horse, he was at the side of the combatants, and faced the slim youth and the tall, massive girl, blonde and muscular as a Norse war goddess, whose round arm, firm as marble in the twilight (her coarse homespun sleeve was turned up from the elbow), had hurled itself against the youth's head.

"For shame!" cried Kendal Trance, who knew the youth, a pitiful fellow enough; "what's the meaning of this?"

But it was the girl who replied, standing there with heaving chest and a frown dark as midnight upon her straight brows.

"He kin let me be after this," she remarked, scowling towards the victim of her own magnificent strength. "I cuffed him till he'll recognise it when he sees me next!"

"Did you insult this girl?" came quickly from Kendal. The girl looked up at him in the dusk. His face had a pallor under the brim of his slouch hat.

"I kin help myself if he did!" she suddenly spoke, the defiance of her mood turning largely against this would-be defender. "I don't want none o' your jawin'." And she was gone with a bound, in the thicket of the hillside.

"Aw! she be a fury," muttered the chastised delinquent, after her. "That's what Se'cashy be!—What I done anyways? I grabbed her ez she was a-walkin' 'long, jest fur a kiss. She's owin' it ter me, fer she knows she's set me crazy with those eyes o' hern; an' I done axed for it; and when she turned about on me I sees sparks, and I grabbed her, and she flung out! Aw, she be a fury!"

"Serves you right. Leave her alone after this," brusquely said Kendal, spurring his horse. The sickle of the moon was coming up above the mountains. The lonely road was full of strange murmurings from the woods. Kendal Trance set his lips together. This had been one of the days when the past (not so long passed) had surged upon him till he sickened, and the details of the present life had become impossible. The revolted bitterness of his mood was distinct upon him as an evil taste in the mouth.

Two days later it was Sunday. Kendal Trance talked to the people then—they called it "preachin'"—even as he tried to teach them during the week in the school-house. They straggled in—women with babies in their arms, men in muddy top-boots, carrying their guns. The doors were open, and the autumn sunshine made a pale glare without. In the blue calm of the Indian summer the red and yellow trees stood motionless. Kendal began to speak and forgot his hearers. He spoke passionately, carried on by the long pent-up stress of contending emotions within him, losing sight of his initial text, of the concrete and practical notions for every-day application, which he generally sought to instil into the dull minds of these, his ignorant fellow creatures.

While he stopped he saw the slow wonderment dawning in the eyes of his hearers as they filed out. They had understood nothing, but that impassioned poetry of speech had stirred some dormant chord within them. As he reached the door himself, he saw a tall girl in blue homespun leaning against the outside wall. She had heavy masses of blonde hair wound above a massive throat. He recognised her. It was the girl called in the mountains "Se'cashy"—the parentless girl who lived alone in the cabin in the woods, and whom he had met in the road two nights before—the girl Circassia. He nodded to her absently.

That night, as he sat under the lamp, not reading, there was a sharp tap at the door, and, before he could reply, the door was flung open, and Circassia entered. She stood an instant irresolute, her scowling glance absorbing the details of the room, its books, its papers. Then she burst forth, turning those strange blue eyes upon him:

"I want 'er learn some book stuff!" She tossed her thumb towards the books on the shelves. "I ain't never keered for book-learnin', but I want it now. Folks sez you teach ter the schule. I want 'er come," she ended, roughly.

"Very well. What makes you wish to learn now?"

"I heer you this mornin'; that's the reason why!" she said, defiantly. "I ain't ketched on ter what yer sed; but I want ter; that's why I come. Yer been't like other men 'round yere. I hates men. But I kin abide ter listen ter you."

All this she spoke with her eyes on his, and her hand still on the knob of the door. Through all her uncouth savagery, Kendal's æsthetic instinct (that cultivation of the eye which was second nature to him) perceived, as it were unconsciously, her strange beauty. The words of her pitiful, worsted admirer on the roadside two nights before, "she's set me crazy with those eyes o' hern," flashed back upon him. They were remarkable eyes. Blue-green in the lamp-light, with something inviolately virginal in the core of their bold brilliancy. And, even as he thought it she was gone, with a clang of the door.

And thus, with a new pupil in the mountain settlement, 3,000 feet above sea level, the winter began for the man who, at thirty, blasted in the world which had hitherto known him by an unjust suspicion, had left in revolted disgust his career and the glittering hopes of the future, and buried himself in these wilds, far from civilisation, there to lead (with such little good as he could do in passing to the ignorant humanity around him) the life of an embittered recluse.

* * * * *

The snow lingered, and the thaws were long in coming that year. A stray messenger from the nearest post-office made his way, but with difficulty, to the settlement. Thus a letter, addressed to Kendal Trance, reached its destination a week later than it should have done.

Written by a cousin, a woman (and a young woman), it began with a sort of cry of despair at the recent conditions of his life, and then eagerly broke to him the glad news. "The good news that has made us all live again, dear Kendal, and that will bring you back to us in honour, back to the place which is waiting for you, and in which we all feel that you will do great things yet!"

A full confession had finally been made by the man who, after embezzling funds belonging to a high civic charge to which he was committed, had at first cunningly contrived to throw the appearance of guilt on the younger man associated with him—on his partner in business, Kendal Trance.

Kendal Trance's reputation was now washed whiter than ever, and his fellow citizens in the rigid far Eastern town had conferred together to request his return from voluntary exile, and to receive him, when he should come, with such ovations as the place had never known. "And Lawrence and I are going to fetch you ourselves, Kendal." Thus the letter concluded. "We shall find you out in your mountain hermitage, and force you to leave it and to come back to your rightful life, with us!"

The letter reached Kendal, and was opened by him in the little school-house by the wayside. The scholars had left, the morning lesson completed; but, as he slowly raised his head, crushing the letter in his hand, he saw that he was not alone. Circassia lingered behind the others near the door. The door was open, and he could see the road outside, heavy with the spring rains and thaws. And then two figures came within his range of vision—a man in a light top-coat, a pretty woman in travelling dress, and with such gloves and boots as he had not seen for two years.

"Kendal!"

It was the writer of the letter, with her brother. She was still young; she was emotional; she had always, half-unconsciously to herself, held a place in her heart for this particular cousin, which he could at any time have taken possession of, and thus doing, have taken possession of the whole. The tears rushed to her eyes now, and she clung prettily to his shoulder a little, as he held her hand. Her brother meantime wrung Kendal's disengaged fingers in a manly grasp, and said, simply:

"Well, it's all right, old man. I needn't tell you how glad we are!"

A moment later the three were walking slowly towards the settlement. But Circassia stood by the school-door still, and watched the retreating figures.

* * * * *

The last night!

The books (Kendal's sole, real companions for two years) were packed, the boxes stood ready. The lamplight fell on the little dismantled room of the one boarded cottage of the settlement which he had made his home. He was leaving it to-morrow. He was going back to his "rightful place in life." With a sense of perfect satisfaction in that justice had been done him at last? No. He threw open the window, and leant out. The night was odorous and filled with mysterious stirrings. And the restlessness of nature was in the man's blood, likewise; a deep bitterness for the past injustice, which no reparation could now wipe away, mingled with some other feeling, of which he did not choose to analyse the constituents.

Behind him the lamplight flared up in a sudden gust of wind. The door had opened, and, as he turned, he faced Circassia.

"If it's true—true you're goin'"—her eyes swept about the room, with its glittering signs of preparation—"I got ter know it—now!"

He came slowly towards her without replying.

"They was a saying' it all over the settlement that you was—was a-goin'." Her hand went up to the neck of the homespun gown as if the light structure oppressed her, and her eyes were black in the lamplight. "And when I see her—her—that lady—yisterday—I 'lowed she'd take you with her!"

He saw her breath come fast, and then the passion within her broke loose.

"I hates her—I hates her! I hates the likes o' her, and the likes o' the man that's with her, her brother, they says! I hates 'em, and the big town you're agoin' to! I hates 'em all—all; because—because I loves you!"

Magnificently she made her confession, as the savage she was, unabashed and unafraid, with a wild sort of dignity in the imperious poise of her beautiful blonde head. She threw her love in his teeth, not as a suppliant, but as one who confers a royal favour.

"I loves you!" she repeated.

"And I—Circassia—my wild mountain bird, my beautiful savage. Circassia, my girl, I, too, love you!" he said, then, at last, with a long breath.

* * * * *

"Not going with us?" repeated Kendal Trance's pretty cousin, sitting in her travelling dress the following morning in the "hotel" of the village in the valley, five miles below the settlement.

"Not going?" she murmured, turning white; and then her brother, who, as agreed upon, had just driven up to the settlement to meet Kendal, and to bear him away, told his remarkable tale. Kendal, since the night before, had changed his mind. He would not return to civilisation now, not till he brought with him the mountain girl who, put into a boarding-school, was for two or three years to be trained to be his wife.

"His wife!"

Long the brother and sister talked, the latter trembling a little, with a great bitterness in her soul.

"But this is suicide!" she cried at length. "What can a man like Kendal do with such a girl—for you say you saw her this morning? He is mad!"

"Perhaps," said her brother, meditatively, and then, with a remembrance vivid before him of Circassia as he had seen her, for the first and last time—Circassia, beautiful and haughty as a Valkyrie—as the wild dream of a poet—he added: "I don't know, though—I don't know."

W. H.

A MAN OF MANY WIVES

THERE were three hundred and sixty-five of them! One for every day in the year.

Nevertheless Barak was not a sultan; he was a hageb—that is, upper chamberlain—at the court of the Sultan Mohammed. He had come to the country as ambassador of the great Mongolian kingdom, and the widow of the late Sultan, yet young and pretty, had given him the management of her household, her son, Mohammed, being still a child.

Barak's administration was good. The army owed to him, among other reforms, the raising of the soldiers' pay from three to four aspers (pennies).

One day the Grand Vizier, Darfur Ali, visited the upright Hageb, and, while the two drank coffee, the guest began:

"Truly Barak Hageb, it is a folly unworthy of you to keep so many wives. If it was with us as the Franks the custom to give wives, you might then be as rich as King Sapor; but here you must not only buy your wife, but must pay cash for her. Now, you have squandered a great deal of gold for this purpose, and when your money is spent, what have you? For the cost of one wife you could keep a hundred soldiers."

Barak stroked his beard. "One should pick as many flowers as he can from the world's garden," he returned.

"True enough, you have blonde and brunette, white and black, blue-eyed and grey-eyed women, yellow Chinese and brown Malay—yes, and even those women that colour their hair red and their teeth black. Now, I think that one of each sort should be enough. By Allah! you have so many that you cannot remember either their names or their special good qualities."

"Don't you believe it," said Hageb. "I will show you. First, then, there is Jedibah, who can prophesy—we need her to tell the fate of the nation; then Hafitem, the medium, who calls up the spirits of the dead; Nourmahal, who understands the languages of the birds better than I do yours; Alpaide tells stories that would put a sultan to sleep; Mahadevi and Assainte are famous for a pas de deux. The great thing about Mangora is that she makes a sultan's bread that is exquisite. Sandabad concocts a wonderful sherbet, after which you wash your beard with regret. Zul——"

"I have heard enough, you need every one of them—each has evidently her famous side. Take care, lest some day you discover an infamous one."

Whether the Grand Vizier was right or not the following story will show.

The Sultan of Kermau, Sidi Achmed, hearing Mohammed's people were discontented, decided to liberate them from their oppression. To alleviate the sufferings of his neighbours has always been a labour of love to Oriental rulers.

Sidi Achmed commanded an immense army. Some Persian historians say he had ten thousand soldiers; others insisted that he had one hundred thousand; the truth probably lay somewhere between the two. Certain it is that he had three hundred cavalrymen.

Before declaring war he raised the pay of the troops from four to five aspers. This naturally caused universal enthusiasm.

While the two drank coffee.

Sidi Achmed was at the head of the army, himself and his horse loaded with precious stones. The sight of them caused a glow of righteous pride in every barefooted warrior who turned out. The Sultan took with him the most costly delicacies, and the thought that the Sultan fared sumptuously went far to cheer the hungry soldiers.

Mohammed also had an enormous standing army. The Grand Vizier Darfur Ali was appointed commander.

The night before the first battle, one of Barak's wives, the Jedibah of whom we have already heard, prophesied that the neighbouring kingdom would be destroyed; and Roxana, who also dabbled in fortune-telling, predicted that on the next day Sidi Achmed would die.

These predictions were made public in the principal city, and there was in consequence universal enthusiasm.

Barak himself was firmly convinced that both would be fulfilled, and he and his entire following of women occupied, the next day, a hill above the battle-field, in order to enjoy from that coign of vantage the amusing spectacle of the downfall of the enemy.

The battle began early in the morning, but it did not last long. In describing it the historians again differ widely. The Persian chronicle says the army of Mohammed lost forty-five thousand men, while the enemy lost but three. Another writer states that the army of Mohammed did not lose a man, while the opponent lost thirty-three thousand. Perhaps in this case, also, the real truth lies half-way between the two statements. All agree that the army of Mohammed speedily gave leg-bail, and proved that no one could catch them.

"By the beard of the Prophet!" cried Barak Hageb, seeing the flight of his soldiery, "I almost think Jedibah's prophecy is not going to be fulfilled. On the contrary, our own country appears to be lost."

"Have patience," murmured the prophetess, consolingly; "the sun has not yet sunk into the sea."

The observation being just, Barak philosophised no more, but spurred his horse, and, with his spouses, sought safety in flight.

Sidi Achmed had heard of Barak's wealth and of his wives, and so soon as he was informed of the flight he hastened in pursuit. Until late in the afternoon two dust-clouds might be seen, one chasing the other; the one beaten up by Barak Hageb and his wives, the other by the troopers of Sidi Achmed.

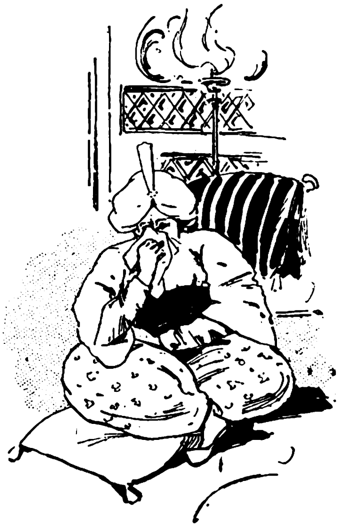
"By the holy apron of the Prophet's wife," growled Barak, "Roxana's prognostication likewise fails to be fulfilled. I shall be the dead man to-day, and not Sidi Achmed."

"The stars are not yet visible," replied the white Roxana. "There near yonder pond we will take rest. You may take your evening bath and pray; let the rest be our care."

In the meantime the women were not idle. When Barak returned from his evening devotions he found instead of his pious family of wives, an army of bearded troopers. Great at first was his fright, for the warriors were of fearful aspect.

The women had cut off the manes and tails of their horses, and had made themselves false beards. From a neighbouring grove they had cut bamboo canes, to the ends of which they attached their tiny daggers, making thereby elegant lances.

Yarko the Tartar, and Zibella the Indian, commanded the gentle cavalry. The troopers were divided into three divisions.



Barak Hageb was touched.

Sidi Achmed came on in wild haste; as soon, however, as he saw these warriors, whose long beards swept down to their stirrups, his heart failed him. At once a portly hero rode up to him, calling him to come forth to single combat.

This was Zibella, so expert with the knife that she could split a hair at twelve paces. The very first throw of her lance killed Sidi Achmed.

Under the guidance of the Tartar Yarko, the other Amazons now pressed upon the enemy. The troopers of Sidi Achmed were but lukewarm. Five pennies is a nice sum, but it hardly pays for a hole in one's hide. Each of these fellows, therefore, took his shield upon his back, and fled as fast as his feet could carry him.

The head of the Sultan was struck from his body, and stuck on the point of a lance. With this token of triumph, the party pressed on to Kermau. The city gates were cheerfully opened, for now everybody knew that Sidi Achmed was a tryant; while Barak Hageb was praised as the liberator of the nation, and was finally asked to be its Sultan.

Barak Hageb assembled his wives and said to them: "Glorious women, I thank you for my life. Yes, I have more to thank you for: my fame and my kingdom. Name, then, the reward you desire; I swear by Allah to grant it."

Then came forward Zibella, and spoke:

"O, great Sultan, we do, indeed, deserve a reward, for we have fought for you like men. We ask nothing small, therefore; we ask for freedom, and our desire is that all the women in your kingdom shall be as free as men."

Barak Hageb was touched; very much touched; he shed tears. Then he said:

"You ask for something unheard of—something that has never yet been. Yet it must be, for I have sworn. In Kermau, from this time forth, woman is as free as man, and the wives of Barek Hageb may proclaim that they have gained this freedom by their own efforts."

And so the new sultan won the hearts of his people, and even in the neighbouring realms his fame increased.

All the sultans round claimed his friendship and solicited his kinship.

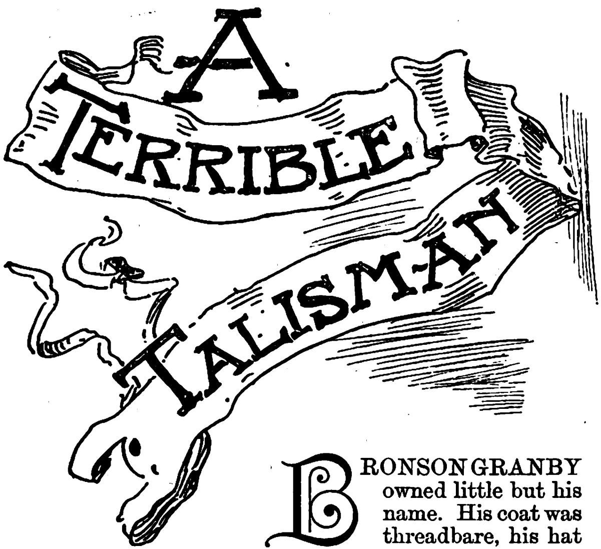
The makers of marriages beseiged his house; even the Sultan Mohammed, at whose court Barak had once been ambassador, offered him sisters and cousins.

To him Barak replied: "I choose neither your sisters nor yet your cousins, for I want not frivolity, but rather wisdom. If you really desire to be kinsman of mine, give me for wife—your mother."

And so it happened.

After having had three hundred and sixty-five wives, he contented himself with one, and found it enough.

E. Duval.



A TERRIBLE TALISMAN

Bronson Granby owned little but his name. His coat was threadbare, his hat could scarcely hold its own; those portions of his scanty linen visible at wrists and throat were so frayed and torn that the clipping treatment bade fair to prove annihilation, and of his boots so little individuality remained one might well scoff at the popular fallacy, that to those who wore shoes it was as if the whole earth was covered with leather. In truth, despite their outward respectability, only the shadows of soles intervened between his weary feet and the rough road he travelled; the leather was a thing of the past.

Tall and gaunt was Bronson Granby; he held himself painfully erect, as if fearful that the slightest relaxation would prove his undoing. His grey hair, worn a trifle long, was brushed back from his broad forehead, and to a physiognomist the strongly marked face, with its deep-set piercing eyes, was one never to be forgotten.

Of course he had a history—everyone has for the matter of that—but Bronson Granby had never quite finished his first chapter. He had, from his precocious childhood, a most inventive mind, which only a solid education and strict discipline could transform into practical usefulness. This, however, was not his portion, and the great schemes by which, as he fondly imagined, the thinking world would be swayed, proved as delusive as Fortune herself, who smiled upon him from afar, but vanished as he drew near.

"But a few hundreds in my hand," he would say, with an expressive motion of the long, thin, nervous member, "and I might make a million—more or less."

Alas! it was always less, for the hundreds had been squandered, and at fifty—worn, emaciated, an old man in the very prime of life—he still waited, with the same impatience of thirty years ago, the granting of his first patent. He had either been too far ahead of the times, or too late in filing his application; or, what is still more probable, his mechanical appliances never fairly illustrated his broad conceptions. But the fact remained, and this man, who was, as it were, the fountain-head of so many brilliant possibilities that died at their birth, hovered about the sacred precincts of the Patent Office, striving in vain for that spell, the "open sesame," without which he could never enter the wonder-world of fame.

He was well known, and regarded by those who watched him come and go with unfailing regularity as somewhat of a crank. But, still undaunted by repeated failure, he lingered in London year after year, held there, doubtless, by some vague, dim hope of better things. He managed somehow to pick up a scanty living, crumbs dropped by busy officials, a scrap of writing, an odd job here and there; anything to turn an honest penny was not beneath Bronson Granby. And in the meantime, there was the invention, the culmination of all his best endeavours and high aims. There it was, tested and approved by competent judges, awaiting recognition!

One evening at dusk, when March was at its windiest, the Inventor, wrapped in an old cloak, that, like himself, had seen better days, issued forth to brave the elements. It was raining a fine unpleasant drizzle, which the blast caught up and turned into sleet, that came driving against the venturesome wayfarer; but though Bronson Granby's slight figure swayed like a reed in the hurricane which met him at every crossing, he struggled on with unabated energy, until finally he stood before a massive looking dwelling, situated a little beyond the fashionable limits of the city, yet distinguished by a certain air of dignity and repose, as if it had descended from father to son for many generations. He steadied himself for a moment against an iron railing which inclosed the mansion; then he mounted the broad steps and rang the bell.

Yes, Mr. Curtis was at home, and had ordered that the gentleman be shown to the library at once. The stately footman eyed "the gentleman" doubtfully, but Granby's manner repelled impertinent curiosity, so he led the way in silence, and opened the library door with that gentle flourish peculiar to his calling.

In the subdued light shed by the soft glow of a lamp, the Inventor saw a gentleman seated at a large table, busily engaged in writing. He looked up as Granby entered, and their eyes met in cold recognition.

"You sent for me," said Granby, in a low voice.

"I did," replied the other composedly, "though I hardly expected so speedy a compliance with my request. It is long since we met, twenty-five years at the very least. You are changed, Bronson."

"Yes; time has dealt more gently with you." Bronson spoke with repressed bitterness as he glanced at the unlined face with its clear-cut features.

"You forget this," and Curtis smiled as he passed his hand lightly over his silvery hair. The graceful gesture irritated his visitor, who moved impatiently.

"You must be tired," said Gordon Curtis, "pray take that easy chair. I trust you have not come on foot this awful night?"

"It was scarcely dark when I left the place I call home," answered Granby, sinking with real exhaustion into the proffered chair. "The distance is great, but I walk in all seasons and in all weather."

"Shall I ring for wine?" His voice expressed only the coldest courtesy.

"Thank you—no," said Bronson Granby hastily. "You sent for me?" he reiterated. "In what way can I serve you?"

"Serve me!" Curtis allowed the full inflection of sarcasm to dwell in the echo. "I rather thought to serve you."

"It is the same thing," retorted the other.

"I have heard of your latest invention," pursued Curtis imperturbably. "and being, in my poor way, ranked among men of science, I thought my opinion might be of value to you." He paused for some acknowledgment, but none came. "Have you the instrument with you?" he questioned.

"Your note expressed a desire to see it," said the Inventor, in his direct way. "I have it with me in consequence."

He drew from beneath his cloak a box of medium size and placed it on the table.

"And all your life, your energy, your privation, and your poverty are compressed in those dimensions," observed the host, with a shade of contempt upon his handsome face.

"Say, rather, my ambition, Gordon Curtis, which rises above such sordid considerations."

"True; but I doubt if your ambition has accomplished the ascendency you boast of. I mean no taunt, Bronson. I am only moralising on the different roads we travel. I fancy I have been more prudent than you, as the world takes it. I am a philosopher in my way, dealing with life's most complex problems, on paper. I invent, too, in a manner. I fashion theories with my pen, and they have brought me golden harvests. I cannot always practice what I preach—what matter! I do not set myself upon a pedestal. I merely expound natural and moral laws to the public as I would interpret them to myself if I had time to live again. Doubtless, you have read my article on 'High and Low Pressure?' No! I will give you a copy. And now I will examine your invention, if you will kindly show it to me."

Granby winced under the patronising tone, but without a word he proceeded to expose his treasure to the philosopher's critical gaze.

There was little to be seen. A copper sphere about the size of a toy balloon was prolonged at either pole into a hollow tube a yard long and half an inch in diameter. To one end was attached a metal top, which opened and shut according to the regulations of an ingenious contrivance at the other extremity; a diminutive engine worked by a small electric battery.

The whole apparatus occupied but an insignificant space on the table, yet it was perfect in every detail, and Curtis, as he sat coolly watching both the Inventor and invention, acknowledged this, even while he wondered how those nervous, trembling fingers could be trained to such nicety and precision. He was still more surprised to see Bronson Granby suddenly throw off his gloom and begin to speak with eager enthusiasm.

"The plan is very simple. The object, as you know, is to temper the atmosphere, for which purpose let us suppose that we need the instrument to reduce the temperature in an over-heated room. Well, then our first care is to indicate upon the meter you see here the number of degrees you wish. Fifteen below freezing is the limit of my experiments, though I believe it could stand a much stronger test, and also, by reversing the action of the engine, which requires the opening of another valve, a room of low temperature could be heated to an indefinite number of degrees. Of course, my delineation is rough. Materials of the proper sort are expensive, and I have been forced to construct my engine of inferior metal and in the face of a thousand drawbacks."

"You have done fairly well, I think." The Philosopher spoke in a ruminative way, with his eyes fixed upon the instrument and his brows drawn together in deep thought. "Yet I firmly believe, if you would follow my suggestion, your invention would be more than useful. It would be invaluable. I am, as I said before, a man of theories. I can explain the process of improvement in your design, though the mechanical appliance of the principle is far beyond me. For this reason I sent for you. I know that your pride, or rather, resentment, which has estranged us for a quarter of a century, could be broken only through an appeal to your dearest ambition. I am thus frank with you because, in seeking your aid in the project I have in view, I want to be sure that something more than pecuniary interest binds us."

Curtis looked straight at his visitor, but despite his seeming unreserve, Granby felt that something was hidden, and he resented the calm dissecting glance of those cold grey eyes.

"I cannot quite fathom your motive," he said, with real dignity in voice and manner, "nor what you wish of me; but understand once for all, I will be led into nothing blindfolded. I can justly measure your influence over me, yet I warn you not to go too far. It has been my destiny to play the puppet in more than one of your schemes. But remember, you may bend my spirit to your will, you cannot break it; there is a point at which it rebounds."

"My dear Bronson," observed Curtis, with just that faint shade of sarcasm he could so well assume, "does it not occur to you that you are raising a tempest in a teapot? But you were always impetuous, and I see your solitary life has not curbed the natural impatience of your disposition. You should have married, as I did."

Again Granby shrank beneath the covert taunt his words conveyed. "I am not one to break any woman's heart. I loved only once and faithfully."

Whatever sting may have lurked in his retort, the Philosopher might have been incased in glass for all the impression that it seemed to make. A strange gleam flashed in his eyes, but it was gone directly, and Curtis, leaning back in his easy-chair, evinced not the slightest trace of emotion.

"There!" he exclaimed soothingly, as if humouring a wayward child. "I have roused unpleasant associations; forgive me, and now let us be strictly practical. I have heard your invention favourably discussed by men of science. I approve of it highly. As you say, it is crude, but possessed of capabilities far above what has hitherto been within the range of human power—further than even you have conceived. Your design performs a wonderful task in thus administering to Nature, holding her pulse, keeping an accurate index of her respiration, but why do you stop here? why pause half-way when you might transcend the higher flight of true philanthropy? You have probed to Nature's heart. Have you ever considered how much more accessible are Nature's children—plants, animals, and human beings—and how you might regulate their inward temperature through a diminished reproduction of your instrument?"

Granby had listened attentively. His flushed and animated countenance looked positively handsome as this vision of fame and glory was subtly spread before him. New worlds to conquer still cried out to him, despite the record of lost battles.

"I see," he cried eagerly. "You wish me to try my experiment in your province—mankind. How and for what reason I am as yet ignorant. I cannot work in the dark."

"Nor do I wish it. You interpret my object correctly. I have spent much time in studying the complex passions that sway my kind, and have come to the conclusion that if the animal force within us—heat, you might call it, or cold, as the case may be—were tempered by intellectual force from without, fine and delicate, yet powerful enough to penetrate the human fabric, and work its way to the recesses of the mind and soul, the most astounding results would be produced."

Granby followed every word with kindling enthusiasm. The man was completely submerged in the inventor, whose active brain had already fashioned the outlines of a noble work, and as Curtis stopped to note the effect of his plausible argument, he was startled at the energy and vivacity which swept away a dozen years from the stooping shoulders.

"Only give me time," he cried, "and I may yet be famous."

"And rich," added the Philosopher.

"Gordon Curtis, am I so despicable as to think of money at this crisis?"

"Yet it is useful," said Curtis musingly; "in its base way, of course. I have found it so." He glanced at his luxurious surroundings, and leisurely produced his cheque-book from a drawer in the table. "How much will you need for the furtherance of this scheme, Bronson?"

"I want no aid from you," said Granby irritably, though his hungry eyes followed his host's every movement.

"Nonsense!" answered the other, dipping his pen in the ink. "You cannot work with air, and I have my own reasons for desiring the success of your invention. I wish to use it—to prove its worth—to give it a place in scientific history, and you the fame you sigh for, and the wealth you so despise. What will cover your needs?"

"Are you trying to bribe me by a pen-stroke?"

"No, only through your ambition. That is vulnerable, Bronson. I hold you above all meaner motive."

"You but do me justice," said the Inventor, with a touch of bitterness. "Would to Heaven I could resist you; but you know your power."

Curtis filled out the form and pushed it across the table.

"Understand," he said, slowly, "I am not buying you either body or soul. I am earnest in my desire to add another gem to science's store, another item to my psychological experience. You are the only being who can assist me, and you must do so untrammelled by any feeling of obligation. I have your address, and will drop in upon you as your work progresses, and now," he added, touching a bell, "we will say good-night. You are tired, ride home, spare yourself physically, for your mental powers must not be overtaxed. Tomkins, show the gentleman out."

In a dazed unsteady fashion, Bronson Granby followed his guide; the vista so suddenly opened to him was vast and overwhelming. Absorbed in contemplation, he took little heed of the elegance and luxury which characterised every nook and corner of the fine old mansion; but as he passed the drawing-room, the sound of voices arrested his attention. The door was open, and in the brilliant glow of many lights, so different from the shaded seclusion of the library, the two occupants were plainly to be seen—a man and a woman, both young and handsome, and—from their low and earnest conversation, the murmur of which reached Granby as he paused half-unconsciously on the threshold—both in love. The girl was beautiful, but the Inventor's eyes only rested on her lightly for an instant, and then were riveted on the face of him who sat beside her. He grew pale as he looked, and leant against the door, as if its support were necessary. The butler roused him by a touch on his arm.

"Are you ready, sir; shall I help you with your cloak?"

"Ready? Yes. Thank you, I need no help."

With a sigh he straightened himself to his full height, drew his old cloak closely round him, grasped his treasure firmly, and the next moment found him an alien from the warmth and light, as he had ever been, buffeting with the rude elements on his way towards a tram whose bells jingled in the distance.

* * * * *

It was some days before Bronson Granby could sufficiently calm his excited fancy for the earnest work he had in view. He felt that the effort he was about to make would overtop the highest pinnacle of human conception, that it would tax all his reserve force, both mental and physical, and before he bent himself to his labour, here solved, let Fortune serve him how she would, that his crowning invention should be his last. His feeble frame, lacking the vitality of youth, would be unable to endure much longer such continual nervous pressure. Should success come to him at this late day, the remainder of his life would be passed in peaceful tranquility; if failure were again his portion, he had a presentiment that the tense cords of his being would snap asunder, and the rest he craved would be his for ever.

With these thoughts, the Inventor applied himself heart and soul to a thorough investigation of the subject with which he had to deal—the tempering of human passions by the subtle mechanism of human skill; the regulation of the blood as it surges through the veins, affecting both head and heart. The heating or cooling of the emotions, that was to be his aim, and what force so powerful as electricity to accomplish his purpose? His enthusiasm once kindled, he gave no thought to Curtis's motive in thus stimulating his ambition; he lived only in the great work, and he cared little what happened beyond his closed door so long as he was left in peace.

It was not until the Philosopher himself knocked at the forbidden portal that Granby became sufficiently alive to outside influences to answer the peremptory summons, and he stood for a moment inhospitably barring the way to his sanctum. Curtis noticed how wan he looked in the broad daylight, and how attenuated was his ordinarily spare figure; all the buoyancy of life seemed concentrated in his unusually brilliant eyes and the lines about his sensitive mouth, and, withal, a certain new dignity born of intellectual triumph, which caused him to stand forth from out the shadows of his poor surroundings.

The Philosopher felt this as he peered curiously round the bare apartment to which Granby reluctantly admitted him, but his observant glance travelled without delay to the farther end of the room, where stood the Inventor's work-table.

Instinctively both men moved towards it and faced each other, the table between them, still in unbroken silence, for the moment was a crisis not lightly to be passed over. Here, however, the Inventor was a monarch in his own realm, maintaining his supremacy by the power of his gift, while the Philosopher, forgetful of his rôle, was pale and agitated, as befitted one athirst with some passionate desire.

"Time presses," he said at length, forcing his voice to calmness. "Is your work completed?"

"Yes."

"Has it been tested?"

"Only upon myself. I have opened the heat-valve and found its effect wonderfully exhilarating after extraordinary mental energy."

"Is it thoroughly safe?"

"What do you mean by safe?" was Granby's counter-question.

"I wish to know if it will act upon the subject mentally and morally without physical detriment."

"It is hard to tell; the very laws of Nature make these forces dependent on one another to a certain extent. That, I should say, is regulated by the disposition; yours, for instance——"

"Being cold," interposed Curtis.

The Inventor shook his head.

"You are not cold. The phlegm in your nature is only a thick super-stratum. The fire beneath is all the more dangerous because smothered. I know you, Gordon Curtis, better than you know yourself."

"You think so, at all events; but that is not the question. Would a high pressure affect me inconveniently? Do not choose your words, Bronson; regard me impersonally."

"Then, candidly—no; a gentler and more pliable nature would feel more keenly the power of such delicate mechanism."

"That is the kind with which we have to deal. May I examine your instrument?"

There was a marked deference in his tone, though his grey eyes looked black, under the influence, probably, of that smothered fire to which Granby referred.

The Inventor detached an old-fashioned locket from his watch chain, and opening it, exhibited the tiny marvel of his skill coiled up within that limited compass.

"Bronson, you are a genius!" exclaimed the Philosopher, in a burst of admiration. "Come with this triumph of yours to my house and we will test it together."

So they passed out into the dusky streets, where lights were just beginning to twinkle. Curtis led the way and his companion followed unresistingly. They paused before a jeweller's shop.

"Help me to purchase a suitable casket for such a gem as yours," said the Philosopher, and Granby found himself looking over a medley of beautiful ornaments.

A locket of exquisite workmanship was at length selected.

"A present for a lady," explained Curtis, in a meaning tone to Granby as they left the place, and no further word was spoken until they were once more sitting in the shadow of the philosopher's library.

Then Granby broke forth.

"So it is a woman on whom you would practice. I tell you, Curtis, once for all, perfect candour regarding your scheme is what I demand before I subvert my highest endeavour to your pleasure."

"You shall have it," returned the other quietly. "The lady is my daughter. I am fond of her in my way—understand that. She is useful to me as an ornament to my home—as mistress of my household; but she has her mother's nature, weak, impressionable—and she loves. That is not well; both you and I have learned the folly of it. Now, from a metaphysical standpoint, I see but one way out of the evil—the cooling of her too ardent spirit by the use of your instrument, without jeopardising my personal comfort or her happiness."

"Is that all?"

"You shall see for yourself. Come."

He lifted a heavy portière, and led his visitor through an unfrequented passage towards a brilliantly-lighted conservatory, and presently they stood in a fairyland of exotics overlooking the splendid drawing-room, which Granby had seen once before. The Philosopher silently pointed beyond. An instant's glance sufficed. Bronson Granby turned fiercely on his tempter.

"Villain!"—he spoke almost in a whisper, but Curtis looked fearfully round, as if the very flowers heard.

"That man—who is he?"

"It seems that you know."

"Her son. Can you not allow the dead to rest?"

"She lives in him, he must be made to feel the sting that has embittered my life. You suffered, too, can you forget?"

"I loved her," repeated Granby dreamily.

The Philosopher suddenly cast away his restraint. "Look there, Bronson! See her hands in his so trustingly! It maddens me. See him bending towards her! Great Heaven! can you stand idle while he wins his happiness so easily?"

"He is like her—the very look and smile. He has her eyes," said Granby softly.

"Aye! so you can trace the resemblance. Come, Bronson, revive your bitter enmity to me. You would not have her son marry my daughter. You possess the remedy; use it."

Again Bronson Granby opened his locket. This time he took out the little instrument and looked at it curiously.

"It is through her that you would hurt him—through your undying hatred towards the woman who lies in her grave that you would wreak your vengeance on two innocent beings."

"But you have assured me that my daughter will escape unharmed."

"Only with the best part of her life destroyed, the chill of that wonderful capacity for loving, which is a woman's kingdom."

"But the man, Bronson, and the help you promised. Consider what rests upon this moment, your reputation, honour, fame, wealth, everything that could tempt a man. Do not fling them away for a sentiment."

"And I hold so much in my grasp?" questioned Granby. "Then if what you say be true, what will become of them—of him?"

"Do you imagine that I care? I would indeed be more than human."

"As you are less now. Look well, Gordon Curtis. I hold, as you say, subject to my will, fame, wealth, honour, and a subtle power over two souls, a voice in their destiny, and see, I shatter it all in the hand that created it."

He closed his fingers firmly as he spoke, and before Curtis could interpose by word or sign, the tiny thing lay a shapeless mass in the Inventor's outstretched palm.

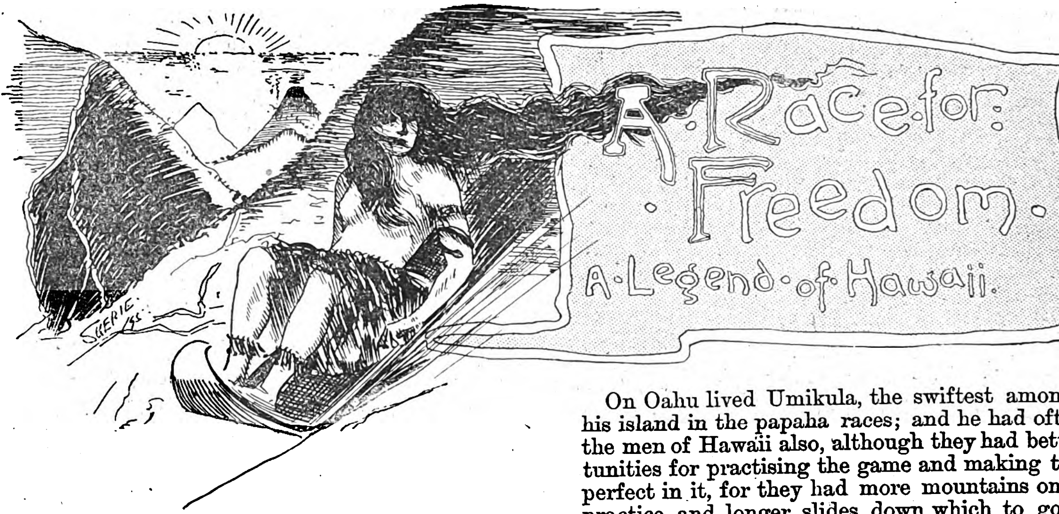
For a moment their eyes met in one deep penetrating gaze.

"Let me pass," said the Inventor, coldly, and Curtis shrank back at his command.

Out into the night air, through the lonely streets, went Bronson Granby, never pausing till his garret door was reached. Here his brief strength failed, and all through the watches of the night he sat half-dazed in his chair, his crushed treasure in his hand, his crushed hopes scattered all about him.

Thus the first rays of the wintry morning found him, pale and cold, but smiling as if at some great victory. That "to-morrow" for which he dared not wait had dawned for him in all the glory of eternal radiance.

P. H.



A Race for Freedom.

A Legend of Hawaii.

FOR many hundreds of years the goddess Pele was in the habit of spending a great part of her time among her mortal friends on one or the other of the islands. Sometimes she would be on Oahu at night, and when the inhabitants of Hawaii awoke the next morning, they would find her among them.

In what way she made her rapid transits no one knew. She had been driven from Maui by her own temper, and had made a vow never to stop upon its shores again. Kauai was never a favourable spot with her, so she had only Hawaii and Oahu left on which to disport herself with mortals. The whole under-world was hers, but somehow it did not seem to satisfy her. She would spend a great deal of time with her mortal friends, and but a short time below.

She was particularly fond of the game called papaha, which was simply sliding down hill as children in cold countries do in winter. I said as they do, but it was not actually the same thing, for the Hawaiians had no snow, and used a different sled. The papaha was simply a piece of board, but of some particular kind of wood which is not now to be found. A board was taken, some six feet long and from ten to fourteen inches wide. This was thinned down at the extremities until it was possible to bend it up, something the shape of the modern toboggan. It was rubbed and oiled until it was as smooth as glass.

The person intending to ride upon this board held it upright in his arm beside him until the word was given to start; then he threw himself and his papaha forward, and slid as swiftly as circumstances would permit to the spot decided on as the end of the race.

They used to find a place where the steep hillside was covered with the slippery lava, and then, throwing themselves upon their papahas, they would slide, as rapid as light, from the top of the steep to the shore below. It was esteemed a great feat to be able to slide from the top of Kilauea to the seaside (and so I should think it, for it is some twenty miles), and it was one of Pele's greatest pleasures to join in such a race, and to win it over all her mortal competitors.

On Oahu lived Umikula, the swiftest among men of his island in the papaha races; and he had often beaten the men of Hawaii also, although they had better opportunities for practising the game and making themselves perfect in it, for they had more mountains on which to practice, and longer slides down which to go with the speed of the wind. But even with all these advantages, the men of Hawaii had a struggle to keep in front when Umikula of Oahu came to add another laurel, or rather maile leaf, to the crown of victor which he wore so proudly.

One day he started for Hawaii, accompanied by his beautiful young wife, Lahula, and followed by several canoes, in which were crowded numbers of his young friends of both sexes. In olden days it was not necessary for the Hawaiian to labour for his bread. Kind Mother Nature provided for him a bountiful supply of the taro on shore, and the sea gave of her fish in unstinted measure, so that he was well supplied with poi and fish, the two great articles of food for the Hawaiian even to this day.

Because of this abundance of food ready to his hand, he had many hours to spend in pastime, and often great companies would leave one island, and spend weeks and even months visiting among the others of the group.

It was on such an expedition that Umikula was starting on the pleasant morning mentioned above. He had just finished a new papaha, on which he hoped to be able to win any race in which he might enter, and for this reason he was going to Hawaii. His wife and the young men and maidens of his immediate family were as sure of his success as himself, and all were going with him to see him defeat the swift men of Hawaii.

One pleasant morning they landed on Hawaii.

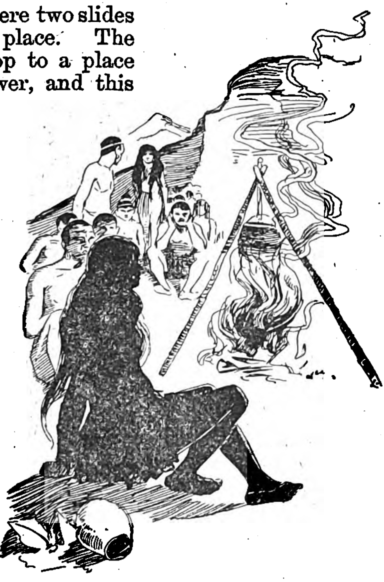
One pleasant morning they landed on Hawaii, near the foot of the slope down which the papaha racers were wont to sweep on their swift sleds. It was some twenty miles from the shore to the top of the mountain. This mountain was Kilauea, in whose crater was the favourite home of the great Pele.

The merry party landed, and after resting and eating of the food which they had brought with them, they started up the mountain. There was a great crowd of young people there already, and soon many more were seen on the road leading from the different villages to the top of the mountain.

On this mountain were two slides where the races took place. The easier was from the top to a place some seven miles lower, and this was where it was supposed the races would be to-day. The other track was from a point some two miles below the end of the first track, and ended at the beach. The ground between the lower end of the upper track, and the upper end of the lower track was rough and broken. No one had ever tried to pass over it on the slender papaha. Rocks and broken lava strewed the ground, leaving hardly a foot to pass through.



All gathered round a great fire.

On reaching the summit, Umikula found that the best men of Hawaii were to be pitted against him; but little he cared for that. He felt confident of victory.

All arrangements were made for the races, which were to begin the next day, and were to continue so long as anyone came forward to challenge the winner. This was fair and satisfactory to all parties, and soon all gathered round a great fire to eat and drink, sing and dance, laugh and talk the hours away till morning should come again.

Morning broke, and the merry crowd hastened to prepare all things for the race, which was to take place immediately after sunrise. The finest of the Hawaiian racers was to try against the visitor.

He came forward, a tall, clean-limbed youth, straight as a dart, with a form like burnished bronze, through which every muscle showed like cord beneath the skin. He had never been pitted against Umikula before, but he was champion of his own island, and felt confident of winning the race. He stood poised on one foot, with his polished sled resting lightly against his side. He looked like a young god, and if he won this race his people would almost worship him as one.

Umikula stood forward, and all eyes were turned upon him, friends with pride, opponents with curiosity. As tall as his opponent, he was slightly heavier. He was older, but only by a few years, and his form did not show the slender suppleness which marked that of Kawili; his face was bright and his smile sweet, but his friends knew what the little furrow between his eyes meant. He saw the strength against which he must strive, and was girding himself for the conflict.

Now the word is given, and as with one motion, both sinewy forms are hurled downward, carrying the slight sled forward for many feet with the impetus of that first thrust. Downward they rushed like lightning, the crowd behind them holding their breath in anxious watching for the end. Down, and still down they rushed, swift as the wind, first one and then the other gaining a slight advantage as they swerved from side to side on the slippery track.

Now the path runs for rods beside the steep mountain side, which towers above them grim and grey in its silent majesty; now they skirt along the edge of a precipice which falls sheer and deadly beside them. One false movement and one of them would be cast from the track to be hurled a thousand feet to the bottom of the cliff, where the women would gather round his mangled body with wails of sorrow, telling of the deeds that he had done while living, and of the death that had so suddenly ended all for him.

But both were skilful, and the dangerous place was left behind. The race is half done now; this rock is the half-way mark, and he who passes it first seems likely to win the race. Both strained every nerve to gain here, but in vain. When they passed by, the youths who had run up to the rock earlier in the morning to see the racers pass could scarcely tell which was ahead, for both were equal in the race. Not an inch divided them. The race was still to be won, and the excitement grew higher and higher as the sentinels signalled to those at the top that there was no distance between the two men.

Half-way from the rock to the end, and still the racers were equal, but now it was evident that Kawili was feeling the strain. He had been used to win before he reached the half-way stone, and now the nervous strain was becoming too much for him. He panted, and the veins on his forehead stood out like ropes, while his eyes were strained and bloodshot. From his lips a slight froth flew, and he began to fall behind. Only a little, but still it was behind. Another effort and he gained the lost ground, but that effort was his last. His head fell lower, his sled slowly turned from the path, and the game was lost. Umikula won it, but by scarcely a sled's length. Kawili had given him the hardest race he had ever had.

The friends of Kawili gathered round him, and he was soon restored to himself. He was a generous foeman, and cherished no revengeful feelings towards the man who defeated him.

This ended the racing for the day. It is too hard work for a man to try more than one race the same day, so it is usual to have the race over early in the morning, before it begins to be very hot, and then all hands rest in the middle of the day.

The next morning Umikula rose, and after his bath in the clear water of a spring, which was fed by an underground stream, he went up to the top of the mountain, to the place where the racers started if they intended racing on the upper track.

A great crowd of people were already assembled there, and to them Umikula proclaimed his victory of the previous day, and challenged any competitor who wished to try issues with him, to come forward; if none appeared, he claimed the honour of champion of the islands.

The Hawaiians stood about in silence. They were not too well pleased at the thought that a man from Oahu was able to come and beat them at their own game, and on their own ground. There was no help for it, however, for no one felt like trying to conquer the man who had defeated Kawili.

Umikula was on the point of claiming his title of champion, when suddenly a girl stood among them. From where she came, or how she got to the place where she stood, none could tell. There she was, and she raised her hand for silence, while in a clear voice she called:

"I have heard thy words, O Umikula, and while I wish not to be called champion of Hawaii Nei, still I can defeat thee in a fair race. Give me my choice of papahas, and on the morrow will I show thee how to ride the fleet sled to victory."

As Umikula looked in surprise at her, it suddenly occurred to him that it was Pele. She was disguised, and none else could recognise her, but he knew that no other could speak as she did.

For many days he had not seen her. She had followed him for months, and pressed him to return her love, which she lavished upon him, but in vain. He was but newly wedded to Lahula, the fairest girl on his native Oahu, and he cared nothing for any other; and he knew also how capricious was Pele in her love. She would choose one among the men of his race, and for a time, sometimes long, oftener short, would lavish upon him caresses and gifts, but soon, weary of one lover, she would turn from him and seek another. Well for the discarded one it was if she did not destroy him on parting.

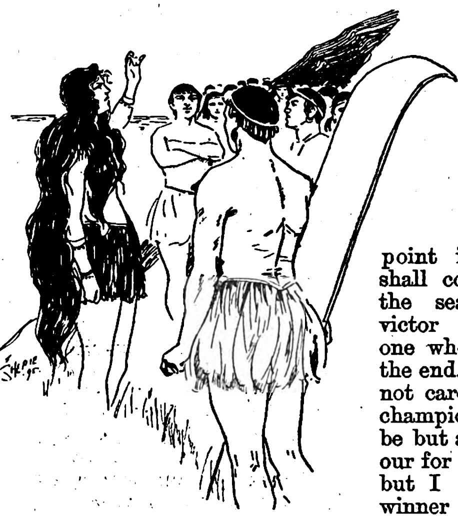
Umikula had been followed by her for months, but at last she seemed tired of beating against the rock of his determination, and had left him in peace. But now she was here again, and no one else seemed to have recognised her. Love may have keen eyes for the loved one, but hate has keener, and will recognise the hated one through a disguise that would mislead even a mother. He knew that Pele must hope that in defeating him she would serve her own purpose, but just what that purpose was he could not imagine.

But he must accept the challenge she made or else allow it to be said that he, the best papaha racer in the kingdom, was afraid to race with a woman. This would be worse than death to his proud spirit, so he quietly accepted the challenge.

Another day of feasting and rejoicing, and then came the morning of the day in which he greatly feared he was to fight against more than mortal power. If he strove against the power of the gods, what chance was there for him to win?

All day he remained apart with Lahula. He at first wished to keep the cause of his trouble from his loving wife, but she won it from him at last. He confessed that he feared that Pele had some secret reason for asking him to make this trial of skill with her, and that he would suffer more than defeat at her hands if he could not find some way in which to bring craft to bear against craft.

When morning came Umikula stood again upon the hilltop, and Pele came forward and stood among the crowd. She asked for silence while the terms of the race were settled upon, and the curious crowd stood waiting for her to speak. Tall and slim as a young tree she stood. Her jetty locks were flung behind her head and reached far below her knees, almost trailing upon the ground. Her dusky cheek was flushed, and her eyes were bright with the thought of the scheme which she was ready to propound.



"Listen, O Hawaiians."

"Listen, O Hawaiians. I wish to give the terms on which I will race with this man from Oahu. The race shall be either to the end of the upper course, or, if either of us wishes, when that point is reached, it shall continue on to the seaboard. The victor shall be the one who first reaches the end. I, if I win, do not care to be called champion. It would be but a barren honour for me, a woman; but I ask that the winner shall have power over the loser, and may demand what he or she will. The loser is to obey any order given by the winner. Wilt thou grant this, O mighty Umikula, who dost wish to be called champion of all these fair islands? Or does thy heart fail thee? Perhaps thou wouldst rather take thy swift canoe and seek thy home on distant Oahu? If so, go, and no more come here to boast of thy prowess, when I, a woman, can cause thee to draw back in fear of defeat."

The taunting words were heard in silence by the assembly. All wondered at the tone of the strange woman. Only Umikula and his friends knew who the speaker was.

They knew that she had taken this taunting tone in order to force Umikula, whom she saw had recognised her, to race with her, and they knew that she had some scheme by which she felt sure of winning the race.

It was soon seen that this scheme must be in making the race from the top of the mountain to the bottom. This would make at least twenty miles, and a part of the distance it was impossible for them to pass on the papaha. This was the way in which Pele evidently hoped to win. She would end the race at the foot of the first track if she was leading at that point; if not, she would insist upon the lower course being added, and hoped that the difficult passage over the two miles between the two courses would so exhaust Umikula that he would be unable to do his best on the lower course.

But this very scheme Lahula had foreseen, and was even now busy providing against it. She had left her husband at the first faint light of dawn, and with her whole crowd of maidens and youths had gone down the mountain side. No one wondered at this, for it was often done. Friends, wishing to see the end of the race, would go below to meet the victor, instead of stopping above to see him start.

Umikula stood in thought a few moments after Pele had ceased speaking; then he stood forth and said:

"I accept thy terms, O goddess, for well I know thee, although thy state and pomp are left behind. I will nevertheless race with thee, and the winner shall have leave to lay his commands upon the loser, and shall be obeyed. I call upon all here to bear witness to this, and to the agreement that each shall run the race as seemeth best at the time."

"We bear witness, we bear witness," called the crowd, who stood astonished at the words of Umikula. None had suspected the goddess in the stately maiden who had come among them, but now they saw her, and felt that Umikula was lost.

He alone seemed to see a chance. He stood tall and stately among them, no sign of trouble upon his brow, a smile just parting his lips. He stood looking intently down the mountain side, and, as the last words were spoken, his keen eyes caught sight of a little column of smoke that rose slowly from the thick forest beside the racecourse. This little sign told him that his faithful wife had succeeded in her task, and was now awaiting his coming.

Straightening up his tall form he asked: "Is the great Pele ready for the race?"

It did not suit Pele that he should be so ready to concede her demands. She feared that he might be better prepared for the task than she had believed, and might have some plan by which he hoped to get the best of her in the coming race.

There was no help for it, however; as she had been the one to give the challenge to this special race, she could not ask to have any changes made at this late hour. She must go through with it as best she could.

"I am ready, O Umikula; and I will now tell thee the command that I shall lay upon thee when at the end of the race, if I am held as victor. I command thee to put aside the woman whom thou hast taken as wife, and that thou shalt come with me where I shall bid thee. This is the command that I shall lay upon thee at the end of the race."

"Haste not, great goddess, to claim an unrun race. I may be the victor. If so, what wilt thou have to say as to the charge that I shall lay upon thee?"

"Boast not, Umikula. Never yet has Pele been defeated by mortal. Think not that thou will be able to do the deed none other has been able to do. The game is mine now, as surely as it will be an hour hence. Send then thy fleet-footed brother to tell the brown girl, for whom thou hast spurned me and my love, that she may be far away before I slay her, as I shall if she dare look twice at thee when thou art mine, won by my skill and power in the race!"

Umikula clenched his hands and bit his lip at these words, but he knew that Pele was striving to make him lose courage and strength by taunting him thus, and he would not allow her to see how much her words affected him.

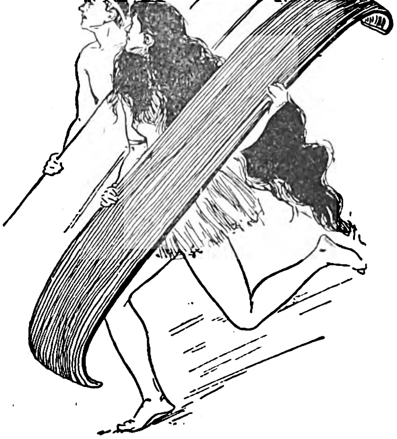
The sun was just rising, and the first beams were shining behind them. In another hour the race would be over, and he would be either free for ever from the power of the angry goddess, or else he would be her helpless slave, and, worse yet, his loved Lahula would be at her mercy. This thought gave him added strength, and he made the last few arrangements and stood ready, waiting for the words of the starter.

Pele also stood waiting, and, as the word was given, both sprang forward as if moved by one spring. Prone upon the slender boards they threw themselves, and the race was begun.

Side by side they flew down the steep mountain. Neither gained an inch for the first half of the distance. When the half-way stone was reached, both boards were still even. To one standing beside the path, it was as if the two forms were upon one papaha. Not a line's breadth to the advantage of either could be discerned.

Still on and on; now they were nearly at the end of the upper course, and still the race was undecided. Now they reached the end, and still it was an even race. Neither showed any sign of stopping. The momentum of the papaha had given them power to run a little way over the rough middle ground, but soon this momentum was gone, and slower and slower the sleds ran. Umikula did not mean to lose any time waiting for the sled to stop, and he sprang up and seized his slender board in his arms and sped forward over the rough lava-strewn ground towards the lower slide.

Pele was a moment behind him, but she was lighter and swifter upon her feet and soon overtook him. Side by side they ran, and each flung the sled to the ground at the lower slidein the same instant.



Soon overtook him.

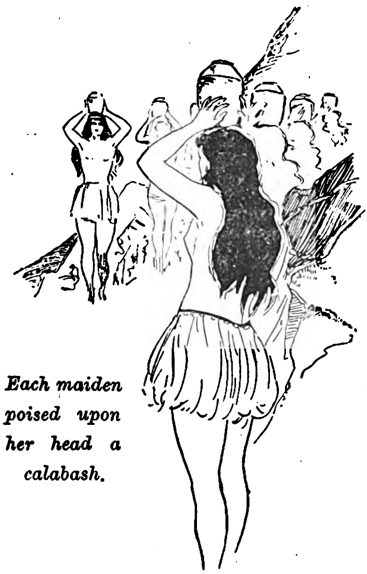
Now it was life or death, for if Pele won Umikula had determined to end his life rather than to leave his wife to the mercy of the fickle Pele.

Still the race was an even one. Neither had the slightest advantage. The only hope for Umikula was that Lahula had succeeded in her attempt to defeat by guile the one whose power made it impossible to win by other means. A third of the distance was passed, and still the two were moving side by side, with no perceptible difference. But now one or the other must forge ahead. They would soon reach a place where it was impossible for them to pass side by side.

The path divided at an immense rock before them. One side of the rock was a narrow path, which seemed to skirt the edge of the precipice, where a movement to one side would be certain death. This path had been called impassable for the racers. The main path was also too narrow for two sleds to glide along side by side. One of the two must fall behind and follow the other. This main path was much longer than the direct path that passed between the rock and precipice. Could one take this inner path, he would gain many rods, but it was never thought of. No one could hope to pass over its length, for there are sharp turns in its course where the slightest swerve meant certain death upon the rocks, thousands of feet below.

As they reached this point, Pele gathered all her force and swept ahead of Umikula. She shouted with joy as she passed, for seemingly this decided the contest. They had been evenly matched all the way from the top of the mountain, and the one who lost the advantage here seemed to have lost the race.

She flew over the track, but Umikula had no idea of falling behind. He turned into the narrow path behind the rock. Death was preferable to defeat at the hands of the ruthless Pele, and this was his only hope. If he could pass safely through this narrow strip, he would gain the lower end of the course some feet before Pele could reach it, and in so reaching it was his only hope.



Each maiden poised upon her head a calabash.

The plan Lahula had resolved upon to aid him required that he pass a given point a little distance ahead of Pele. If he could do this then the race was his.

And he did it. He flew straight as an arrow through the narrow pass and gained the straight course a little ahead of his competitor. Pele had supposed that he was following her hidden by the turns in the path, and was thunderstruck when she saw him dart out of what seemed from her point of view the solid cliff far ahead of her.

The race was nearly ended now, but Pele called to her aid for the first time her supernatural powers, and was gaining upon Umikula.

From the place where the two paths joined, the way was straight to the coast. Half-way from that point was a stretch of ground where it was impossible to turn from the path, as the ground was covered with blocks of lava and by broken rocks for many rods. Beside this place stood Lahula and her companions. There were two lines of them, standing one each side of the path. Each maiden poised upon her head a calabash. The long lines stood motionless as the racers swept down towards them. One more effort, O Umikula, thy faithful wife will aid thee, and the race is thine.

The effort was made. He glided over the path scarcely half-a-dozen lengths before his enemy, but that was distance enough. As he passes he hears the voice of his Lahula: "Courage, courage! The race is thine. I am here and will give it to thee. Pele shall lose the race, and losing it, shall lose all power over thee."

As the words rang out, Lahula raised her hand. As if the motion had given life to the statue-like figures, the two lines on each side bowed forward with raised arms, and each threw from her the contents of the calabash which she had carried upon her head.

They threw the contents upon the track before the swift-coming Pele, and, as she reached the place, her sled ran slower and slower. She strove to drive it forward, but though the track was steep and the rock glassy, she was unable to make any progress. Slower and slower it moved, until at last she stopped, foiled and beaten by a loving woman. The track was covered inches deep for rods in length by sand, which the friends of Umikula, led by his wife, had cast before the goddess to stop her in her career.

She rose from the slim board, and as she rose she saw Umikula spring from his sled at the foot of the hill, and clasp his wife in his arms. But for her the end would have been different. But for her woman's wit, Pele would have conquered, and Umikula would have been a slave.

Pele was defeated. She must bow to the will of a mortal, and, worse yet, must see that mortal stand beside the one whose trick had beaten her, and know that he loved her more even than Pele had hoped to make him love her. Sullenly and slowly she went back up the mountain. At the top she stood aside, waiting for the coming of the victor. Whatever he bade her she must do. And it was her own plan. She herself had made this proposition, and she must abide by it.

Umikula followed her up the mountain, accompanied by her friends, but Lahula would not seek the top. She feared some treachery at the last, and waited below.

When Umikula reached the plain at the top of the mountain, he found the crowd awaiting him. The oldest man of them came forward and greeted him as champion not only of Hawaii, but of all the islands.

Pele stood by with clouded face, waiting to see what task the victor would lay upon her.

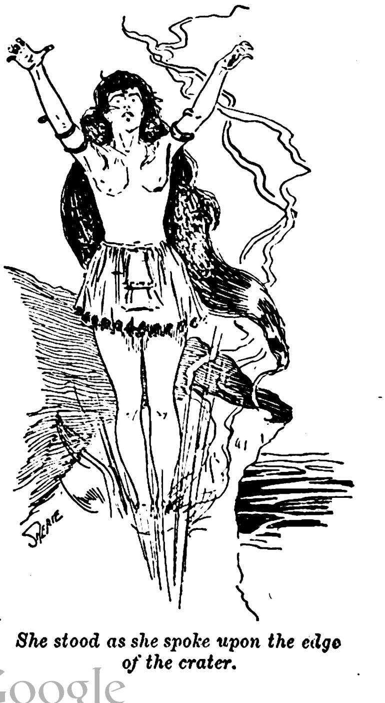
"Pele, it was thy own plan that the vanquished should yield obedience to the victor. As thou hast said, so it shall be. I have won the race from thee, and thou must do whatever I bid thee. Is not this the agreement?"

"It is. I will obey, but beware of my vengeance! I am defeated, but not by thee. I should have won the race had not thy wife tricked me."

"And was not it a trick for thee to strive with thy power against one with only mortal strength? Was the race fair when thou hast all thy power as goddess to bring against me, a mere mortal? But enough of this. I have won the race, and thou art to obey whatever I command. Is it not so?"

"Speak, and I will obey as I agreed."

"Then, Pele, I bid thee to seek thine own home below the fire depths, and command thee never again to seek this upper world. For countless years thou hast made the lives of men in these islands a misery hard to be borne, but now I command thee to seek thy own kind, and to keep thyself to thy kind. Never more mayest thou come among us to make trouble for our wives and to take the love of men for a pastime and then cast the broken lives aside when tired of them. Never more shalt thou darken the day by thy presence. I bid thee go and never return. The under-world is thine. Do as thou wilt with it, but seek no more this fair upper world. This is the command which I lay upon thee, and thou must, by thy own agreement, obey it."



She stood as she spoke upon the edge of the crater.

Pele stood silent. She was caught in her own trap. She herself had said that the vanquished should obey the victor, and she must obey the command that Umikula had given her.

For the last time she looked abroad over the fair islands, which she had loved well. For the last time she stood fair and tall in the light of the sun. Never more could she join in the games and sports of the Hawaiian race. She had loved them much, even while she had been a tyrant over them. But now it was over. She must seek the dark depths of her mountain, and must live in its dismal caverns. No more sunlight, no more happy days in the summer air.

But, though conquered, she was still a goddess, and she would yield as a goddess should. She stood for the last time in the light of the fair day. She looked for the last time, and then raising her head haughtily, she spoke:

"I am conquered and must yield, O Umikula, but beware of the vengeance which I may yet take upon thee and thy crafty wife. I go to return no more. But if I return not, I may send thee a message that will crush thy proud spirit and bow thy haughty head in the dust. Thou hast used thy power relentlessly, but beware of my vengeance."

She stood as she spoke upon the edge of the crater, and as she ended she turned for one farewell look at the sweet world, then plunged into the depths of fire that raged far below.

As she vanished from sight the ground beneath their feet shook with an earthquake shock, and the smoke and steam that rose from the crater almost smothered them.

"Fly, fly, for Pele has called her fiery brothers to avenge her, and we shall be destroyed." This was the cry that rose from the thousand throats, and with one accord the throng fled from the mountain top, seeking safety in the valleys below.

Umikula sprang upon his papaha and flew down the mountain side towards the distant coast, where his wife and many of his friends awaited him. As he fled he looked back at the top of the mountain and was stricken with awe at the sight of the fire and smoke that arose from its depths. Pele was indeed avenging herself, and it seemed as if all on the mountain would be destroyed.

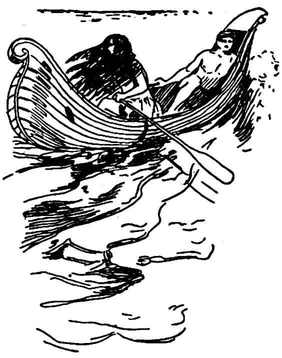
Pele had indeed tried to pour vengeance out upon her conqueror, but she again failed, because the love of Lahula had been working to save Umikula. Lahula had feared that in some way Pele would destroy Umikula when she found he had her in his power, and this was the reason she had declined going to the top of the mountain after the race. She had, instead, gone to the beach and had busied herself in getting all things ready to leave Hawaii at a moment's notice.

When all was ready she rested, and, sitting on the edge of the canoe, looked up towards the mountain top to see if there was any sign of her lord's coming. To her horror, she beheld, instead of the peaceful scene of the morning, one of dread and horror. From the top of the mountain, fire and lava were streaming high into the air. Smoke and steam had almost hidden the face of the earth. A stream of fire was swiftly flowing down the track over which the fateful race had taken place.

But where was Umikula? At the thought of the peril to which he must be exposed, Lahula felt her heart fail her, and she sank almost senseless to the ground. Her companions filled the air with their wails and cries of grief. But suddenly one of them changed from cries of sorrow to shouts of joy. Far up the side of the hill a form appeared swiftly gliding towards them. It was Umikula. He had kept ahead of the fiery torrent, and was still safe.

But would he escape? Would he be able to reach the shore before he was overtaken by the stream of liquid fire? And if he did, would he then be safe? Could they get away from the shore before they were destroyed by the avenging flood? Was it possible?

Had Umikula been alone; had he been left to his own resources, he would have been lost; but he had a faithful wife, who was even then working for his salvation. Down the side of the mountain he flew, with the hot breath of the lava surrounding him; but he was not overtaken. He reached the shore just before the first wave of the glowing lava caught his feet. His wife had been ready for hours, and as she saw that his safety depended upon her, she ordered her companions into the canoes, and when Umikula reached the shore all but one of the canoes were out of the reach of the flood of fire. In that Lahula awaited him, and as he sprang into the frail craft she dipped her paddles deep into the water, and sent the canoe flying out to sea, far beyond the reach of the stream of lava.



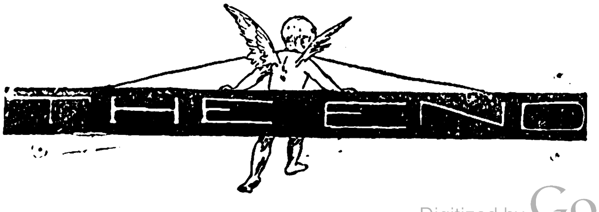
Sent the canoe flying out to sea.

Again had Umikula defeated Pele, and again the defeat was by his wife's love and forethought.

Pele destroyed the villages and buried the valleys under streams of fire and lava that she hurled upon the island in her wrath. Many of the natives who had witnessed her defeat looked their last upon the world on that summer day. She covered the track upon which she had been defeated deep under a stream of ashes and lava, but she did not succeed in destroying the man who had roused her wrath. He escaped in safety, and his children and grandchildren often told the tale I have told you, of Pele's last day in the upper world, and of the love and faithfulness of a woman who had been the cause of her defeat.

I have told you the story as it was told to me under the soft light of the Southern Cross. If you do not believe it, you can see the track down which the racers flew on that sunny morning many, many years ago.

J. P. L.



An Episode of the Strike.

THE soft glow of a tall lamp, crowned with a fearful and wonderful shade of red silk, rested caressingly on the pondering face of Miriam Walcott. She was remarkably pretty at any time, and with the shadows of Colonel Walcott's library as a background, and Jack Pennington as a critic, she was simply faultless.

Jack had been very seriously in love with her as long as he could remember, which must have been fifteen years at least, judging from the fact that when she first dawned upon his boyish horizon she was arrayed in a pink sunbonnet, and had the remains of a dozen mudpies impartially distributed over her face and hands.

Those fifteen years, while serving principally to intensify Jack's adoration, had also brought about an appreciable change in his relations to its object. The faithful swain was now living in a little heaven on earth, miraculously created by a tearful "yes," lately wooed from the girl before him. The chief features of this celestial existence were long tête-à-têtes, like the one at present in progress—tête-à-têtes in which the most trifling topics became possessed of enormous importance, and almost every occurrence of the day was reviewed in circumstantial detail.

"Bill Flanagan came to see me to-day," remarked Jack, with his elbows on his knees, and his fingers linked under his chin. "He's out of work again, and as blue as possible in consequence. He's the son of our cook, you know."

"I don't know," answered his fiancée reprovingly, "because I never heard you mention his name before. Why should he come here and bother you about work?"

"Simply because when he first came up to the north of England with two shillings, a lame ankle, and a face as blue as you make them, I took an interest in him, and got him a job in the town; later I found him a place in a neighbouring coal mine. But he's a genius at ill luck. He had scarcely learned his work when the whole crowd were ordered out on strike; and now behold my protégé drawing the imposing sum of five shillings a week from a labour union, and boiling with indignation against my old friend, the master of the mine."

"I think strikes are the most absurd, ungrateful things imaginable," observed Miriam, with a frown.

"Not always," answered Jack, giving the fire an encouraging poke, which sent a sharp burst of little sparks up the chimney. "Sometimes the men are in the right, and I believe they are in this case; but perhaps their methods are wrong."

At this point the conversation was interrupted by the approaching sound of a firm footfall, and the next moment the tall form of Colonel Walcott filled the doorway.

The colonel was a big, hearty, good-natured old soldier, fond of his pipe and his magazines, and with a decided leaning towards good wine, clever books, and his pretty daughter.

As he entered, Pennington rose slowly, and put out one trim, white hand in greeting.

"Good evening, colonel," he said. "I trust you will excuse the informality of my dropping in to dinner?"

For a moment the colonel made no reply. He simply straightened himself a little, and compressed his lips. Then he said seriously:

"Mr. Pennington, I have something for you to do."

"Certainly, sir, anything in my power," answered the other, surveying his face curiously.

"I may say," continued the older man, "that I am addressing you as your superior officer, not merely as your friend."

With a dim premonition of what was coming, Pennington raised his hand in salute.

"You will report at once at your barracks. All leave of absence has been cancelled. Use your best endeavours to aid in the immediate summoning of your company."

Six hours produced a wonderful change in the ——th. Here and there men were busily rolling blankets, filling haversacks, or carrying boxes of cartridges towards the drill hall.

Five o'clock brought another change. The companies were forming in the open courtyard of the barracks, and in accordance with the order, "Thirty rounds of ball cartridge," on every side men were bending over cases of ammunition, and busy hands were slipping the smooth polished cylinders into place in the leather cartridge boxes. Then followed the flash of swords, sharp words of command, and the ringing of steel-shod rifle butts as the ranks came to "order arms."

Pennington, standing straight as a ramrod, felt his heart swell under his trim uniform. It was a strange situation. Less than twelve hours before he had been sitting in a quiet library, with a fire crackling before him, the little brass tea-kettle singing merrily, and the girl he loved more than all the world at his side.

Complacent and contented in his luxurious surroundings, the rioters, and the possibility of active service for his regiment, had seemed as distant and indefinite as a mirage. Now, shoulder to shoulder with a thousand men, his haversack and canteen at his side, his blanket strapped across his shoulder, and his cartridge-box, heavy with the possibility of a score of deaths, at his belt, the mirage had become a reality, and the man who had learned to believe his hours made for love was facing a duty sterner than any he had ever known.

Meanwhile, the rioters had succeeded in inspiring a very wholesome fear in the minds of their avowed enemies, the companies' officials, the police, and the non-union workmen. Violence hung like a cloud about the pit-mouth, and anxious faces watched from places of security for the attack that was momentarily expected.

Towards the close of the day Jack Pennington found himself, with his own and two other companies of the ——th, guarding one of the miners' tool-sheds. As night fell, and he took his post for sentry duty, the picture was really suggestive of actual war. A light mist crept in from the sea, and shrouded the shabby neighbourhood with a soft white veil, through which the form of the next sentry loomed dimly, and the bivouac fire showed strangely bright with its surrounding group of half illuminated figures.

Pennington, at first alert for approaching footsteps soon found his thoughts drifting back to Colonel Walcott's library. He could feel Miriam's arms around his neck, and hear her whispered "Good-bye, dear; God bless you." Then with a guilty start he remembered his duty. At the same moment he saw a man standing a few paces away. Before he could challenge there came a great crash, the earth reeled madly upwards, and dimly conscious that several of his comrades were running towards him, Pennington pitched heavily sideways, and fell full length upon the ground, his rifle clattering noisily among the stones.

It was a great opportunity for the reporters, and they fell upon it greedily. So it was that the newspapers announced to the startled town that Jack Pennington had been struck with a heavy stone, that his forehead had been torn open, and that he was lying at the point of death, at the very moment when the young gentleman in question, with a strip of court-plaster round the bridge of his nose, was protesting to the sergeant his ability to do sentry duty again. Like most men, the sergeant was easily persuaded when his own inclination seconded his judgment, and less than twenty-four hours after the casualty Jack found himself once more detailed on the first relief of the guard, and stationed at his former post in front of the tool-shed.

"You heard the orders? You will know how to treat anyone disregarding your challenge?" said the officer of the guard; and Jack's expression was not particularly benign as he replied: "I think so—yes."

The hours passed slowly, and Jack was patrolling his post for the third time, when he saw some one approaching him. His sharp "Halt!" brought the man to a temporary standstill, but almost immediately he advanced again. Then came the click of Pennington's rifle as he slipped a cartridge into the chamber. "Halt!" he called again, peremptorily.

For an instant the man stopped. Jack saw him raise his hand and step swiftly forward with an indistinct mutter. Like a flash the sentry's rifle snapped to his shoulder, and then officers were running quickly to the spot, for the first shot had been fired, and a man was lying face downward on the pavement.

"I obeyed orders," said Pennington nervously, as the tall figure of the captain came forward.

"I know you did, sir," was the reply. "You were perfectly right."

"Still living," said a sergeant, stooping over the wounded man. "Here, lend a hand, some of you fellows, and we'll let the surgeon have a look at him."

To Jack left alone, the minutes seemed hours. It is not a pleasant sensation at any time to know that one has the blood of a fellow creature on one's hands. Finally, he was approached by the corporal of the guard, bringing a private from the second relief to take his place, with the message that the wounded man had recovered consciousness, and that he was wanted at once in the hospital.

Mentally marvelling at the summons, Jack went directly to the hospital, and stopped a moment at the door to view the scene within. The man lay on a seat, his shirt torn open, and a surgeon carefully examining a wound in his side. The electric light intensified the pallor of the sufferer's face.

As Jack entered, he raised his head slightly, with a murmured "Misther Pennin'ton."

At the sound of his name the young man stepped quickly into the room.

"Bill Flanagan!" he cried. "Can it be you? Oh, I am so sorry!"

"Don't grieve, surr," answered Bill faintly. "It was me orn fault, shure it was. I read in the paper that ye was dyin', and I kem to giv' meself up. Misther Pennin'ton, surr, it's a lot ye've done for me, and it's a lot I'm afther owin' ye. I'm going fast, but I want yer forgiveness 'fore I'm gone. I t'rew that stone, surr, not knowin' 'twas yerself I hit. 'Twas the papers gev' me to know I'd kilt ye intoirely. I meant no harm to-noight, as thrue as I'm here; but when I heard yer voice I t'ought it was afther bein' a wraith I saw, and I lost me head. Can ye forgive me, surr?"

Jack's voice had a suspicious break in it as he bent over the dying man.

"Bill, my poor fellow," he cried. "God help me, I've killed you!"

The electric lamps dimmed for a moment and then went out. The strikers had cut the wires, and with the failing of the lights Bill Flanagan's soul passed to its eternal rest.

Richard Sibert.

A CHILD OF THE MADONNA.

Mrs. Onofrio stopped stirring the broth, placed the pan in which it simmered on the hob, and hurried into the next room. Remigio had sent up a piping note which, like a good Calabrian mother, Signora Onofrio at once translated as meaning that the young gentleman wanted the zizze. Remigio was just forty days old, but it was not this Lenten term that made him wail for milk. It was simply that he was hungry, and his jaws were not equipped for solids.

It may have been a pathetic picture, after a fashion, that of Mrs. Onofrio suckling her tiny son, but it was more comical than beautiful. Remigio had a look of condensed age about him, as if he had been blown in by the centuries. Nobody in the wide, wide world but his mother could have gone so far wrong as to think his plastic face anything but a pain to look upon.

He was swathed like an Indian mummy, or an Indian papoose. White clothes and towels were wrapped closely round his small anatomy and were tightly tied. Only his large downy head and his crimson arms were free. Otherwise Remigio was a rigid system. His small nose was flat against his face, his round eyes looked like glass marbles stuck in a piece of dough, and his mouth was so unnecessarily large that it really seemed clever of the little chap not to let anything escape from it at meal times.

When one looked at Mrs. Onofrio it was evident that Remigio had every right to be a homely baby. Her coarse, black hair was brushed straight back, and made her face, with the high cheek bones and sallow skin, look more pinched and hard. There was a gaunt aspect to her eyes. Her lips, too, were thin and colourless.

Yet when Mrs. Onofrio smiled there was something as sweet and poetic in it as a bluebird in flight. After all the soul is the best beautifier. Perhaps the loss of her first child may have had to do with the good woman's expression. He, too, had been Remigio, and when his mother called her second son by the same name, as if he were an encore of his too fleeting predecessor, she may possibly have felt that she was giving the new baby two Saint Remigios to look after him, and that one of them was his little, unknown brother.

But the lot of the Onofrios after they were transplanted to London was not a painful one. In fact, they had what must be considered a prosperous career for inhabitants of the Italian quarter. They lived on the top floor of a house in a street off Hatton Garden. It was owned by a syndicate of Hebrews. Callers on the Onofrios had to toil up six flights of grimy stone steps, each flight with as many joints in it as a yard rule. The staircase was narrow and dirty and dark. On each landing sticky children swarmed like flies round the bunghole of a barrel of treacle. Opposite Mrs. Onofrio lived a tawny-headed Jewish lady, whose personal contribution to the world's population was eight small Israelites. It made Mrs. Onofrio feel very insignificant with her one atomic, beswaddled Remigio.

After one had forged upward through the several strata of tenement house life, advent into the Onofrios' apartimento was rather cheering by contrast. For it had a homely, neat, cosy air. There were three rooms. The door from the passage opened at once into the eighteen by twelve kitchen. In the middle of the opposite wall stood the fireplace. At the right of the door the whole space was taken up by a sink, with a permanent washtub, and a wooden table, at which Mrs. Onofrio kneaded the dough for her bread.

At the right, through the door, was visible the bedroom of Signor Onofrio and the good lady, his wife. It was a cheerful, airy room, with a large iron bedstead, painted white. The patchwork quilt was in those gay colours which Italy loves, but fails to use quite as temperately as Nature, and the pillows were large and square, or rather pillow, for there was only one—excellent comment on the conjugal sympathy in which husband and wife dwelt.

On the other side of the kitchen was a much smaller, much darker room. It had hardly anything in it but a bed. A few simple dresses hung upon the wall, and a very modest trunk stood on the floor. Even on a sunny day the light strained into this room but meagrely. Yet here was where Rosella slept, and Rosella was a flower, the sweetest, purest, dearest Italian girl in London. She was Mrs. Onofrio's sister; but Rosella—ah! she was a pretty girl. Large, limpid, innocent eyes with long lashes to them, and her eyebrows set high and delicate in their lines, while her complexion was a clear, warm olive. She was seventeen, and used to sing in the little Italian church. Her voice was not very cultivated, but it was full of Nature's sympathetic fulness. When she arched her eyebrows pathetically, as she sung the Et Incarnatus est or the O Salutaris Hostia there was a thrill in her tones that made the people in the church pray better.

Something must be said about Signor Onofrio. He had come to England a year before his wife, and at the end of that time had saved enough money to bring her over. He was a good little chap. In fact, the quartette in that little nest at the top of the tenement house were so good as to be almost uninteresting. In the ratio of virtue, Signor and Signora Onofrio were the mean between Remigio, who was only negatively good, of course, considering his forty days, and Rosella, who was good to the verge of sanctity.

Everybody regarded her as almost a little saint, and the family felt that she drew down a blessing on them. There wasn't a stiletto amongst them. The nearest approach to it was a pair of shears. For Guiseppe, who was called "Jo" in the shop, was a cutter. He got ten shillings a day, but it was a good long day. His "boss" was a Hebrew gentleman. Although these wages were far superior to anything Guiseppe could command in Italy, and especially in cold, bleak Calabria, yet living expenses were more, too. But they were a thrifty pair, and the dream of the Onofrios' was to save up enough money to go back to Italy one day, and buy a place of their own. Yes! they hoped some time to have their own vine and fig tree, and die in Italian sunshine.

This is really a great deal about an Italian journeyman cutter, and his homely wife, and his wizened scrap of a baby. But they had the same kind of souls as the millionaires, and though they did not live as far in the city, they were closer neighbours to God than many of these rich people, and were quite as happy.

As the Signora sat in the warmth of the fire, under one of Guiseppe's shirts that waved gently like a flag of truce, patiently letting Remigio get a "good square meal," she heard a light hasty footfall on the stone passage, then the door opened quickly and Rosella came in.

Mrs. Onofrio was almost appalled at seeing that her sister's face was tear-stained. It was such an unusual spectacle—Rosella who always smiled, albeit at times a little sadly. And a pretty face is never improved by tears. Rosella's wasn't. Her slender, well modelled nose was red, and her eyelids swollen by the teardrops that welled over and splashed upon her cheeks. Mrs. Onofrio felt the spectacle as quickly and as keenly as if she had been a man, though, of course, being a woman, it was not so irritating to her.

"What is the matter, Rosella mia? What are you crying about?"

Rosella sank into the nearest seat at hand, which chanced to be a camp-stool, and tried to stay her tears. But they oozed forth anew as she said in a choking voice:

"Mrs. Goodridge has discharged me."

"Eh? Didn't you do your work all right?" Mrs. Onofrio adjusted Remigio's stiff little frame as she sat up very straight to attend to this calamity.

"For—for stealing!" sobbed Rosella. The word seemed to stick in her throat, and she ejaculated it quiveringly.

"Stealing!" exclaimed her sister, taking a fierce grasp of Remigio that nearly dislodged him from his supper. What an honest indignation came into her gaunt eyes. She clutched the baby as a thundering Jove might grasp a bolt. "Oh, Rosella! You steal! Doesn't she know better than that? Oh, the wicked woman! Bosh!" How finely fierce the frail, thin creature grew at the thought.

"Oh, no, no!" sobbed Rosella quickly, as if averting a malediction. "She can't help it. There was something stolen from the house last Tuesday when I was there all alone," she went on controlling her grief a little, now that the worst had been told. "She had gone out and had let Mary and the cook both have an afternoon off, thinking I could look after the house. She left her purse in the room on the top floor, and when she came back, after I left, she found that it was gone. And she didn't go out until the others had left the house. And the front and back doors were both locked and so were the windows. I was the only one there. How can she help thinking I took it? Oh, Tessa!" cried the poor girl, as it came upon her anew. "Who has done this to ruin me?"

Mrs. Onofrio checked her and exclaimed warmly: "She must have made a mistake about the purse."

"Oh, no, she didn't," and Rosella shook her head sadly. "She remembers too well just what she did. She took it out and laid it on the table in the studio, the top room where she paints, before she changed her gown to go out. She meant to get it after she was dressed, but she never remembered it again until she went into a shop and bought something. And I was alone in the house all the time. And so she thinks I took it. She didn't want to believe it. She told me that she and Mr. Goodridge had almost determined to say nothing about it, thinking I might have taken it under some pressing need. And she only asked me to confess it and promise I would not do so again, and she would still keep me. But, of course, I couldn't confess it, and I couldn't stay with her——"

"Santa Maria!" cried Mrs. Onofrio. "Stay with anyone who could think you could steal!"

The good woman felt as if Rosella had discharged an unworthy mistress, which was a dignified way of looking at the thing. "Somebody must have got in," she persisted.

"No," said Rosella sadly. "No one could have got upstairs without my seeing or hearing them, because I sat where I could see the staircase, with the idea of watching the house. I am going up to the church to ask Our Lady to help me," she said, rising and putting her handkerchief, which was now a little ball of moisture, into her pocket. "Oh, it is so cruel!"

A crowd of Italian children, boys and girls, hung round the church door, like honey bees over a patch of clover. There was always this band of small Confessors of the Faith at the portal. The little old-fashioned girls, with longer-skirted and higher-waisted gowns than English children wear, had handkerchiefs of green, or red, or brown, bright with gaudy flowers, over their shoulders. They looked like pigmy matrons. The young urchins wore strange garments and cropped hair, their eyes shining more brightly from the fact that their round faces were a trifle opaque through lack of water. Rosella passed through them rapidly, answering their chirps of greeting with a sad smile, and hastening to the altar of the Madonna, sank upon her knees.

"O, Blessed Mother!" she prayed brokenly, her lustrous eyes upturned to the calm sweetness of the Munich image of the Virgin, "you know what I am suffering, and you can and you will help me!"

And Rosella took her beads from her pocket and began to say the Five Sorrowful Mysteries, that the Mother of God would care for her own. No one could have seen the poor girl as she prayed there in the deserted church, underscoring her prayers with her tears, and have doubted her innocence.

But no one of the earth saw her save the small Paolo Gianelli, who had tip-toed up the aisle, and now stood at her side. The dark humid eyes of Rosella, raised to the face of the Virgin, became conscious of this human presence. Without interrupting her Aves, she turned her gaze upon the urchin. She recognised at once the best scholar in her catechism class. Paolo also played the trombone in the boys' band, though where he harboured the wind to do it was a mystery.

"Do yer know where Fath'r Bruno is?" he asked, in a husky whisper. He was a robust Catholic, and good Catholics speak slowly before the Presence on the altar.

"No," said Rosella softly. "Is anybody ill?"

"Fath'r's broke his leg," replied Paolo. "'Nd she wants to see Father Bruno, and find out where they oughter take'm."

"We'll find the Brother and ask him where the Father is, Paolo," said Rosella, rising from her knees. An appeal to her charity was like the touch of a spur to a high-strung horse. Her own affliction made her more than ever responsive to human suffering, though a broken limb did not seem so great an evil to Rosella as being branded a thief. One can go as fast towards Heaven on one leg as two.

Inquiry showed that Father Bruno was out, and that none of the priests that served Madonna di Loreto were in.

"I'll go home with you and see your mother, Paolo. Perhaps I can be of some help."

So the young girl walked rapidly with the boy along the dingy streets. He led her to a squalid row of brick houses. Then he shot into a passage between them, so narrow that a man with arms akimbo would brush the walls with his elbows, and emerged into a space which, for want of other name, must be styled a court. Several houses of forlorn aspect ran here parallel with the outside row.

Paolo skipped up the rotten wooden steps of the house directly facing the opening of the passage, and pushed open the door at the right just inside. Rosella followed. Compared to this interior, one of the lowest, cheapest lairs of the poor Italians, the Onofrios seemed to have a grand and luxurious lodging. It was a room not more than twelve by ten. The walls and ceilings were covered with whitewash, save where it had flaked off. Poor and scant as was the furnishing, it crowded the small room. A stove in front of a black mantelpiece glowed a dull red in one spot, and a tin with some cheap broth was bubbling in it. A rude cradle with two barrel hoops across the top stood between the grimy windows. Three or four wooden shelves nailed against the wall made a dresser.

Through an opening at the left was seen a bed which stood nearly four feet from the floor. Another bed, much smaller, was at its feet, but this did not obtrude upon the view. This was the sleeping quarters of the Gianellis, where the father, mother, and five children bestowed themselves at night in a way that would have given points to a sardine-packer.

The baby girl, who was the proud possessor of the cradle, cuddled against her thinly-clad mother as Rosella entered. She had thin curls of a reddish, golden shade. The woman looked distressed. Rosella seated herself unasked, and soon drew forth the simple tale of woe. The woman's husband was a day labourer, and he had fallen and broken his leg, and they had taken him away. She did not know where, and this was worrying the poor creature.

"Why don't you send Paolo up to the place where he worked and let him find out?" said Rosella. She could gauge the income of the family pretty well by the look of the place and the children. Her quick eye had remarked on the round, wooden table, a large circular loaf of bread with a hole in the centre, which had evidently been brought recently from the bakery. That meant nourishment, anyhow, for a day or two. It is not as indestructible a solid as it looked.

Mrs. Gianelli acted on the suggestion. With querulous impatience she told Paolo to go to the place where his father worked and get the desired information, and return as quickly as possible. Rosella remained until the lad returned, cheering up the mother and talking to the children.

Paolo was longer than they expected. He came in at last, and told where they had taken his father. Then he said with some pride: "He must 'a been shoved, if he fell. 'Taint hard to walk round on a roof. I see a woman walking from one house to 'nother."

So it was perfectly natural that Mrs. Gianelli should say, crossly: "What did you stop to look at things for when I told you to hurry back?"

"'Cause I got her caught," replied Paolo, with some importance. "She was a thief."

One of his hearers listened attentively now. The sound of the word "thief" was a scaring one to poor Rosella. She was regarded as one, and her reputation was gone unless Our Lady of Loreto saved her. And then a thought flashed into her mind like an inspiration. Had the good Madonna helped her already?

"Where was she walking?" she exclaimed, her quick Italian emotionality thoroughly aroused.

"On de houses 'n —— Place. I see her from the street; 'nd she slipped down trou' de skylight; 'nd I tole de bobby; 'nd he went to de house 'nd grabbed her."

What an angel Paolo suddenly seemed in Rosella's eyes! Mrs. Goodridge lived in —— Place. Verily, he brought good news. And she reflected quickly that he had come to her even while she was praying to Our Lady of Loreto to clear her fair name.

"Which side of the street were the houses on?" she asked eagerly.

"On de top side," replied the boy. He was feeling the dignity or having discovered a thief, and the glory of setting that instrument of justice, a policeman, into movement against the culprit.

"I must go," cried Rosella, rising impetuously. "I can't stay any longer now," she explained to Mrs. Gianelli. "I've got to do something. But I will come and see you to-morrow. Addio."

She caressed the baby, and stooping, kissed Paolo, somewhat to that young man's surprise. Then she fluttered out. She felt as light as air! She flew along, almost running in her haste to get to Mrs. Goodridge's. But she did not go so rapidly that she had not time for an unuttered thanksgiving to the Mother of God. Why had she not thought of the roof?

She darted up the steep steps of the Goodridge's, out of breath, but with colour in her cheeks, and a clear brightness in her beautiful eyes. There was a vivacity of innocence in her expression that was eloquent. When the woman opened the door Rosella exclaimed, with a pitiful eagerness as she saw her take on the air of virtue confronted with vice: "Won't you ask Mrs. Goodridge if I can see her at once? Oh, do hurry, Lizzie."

"Well, you wait there," replied the servant coolly, but with a mean significance, as she closed the door in the girl's face. Rosella did not mind that much. It was the waiting that chafed her.

When she was admitted by the surly maid to Mrs. Goodridge's presence she broke forth: "Oh, Mrs. Goodridge! They caught a woman this afternoon walking on the roof of these houses and slipping into the skylights. She is the one that——"

And then she stopped suddenly. A thought had come into her mind, a most characteristic one. She had been accused of being a thief because circumstances were so strongly against her! And she had been so deeply pained that they could not dream she was guilty. Was she not doing that very thing with this woman? Delicate charity is almost absurd in devising excuses for seeming guilt. Perhaps this feminine pedestrian of the tiles was only the New Woman in a novel, eccentric emancipation! A venturesome creature who strolled on the housetops because she was brave and unconventional and loved the purer upper air. Or, perchance, some dauntless maid who took this short route to pay a visit to a neighbouring maid!

Rosella did not quite think these very thoughts, but she did check herself on the brink of passing judgment, and said instead: "Don't you think, dear Mrs. Goodridge, that she may have taken your purse?"

Mrs. Goodridge having heard the story, and not being an idiot, did think so must assuredly.

"I will get Mr. Goodridge to go up to the police-station and find out all he can, Rosella. And you wait here until he comes back," she said, with decision.

Mr. Goodridge did go, and came back with the news that the roof-walker had been searched, and several silver-backed toilet articles, a small watch, and a lace scarf were discovered on her person. None of these harmonised with her garb or appearance. Furthermore, Mr. Goodridge had called on the people who lived in the house on whose top the lady had walked, and they found that just those articles were missing. It was a clear case. The woman had not walked on the roof for mere exercise. The most ardent charity had to admit that.

"There is no doubt that she took the purse, Rosella," said Mrs. Goodridge, "and it will come out when she is brought up for trial. And we both beg your pardon for not believing in you in the face of any suspicious circumstances. In fact, I think we did, although now is a little late to say it. But I want you to come back at once, and we will never doubt you again, my good girl."

Rosella had not felt happier in her life than when she went home in hot haste. But she was not so hurried that she did not slip in at Madonna di Loreto, and pour forth a fervent prayer of gratitude to our Lady. And when Mrs. Onofrio heard the news, she was so carried away, that she stood Remigio in the corner, like an umbrella, and wept on her sister's neck. And Remigio, who may have felt the indignity to himself, joined in the weeping, shutting his eyes very tight, and opening his mouth very wide, so that when he recovered his normal appearance, he almost seemed beautiful by contrast. Things are so relative in this world.

Although that was not one of the two nights in the week when they had spaghetti, Mrs Onofrio prepared a huge dish of it with tomatoes, and Parmesan cheese grated over it, and bought a pint bottle of Chianti. When Guiseppe came in at nine to this succulent and extravagant feast and heard the reason thereof, he acquiesced like a trump in the whole thing, and forbore to reflect that it might mean a day longer in returning to Italy. The one regret was that Remigio could only share indirectly in this feast of thanksgiving to Madonna di Loreto.

J. J. à B.

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

SUMMARY.

The mail train has been robbed between Cornwall and La Grange stations, and £20,000 worth of gold stolen by a gang of desperadoes, headed by two brothers named Mulligan. Two passengers on the train—Adolph Squirrek, alias Smith, a detective tracking the Mulligans, and Fred Weldon, a young lawyer—who have struck up an acquaintance on the way, alight at Somerville, where the former stopped at the "Drover," and the latter at his mother's house. During the night a message comes to say that Judge Woodland's horse has come back alone, and Weldon, together with Squirrek and two other men, set out to find him, and discover one of Mulligan's confederates lying senseless on the road. The man, who had made an unsuccessful attempt on the life of the judge, is sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. At Judge Woodland's Weldon meets a Spaniard named Alvarido Almanaz, and the two men become rivals for the love of Florence, the judge's daughter. Weldon is inveigled to a lonely bridge near Cornwall, and disappears. Squirrek pays a fruitless visit to the spot. Squirrek arouses the citizens of Cornwall, who make their way to the outlaws' hiding-place. One outlaw is found and killed, and the cabin is set fire to. Squirrek discovers a piece of paper with the following cryptogram: "1——0——1. Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid Xgjsf Nbg." He afterwards falls in with the two remaining outlaws, and has them arrested. They are lynched by a furious mob. Both Florence Woodland and her father have dreams of Señor Almanaz in connection with Fred Weldon's disappearance. The Señor leaves Somerville professedly for Cuba. He writes from Chicago to Miss Woodland, asking for a solution to the cryptogram. This is sent, but is intercepted by Squirrek, who has been tracking the Señor, and who at last discovers Fred Weldon, more dead than alive. A description of what happened at Devil's Creek is found in his journal. He is secretly removed to No. 19, Blankton Street, but is again tracked by Squirrek.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Caught!

After a careful diagonis of the case, Doctor Butler pronounced Fred Weldon hovering between life and death, where it needed but a breath of wind to sweep him one way or the other. In answer to my inquiry regarding poisoning, he replied:

"It looks very much that way, but I would not say positively that he has been tampered with. Toxicology is a science itself, and the most skilful practitioner would not pronounce judgment in such a case without more data than are before me. Let me examine his medicine."

Strict search failed to discover anything more than a single bottle of what was labelled "Liniment." Doctor Butler smelt and tasted of this for a few moments and then set it down again.

"That's all right; no poison there."

"What is it?"

"Simply a harmless wash for the wound upon his forehead, which is certainly improving very fast."

"I consider that circumstance suspicious in itself," said I. "This Doctor Ruthven certainly uses medicine, and if it were innocuous, and would bear examination, he would not be afraid to leave it here."

"But you saw several bottles at the other place."

"Very true; but that was before he had been alarmed by my visit. He had not then begun to cover up his tracks."

The physician smiled very significantly, but made no reply. He was a man naturally reticent, and whatever thoughts he had, he preferred to keep them to himself.

Having left what medicine was needed, and given his instructions to the nurse, he departed, and I followed shortly after, without having exchanged a word, with the patient.

As the life of Fred Weldon was still in danger, I concluded to send nothing more to his friends until there was a change one way or the other. I had some thought of telegraphing to his mother to come, but Doctor Butler advised against it, and his advice was followed.

At the police headquarters I encountered Runkle, who was impatiently awaiting me.

"This Spaniard has scented danger, and is seeking to get out of the city. I want you to go with me to the terminus to watch for him; I have given half-a-dozen men a description of him, and they are on the look-out."

Glad enough was I to assist in the apprehension of this heartless wretch, who had plunged so many hearts into the lowest depths of woe, and who deserved the severest penalty that it was possible to inflict.

I was well satisfied that if Almanaz knew of the sharp search being made for him he had a good chance of eluding us after all. As every one knows, there are so many avenues of ingress and egress in Chicago, not to mention the numerous haunts of desperate characters, that a fugitive from justice is almost as safe in this great city of the west as if he were in London or New York.

But it was not likely that he had any suspicion of the measures we had instituted, and consequently would not take any extraordinary precautions. It was not at all improbable that at that very moment he was at his hotel packing up ready for flight, but our force was too small to weaken it by sending to see.

Runkle informed me, as we walked along, that Doctor Ruthven had been locked up for the night, but that he would no doubt be liberated on bail in the morning. Nothing as yet had been discovered of any more of the confederates of the Cuban, Almanaz.

We walked rapidly towards the station, like men conscious of the value of time. We were talking together in low tones, when I suddenly placed my hand upon Runkle's arm and checked him.

"What is it?" he asked in a whisper.

"Yonder is our man!"

There was no mistaking the identity of the tall figure with bag in hand crossing the street. He took the same direction that we were following when he reached the pavement—evidence that we were none too soon in seeking him at the station.

He was about twenty yards distant, and going at a rate that required our utmost efforts to surpass. We came up, one on either side, and both placed a hand upon his shoulder at the same moment.

"Señor Almanaz, you are our prisoner!"

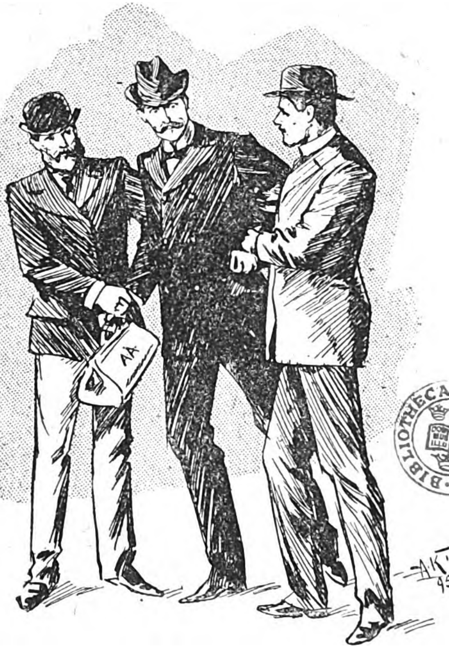
He started as if shot, and stared first at me and then at the other, and was absolutely speechless. Locking arms within his, we wheeled about and started for headquarters.

Still he failed to utter a word until we had nearly reached our destination, when he bristled up and demanded what it all meant. I could see from the glances he cast at me that he suspected my identity, and no doubt understood what our proceedings meant without any enlightenment from us.



BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

"Señor Almanaz, you are our prisoner!"

We did not reply to his questions, nor take any notice of his threats, but kept him securely between us until he was safe within the walls of the prison. Then we separated, and, as the hour was late, I went to the nearest hotel, where I am sitting writing up my journal before retiring to rest

CHAPTER XXXII.

The End of Almanaz.

Tuesday, November .—Thank a good Providence! Fred Weldon has come up out of the dark valley into which I believed, last evening, he had gone too far to retreat.

The kind old soul, Doctor Butler, tells me that the crisis came about midnight, when he had returned to watch for it. Under beneficent heaven, with the aid of a powerful constitution, which had never been impaired by dissipation, he began to rally, and has continued steadily to improve ever since.

This morning he is still so weak that I concluded not to intrude upon him, but to wait until towards evening.

The doctor says he is flighty, and at times completely astray with his faculties, but his mental equilibrium will be recovered simultaneously with his intellectual, and, unless some unforeseen accident occurs, there is nothing to be feared in his condition.

After my call upon Doctor Butler I dropped in upon Runkle, who met me with rather startling intelligence.

"Upon going to the cell of your Cuban acquaintance I found him dead and cold."

"Suicide?"

"Yes, with the dagger. The fellow was more frightened than he need be, for it isn't likely he would have been hanged."

"The disgrace of the exposure and punishment, which could not fail to follow his arrest, were a thousand times worse than death itself to his proud spirit."

"I suppose so; but it always seems to me that the most foolish thing a man can do is to make away with himself. However, he is gone."

There was no attempt to hunt up the confederates of Alvarid Almanaz, excepting Doctor Ruthven, who easily produced bail, and was allowed to go free. As it would be impossible to prove anything criminal against this man, although it is morally certain that he is one of the most guilty and dangerous men in the community, his connection with our affairs, I suppose, terminates with his walking out of the gaol.

The reports from Doctor Butler continue encouraging, and this evening Fred Weldon and I met on a level for the first time in several weeks. The poor fellow reached out his hand as I took my seat by his bedside.

"Squirrek, you are a good friend of mine," he said, in a feeble voice, while the tears welled up and filled his eyes.

"No better than you are to me."

"Tell me how mother is."

"Perfectly well, by the last accounts. I telegraphed to-day that you were rapidly recovering, and might be expected home in the course of a few days."

"I cannot express to you how much I thank you."

"Then don't try to do so."

"Tell me all about it."

Tell him I did, from beginning to end. It took a long time, and during the recital it would be hard to say which showed the greatest interest—the nurse, the doctor, or Fred Weldon himself. He drew a long sigh of relief when I had finished.

"What an experience has come to me from my getting mixed up in this Mulligan business! But how long before I can go back to Somerville with you?"

"Doctor Butler is the gentleman to answer that question," I laughed, looking towards the physician.

"I see no reason why he should not be able to return the day after to-morrow; but you must not allow yourself to become too much excited, for the reaction cannot fail to set you back again."

"I will endeavour to be careful."

Suddenly the door was pushed hurriedly open; the form of a woman swept by us towards the bed.

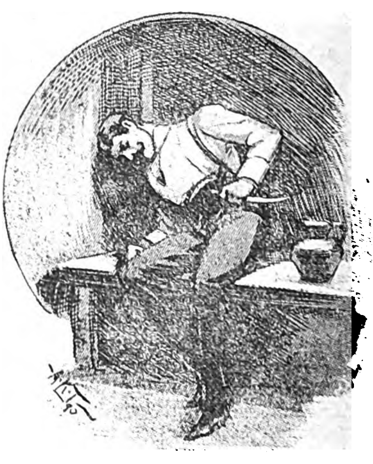
"Oh, my son! my son!"

And, with her arms thrown round the neck of her boy, Mrs. Weldon sobbed as if her heart were bursting, while Fred cast his weak arms round her, and their tears mingled.

For a few moments we were silent, and I am not ashamed to say that my own vision became misty, while Doctor Butler blew his nose again and again, cleared his throat, and fidgeted as though he did not know what to do with himself.

"I am—am—really afraid this is too much for our patient," he said, walking aimlessly about the room.

"It looks as if it were too much for us," I replied, making a poor effort to be cheery.

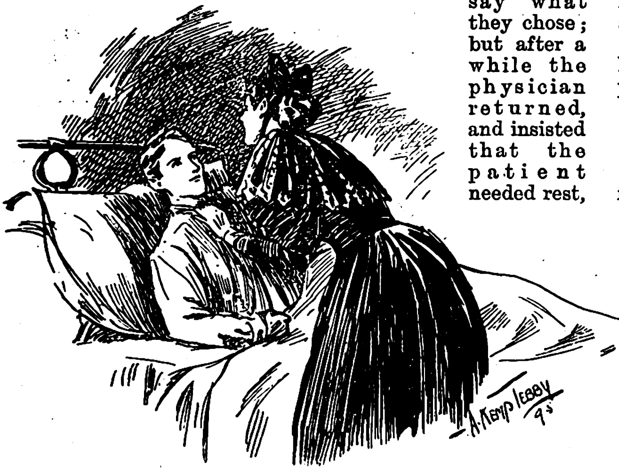


"I found him dead and cold."

The old doctor, however, was fidgety and uneasy, but he saw it was useless to interfere. Such a course might produce more injury than good.

When the tempest of joy had subsided the calm came, and Mrs. Weldon raised her head and looked fondly in the face of her son.

Then the doctor and myself wandered out of the room for a few minutes, until they had been given an opportunity to say what they chose; but after a while the physician returned, and insisted that the patient needed rest, and should not be disturbed any more, at least for a time.



"Oh! my son! my son!"

"To tell the truth," said he, with a serious face, "I am afraid that he has already been put back several days."

But no one else feared any such thing. The radiant countenance of the young man himself proved that it was the best tonic that could have been given him.

As might be expected, Mrs. Weldon would not listen to any arrangement that shut her out from her son.

"By him I shall stay until he is ready to move," she said in her quiet but emphatic manner, "and, then he shall rest his head on my shoulder until he lies in his own bed at Somerville."

"Them's my sentiments," said Fred, who was beginning to feel light-hearted, and was disposed to be facetious. "How are all the folks at home, mother?"

"Especially at Judge Woodland's," I put in; "that's the point he is aiming at."

Mrs. Weldon started, and put her hand in the pocket of her dress.

"Dear me! If I didn't nearly forget it."

"Forgot what?" asked Fred, a flush of interest overspreading his face.

"There! I do believe I have lost it," she added, without heeding his question, and fumbling anxiously in her dress.

"Lost what, mother?"

"Never mind; I don't suppose it is of much importance."

"If you will only tell us what it is, mother, it will be some relief."

"Oh, Fred! did you speak to me? Why Florence gave me a letter for you, and I do believe I have lost it. I don't suppose there was much in it, and if there was, she can tell you when you get back to Somerville. You don't care, my son, do you?"

"Oh, no," was the response.

But I saw plainly enough his keen disappointment, although he did his utmost to conceal it.

"Let me see," said his mother, as if striving to brush up her memory; "where did I put that letter?"

She sat in thought for a few moments, and then drew out of her bosom.

"How came I to forget it? Here it is."

Fred Weldon's hand trembled violently as he opened the letter, despite his determined efforts to appear cool and self-possessed.

I narrowly watched his countenance as he read the few lines within. First there was the intense straining look of interest; then the flash of a new happiness, followed by the serene radiance of young love.

He read it over several times, and then folded and handed it back to his mother, as though it were a business piece of paper in which he had no material concern.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The Detective Finishes his Diary.

In the evening I dropped in and looked upon my young friend. His mother had gone out to procure some delicacy for him, and the nurse was dozing in another chair.

He evidently believed himself alone, and did not notice my knock nor my entrance. As I looked in I saw he was reading the note of Florence Woodland.

He started guiltily when he became aware of my presence, and hurriedly put the missive away. I had enough good taste not to notice his embarrassment.

"I never saw a man improve so fast," I remarked cheerfully. "Are you able to walk?"

"I will soon show you."

With which he rose, and passed round the room several times, with something like his natural, elastic step.

"I should say you will be able to go home to-morrow."

"We have made our arrangements for leaving by the noon train," he replied.

"Has Doctor Butler given his consent?"

"Yes; rather reluctantly, I confess, but the whole thing is settled. You accompany us?"

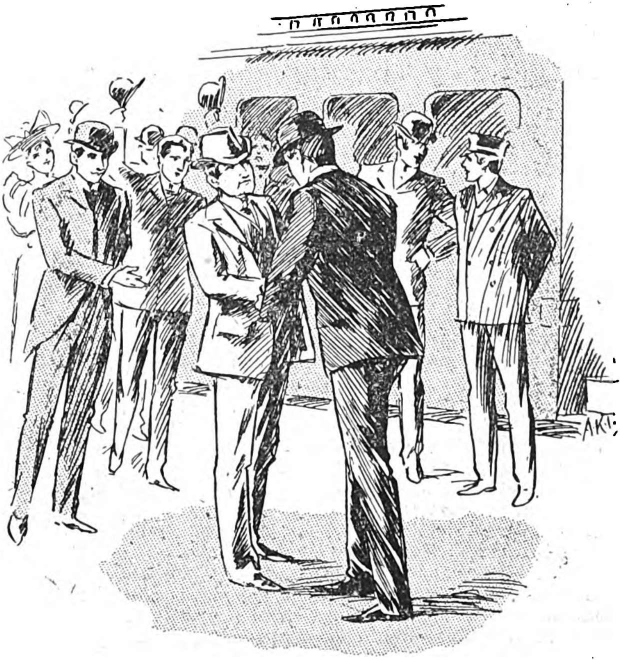
"Yes; my business is not quite finished. There is one little matter that must be attended to."

He looked inquiringly at me, but I did not deem it best to explain at that time.

"By the way, there is a little thing that I ought to mention to you, as I think it will perhaps please you."

"Let me hear it."

"When it became known that you had left our neigh-



It seemed as if the whole town was at the station.

bourhood—and a great many thought you would never return—there was a manifestation of interest and friendship in your welfare so general in its character that you would scarcely believe it."

"Ah!"

"Yes; among all those outside your own family, I do not believe there was a person who suffered more keenly than Florence Woodland."

The arrow struck, and he started and flushed as if detected in a crime.

"I am an older man than you, Fred, and can look at matters more coolly. I took occasion to sound this young lady, and my impression—to make it short—is, that she thinks so much of you, that it only needs a little attention on your part to cause her to think all the world of you."

He stammered out some pointless reply, and then to relieve him, I changed the conversation.

* * * * *

Somerville, October —.—Fred Weldon is in his own room again, so strong and well that he refuses to be put to bed.

It seemed as if the whole town was at the station, and when the young man appeared, the excitement was indescribable. It reminded me of the war times, when some popular general started on his travels.

Such shouting, such hurrahing, such shaking of the hands, such a rush and crush of the swarming multitude, was absolutely fearful.

I feared for the consequences of this upon Weldon, but he stood it well.

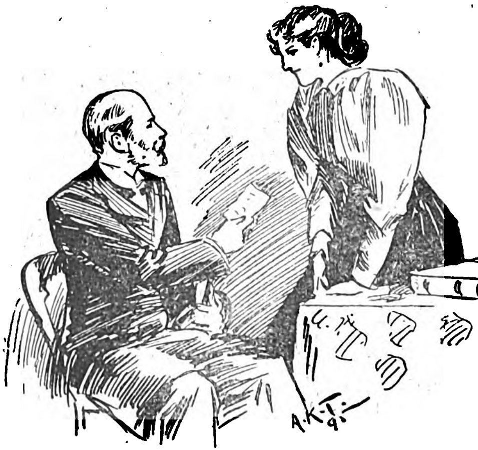
I found a sort of mushroom popularity attached to myself also. Judge Woodland, usually so discreet, had taken the pains to elaborate, at an alarming rate, upon the virtues of his friend Mr. Smith, and I did more smiling and handshaking than I had ever done.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

SOLVING THE CYPHER.

ADOLPH SQUIRREK, the detective, took the earliest opportunity to call upon Miss Florence Woodland, to make sure of the translation which had so sorely puzzled him.

The officer was received with the greatest cordiality by both father and daughter, who fully appreciated the service he had rendered the community, he being the main instrument of rooting out the pestilential Mulligan gang.



The detective took it out of his pocket-book.

All saw, too, that he had been the means of saving the life of Fred Weldon, who was given up as dead long ago, and who certainly would have perished had he remained in the hands of Doctor Ruthven and Señor Almanaz for a few days longer.

The unmasking of this villain was a theme for remark for a long time in Somerville. More than one young lady had looked askance but longingly upon the handsome and accomplished Cuban, although there were none who would now admit that they had ever felt anything but contempt for the frivolous fop.

It was evening when the detective entered the parlour of Judge Woodland. The latter was so delighted to meet him that the visitor could scarcely find time to speak with his daughter; but finally he stated his errand.

"Your translation, Miss Woodland, undoubtedly is the correct one," said he, "and yet with it before my eyes, and with the fact that you give the same number of letters that there are figures staring me in the face, I cannot gain any clue to the riddle. Before making use of the information you have given, I have called to ask you to explain it to me."

"Have you the writing with you?" she asked, with a laugh.

The detective took it out of his pocket-book and handed it to her with the question:

"Did I ever tell you where I obtained that?"

"I do not remember that you did."

"It was found on the island, in the cabin that we visited and burned. The minute I placed my eyes upon it I suspected its character; but that did me no good."

"You remember that I sent the reply to Señor Almanaz, and I suppose he has availed himself of it long ago."

"No; I do not think he has."

"Why not?"

"I don't think your letter was received by him."

The detective said nothing more, and the significant tone in which he made the remark rendered it unnecessary.

Miss Woodland carefully examined the cypher for a few moments, and then came and stood beneath the chandelier, Squirrek on one side, and her father and his spectacles on the other, both peering over her shoulders.

"In the first place," said Squirrek, "what is the meaning of those figures at the top?

"1—0—1

"Cfujk't Bsdfj 50zct Mpqug Vmeds sid Xgjsf Nbg."

"That," she replied, in her smiling way, "means that the cypher in the centre stands for a letter, but that in reading the lines below, you are first to take the preceding letter, as it comes in the alphabet, and then the second. Do you understand?" she asked, turning her fair face around so as to confront the bearded and grizzled countenance of the detective.

"Not a word," he laughed.

"I will make it plainer. You see at a glance that, as the letters are written on this slip of paper, they make no sense at all. This proves that they were not intended to do so, but that each letter represents another letter than itself."

"I got that far without help, but no further, and never could if I laboured twenty years."

"Because you didn't go at it the right way."

"Pray tell us your plan," said Judge Woodland, who was not the least interested of the party.

"In all such cyphers that I have examined there is always a clue to be found more easily than people think. You can never get it by starting at the beginning, but you must glance at the cypher as a whole, and notice its peculiarities."

"And that reminds me," said Judge Woodland, turning towards the detective, "of an exploit of my daughter's in that line which I have never mentioned to you."

"I shall be glad to hear it."

"Have you ever read Edgar A. Poe's story called the 'Gold Bug'?"

"I remember it distinctly."

"You will, then, recall the jumble of figures that are there presented as being found upon a piece of parchment, and as containing some important secret. You will, perhaps, recall also that the story—which, like all of Poe's works, I consider a masterpiece of art—was published in two numbers of a Philadelphia newspaper. The first number contained the cypher, and the second the solution. This was over twenty years ago, before Florence was born; but several years since my housekeeper borrowed the papers containing the 'Gold Bug.' I offered my child the first number, with the promise of a handsome prize if she could make any sense of the figures. I no more dreamed of her doing it than I did of her going to the moon; and yet she did."

"That was a feat of which anyone might feel proud."

"And this is the way I did it," said Florence. "I held up the paper and looked at the cypher as I would have examined a small piece of statuary. Anyone could have understood that the figures represented letters. One figure occurring oftener than the others very naturally stood for the letter 'e,' which is most used in the English language, and so on. You remember the process by which Poe built up his sentences. My solution was not as perfect as his, as, after I made out some of it, I guessed at the rest. There are two points in it which are vulnerable. The figures at the top are of no assistance whatever, and I cannot understand why they were put there, except to remind the writer of the method, if he should ever forget it.

"You notice the '50zct' and the 'sid'; these are the two combinations which I worked upon, asking myself what letters or words they most likely represented. There were two words that almost instantly suggested themselves. The 'sid' must stand either for 'the' or 'and.' I first tried 'and,' but, comparing the two, found it was impossible to deduce any law or rule for them. I next took 'the,' and made this discovery:

"The letter 's' is the one which immediately precedes 't' in the alphabet, 'i' immediately follows it, and 'd' again is the next one preceding.

"Here is seen at once a certain method; these three letters, like the first three terms in an arithmetical or geometrical progression, announce the law which governs the others.

"But we will attempt to pierce the mystery at another point, taking the '50zct' which I mentioned. This struck me as a measurement of something; the three letters represent inches, feet, yards, rods, or miles. The words 'yards' and 'rods' are the only ones which are abbreviated to three letters, as yds and rds. Trying the last, nothing can be made of it, and we will take up the other, 'yds.' The letter 'z' follows 'y,' 'c' precedes 'd,' and 't' follows 's.'

Here the same thing is discovered, and we see the meaning of the figures, which instruct you to take, instead of the letter you see, the one immediately following it in the alphabet, and then the one preceding it, alternating in this manner all the way through the cypher.

"We will now go back to the beginning, and test the rule. Instead of taking the letter c with which it opens, I tried the letter b, but saw, after going through the word, that I had begun wrong, so I tried d, and in a few seconds had worked out the dreadful word Devils; the next proved to be Creek, and, following it up, the whole thing read:

"'Devil's Creek, 50 yards north, under the white oak.'"

CHAPTER XXXV.

An Eavesdropper.

"There it all is," added Miss Woodland, handing the paper back to the detective, while all three took their seats, the latter gentleman complimenting the skill of the young lady, and the father looking rather proud of her.

"There is one thing still which I do not understand," said Squirrek. "You translate the figures literally, why is that?"

"I judge that is likely to be correct, as the regular alternation of the letters is continued without any regard to that. If there were a break here, I would have made the same change with them."

"That point is immaterial," replied Squirrek.

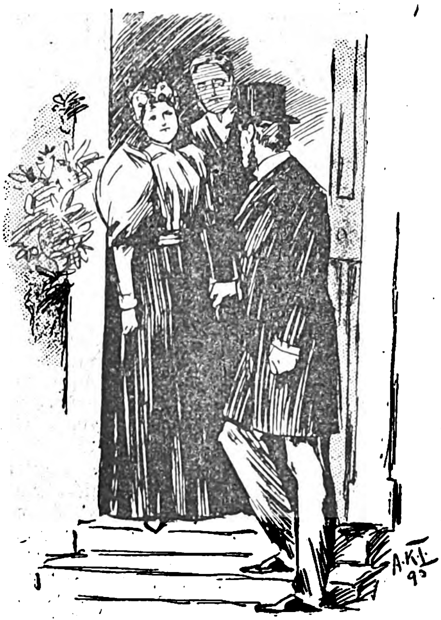
"That is the legacy which the Mulligans left you," laughed the judge.

"I really hope that it may be the key to your fortune, for you surely have earned it."

"I shall not fret myself if this amount to nothing."

"How do you account for such a sentence having been put in cypher?" inquired the judge.

"I presume all of these men knew of its existence, but that it was written by one of the Mulligans, the others understanding that it was the lock to their hidden wealth, and that if anything occurred by which they were sentenced to suffer the penalty of their crimes, they would give the key to their men, so that they might divide the booty among themselves."



He manœuvred somewhat to get a private word with Florence.

"Why has it not been divided, then?"

"You will recollect that the Mulligans were the last who fell into the hands of the committee, so that the necessity did not exist, except, perhaps, in the case of the Cuban."

"Perhaps he has availed himself of the discovery."

"No; he used every entreaty possible to get the secret out of them when they were in gaol, but they resolutely refused to give it to him, and he was led to apply to your daughter."

"What reason or pretext had they for keeping it from him?"

"I don't think he was ever popular with the gang, on account of the peculiar position he occupied, which gave him such an advantage over them; and although fully as wicked as they, yet his tastes were somewhat different, and kept him in a manner apart."

"How was it that they refused to expose him?"

"I wondered that they did not do so, but I suppose it was another version of 'honour among thieves.'"

"I cannot say, Mr. Squirrek, that I understand what this Cuban's real position was," remarked Judge Woodland, inquiringly.

"It was sui generis. Furnished with an abundance of funds, and highly accomplished, he moved in the very best society, and was thus given opportunities for making discoveries which proved exceedingly remunerative."

"Ah! I understand."

"At the same time he was enabled to spy out any serious danger which menaced the men."

"When did you first suspect his character?"

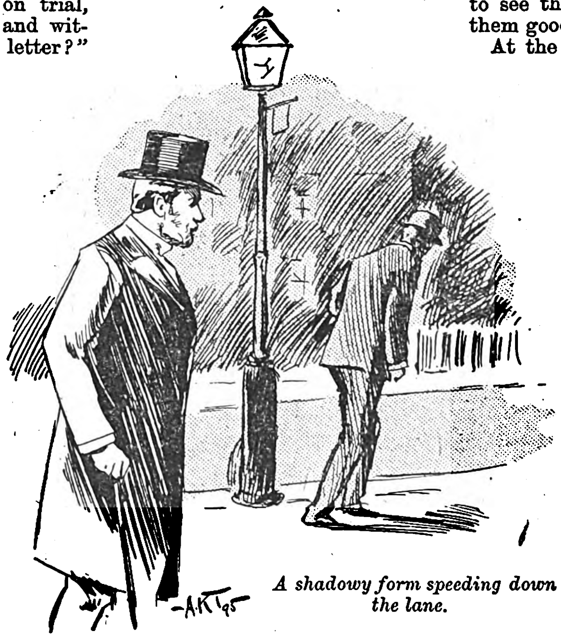
"The evening that I met him for the first time, in this room. I began watching him from the first, and soon learnt what rôle he was playing."

"Do you think he had any suspicion of your identity all this time?"

"Yes; for some cause or other he was suspicious of me when I made my appearance in ministerial costume, but I threw him off his guard, and obtruded myself under his very nose, without his dreaming who I was."

"You must have been thoroughly disguised."

"So I was. You remember, judge, that when 'poor Tom Borie,' as he was called, was on trial, the presiding judge, the jury, and witnesses each received a warning letter?"



A shadowy form speeding down the lane.

"Distinctly, and I got one myself, although I never mentioned it before."

"They were all written by one person, and he was Señor Alvarido Almanaz."

"Is it possible? I never suspected it."

"Yes; and your daughter will now understand my reason for calling here one day and looking so attentively through her album."

"I remember you showed a special concern about a piece written by that individual."

"Yes; I was examining the penmanship. Wherever he put his autograph, or made a single letter with his pen, he attempted to disguise his hand, for he was well aware that there was great necessity for his doing so."

"You had no doubt about that?"

"None at all; there were certain ear-marks, as we call them, in all. He was the same person, too, who sent the letter to Fred Weldon, and then betrayed him."

"You amaze me! He richly deserved the fate the rest of the gang received."

"There can be no question about that. Coming frequently in contact with both him and young Weldon, I could not fail to notice the contrast between them."

"I always admired the young man," remarked the judge, in reply to the observation of the detective.

The daughter was silent, looked down, and said nothing.

"He is one of those few young men who improve on acquaintance. He has had two great objects in life, for which he has struggled nobly—one a praiseworthy ambition to make himself an honourable name in his profession; the other, to place his mother beyond the reach of want."

"Fortunately the last incentive exists no longer."

The detective paid no heed to this direct reference to his own generosity, but continued:

"I shall always feel an interest in him, and predict for him, should his life be spared, a brilliant future."

Squirrek did not tarry long at the judge's, but promising to see them as often as he could, bade them good evening.

At the door he manœuvred somewhat to get a private word with Florence, but he found it could not be done without attracting the notice of the old gentleman, and he scorned to appear as though he were taking advantage of such a friend.

"I don't know as they need any help from me," he soliloquised as he walked homewards; "they say that if a couple are intended for each other they will find it out some way or other—sh!"

The detective had forgotten his usual caution in musing upon love affairs, and was reminded of his remissness by the sight of a shadowy form speeding down the lane in front of him.

He was never more startled in his life, because he was taken completely off his guard. The fugitive was too far ahead of him, and going too fast for him to think of pursuing him, so he paused and gazed after him until he speedily vanished in the darkness.

Then, as the detective resumed his journey towards the town, he muttered to himself:

"I do believe that fellow has followed me to Judge Woodland's, and heard every word of our conversation. If so, it looks as if there were going to be trouble."

(To be concluded.)

THE BIGGEST, BRIGHTEST, AND BEST.

THIS applies with special force to PEARSON'S WEEKLY, published every Saturday, price 1d. Among the numerous advantages P.W. offers its readers are a £2000 Insurance and a £100 Cycling Insurance. Articles of special interest to Cyclists, Cricketers, Stamp Collectors, Smokers, and the Army are appearing, besides interesting and humorous articles on all subjects. A serial story by HEADON HILL, entitled has just started.

"GUILTY GOLD,"

WHICH EVERYONE SHOULD READ,

THE WEEK AFTER NEXT

A new serial story will commence in SHORT STORIES, entitled

THE TREASURES OF THE WHITE GOD,

The Story of a Shameful Crime.

◆◆◆

This Grand Serial is of most vivid interest.

YOU ARE SURE TO LIKE IT.

Profusely Illustrated by BERNARD HIGHAM.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

CAMBRIC POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS

	Bordered. per doz	Hem-stitched. per doz.
Children's	1/3
Ladies',	2/3	2/9
Gents',	3/3	3/11

Direct from the Manufacturers

"The Irish Cambrics of Messrs. ROBINSON & CLEAVER have a world-wide fame." The Queen.

Samples and Price Lists Post Free.

LINEN COLLARS, CUFFS, AND SHIRTS.

Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, 3/6 per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4/11 per doz. Cuffs for Ladies or Gentlemen from 5/11 per doz.

Shirts, Best quality Long Cloth, with 4-fold Linen Fronts 35/6 per ½ doz. (to measure 2/- extra).

"Exquisite quality, most moderate in price."—Myra's Journal.

(By Special Appointments to the Queen and Empress Frederick of Germany.)

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

ONE BOX
OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S.W.

Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO, 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

TOOTH-ACHE CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

IMPORTANT TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

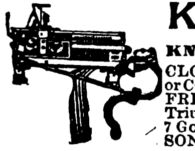
For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER



KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for SPECIAL TREATISE and PRICE LIST of SURGICAL APPLIANCES. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, GRAHAM ROAD, LONDON, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. HOLT, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

---

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

BALDNESS CURED in all its forms. Send stamped addressed envelope for Testimonials, Press Criticisms, and valuable Pamphlet, containing Chapters on Baldness, Loss of Hair, Greyness, Superfluous Hair, etc., with advice form for Treatment, to Dr. HORN, Hair Specialist, Newport, Isle of Wight.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. HOWELL, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

RUBBER STAMPS

FREE BY POST.

AGENTS WANTED.

Liberal commissions.

Your MONOGRAM, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY £5,000!

GRAHAM & CO.'S MONSTER GIFTS.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—Messrs. GRAHAM & CO. intend to present their Customers with a Monster Parcel as a means of advertising their celebrated

EGYPTIAN GOLD JEWELLERY.

For the small sum of 6s. 6d. we will send as follows:—

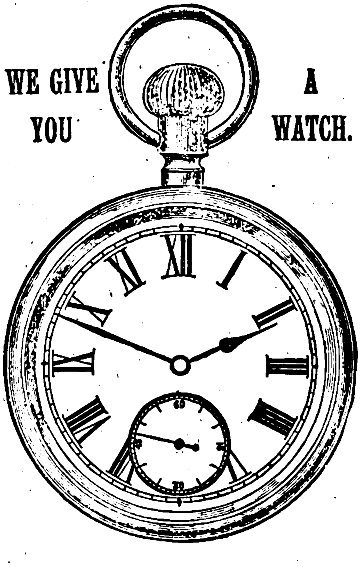
NOT A TOY

WE GIVE YOU A WATCH.



GUARANTEED TO KEEP CORRECT TIME.

Any Watch not received in going order will be exchanged.

	Our Price.
One Gent's Egyptian Gold Albert, or one Lady's Egyptian Gold Albert	2s. 6d.
One Seal or Locket for Chain	1s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Ring, or one Lady's 5-stone Diamond Ring	3s. 6d.
One Gent's Carbon Diamond Scarfpin, or one Lady's Fashionable Brooch	2s. 6d.
One Pair of Cuff Links, or one Carbon Diamond Bracelet	2s. 6d.
Total	12s. 6d.

FOR 6s. 6d.

In addition to the above Every Purchaser will be Presented Free of Charge with one of our handsome

KEYLESS WATCHES.

USUALLY SOLD AT HALF-A-GUINEA.

Read what is said by those who have purchased.

WANTS A SECOND PARCEL.

Lowick-by-Neale, Northumberland, August 17.

GENTLEMEN,—Received to-day your second parcel of jewellery, with which we are immensely pleased. We really wonder how you can do it. The watch itself is worth more than the money charged for the whole. Many thanks for punctuality.—Very truly yours, WILLIAM McISAAC.

GOES BETTER THAN HIS £15 WATCH.

11, North Street, St. Peters, Tunbridge Wells.

GENTLEMEN,—Some few weeks ago I sent to your firm for the jewellery and advertised watch, of which I am surprised; the watch is a beautiful timist. I must admit, in fact, it goes better than my £15 gold watch; and for the jewellery it is astonishing value. I think you must lose money over such gifts, as I term it. The watch alone is worth double the 7s. I enclosed. I have shown it to several of my friends, and they were astonished. You can add this to your testimonials if it will be of any service.—I am, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, LEWIS C. RHODES.

Every Watch is Carefully Examined, Timed, and Guaranteed a Correct Timekeeper. Call and see them.

We do this to save the enormous cost of advertising, preferring to give our customers the benefit. As we lose money on each parcel we cannot supply more than two parcels to one person. If you cannot call get a P.O. at once, and send for this wonderful parcel. Orders will be executed in Rotation. MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

NOTE.—The entire parcel will be sent for 6s. 6d. (post free, registered, 7s.). Each customer will receive gratis one of our HANDSOMELY ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES. Be sure and call or send to-day for the

6s. 6d. Monster Presentation Parcel including the Handsome Keyless Watch.

◆ ◆ ◆

S. S. GRAHAM & CO., 277, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

NEW SERIAL BY GEORGE GRIFFITH STARTS NEXT WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 348. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 31st, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well.

APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Free from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY,
HANLEY.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lbs., 3s. 9d., Including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KIRKHAMPTON, SHALTON, N. DEVON.

St. Jacobs Oil

AFFLICTED
TWENTY YEARS.

Mr. William Dean, of 6, Barleyfield Row, Walsall, says:—"I have been afflicted with Rheumatism almost continually for twenty years. For twelve months I was unable to work; I tried different hospitals, many doctors, and several kinds of medicine, all to no use; was unable to get rest night or day until I used St. Jacobs Oil. As the result of using this marvellous Oil I can now sleep well, and go to my work regularly every day free from pain, perfectly cured."

The CHARLES A. VOGELER CO.,
45, Farringdon Road, LONDON.
Sole Proprietors and Manufacturers.

The Great Pain-killing Remedy.
There is nothing so good. Acts Like Magic.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6.

ESTABLISHED
FIFTY YEARS.

CURES...

Rheumatism.
SPRAINS. STRAINS.
BRUISES. SORENESS.
STIFFNESS.
SORE THROAT.
CHEST COLDS.
NEURALGIA. LUMBAGO
BACKACHE.
HEADACHE.
FEETACHE.
And all Bodily Aches and Pains.

Conquers Pain.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.
NERVINE

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street,
Liverpool.

HAIR DESTROYED.
A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.
£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.
KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.
HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.
A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

BLUSHING,
permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London

ONE BOX
OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS
will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's
Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.
S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.
Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and withou injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiri confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonia from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

RED NOSES
caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. Howell, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.

SHORT STORIES

No. 348.] [One Penny.

Edited by

C. Arthur Pearson.

For the Week ending August 31st, 1895.

ROMANCE
LOVE
ADVENTURE
WAR HUMOUR
PATHOS

JENS.

THERE had been trouble at the mill that day, and, as usual, I had lost my temper. The men had scowled and muttered among themselves as my harsh words descended on their heads, and many threatening glances had been directed towards me as I was perched upon a pile of lumber, bidding them defiance. The upshot of the quarrel was that I closed the mill for the day, and told them that all who were satisfied to work on the old terms could return to their posts in the morning.

Towards night, however, an uneasy feeling took possession of me. I could not rest. The atmosphere in and about the office seemed stifling and oppressive. I left the mill and went home. On my way I saw groups of workmen gathered at the street corners, all looking at me with menacing glances.

But what did I care for their looks? Were they not dependent upon me and my mill for the bread to satisfy their hunger, and for the rags to cover their bodies? Yes! What did it matter to me whether they worked or not? I could afford to close the mill for years—for ever, if I chose—and still have enough for my every want. I laughed in their faces as I passed, and called them fools.

When I reached home my sister met me at the door. There was an anxious look in her eyes and a tremour in her voice as she greeted me.

"Oh, Edward! is it true that you have had trouble again with the men at the mill?" she asked.

I scanned her face closely before I answered. Yes, our hereditary curse—insanity—shone in her eyes now. It had come upon us at last.

I could hardly repress the cry of pain that sprang to my lips at the discovery. With an effort, however, I calmed myself and kissed her as usual. Then I replied to her question:

"Yes, sister mine. The dogs had the audacity to ask for shorter hours. Of course, I refused them and closed the mill. They can do their loafing now at their own expense, and it will not be long before their empty stomachs will bring them to their senses."

With the subtlety of insanity Clare tried to reason with me that evening. She took the men's part, and pleaded for them so piteously that at last, just to please and quiet her, I consented to accede to some of their unreasonable demands.

At this she came and kissed me, and after a few minutes' conversation on other subjects she left me and retired for the night.

When alone, however, the pent-up feelings that had been tormenting me the whole evening broke loose from all restraint. I vowed then to take a terrible revenge upon the dolts who, by their demands at the mill that day, had so excited Clare, bringing on the crisis that unbalanced her mind.

For years I had been constantly on the watch for the first symptoms of insanity which I knew would come sooner or later to my sister or me. The disease was hereditary, and I had always known that one or both of us would become its victim in the end. Oh! how I had prayed, often and often, that it would fall to my lot, and leave my beautiful Clare unscathed; my prayers had been in vain. That night I saw that the fire was kindled and burning which would finally destroy her reason, and leave her a mental wreck.

All rights reserved.]

Clare and I were all in all to each other. Our parents having died when we were children, we were alone in the world. We both knew what was in store for one of us at least some day, but by an unspoken agreement we had never mentioned the subject between us. I am sure, however, that the same thought governed Clare's actions that ruled mine, and that she feared the excitement resultant from the quarrel at the mill would bring on the beginning of the end, never dreaming that the very fear she entertained had effected in her what she dreaded should happen to me.

There was one man especially whom I had marked for punishment—a fellow who had said nothing, but who, I felt satisfied, was at the bottom of the trouble, for he was well fitted by his superior knowledge and attainments to be a leader of the rabble that had threatened me. Adam Morley should suffer for the part he had taken. He did not deceive me by standing apart from the rest, looking on disinterestedly. His acting was too transparent to deceive me—so overdone that it betrayed him and his little scheme.

Yes; the more I thought the matter over the more convinced I become that Morley was the instigator of the trouble, and that he was the man on whom to take revenge. When I had made this perfectly clear to myself I took a knife, a murderous-looking weapon I had picked up one day at the mill, and put it in my pocket. Then drawing my hat well down over my face, I stole noiselessly out of the house.

I knew from former experiences that the mill-hands were yet out in the streets, congregated at the corners, and in the bar-rooms, as usual, when they had a day to themselves.

My judgment of their habits and character was true and correct, for I found them just where I had expected.

The men were gathered in small groups here and there, orderly enough to look at, but I knew from their actions and from the subdued tones in which they were talking that they were planning some new devilry for the next day. I walked along leisurely, although every feeling within me prompted me to rush forward, weapon in hand, and scatter death and destruction among them.

I was just passing a dark doorway when someone reached out and grasped me by the arm, drawing me inside.

"Mr. Zavalla, please do not go away further," a man's voice said, in low tones. "The men have been drinking all day, and are just in the humour to do you some harm if you go among them."

"Who are you?" I asked.

"Adam Morley."

The very man I had come out to find! and here I had found him, or, rather, he had found me. I felt like shouting in exultation at my success. Here we two were standing face to face in the dark, I grasping the knife in my hand ready to strike, and he unsuspecting and defenceless.

Just then someone laid a hand upon my shoulder, and a voice, gentle, but clear and distinct, spoke in my ear:

"Easy, easy, my friend. That would be murder."

At the sound of the voice and the touch of the hand a strange thrill went through me. My arm dropped to my side, and the tumult in my breast seemed to die. A new feeling came over me, a sense of peace and quiet and rest.

"Come, Mr. Zavalla," the speaker continued, "this is no place for you at this time of night. I am going your way, and will keep you company until we reach your house."

The man took my arm. I felt perfectly contented to go with him. When we reached the street, and the light from a gas lamp fell upon him, I looked into his face. He was a perfect stranger to me.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Zavalla," he said, with a smile. "I forgot to introduce myself. My name is Jens. I knew your father intimately at one time, and I hope I may be allowed to call his son also by the name of friend."

"Certainly you may, Mr. Jens," I replied, cordially, feeling drawn to this strange man in an unaccountable manner altogether new to me, for it had always been one of my great difficulties to become on friendly terms with anybody.

I am fully six feet in height, so that, by my side, Jens was a comparatively small man, his head barely reaching up to my shoulder. He was slender in build, with remarkably small hands and feet, and his movements were quick, but sure and exact, free from that nervous flutter which often attends the swift motions of small men.

But the special charm in Jens was his eyes. In darkness or light I seemed to feel them looking at me from the first moment we met. His voice, too, had a peculiar power over my feelings. Whenever its sound reached my ears, no matter how excited I had been just before, a restful feeling would steal over me, and I became cool and collected.

That night Jens somehow gained a mastery over me from which I fear death alone can emancipate me. When we reached my house he followed me inside, at my invitation, of course; but it had been wrung from me by one of his glances and the soft purring murmur of his voice.

I can never tell why I did so, but I confided to Jens all my troubles. We slept in the same room; I in my own bed, he on the sofa—that being his choice. The day was just breaking when I awoke. I lay for a few moments thinking over what had happened the night before, and I felt heartily ashamed of myself for the foolish part I had acted in taking a perfect stranger into my confidence, and giving him a lodging under my roof.

As I pondered, I became convinced that Jens, the pretended friend of my father, was an impostor and a fraud. When I had fully come to this conclusion, it needed only a moment to form the determination that he must leave my house.

With this intention I got up and approached the sofa on which he was lying, apparently sound asleep. When I drew near, however, he turned his face towards me, looking up with his wonderful eyes, and smiling brightly.

"You are an early riser, my friend," he said. "I am inclined that way myself, but not knowing your habits I did not like to disturb you."

I assured him that he would have to get up before the first faint peep of dawn if he expected to find me asleep.

My determination to eject him from my house that morning failed as miserably as it failed every morning after. The look in his eyes, the sound of his voice, his smile of calm assurance disarmed me, and I was helpless.

He became an inmate of my house; he ate my bread, and ruled me by a word or a glance. When he was absent, or I was out of his sight, I hated him, and regretted the day on which I had fallen into his power. Even my beautiful Clare came under his influence.

Jens followed me about wherever I went. In the street, at the office, or in the mills, he was at my heels.

The change in my sister from day to day was fully apparent to my watchful eyes. Often I saw her stealing away from my door on tiptoe, after standing there watching me closely for several minutes. At such times I never looked up from my work, but let her follow out her strange whims without showing her that she had been detected.

One day she had not come to my door as usual for over an hour, and I became uneasy. I went to her room, but she was not there. Then I visited the sitting-room and the library, but found her in neither place. Next I went into the garden. I was stealing along the walk leading to her favourite arbour as noiselessly as possible, so as not to startle her, should I find her there, when the sound of subdued voices reached my ears.

I paused a moment, and crouching down where I stood I peered through the shrubbery. What I saw there I shall never forget as long as life is in me.

Jens held my poor demented sister in his embrace, kissing her again and again, while the blushes came and went on her beautiful face. She was so completely in his power that she did not even struggle to become free or murmur a protest against his outrage. Her bright eyes gleamed with a light I had never seen in them before—half fear, half ecstasy—as she gazed mutely into his.

A resistless longing came over me to grasp the unprincipled scoundrel by the throat. My hands fairly clawed the air, as with a cry of rage upon my lips I dashed through the bushes and rushed towards him.

The cry betrayed me, and his life was saved. The next thing I remember, Jens was bending over me as I lay prostrate upon the ground, his mysterious eyes looking straight into mine, while what seemed to me a taunting smile hovered round the corners of his mouth.

"Come, Edward," he said, "let me assist you to your feet." The tone was more authoritative than any he had ever used to me before.

I did not resist him. I submitted meekly to his command. But in that moment I vowed to take his life at the first opportunity that offered.

From that day I calmly bided my time. Instead of Jens keeping at my heels as heretofore, it was I who never let him out of my sight.

I gave him no opportunity to be alone with my sister, and I could see that it annoyed him. One day, however, when I had been rather more persistent than usual in following him about, he said to me in Clare's presence, as he took her hand in his:

"Edward, I love your sister, and she has promised to become my wife. Have you any objection to our engagement?"

Cruel knave! He had chosen his time and place with keen foresight. With Clare's eyes looking into mine imploringly, and her hands clinging to him trustfully, what answer could I give?

He had wrung consent from me; but that should not save him from the fate I had in store for him. Carefully, imperceptibly, I was weaving a web round him, which would be his doom sooner or later.

One night the opportunity came. The mill was running night and day, through a pressure of work. I resumed my place while the rush lasted, and had chosen the night watch; for that, I knew, would afford me the best chance to get rid of my enemy.

I had the plan perfected to a nicety. There was a long, inclined plane inside the mill into which the slabs and refuse were thrown. At the bottom of this plane was an endless chain that carried the stuff up a sort of lift to the height of over one hundred feet and fully five hundred yards from the mill; thence it was shot down from its elevation into the slab pit below, where a fire was burning constantly, fed by an almost continuous stream of slabs and timber ends.

It was midnight. The mill had been stopped for half an hour while the hands were eating their meal. I had made the rounds of the mill during this time, and had inspected everything. Jens followed me. We had returned to the saw-room and stopped at the edge of the plane.

I carried a hammer in my hand which I had always used during my tour of inspection. As we stopped at the plane I turned suddenly, pointing into space behind us, without saying a word. Jens was thrown off his guard, and looked round.

His back was towards me for a moment. With all my strength I struck him over the head with the hammer, and at the same time, with a push, sent him spinning to the bottom of the plane.

Then I ran to the engineer's station. I pulled the lever, throwing the throttle wide open. The machinery started with such suddenness that belts and pulleys creaked, and the large circular saws hummed and clanged like a thousand bells.

I never stopped to see what happened inside the mill. I ran outside, and thence to a high bank on the river, where I could have a full view of the smoking, burning pit below.

Slab after slab came tumbling over, and shot downwards into the burning mass, but I was looking to see the body of my hated enemy. I saw him at last, but he was standing upright, moving slowly, his form clearly outlined against the starry sky.

Just then there came a terrible roar and hiss. The earth shook and trembled under my feet, and a shower of iron and bricks, of timbers and splinters of wood, fell about me on every side.

I looked round me. The mill was one great blaze of fire. A huge pillar of smoke ascended on the calm night air, bearing the souls of the dead and the groans of the wounded and dying with it towards Heaven.

* * * * *

They say I am mad. They say I am a murderer. Perhaps I am both; perhaps I am neither. They do not hang mad men; however, at least not as long as they have sense enough to behave themselves as such.

* * * * *

I was almost thrown off my guard to-day. Clare visited me—she is as mad as a March hare now—looking as beautiful as ever. Jens was with her. He had a deep, broad scar across his face, and walked with a limp, so that I did not recognise him at first.

But when I saw his eyes I knew him instantly. They stayed with me most of the afternoon. When they were going away, Jens for a moment took his eyes off me. I was about to spring upon him and grasp him by the throat when he turned round again suddenly with the old smile upon his face.

"Remember, Edward, that you must behave like a gentleman, or people will think you are deceiving them," he said.

There must be something in that advice. I will dissect and analyse it by the time poor Clare and that rascally husband of hers visit me again. W. H. H.

IT CAME TO PASS

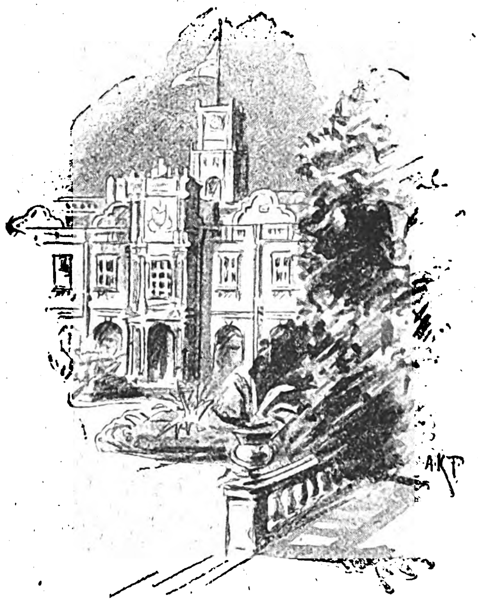
BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

CHAPTER VI.

The two latest comers in the Hotel Mirabeau, St. Moritz, were Mrs. Peel and her invalid step-son.

All sorts and conditions of men had assembled in the large dining-hall, and Charlotte surveyed them curiously, as she took her seat beside Hugh.

Charlotte tried to smile at the frail boy under her care and engage him in conversation, but her lips quivered involuntarily. She had taken the law into her own hands—unfolded the history of his birth, and enforced the journey to save his endangered life. Yet even now he could hardly realise she was not some mysterious visitant from another world. She had donned a loose white gown for comfort, and fastened a soft frill of chiffon round her throat.



The Hotel Mirabeau, St. Moritz.

"What a different atmosphere to smoky London!" said Hugh, at last. "I feel fresh life coursing through my veins already."

"You will soon get strong and well again," she replied, "with complete freedom from worry. I cannot bear to think of your late slavery while that wicked Mrs. Donnington-Bain lived on the fat of the land, and wasted your substance. Did you never love her, Hugh?"

"How could I love such a woman! She is just as hard as a stone. I cannot remember her ever kissing me as a child, or saying a kind word. I grew up unloved, unblessed. But for my musical passion I should have starved for lack of sympathy. During those years I simply lived on the hope of some day appearing before an audience, and when at last the great time came I nearly died of excitement. Every nerve in my body tingled and vibrated through the instrument. I forgot that many millions daily indulged the same flights—men and women whose genius made fame easy and success assured. But this was fortunate, since a sense of inferiority has hindered hundreds from nurturing talent."

"Yes; they aspire to perfection and faint by the way."

Hugh agreed. He had experienced that faintness in the great city of London.

"I met such a sad-looking woman on the staircase," he said, "but she is not among the diners. She seemed almost too weak to walk, and every few steps clung to the banisters, panting. She stared at me blankly, and her lips parted in a half-smothered exclamation. I thought she was going to speak, but she passed on wearily. I glanced back at the foot of the stairs and saw her standing above gazing down with wide wondering eyes. Probably some mutual attraction caused us to turn simultaneously, and yet I fancied she had been watching me longer."

"I dare say we shall find endless opportunities for character-study here. You must point her out to me."

After dinner Hugh saw the stranger again.

"There she is," he whispered, "on that lounge in the window."

"How lonely she looks, poor creature, and what a strangely pathetic expression!"

Her smooth grey hair waved back softly from her forehead, lined with suffering. She was the broken down wreck of a once handsome woman. Occasionally her eyes flashed in the light; they had been bright and piercing in their day. The faded complexion turned a shade greyer as she caught sight of Hugh, while vague anxiety fretted her brow. Charlotte drew nearer.

"I am afraid I stared at your young companion," the pale lady said, addressing her in low hurried tones. "His face startled me. He looks very ill!"

"Yes, I have brought him here for his health."

"That word embraces so much, sometimes merely excusing bad temper, often forestalling death."

Charlotte shivered.

"I beg your pardon," said the stranger. "I had no intention of paining you. It seems such a little thing to me, for I am very ill myself—incurable. I was tired of lying in bed, and got up to-night for an hour. I was racked with a horrible, throbbing pain, and had no one to speak to. I am here quite alone. I heard your young friend coughing on the stairs; it reminded me of a cough I once had myself, and I thought of my mixture. It is very strong and effectual, an American prescription—Jamaica ginger, rum, and honey, etc. I should be very glad if he would try it."

"Thanks," said Charlotte; "it is very good of you."

"He is such a pretty boy," said the stranger, "though he might not appreciate the name."

"He is nineteen years of age."

"Nineteen—only nineteen!"

"He is very musical," Charlotte vouchsafed, glad to distract her own mind by conversation. "Are you fond of the violin?"

"It is my favourite instrument," the lady replied. "I should have taken it up, but painting was more my forte as a girl."

"Why 'as a girl'? Surely you have not dropped it?"

"Yes, unfortunately. I haven't touched a brush for nearly twenty years."

"What a pity to neglect your art!"

"My life has been a dreary one—you could not understand how dreary. Perhaps some day you will persuade your young friend to play for me. I should like to hear some music again before I die."

"He is my stepson, and would do anything I asked him. He fancied you seemed ill on the staircase."

"Yes. It was that pain over my heart. He looked as though he wanted to help me, yet hardly dared. Sympathy goes far to alleviate suffering."

Charlotte felt a deep compassion for her, and signed to Hugh to join them.

"I have not yet learned your name," she said, "so I cannot introduce you."

"Mrs. Leigh," was the quick retort; "and yours?"

"Peel—Charlotte Peel."

"Now I seem to know you better," declared Mrs. Leigh, glancing swiftly at Charlotte as she spoke. "I wish I could sit up longer, it is such a pleasure to talk; but I am obliged to retire early. My nights are simply interminable. I try to read, but the few books I have are very dry. A lady here lent me an amusing story which I scanned while in great pain. It actually made me laugh, though a moment later I flung it on the floor, damaging the flimsy paper cover. She has not offered me another since. Your room is No. 150, Mrs. Peel?"

"Yes. How did you know?"

"Mine is 149, and I saw your luggage taken in. I hope that my being an invalid will not disturb you, as I sometimes cry out loudly in my sleep. I am very nervous, and dream terribly."

She rose with an effort, and held out a blue-veined hand.

"Good-night, Mrs. Peel," she said, a slight quiver in her voice. "I hope you will rest well."

Then she glided from the room like a grey-gowned ghost, closing the door noiselessly behind her.

"What a queer-looking woman," said Charlotte, "and yet she fascinates me. Fancy, Hugh! she says she is dying."

"And possibly already in touch with the other world," he suggested.

"How strange that she should be here alone in such a condition! She must have some friends or relatives."

"Apparently not."

"Poor creature! It makes me feel uncomfortable to think of her."

"You are tired and worried, Mrs. Peel. May I write and acquaint your husband with our movements while you rest? I think you ought to tell him."

"Perhaps; but I will write myself. Heaven knows I do not want to bear malice; but he was so hard, so cruel, and time alone will soften him. I took the only course open to me, and you have no cause for self-reproach. It is best as it is."

"Dear Mrs. Peel, when I think of all the trouble I have brought upon you I wish I had never been born. And what a birth! It is too horrible to think of!"

"Then don't dwell upon it. Live in the present, and try to forget the past. By the way, remember that your name is 'Peel' now, and 'Derringer' no longer."

"Except to the public," he said, with a smile. "I shall hardly know myself as 'Peel.' But you are overcome with fatigue, and I must not keep you talking."

"Before I leave you, promise not to write to Raymond."

"Is it likely I should neglect your wishes after all your goodness? I shall never be able to repay you."

"Then if you wish to please me, say nothing about it," she replied fondly, but though she smiled there was a tremour in her voice.

"Sleep well!" he whispered, pressing her hand. "God bless you."

Charlotte wished him good-night hastily, and turned away to hide her tears.

"Sleep well!" she thought. "Oh! the irony of the words! Could there be any sleep for me with this weight of sorrow on my heart?"

She went silently upstairs, and flinging open her window, gazed out at the black darkness.

"Oh! Raymond! Raymond!" she moaned, forcing back her tears. "I want you so badly. Everything is empty without you. Why—why wouldn't you be kind to me and to your son? Isn't his neglected life a slur on your manhood, and are you not sorry to-night for your forlorn little wife bearing your burden alone?"

She felt he must hear her, as she stretched out her arms to the skies, with a gesture of despair. Then her head sank upon the window-sill, and two or three low sobs shook her frame.

Poor Charlotte Peel! The world seemed very desolate, as a prayer rose from the depths of her heavily-laden spirit.

"Help me, oh, Lord, and soften Raymond's heart! Bring him to me again, for Thy mercy's sake. Bring back the dear departed days of love and happiness."

Her door opened softly, and she started up, half-expecting that her prayer was answered.

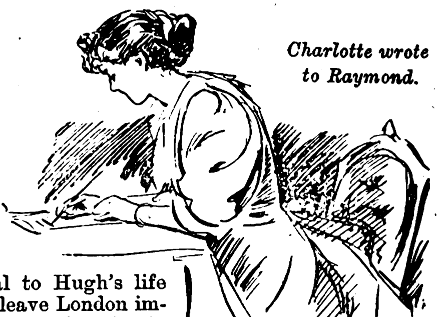
Before her stood a gaunt figure robed in white, with short grey hair falling over her neck, and strange gleaming eyes which sought Charlotte's astonished gaze.

"Mrs. Leigh!" she exclaimed, dashing away her tears.

"Don't be frightened," replied the figure, extending a long thin arm. "I have only brought the cough mixture."

CHAPTER VII.

The following morning Charlotte wrote to Raymond, little guessing in what a fever of suspense he had passed the last few days, or how welcome would be the sight of the familiar hand.



Charlotte wrote to Raymond.

"I am sending our address," she began, "hoping you may have reconsidered your decision. It was essential to Hugh's life that he should leave London immediately, so I brought him to St. Moritz, where I am thankful to say the climate is working wonders. Oh! Raymond, need I tell you how deeply I feel this separation? Never think, dear, that I came away from any lack of affection, for my love is, if possible, strengthened rather than shaken by this great sorrow. I am ready to forget everything if you will come to me and own your son. Why should we cringe to the opinion of the world? So long as I have you, my husband, I want nothing more, so let us brave it out together. If you could look into my heart, I know you would come. Every hour the blank in my life grows darker and more dreary, till I fancy the task I have set myself is too hard. I want you Raymond—I want you." Having folded the note with trembling fingers, Charlotte put away her writing materials—a calm, cold look of self-possession on her pale face. She tried not to realise how much depended on his answer, though her heart was like lead, and her body felt chilled and numb. Then remembering the sufferer upstairs, Charlotte sent to inquire for Mrs. Leigh, who proved worse and desired to see her. With ready promptitude she obeyed the summons, her sympathetic heart aching for the lonely woman.

"Forgive me, Mrs. Peel," murmured the invalid feebly, "for troubling you to come. But the doctor is sending a nurse this morning, as I am decidedly weaker, and I fear I may not like her." She stretched out her hand pathetically. "Dear friend, you are so different to an ordinary stranger that I ventured to hope you would stay with me a little. Is it too much to ask?"

Charlotte sat down by the white curtained bed, and took Mrs. Leigh's thin fingers in her own. "No, I am only too glad," she replied, "for I feel very lonely here."

A look of surprise came into Mrs. Leigh's drawn face. Involuntarily she shook her head. "You will never be friendless and deserted as I am," she declared, speaking with a certain grave assurance.

Charlotte shivered as she watched the bright sunshine creep across the room and fall upon the sick bed.

"No, I ought not to complain," she said, "for I am hoping" (laying a stress on the word) "that my husband will join us shortly, and in the meanwhile his son is with me. But surely you have some relations or friends, Mrs. Leigh, who would come to you?"

"Not one."

It was a pitiful admission, and brought a flush to the ghastly cheeks. For a moment her voice faltered; then she continued in ordinary tones: "It must seem very strange to you that I am left to die alone, but I suppose I have escaped love. It is the painful consequence of a wasted existence."

"You may have done good without knowing it," murmured Charlotte soothingly, "for few lives are utterly useless. Example alone goes a long way."

"Unfortunately it is not so with me, and I have only myself to blame for a loveless old age. I have a history, Mrs. Peel, a miserably sad story, of which I never speak. Are you content to befriend a dying woman who has sinned in the past, since death"—with a faint smile—"must shortly divide us?"

Charlotte felt the speaker's burning hand tighten on her arm, and pity for the sinking life welled into her eyes. She had grown fond of her in a single night, and determined, whatever her history, to cheer these last days of pain.

"You could never guess what I have endured," continued Mrs. Leigh, in answer to a sympathetic word from her listener. "I have suffered so long and so deeply that I cannot weep or cry or wring my hands, or go through any of the pantomime of grief. Three days ago the tears came to my eyes for the first time during the last ten years. A little girl in the gardens put her arms round my neck and kissed me. Perpetual sorrow has a hardening effect, which only a child can soften."

"Then you are very fond of children?"

A sudden light came into her eyes.

"Oh! yes. They are so perfectly unconscious of disgrace or sin. But tell me, Mrs. Peel, have you a good husband?"

She asked the question abruptly. For a moment it remained unanswered.

"What do you call good?"

"Does he love as he should? Is he kind and considerate?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Charlotte, without hesitation. "We have had but one dispute since our marriage, and his very faults are ten times dearer to me than another's virtues."

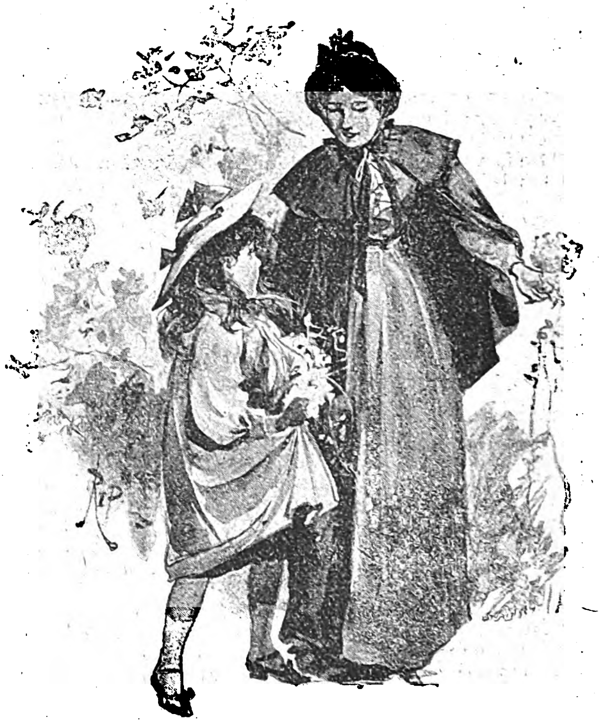
"Happy woman. How few wives could say the same."

"Your husband is dead, I believe?"

There was silence in the room, and Charlottte, turning to Mrs. Leigh, saw her lying back among the pillows, with her face in the shadow. Her eyes were closed, she was feigning sleep. Presently she stirred uneasily, and reopened them.

"How foolishly weak I am—like a fly in late autumn," she declared, forcing a strained smile. "The poor doomed creatures crawl about waiting for the end."

Charlotte tactfully refrained from returning to the subject, though Mrs. Leigh's unknown sorrow was ever present to her mind. She pictured a life, without hope, without joy, without even tears, and the vision appalled her!



A little girl in the gardens.

The door opened, and a bright-faced nurse entered.

Mrs. Leigh raised herself, eyeing the new-comer critically.

"You are just like a doll I once dressed for a bazaar," she said, "with white strings to its bonnet, and a nurse's frock. That was in my early married life. Everything happened twenty years ago!"

With a farewell word, Mrs. Peel glided from the room.

"That poor woman was quite light-headed this morning, she will not live many days," Charlotte told Hugh.

"Come out and forget that all the world's a hospital," he replied. "Do you know I am so relieved to think you have written to your husband? I could not rest until he knew our whereabouts."

"What will he answer?" Charlotte wondered, painfully conscious of the weight upon her heart.

"Who is that fair-haired girl in the window?" asked Hugh. "What a sweet face—just like a little wax doll!"

"Mrs. Leigh said the same. She is the nurse in 149."

CHAPTER VIII.

NURSE EVELYN supplied Mrs. Peel with details of her patient's case.

"You have come to be near her, I suppose?" she said one morning, pausing on the landing for a moment's conversation.

"Oh! no," replied Charlotte. "I only met her here by chance, and was struck by her forlorn condition."

The nurse raised her eyebrows.

"Really! Yet she speaks of you constantly, even in her sleep. She has also told me about your stepson."

"Indeed!" said Charlotte. "She felt interested in him, poor fellow, for he is consumptive, you know."

Yes; Nurse Evelyn knew. She heard his cough on the staircase as she crept noiselessly back to the sick chamber, with flowers from Charlotte in her hand.

"I am better this morning, nurse," murmured Mrs. Leigh. "Won't you sit by my bed and talk? My life has been very silent, and I love a cheerful voice. Have you seen young Mr. Peel to-day?—the boy with the face of an angel."

"I noticed a gentleman in the garden with Mrs. Peel. He glanced up at the window, and certainly his profile was singularly striking—more like a girl's than a man's."

"Good people deserve to be beautiful," she replied gloomily. "I lost my looks twenty years ago, and ever since then life has been one long spell of atonement."

"You must not dwell upon sad subjects," said Nurse Evelyn, kindly but firmly.

"I like them—they are in keeping with my mood. Won't you tell me of your experiences at the hospital in England?"

Nurse Evelyn's face brightened, for she loved to talk of her calling.

"Children were my chief charge there," she began, folding her hands across her knees, "such dear little creatures! I remember my mother visiting me once, and going the round of the cots. A curly haired boy who was up and running about pointed to a small patient lying very ill, and said:

"'Tommy went to the theatre yesterday, ma'am.'

"'How nice for Tommy!' replied my mother, smiling at the sick child, whose convalescent companion appeared vastly amused.

"'It ain't that sort of theatre,' he continued cheerfully. 'I means the place downstairs, where they puts yer to sleep whether you will or no, and cuts yer up!' I never liked carrying the children to the operating room, they clung round my neck and cried."

"I adore children!" said Mrs. Leigh.

"Have you none of your own?" asked nurse Evelyn.

The sick woman quailed at the question, her face blanched, as she leant back panting.

"This pain across my heart is killing me!" she moaned.

It was the remembrance of a secret sorrow that drove her to the verge of delirium as she closed her eyes and dropped into a heavy stupor, murmuring, half inarticulately:

"Ask me no questions—no questions!" she cried. "Why will they worry me? Your husband is dead, I believe? Have you no children? Oh, those questions—those questions!"

Nurse Evelyn's professional ears caught the gist of her patient's ramblings.

"Nurse," she cried at last. "Nurse, have I incriminated myself?"

"No," came the soft reply, and a cool hand was laid on her burning forehead, as with faltering footsteps, as it were, Mrs. Leigh returned to the realisation of the present.

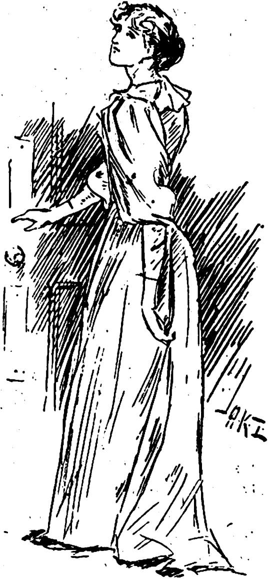
* * * * *

Raymond was worn out with sleepless nights and fruitless searching; his deserted house seemed like an empty tomb. He fancied Charlotte's presence lurked in every corner, and occasionally started up, imagining he heard her voice, or saw her standing before him with outstretched arms. Every post he watched eagerly; even when out his servants had directions to follow him with letters, that not a moment might be lost should Charlotte proffer an olive branch.

James the butler was in a high state of indignation at Mrs. Peel's conduct, enlarging daily in the servant's hall upon "Master's hevident hanxiety."

"What about dinner to-night, James?" asked the footman, in unusually subdued tones.

"Master went out to that church opposite," replied James stolidly. "I watched him across the road" (with an ominous shake of his head). "All these years as I've been in his service I never knew him to do that of a week day. It's a bad sign, depend upon it, a very bad sign. Missus used to like them Wednesday evening services, and I suppose 'e remembered it to-night."



Saw her standing before him.

"It's my opinion she's committed suicide," declared Parker, the younger man. "Women are that fanciful, especially when they're married; they gets queer ideas and rum notions. Look at cook! She drove her husband to his grave in three months."

Parker had a poor opinion of the weaker sex, having read of meddlesome females who lecture on man's delinquencies, and considered cook the latest form of an emancipated woman. James, on the other hand, admired the victim of Parker's disparaging remarks, and grew hot at the sneer.

"Mrs. Blundelberry is a thoroughly domesticated and highly educated pusson!" he declared emphatically, "and if it wasn't that we were both so well placed in present circumstances, I would make her Mrs. James Jellicoe to-morrow!"

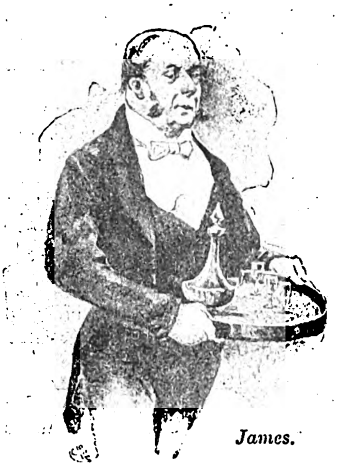
Having delivered himself of this astounding sentiment, he left Parker open-mouthed, as the postman's rap fell on his vigilant ears.

He scanned the contents of the letter-box.

"My stars! here's missus's fist at last! I'd know that 'P' in a thousand. Thank the Lord! Parker was wrong, for suicides can't write nohow."

Breathless and hatless he fled across the street, bearing the precious missive in his hand. Raymond was kneeling in the sacred edifice, with bent head and folded hands, praying as he had never prayed in his life before for the safe return of his absent wife.

A woman's face in the stained glass window above him brought Charlotte vividly to his mind. Was it a virgin mother—a Magdalen or Martha? No. It was Charlotte—his Charlotte, looking down with sweet forgiving eyes. As he gazed on the figure wrapt in thought, James Jellicoe's stealthy footsteps crept softly up the aisle. A hand was laid on his elbow, a hand which contained the wealth of the world for Raymond—the letter from St. Moritz



James.

(To be concluded.)

An Amateur Scoundrel

MLLE. DAUREL stopped in front of the post office. Her right hand held up her skirts. She released them with a sudden movement and thrust her hand into her muff, which she held in her left hand. At the same moment she uttered a cry of surprise. The little purse that she always carried in her muff was no longer there.

"Oh!" she cried, looking to the right and to the left. A few feet away from there stood a man of about fifty years of age, clean shaven, stout, and well dressed. He was looking at her attentively. Then he suddenly came towards her, and with a polite bow and an evil smile he said:

"Mademoiselle, I live near by, in the Rue de la Michodiere, No. 60—M. Chouinot; man of business. If you desire to have news regarding the purse you have been so unfortunate as to lose I can furnish it to you."

M. Chouinot was a fine specimen of a rascal. It must be confessed life was difficult for him. He had endeavoured to make a success of several enterprises, but every time, just as the longed-for end was in view, an obstacle had arisen and overwhelmed him. That obstacle was Justice.

The clients whom he had attempted to dupe had made complaints to the police, and the police had started investigations which had finally brought M. Chouinot face to face with the superintendent of police, the judge on the bench, and then the prison of Mazas. Happily, he had so far been able to avoid long terms of imprisonment, which was something, but he had been obliged in every case to disgorge his gain and restore to their rightful owners the sums of money that had been confided by them to his care.

In short, he had so far been successful only in putting to one side his scruples.

That day he was walking behind Mlle. Daurel. Was he looking at her? It is probable that he was, for Mlle. Daurel deserved it. Rarely has a more charming woman been seen.

That she had the appearance of a smart woman, a supple and graceful figure, beautifully proportioned, could be seen from her back. In front it was seen that she had a lovely face, dark ardent eyes, an adorably chiselled nose, a fine mouth, and besides these an infinite and subtle charm that was indefinable. She was a woman no man could help looking at.

So, as has been said already, M. Chouinot was walking behind Mlle. Daurel. Suddenly he saw that she had dropped something on the pavement. He was about to call her attention to the fact when an idea presented itself to his mind.

"Never trust a first impulse," thought he.

No one happened to be passing at the moment! Why should he not take possession of the article, provided it was worth the trouble?

M. Chouinot opened the purse. For it was a purse that Mlle. Daurel had let fall—a pretty little purse with her name on it in neat silver letters. It contained a fifty franc bank-note, several scraps of paper, and a letter in an envelope ready to be posted.

M. Chouinot rapidly looked over the pieces of paper. They were letters that showed signs of having been read and re-read many times. They were almost in pieces, and all bore the same signature, Henri.

The letter in the envelope was addressed to M. Henri de Prejailles.

So the owner of the purse was answering love-letters?

"Ha, ha!" exclaimed M. Chouinot to himself. Then he found some cards bearing the name "Mlle. Daurel," and M. Chouinot began to think deeply.

"Mlle. Daurel to a male friend, Henri de Prejailles, who is bitterly opposed by her father. Excellent affair!"

Without a tremour he opened the envelope, and taking out the letter began to read.

"It remains to be seen now whether Mlle. Daurel is rich," said M. Chouinot to himself. "In any case it will be sufficient if her friend is. Henri de Prejailles sounds well. I will find this out as quickly as possible."

Talking thus to himself, M. Chouinot kept following Mlle. Daurel. When he saw her stop in front of the Post Office, he stopped too. It was the decisive moment.

"She wants to post her letters now, and discovers that her purse is lost," continued M. Chouinot in monologue. "I will approach her very politely and beg her to come to my office for news of the lost article. There I shall tell her my conditions."

M. Chouinot's deductions were perfectly accurate. Is it necessary to say that when Mlle. Daurel heard M. Chouinot address her, she turned in surprise, which rapidly changed to confusion and terror, and left her without a word of reply.

As soon as she recovered her self-possession, M. Chouinot, who had turned upon his heel as soon as his little speech was concluded, was already disappearing down the street.

Thus she found herself at the mercy of this man. Doubtless he had opened the purse, had read her letters, and now would only restore them to her in return for a large reward. Mlle. Daurel faced the situation.

"There is no use hesitating," she thought; "I must go to this man." And she went.

M. Chouinot was waiting for her, and as soon as she had made known her name she was introduced into the private office of the man of business.

M. Chouinot rose to meet her and bowed.

"Here is your purse," he said to her, holding out the article he had picked up shortly before on the pavement.

Mlle. Daurel, a little surprised, was about to thank him warmly, when he began:

"I hand you back your purse, but honesty compels me to state that it does not return to you intact. It still contains, indeed, the note for fifty francs, because money is always sacred. You will also find here your visiting cards. But I thought it was imprudent of you to keep your letters there. An indiscretion is so easily committed. Therefore, I will take care of them for you—oh, the utmost care, I assure you!"

Mlle. Daurel understood. The man had laid a trap for her, and she had tumbled into it.

"But, monsieur," she stammered, "the purse you have picked up is my property. You have no right to keep it, whatever it may contain."

"You think so?"

"I can go to the police, and they will force you to give me back those letters."

"And I can go to the police, and tell them that I picked up nothing; that I know nothing of any purse, and that I, M. Chouinot, a business man, am above all suspicion of such things."

Mlle. Daurel did not insist on this point.

"But," she said, "why do you keep those letters? They have no interest for you. I assure you——"

"Letters of that sort, I assure you, are very nice to keep. M. Henri de Prejailles writes most interestingly, and your own style, madame, is delightful."

Mlle. Daurel flushed. She had loosened for a brief second her grasp on the purse, and that little moment of negligence was going to cost her dearly.

"You forget," continued M. Chouinot, "that everybody who recovers a lost article is entitled to a reward."

"I am prepared to give it to you, monsieur."

"Agreed. But there are rewards and rewards. I think the correspondence of Mlle. Daurel and Henri de Prejailles is worth a good price."

"Oh! monsieur—"

"A very high price, I repeat. For 20,000 francs I will return you your letters. Otherwise I will give them to your father."

Mlle. Daurel became furious.

"But it is a swindle!" she shrieked.

"That is a hasty word for such an exquisite mouth."

"Wretch!"

And Mlle. Daurel threw one of her cards in the face of M. Chouinot. The man of business remained calm and said:

"A second card is useless; I have already taken one. Twenty thousand francs, I repeat. M. Daurel is a builder and rich! 20,000 francs is nothing to him!"

This was said quietly and with calm cynicism.

After her anger a reaction had followed, and Mlle. Daurel grew quiet. She was frightened now, panting and overwhelmed; M. Chouinot did not move or say a word. She sank down on a chair, with her eyes on the ground, listening to this man as if she was being sentenced to death.

Then there was a silence, and Mlle. Daurel rose and walked towards the door. What was she going to do?

That was what M. Chouinot wanted to know.

Several hours later she would return. Probably she would try and bargain with him for 15,000 or 10,000 francs. But he, M. Chouinot, would remain unalterable, 20,000 francs.

And Mlle. Daurel would spread out on the table, not without regrets, twenty banknotes of 1,000 francs each.

At the thought of this M. Chouinot rubbed his hands.

"I am a lucky man; twenty thousand francs for merely picking up a purse."

But the hours passed, and Mlle. Daurel did not return. Probably she needed more time to get the money.

Meanwhile M. Chouinot sang to himself while he waited.

Presently an employé of the office came in.

"Monsieur, there is someone asking for you outside."

"The girl, no doubt?"

"No, sir; it is a gentleman!"

"A gentleman? Show him in."

The visitor came into the office.

"Monsieur," he said, looking M. Chouinot in the eye, "I am M. Henri de Prejailles!"

The man of business took a step backward.

"Oh, do not be afraid. I have no intention of administering to you the thrashing you so richly deserve. It gives me pleasure, however, to say that you are an infamous villain. Having said this, I ask you now to follow me."

"Monsieur!"

M. Chouinot moved further and further away.

Henry de Prejailles took a pistol out of his pocket and put the end of it under M. Chouinot's nose.

"Will you follow me?"

"I will follow you, monsieur; but remember one thing, that your letters are in a safe place, and that you cannot force me to give them up, and—"

"Exactly; meanwhile, walk in front of me, and not a word, or I will shoot you like a dog!"

Below a carriage was in attendance, and M. Chouinot got in. Henri de Prejailles took the seat next him.

"Coachman, drive to Rue Rembrandt, No 34, the house of M. Daurel!"

M. Chouinot trembled, but said nothing. There M. de Prejailles said to his companion as he opened the door:

"Monsieur, you may get out; the moment to execute your threat has arrived. Take my letters to M. Daurel!"

M. Chouinot sprang out. He could scarcely believe his ears. What was going to happen next!

At the door stood a servant dressed in black, with a white tie.

M. Chouinot went towards him.

"Monsieur Daurel?" he asked.

"What, monsieur!" said the servant, "have you not heard?"

"What?"

"Monsieur Daurel died this afternoon!"

M. Chouinot was fairly stunned.

"Oh!" he groaned, "I have no luck at all!"

He was about to walk away, when Henri de Prejailles stepped out of the carriage and held him back.

"You see," he said, "that good fortune does not always come to villains of your sort. You will now restore to me the letters you have stolen. We will go to your office to fetch them, and whatever you do, do not keep us waiting."

Poor M. Chouinot! What could he do? He went to his office with Henri de Prejailles at his heels; he took the letters out of a secret safe. M. Henri took them and placed them in his pocket.

"Now, M. Chouinot," he said, "I will tell you that M. Daurel never felt better in his life. He is alive and well. The servant at the door was my own valet. Twenty francs did the trick. You see the 20,000 francs you spoke of seems a pretty high price compared to that."

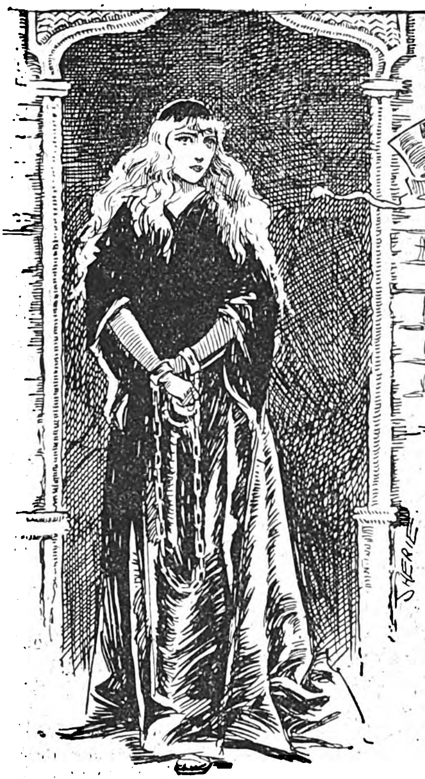
And as M. Chouinot raised his arms to heaven in utter despair, he added:

"For the rest, there is always a bullet in this plaything at your pleasure."

And he showed him his revolver.

E. C. Waggener.

THE WITCH OF SANTA BARBE.



There was a great stir in the tiny village of Santa Barbe. The hilly, picturesque streets were thronged with people decked out in gay attire, though it was not a holiday. In front of the old stone courthouse a mass of people surged, waiting—for what?

Within two weeks the town had become famous, not for its tobacco fields, not for its crops, not for any passing fair, but because Santa Barbe had lately acquired a new saint. Most of the villages possessed saints, but they were old, dried up, and buried centuries before, with the musty relics alone left for the people to worship and adore.

A passing report gathered weight as it spread all over Mexico, that here, in the miserable hamlet of Santa Barbe, a new saint was lying hidden, absolutely new—a girl, young, beautiful, and gifted with marvellous healing powers. The mere touch of her robe in passing was enough, the people said, to cure the vilest disease. In a few hours the people, barefooted and in tatters, were travelling towards Santa Barbe, bringing their sick with them as to a sacred shrine.

Crime and disease found their way hither. "Santa Teresa can take it all away," they said. The magistrates remonstrated: "The town is filled to overflowing. All the wretchedness and filth of Mexico is pouring into Santa Barbe. It must be checked." The decision was a wise one, but what power on earth could stay that rushing river? A quivering mass of humanity seethed outside the lowly hut which the little saint had chosen for her temporary dwelling on this earth. "Come, come!" the people cried. "She will not stay long with us, and when she flies away again to heaven we shall be left in our sins and misery."

Thus Santa Barbe had become world-renowned, even as far as the borders of Mexico stretched, east, west, north, and south. For the people that came sorrowful went away blessing the girl-saint. "It may be that the heart of the gracious Mother has been touched by the sufferings of her children," they murmured, "and she has sent her angel to comfort and heal us." But the magistrates cried out again: "Are the blessed bones of Santa Barbe to be thus mocked and set aside for the whim of a mad people? It must come to an end."

That night, while the people slept, the magistrates climbed the hill to the hut, and with their own hands dragged the girl to the courthouse, and locked her in a prison cell. The soldiers dared not touch her, so those in authority were compelled to perform the deed with their own bejewelled fingers. In the morning the fury of the populace knew no bounds. Their saint, their beautiful saint, has been rudely dealt with, and imprisoned in a cell like a common criminal. The wrath of Heaven must surely descend on Mexico for the rash deed.

The people groaned, and then a few choice spirits bound themselves together, with an oath, to slay the rulers, and deliver the Madonna from her cruel imprisonment.

Oh, the terrible fear that hung over the town! Shops were closed, shutters pulled down, and the people assembled round the old, ivy-hung courthouse.

"Give Santa Teresa back to us," they cried. "Our children weep for her, and we cannot live without her. Where is she, our saint?"

The magistrates held a hurried consultation. There was great danger. Even now no life was safe. Who could answer for the consequences? So the magistrates, five in all, huddled together in the upper chamber, whispering, with their eyes on the windows, while the ceaseless roar of the waiting multitude sounded in their ears. Finally, one of their number rose; he was a tall, thick-set man, with crafty eyes and a Napoleonic jaw.

"Cowards, all of you," he said loudly, striking his closed fist on the table before him. "Think you those dogs would dare to rebel? I myself will speak to them. Watch, you shall see them cringe." He approached the window as he spoke and threw open the casement. A cry greeted him from without, at first faint, then growing mighty as the roar of an avalanche, and then dying away to a moan that was succeeded by a deathlike silence.

The magistrates climbed the hill to the hut.

The magistrate stood there calm; that human storm was nothing to him, and at last his voice broke the stillness.

"Are you all fools, fools to be bewitched by this wretched creature? She is no saint, I know it, I can prove it. She is as you and I, mayhap worse. Nay, I say that she is a witch and is cheating you. For that reason we have brought her here—if she is innocent it will be proven."

"A witch, a witch! Santa Teresa a witch! Blasphemy! Down with him!" and the moan grew to a roar again.

"Listen to me—to me, Don Capello," he shouted, leaning far out so all could see him. "If she is a saint, can she not protect herself? If an angel, will she not use her wings?"

"Santa Teresa, where is she?" was the only reply.

In despair the Don leant still further out. "Your saint heals, yes; but how? Come forward and show me your closed wounds, then I will believe. Carlos, where is he; is his leg well?" The answer came up sadly, "He still limps." "And mother Manita, has her rheumatism gone?" The people gazed at one another in doubt. "Santa Teresa, the blessed saint!" they murmured, "bring her to us."

But the poison had done its work; the people were growing uneasy. "See, they cringe," he whispered to his brother magistrates; "now all is well."

"Hark;" he called aloud to the listening multitude, "she shall go back to her home, now, this afternoon, but first must come the trial. Are you content?" The silence was intense. "It is a good sign," he whispered again, and, closing the casement, he joined the relieved rulers.

They hastened down to the cell where the witch lay imprisoned, and, five against one, the trial went on inside, while without the crowd thronged under the windows like the quickening pulse of a fever patient. There was a hush of painful expectancy, and the air grew heavy and close, as one hour, two hours passed by.

A little apart from the throng stood a man, and of them all he pressed the nearest to the gate, as his eager, restless eyes flashed over the draping ivy and scanned each barred window. Instinctively the people followed his gaze.

"It is Sereno," they whispered. "He loves the Madonna well. It is said that before the wonderful power from above descended on her they were to have married. Now he loves her blindly. His hope is gone."

The rustle of a leaf in the trees, the twitter of a bird startled the watchers. Was it possible that Santa Teresa would use her wings and fly away from them? Suddenly the hush deepened. Every eye was riveted on the great oaken door. It moved on its hinges, and out of the darkness, like a ray of light, stepped a girl. The small, graceful form was draped in a long, black gown, clasped about the waist with a curious gem. It fell to the ground, showing beneath its folds a tiny foot, protected from the rough soil by the Mexican sandal. A face of piercing loveliness, encircled by soft golden curls, looked out from under a black cap, which fitted closely to the beautiful head. Her eyes shone like two stars, and the white face gleamed under the fair hair as the opal in her girdle. Such was the witch and the people's saint.

While she gazed on them the people shaded their eyes. It was pain to look on such a face.

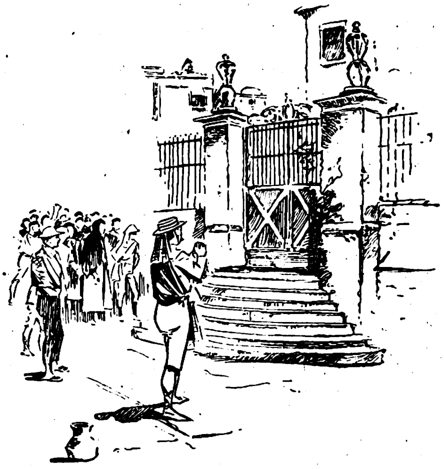
"Santa Teresa, Madonna," they whispered; "she has come back to us."

With a sudden cry Sereno flung himself on the ground.

"Holy Mother! They have put chains on her, the demons! The cruel links cut into her delicate flesh. See!" He shuddered as he lay.

The people fell back in alarm, and again the oaken door creaked, and the magistrates appeared before the multitude. Don Capello stepped forward.

"We have applied the test, my friends; it has failed." And with triumph he pointed to the slender arms weighed down by the heavy irons, and pointed with glee to the deep, cruel scars caused by some burning, fiery instrument of torture. "It is a witch—no saint!" he hissed.



A little apart from the throng stood a man.

With a groan the people looked on. A witch, their beautiful saint! How could it be? Did the Evil One look out of those beautiful, pitying eyes? Had the devil led those tiny hands in their labour of love? The Don went on in harsh tones addressing the people, while they, sobbing, gazed on the black-robed figure standing before them so silently awaiting its doom. "It is a witch, and must be removed from our midst."

As he spoke, the air grew heavier and closer, the black, threatening clouds seemed to droop as though they would swallow the courthouse, the judges, the prisoners, the people, in crushing embrace. A great fear passed over the crowd, and they trembled and almost ceased to breathe.

Only one, Santa Teresa, stood calmly, with unclouded brow, amidst the dreading multitude. She showed no fear, and ever and anon a smile played about the sensitive mouth, as though they were offering her some beautiful gift, instead of the cruel sentence of death.

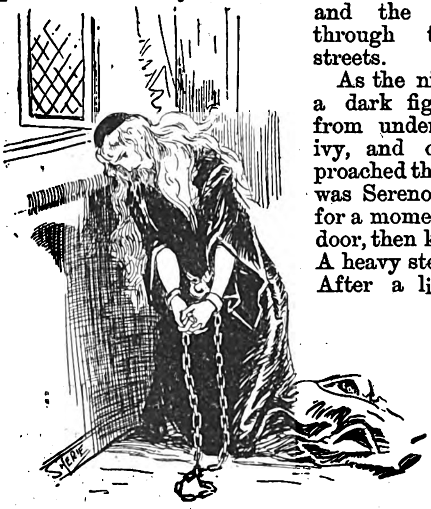
The magistrate hesitated, and then went on rapidly: "Teresa Coreno is condemned to be shot, and must die, as a witch in league with the Evil One, to-morrow at sundown." A violent crash of thunder filled the air as he finished speaking. "There is no more danger," he whispered to his associates, "the people are paralysed with fright, and will do as they are bid. The storm has helped us wonderfully," and he rubbed his hands together in triumph. "Teresa Coreno, you may now return to your home. I warn you to try no escape, nor attempt to influence the people in your favour, for you are watched; the least suspicion will throw you again into prison." The girl made no answer, but slowly descended the steps with her eyes on the ground.

Only as she reached the prostrate form of Sereno did she show any consciousness. With a pitying look she laid her hand on his head and murmured a few words of blessing. The crowd started back as she passed, and crouched with averted faces when her lustrous eyes rested for a few minutes upon them.

"A witch, a witch!" they muttered. "She has cheated us with her evil eye." Yes, the temper of the people had changed. They feared instead of loving her, and blind fury possessed them that this, their saint, had so deceived them. Still, they offered no violence.

With one accord they determined to watch the affair through to the end. If a saint, she must protect herself in her innocence, but if guilty, she must die the death of a witch; that was the decision. The magistrates could not have adopted wiser means to gain their ends than in thus committing her to the custody of the people. As their charge they would guard her carefully, lest she should escape and rob them of their spectacle; but had Santa Teresa been imprisoned from their sight they would have rescued her in anger and placed her on a pedestal for ever, as a martyr.

It was a clever ruse, and Don Capello laughed to himself as he watched the slender, girlish figure toiling up the hill to the hut, while the people hung back, dreading to encounter the evil eye. A few, a very few, still believed, and kissed the flowing hem of her gown as she passed, beseeching the blessing which she never refused to give, tenderly as a mother blesses her child. As the witch disappeared through the low doorway, another groan went up from the feverish moving sea, mingled with jeers and hisses. And then as the rain came down in torrents from the lowering clouds, they hurriedly dispersed. Presently not a soul was visible on the green, and the storm raged through the deserted streets.



Saw the witch kneeling beside the open window.

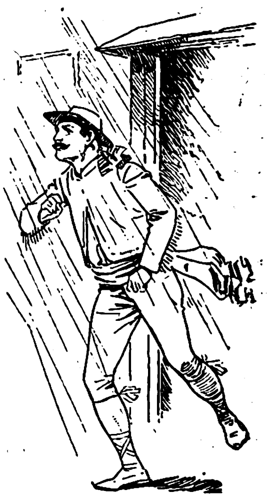
As the night deepened a dark figure stole out from under the draping ivy, and cautiously approached the tiny hut. It was Sereno. He listened for a moment outside the door, then knocked softly. A heavy step approached. After a little fumbling with the bolt, the door was unlatched, and an old man stood out on the threshold.

"Sereno, is it indeed you? I thought you had deserted with the other cowards."

"You know better," the other replied indignantly.

"Yes, you do well to reproach me," the old man retorted; "but you are not a father. I tell you my heart has ached with weeping so that all men appear as foes. It is the way of the world; but to think that those very ones whom my blessed child has healed and comforted should run away at the first shout. Yes, yes, I know you are impatient and did not come to see me," he went on as Sereno moved uneasily. "Go, I can bear it alone. She is there." And he pointed to a low door in the farthest corner of the long, dark room.

Sereno nodded. "Yes, I know."



He dashed out of the door.

The door was slightly ajar, and as he looked in he saw the witch kneeling beside the open window, while the evening wind played with the gold hair on that whitest of brows, and tossed its baby curls over her black cap. In vain she tried to raise her tiny hand to smooth those curls; the cruel chains weighed it down. With a half-sigh she clasped her hands together so that the rough iron links rattled, and pressed her lovely head against the wide window-bench.

"Holy Mother!" she murmured. "Why do they torment me so?"

Sereno stood at the door.

"Madonna!" he exclaimed. The girl raised herself and came forward.

"Sereno, why did you come? I can help you no longer. If it is a wound you must go to the doctor's; my power is gone. I believe the blessed Virgin has taken it away because the wicked men scoff."

With the cry of a hurt child, he fell at her feet. "Madonna, it is you," he gasped. "Did you not hear the sentence, do you not see the danger?"

"Is it the morrow you speak of?" she returned, laying her hand on his head as before. "Sereno, where is thy faith? Will not the Christ that died for us on the cross care for me, his suffering child?"

He caught the delicate wrist, loaded as it was with the chains, and kissed it passionately. "Teresa," he said, "he will help me to save thee."

The girl smiled, saying: "The people will not suffer it; I am no witch, and they know and love me too well to believe it."

"Oh, Madonna!" he cried, "how little you know the Mexicans; they are now as fierce against you as they before loved you. It is as good as a bull-fight, this spectacle to them. Do not trust them, but rely on me alone to save thee."

She would have spoken, but he went on rapidly: "Madonna, this night, while the storm and darkness last, I will bring the black stallion you love so well, outside the window. I will call softly like this: 'Madonna!' When you hear, you will come and mount, and we shall ride for our lives, away, far away, from this accursed Mexico."

Sereno was standing now. With all the pride and impulsiveness of early youth he spoke, but ever with that reverence which is born of love. He did not believe, had never believed, in that heavenly power with which she had been accredited by the ignorant populace. Three months before that day they had been betrothed—she merely a beautiful peasant, and he, Sereno, madly in love with her, and in all his hopelessness that love had never faltered.

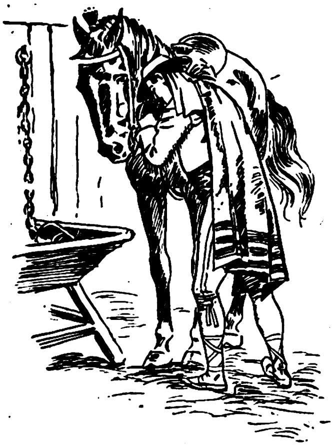
He remembered now how one evening she had sat on the doorstep, singing softly to the accompaniment of her mandolin. And he, leading a spirited black stallion, climbed the hill to her side, and going to her, had taken her in his arms, and placed the bridle in her tiny hand. "It is my betrothal gift," he had said, smiling at her delight.

Teresa, laying her beautiful head on the glossy, black mane, put both arms round the animal's neck and kissed him. "Be watchful, he is fierce," Sereno cried, warningly, but she had laughed at him, and even as he spoke the spirited creature stood at her side motionless under the caressing touch. She and she alone rode the stallion during the months that followed. Lucifer would suffer none but Santa Teresa and his master to touch him, and she loved him as a brother.

One night Teresa had a dream, and it was then the holy power descended on her. It was something she could not explain. "Sereno," she had said, as he pleaded with her not to leave him alone, "the gracious Mother has revealed herself to me and given me this power. I must go to the people and help them in their sufferings; do not touch me." Sereno wept like a child, but the girl was firm. In a week her fame had spread over Mexico. Teresa became a saint, the people's saint, whom they worshipped and adored. She, still simple as a child, healed the sick and thanked the mighty Father for her power. Sereno, of all the people did not believe. "His beautiful Teresa was no saint," he said firmly, and now he repeated it with a difference, "she is no witch, no witch."

Santa Teresa, half leaning against the rough stone, looked up at Sereno standing before her. There was pity in her glance, but no sign of wavering. "Madonna," he cried in his despair, "be not so wilful; they will shoot you—you, my bride. Come with me, oh, my love, and Lucifer shall carry us out of this fearful land. Speak, will you say yes? Lucifer shall carry us both."

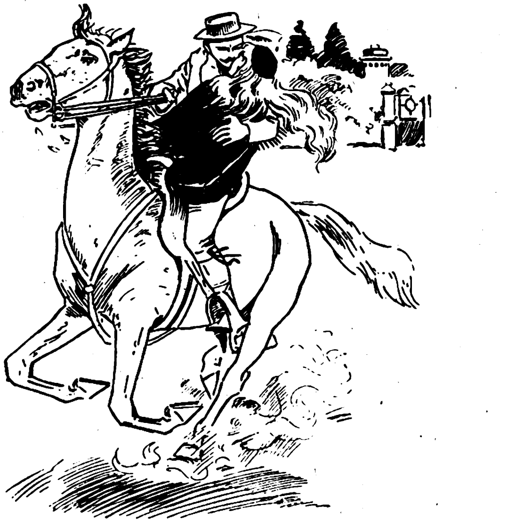
"Yes," she said, simply, "the fiend would bear us away, but while we stay, the Holy Mother will watch over us and keep us from evil." Even as she spoke, Teresa sank on her knees again before the open window, regardless of the lightning flashes, and, with her pale face bowed, moved her lips as in prayer. Sereno shivered as the heavy chains clashed. With one last burning look, he dashed out of the door, past the sleeping father, into the storm. As he did so, a shot rang out, for the house was watched. Sereno had forgotten the fact, though he remembered it now, with added pain, as the ball whistled harmlessly past his ear.



Laid his head on the arching neck.

It was not until the sun had risen high in the heavens that Sereno turned his footsteps homewards. It had been a night of suffering and long drawn out agony, spent in the lonely forest, amid the fiery sparkle of the lightning and the heavy thunder crashes. With indescribable weariness, he flung himself down on his hard couch and tried to sleep.

All that day the affairs of the village might have appeared to the eye of a stranger to go as usual, but Santa Barbe was not in its accustomed calm, and the air grew heavy with suppressed excitement.



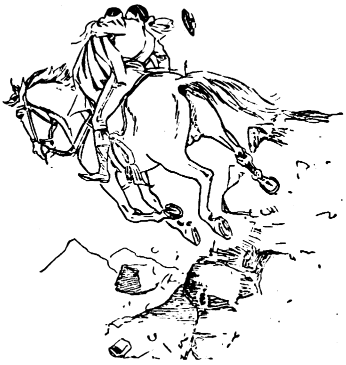
Pressed his passionate kisses on her white forehead.

Every eye was turned, as with common consent, towards the hut on the hill, guarded, as it was, by the bravest and strongest men of Santa Barbe; men who were not to be driven away by spirits, nor alarmed by the flutter of wings. So the day wore on, and as the hour of sundown approached, the shops were again closed, shutters pulled down, and the holiday gowns and coats brought out. Once more the people began to assemble on the open green, for it was a grim sort of festival to many. There was but one subject of conversation: How would their saint, or witch, as they now softly pronounced it, comport herself? Would she show fear, and die like any ordinary mortal? Would she ride away on a broomstick, with the fiends' imps around her, or, and this made them most to tremble, would the Holy Mother in anger send down an angel to carry her out of their sight? So they waited, pale with fright in anticipation, and feverish in waiting.

As the time drew near, Sereno sprang up from his couch. "It is the hour," he said shuddering, and went to the stable where Lucifer stood, saddled and waiting. The noble animal whinnied and stretched his eager nostrils as he saw his master approaching. Sereno took the bridle, and, with a groan, laid his head down on the arching neck which Teresa had kissed three months before.

"Madonna," he sobbed, "why has this thing come to pass?"

The horse trembled and moved uneasily as the hot tears bathed his mane. It was as if he understood, for his eyes shone full of fire and intelligence, and his nervous action seemed to condemn useless sorrow. Sereno raised his head, and now there was strength in his gaze, as he looked into the beautiful eyes of the stallion, kissed him on the forehead, and then sprang into the saddle.



Fell headlong over the edge.

With a sudden clang the great gate of the courthouse was flung open, and the five magistrates walked out in solemn procession, Don Capello at their head. As they took their places round the oak, the soldiers entered the hut and led out the one whom all eyes dreaded yet longed to see. Santa Teresa approached the oak rapidly, firmly. Her beautiful face, white as the driven snow, wore an expression of peace, as though she had already reached the gate of the Kingdom of Heaven. As they gazed on her unearthly beauty, the people wavered. Was it not, after all, a crime they were committing?

The voice of Don Capello reassured them.

"Be firm and courageous, ye people. When we hear the whirr of wings it is time enough to falter. Fear not, the witch must die as decreed."

A pitiful cry rose from amongst the multitude. It was the old man, her father. He was not to be quieted, so they led him, sobbing, away, at the command of the magistrates. His weeping only weakened the hearts of the people. Santa Teresa stood before the fatal oak, and Don Capello stepped forward and struck the chains from her wrists.

The soldiers raised their guns. The moment had come. Santa Teresa would soon be a saint in reality. Suddenly, there came a cry from the people. A black horse had bounded into their midst, and Santa Teresa, in an instant, was swept up into the saddle. The report of a dozen guns rang out on the silent air, but, with a mad spring into the air, the animal sped away. For one brief second the people were dazed, but Don Capello was the first to recover himself.

"Quick!" he cried, "out with the horses. She will escape while you fools sit there like so many stones. Put up the guns, we will seize her alive."

As he spoke, he caught his own horse, and climbing heavily into the saddle, started the chase. Before five minutes had come and gone he had hundreds at his back, for presently the entire village was mounted and in pursuit.

Lucifer was ahead, but could he keep there? for he was heavily laden with a double burden. Santa Teresa lay back in Sereno's arms. He feared she was unconscious, and in even that wild flight he clasped her closer and pressed his passionate kisses on her white forehead. In his impatience, each spring of the flying hoofs seemed but as the step of a lame man, and they could not go fast enough—yet Lucifer was straining every nerve, and great drops of blood and foam flecked his heaving sides.

Sereno glanced back in dread. Could they escape? If the pursuers numbered fewer it might have been, but there were hundreds of them—thousands, it seemed to Sereno's agonised gaze. Fierce, strong-limbed Mexicans, fearful when roused, and at their head the cruellest of mankind, Don Capello. Was he to be baffled? A smile of hatred lit up the latter's brutal features. "We are gaining!" he cried. "They cannot go on for ever."

But the danger lay not there. Lucifer flew straight as an arrow, with no thought of dropping until the goal was reached. Suddenly, to Sereno's horror, he found they were being gradually surrounded, for horsemen were everywhere, to the right, to the left, with Don Capello urging on behind. A steep hill loomed up ahead. With ever-increasing speed, Lucifer dashed up the slope. Through bushes, over stones, leaping gullies, onward and upward he fled surefooted, never stumbling nor wanting for breath. Sereno clung on in the muteness of despair, Santa Teresa folded in his fast embrace, her beautiful head resting on his breast. It was a ride to death.

A sharp precipice of several hundred feet lay directly in their path. Behind, on all sides came the people. The horse halted on its very brink, one foot hovering in mid-air, his hind hoofs striking wildly for a footing on the slippery rock. His eyes grew wide in agony, he snorted with a terrible fear and dread of what must come. Sereno glanced back once more. But there was the cruel face of Don Capello reared up like a serpent not ten paces behind.

He hesitated no longer. Santa Teresa opened her eyes. "Holy Mother," she murmured. Then he, with a mighty effort, lifted her in his arms, and leant forward with all his weight on the stallion's neck. The horse struggled, reared back in anguish, but it was too late. The rock crumbled beneath his clinging hoofs, and they fell headlong over the edge, down, down into eternity.

Sereno had at last received his bride. Death had united them for ever.

As the people crowded up the hillside, nothing was to be seen. With a cry of awe they lifted their eyes towards the blue sky, smiling over that scene of woe.

"Santa Teresa," they murmured. "It was the angel, and she has gone from us for ever, our beautiful saint."

Santa Barbe is famed no longer; it has almost been forgotten by the Mexicans themselves. The courthouse lies a mass of ruins, but beneath a mighty oak, gnarled, yet still green, stands a tiny chapel. The new generation, in passing, make the sign of the cross, while they murmur "Santa Teresa."

Frederick Heldon.

TWO GRAND NEW STORIES JUST ABOUT TO COMMENCE.

In the place of "The Treasures of the White God," previously announced, a romance by Mr. George Griffith, who wrote "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-born," etc.

GOLDEN STAR,

WILL START NEXT WEEK.

Seven days later Mr. Headon Hill, the author of "Guilty Gold," opens a new novel to be called

THE QUEEN OF NIGHT.

Mr. Griffith being so well known to our readers needs no further introduction than the mere mention of his name, but Mr. Headon Hill is not so well known to them. He will soon, however, endear himself to everyone who is sensible enough to read Short Stories. It would be unfair to give the plot of his story, but this we do say—it is one of the most marvellous stories ever conceived by the mind of man, and will create a sensation.

THE STRANGE CASE OF SIR JOHN ROWELL.

THE mysterious Saint Cloud affair had excited and baffled all Paris for a whole month. M. Bermutier, preliminary judge, had been discussing the various aspects of the case before a group of friends.

"It is frightful," exclaimed one of the ladies, "almost supernatural! Nothing will ever be known."

"Yes, madam," said the magistrate, turning towards her, "probably nothing will ever be known. As for the word 'supernatural,' it has simply no place here. We have here a crime cleverly conceived, very cleverly executed, but so involved in mystery that we cannot disentangle it. Once before, however, I had to investigate a case in which there really seemed something fantastic, and which had finally to be abandoned unsolved."

"Oh, do tell us about it," cried several ladies with one voice.

M. Bermutier smiled gravely, as became a judge, and began: "I was preliminary judge at Ajaccio, and my chief duties were, of course, in connection with affairs of vendetta. One day I learnt that a little villa at the end of the gulf had been taken by an Englishman for several years. Everyone was speculating about this singular person, who stayed with a single man-servant, never leaving the house except to hunt or fish. He never spoke to anyone, and every morning he used to practise pistol-shooting.

"Rumour said he was some great personage who had left his country for political reasons. Then he was reported to be hiding, after having committed some terrible crime. I could learn nothing about him except that his name was Sir John Rowell. I had him closely watched, but nothing suspicious was ever reported to me.

"One evening, in passing, I observed him smoking in his garden, and saluted him. He invited me to enter and drink a glass of beer. I at once accepted. He received me most courteously, and we chatted pleasantly on many subjects. In reply to my questions on his mode of life, he told me that he had been a great hunter in Africa, the Indies, and America.

"'I have hunted man, too, a good deal,' he added. He then invited me in to see his collection of firearms. The salon was hung with black silk embroidered with gold. 'It is Japanese cloth,' he said.

"But a strange object in the centre of a large panel caught my eye. It was black, and stood out clearly on a square of red velvet. I approached. It was a hand—a man's hand, not a skeleton hand, white and clean, but a black shrivelled hand with yellow nails and muscles laid bare. The bones, which had been cut clean near the middle of the forearm, as if by a hatchet, showed dark stains as if of old blood. An enormous iron chain was welded round the wrist of this horrible member, fastening it to the wall, by a ring strong enough to hold an elephant.

"'Why!' I exclaimed, 'what is that?'

"'It is my greatest enemy,' the Englishman answered quietly. 'It came from America. It was severed by a sabre, skinned by a sharp flint, and dried in the sun for eight days.'

"I touched the human relic. It must have belonged to some giant. The fingers were excessively long, and were held by enormous tendons, to which pieces of skin still adhered in places.

"'This man must have been very strong,' I said.

"'Oh! yes,' he replied, 'but I was stronger. I have had the chain made to hold it.'

"'This chain is useless now,' I said, thinking he was joking; 'the hand can't run away.'

"'It always wants to get away, though,' Sir John Rowell answered gravely. 'The chain is necessary.'

"I thought he must be either a madman or a humbug, but his face remained as passive and impenetrable as ever before my searching look. I changed the subject, and began to admire his weapons. I observed three loaded revolvers lying at hand in the room, as if the man lived in constant fear of an attack. I returned to see him several times, and then my visits ceased. All had now become accustomed to him, and his presence had, therefore, become indifferent to all.

"A year passed. One morning my servant awakened me and announced that Sir John Rowell had been assassinated during the night. Half an hour later, I was in the Englishman's house along with the chief police authorities. The valet was standing distractedly before the door. At first I suspected this man, but he was entirely innocent. The body of Sir John was lying on its back in the middle of the salon. Everything showed that a terrible struggle had taken place. The victim had been strangled. His face was swollen and discoloured, and bore a look of deadly fear. He held something between his clenched teeth, and the neck, covered with blood, was pierced by five holes which seemed to have been made with some sharp iron points. A doctor arrived. After carefully examining the five strange impressions in the flesh, he said:

"'Why, it looks as if the man had been strangled by a skeleton.'

"I shuddered, and glanced at the spot where I had formerly seen the horrible dried hand. It was no longer there. The chain was hanging in its place, broken.

"I knelt over the body, and found between the clenched teeth a finger of the missing hand, cut, or rather gnawed off at the second joint, by the victim's teeth. We then made an investigation, but nothing was discovered. Neither doors, windows, nor furniture had been tampered with. The two watch-dogs had not even been aroused. Although a minute search was instituted throughout the whole island nothing was ever discovered.

"Well, one night, three months after the crime, I had a frightful nightmare. I saw the horrible hand running like a scorpion or a spider up and down my curtains and walls. The hideous member galloped round my room, using its fingers like claws. Next day the vile thing itself was actually brought to me. It had been found in the cemetery on Sir John Rowell's grave. The forefinger was missing.

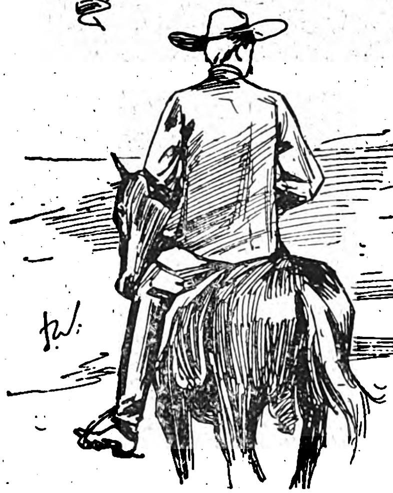
"This, ladies," said the judge, as he concluded, "is my story. I know nothing more."

* * * * *

"But that is neither dénouement nor explanation!" cried one of the terror-stricken ladies. "We shall not sleep to-night unless you tell us at least how you think it occurred."

"Oh, I think," said he, with a judicial smile, "simply that the legitimate owner of the hand was not dead, but that he came to fetch it with his remaining one. I never could tell, though, how he did it." N. N.

A DOWRY OF DIAMONDS



By Iza Duffus Hardy.

Author of "In the Springtime of Love," etc.

"It's a lonely-looking place," said Harry Osmond to himself, letting his horse fall into a walk as he drew near the house in search of which he had ridden out. "A lonely kind of place for her! I suppose this is the house. It can't be any other;" and he ran over in his mind the instructions he had received on leaving Orodelphia City—we should call it a village here, but a barn, a bar, and a general "store" make up a city in that far West wherein Harry Osmond had spent the best years of his life.

"Go straight on; leave Red Cross Cañon on your left; keep on till you come to Blue River Falls, then bear round to your right by the woods till you get out in the open valley, and there you'll see Kenrick's place right before you."

So this was "Kenrick's place," evidently—a small, bare barrack-like wooden house, suggesting a grotesque resemblance to a Noah's Ark, with all the paint worn off, set down in the middle of a strip of arid plain, its scant green burnt yellowish under the sun's merciless glare, walled in by dark, unbroken masses of the great redwoods on one side, by a jagged range of hills on the other. The general aspect of the house, and its position, produced an impression of forlornness and desolation in Harry Osmond's mind. He recalled the comments which his informant had added to the instructions in regard to the road.

"He's a queer sort, is old man Kenrick! They say he nearly blowed up Saucel City with his dratted experiments. We wouldn't have him here in Orodelphi', so he's built himself a place a few miles out. He comes in and out pretty often. There's some folks in the city won't send for no one but the old doctor when they're sick, but the gen'l opinion is that he's a mighty queer lot."

And Osmond was aware that a certain mild curiosity with which he, as a visitor to "old man Kenrick," felt himself being regarded, was mingled with a spirit of doubt as to the welcome he would receive at his journey's end—that complacent sort of doubt which was evidently satisfactory to those who had probably not been warmly welcomed at Kenrick's. The reflection of this doubt unconsciously entered into his own mind as he pulled up his horse at the door, and paused a moment before dismounting.

He saw no one at the windows; not even a dog barked, not a cow grazed near the house. While the horseman outside lingered and looked and thought what a lonely place it was for a girl, a girl gazing out of one of the windows, out of his sight at the other side of the house, was thinking much the same—not discontentedly; the cloud of discontent never marred the serene sweetness of Grace Kenrick's face, but with a faint stirring of vague longing that "was not akin to pain."

In the dead stillness of the hour and place she heard the trample of the horse's hoofs, the sound of someone stopping at the door, knocking on it with his knuckles, as there was no other means of gaining admittance. Dr. Kenrick had never thought it worth while to put up bell or knocker.

Grace went to the door and opened it. A tall, broad-shouldered young man stood there; bearded, sunburnt, with good-humoured dark eyes that lit up with a light of pleasure as they fell upon her face.

He looked at her for a minute without speaking, as if waiting for her recognition.

"You don't know me, then?" he said. "And if it was in the uttermost corner of the earth I'd have known you, Miss Grace, though you're changed somehow, yet still the same."

The girl did not find fault with his speech for its inconsistency.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, with a brilliant smile of surprise and pleasure. "How could I have forgotten you, even for a moment? But there is excuse for me—you are changed! I don't know how I know you!" she added laughingly.

"Does five years change a fellow as much as all that?" he rejoined a little deprecatingly. She had held out one hand, but he had taken both, and was holding them close in the familiar clasp of old acknowledged friendship.

"Is it only five years?" she said.

"Hardly more. I shouldn't think it was five years, looking at you."

And indeed Grace Kenrick at twenty was scarcely altered from what she had been at fifteen. A slender girl, with soft brown hair, and a delicate, pale complexion, with irregular, yet somehow attractive features—a gentle, serious, sometimes dreamy expression—her great beauty in the large, soft, grey eyes, with their limpid candour and almost child-like sweetness and innocence—she was, as a woman, just what she had been as a child, except for a trifle more maturity of form and feature, a shade of added thoughtfulness and gravity—a look almost too thoughtful for one still so young.

The years that had left her almost unchanged had developed Harry Osmond from a fair smooth-faced youth to a sun-bronzed man. He had filled out in figure, too, and was now a splendid young fellow, who looked handsome, strong, and manly, in his picturesque sombrero hat, his riding-coat, and his jack-boots.

Of course they soon came to the questions:

"How did you come here?" and "How has it been with you all this time?"

How Mr. Osmond came there was soon told. Since he had said good-bye to the Kenricks and started on a prospecting tour from Saucel City some five years before, he had spent his time in the mining district of the Black Hills; he had done fairly well there, was now on a holiday trip, had left his claim for a time in his partner's care, was on his way to San Francisco, and had made a détour chiefly for the purpose of visiting his old friends.

How things had been with Grace Kenrick all this time she also made short work in the telling. She was very well, and the Doctor, her father, was very well, and she liked this place well enough, though it had seemed a little quiet at first, after Saucel City. Father liked a quiet life for his experiments; he had a big laboratory at the back of the house; but on this subject she did not seem inclined to dilate. Osmond remembered that when he had left Saucel City, Dr. Kenrick, the leading doctor there, was enjoying a large and flourishing practice; he wondered how much truth there was in the gossip of Orodelphia, and whether the doctor's experiments made him indeed so undesirable a resident?

Presently Dr. Kenrick came in. He was a man of rather slightly-built, wiry figure, of average height; his face was old and wrinkled, the lower part hidden by a heavy, untrimmed, wild-looking beard. Hair and beard were so thickly streaked and patched with grey, fast turning to white, that scarce a vestige of their original colour was discernible; but the eyes were young still—large, clear, and bright, full of latent fire, wide with waking dreams—they looked out from under the grizzled brows in strange and almost startling contrast to the haggard, parchment-coloured face.

Grace went up to him with a happy, tender smile, and took his hand as she said:

"It is Harry Osmond, father! Would you have known him?"

The Doctor did not seem to take much interest in the question whether Harry Osmond was altered past recognition or not. He greeted him kindly and hospitably enough, with a cordiality that, although it was no more than lukewarm, clearly owed its moderation simply and only to the fact that his mind was too pre-occupied for him to spare much thought for the visitor.

Grace soon slipped away, on household cares intent. They kept no help—help in that country being hard to get and harder still to keep—so that Grace Kenrick's part in life was very far from being the ornamental alone. She bustled blithely in and out, getting the supper ready. Osmond jumped up to help her, and insisted on carrying the tray for her. One of the fruit dishes was broken, so Grace ran to the laboratory and came back with a cracked retort, into which she put the preserved peaches; this seemed to both the young people an excellent joke, although the Doctor, as soon as he realised the nature of it, started up in a hurry to assure himself that it was only a damaged and useless retort on which they had laid irreverent hands. The two young people laughed and chattered as they went to and fro between kitchen and parlour; the elder man looked on with a sort of mild awakening of interest in things around him.

Harry Osmond became a frequent visitor at the Kenricks'. He brought a new gladness into Grace's quiet life, a new sunshine into her smile. The Doctor was pleased to see his girl bright and happy. Grace was the apple of her father's eye; there was only one hope, one dream, that he held even dearer than his daughter. Yet somehow, until now that he saw the brightening effect of a little cheerful companionship—the healthy influence of another young, strong, vigorous personality upon her—he had never recognised that her quiet, lonely life of daily household work, pleasureless, friendless, needed some relaxation and recreation. It suited him so well, it had never occurred to him to doubt that it was equally well fitted for her.

Young Osmond's visits did not inconvenience him nor interfere with his way of life at all. If he were busy in his laboratory, Grace did not disturb him for Harry Osmond's coming and going; she made no stranger of this old familiar friend, who had been her childhood's companion. It was long since anyone had visited at the Kenricks' on such free and privileged terms, and the Doctor, somewhat to his own surprise, presently began to find that young Osmond's society was rather welcome to him than otherwise.

Osmond remembered some of the Doctor's theories, and certain allusions to the nature of his experiments, which had been dropped in the olden days. Little forgotten words and trifles floated up in his memory, and roused his curiosity in regard to Doctor Kenrick's present pursuits, although delicacy withheld him from making any observation to Grace, or inquiring of her concerning her father's occupations.

A girl gazing out of one of the windows.

One day, however, the Doctor himself said to his daughter:

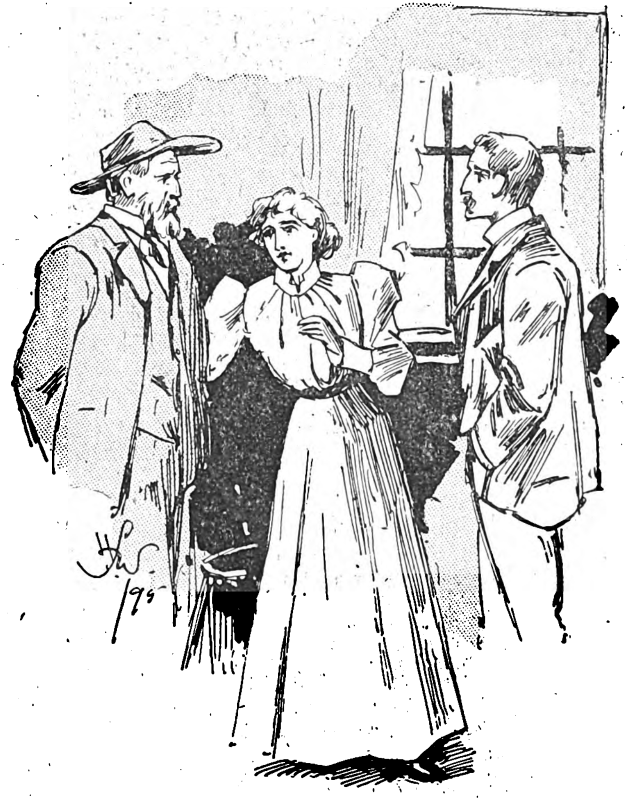
"Have you told young Osmond, Grace?"

"Told him what, father?"

"Our secret."

"No, father, I didn't know whether you would like him to know anything about it."

"He seems an intelligent young fellow," the doctor observed musingly, "and I should think he might be trusted. He is not one of the babbling sort, I fancy."



He was soon taken freely into the family confidence.

Grace placed her own interpretation on these remarks, and the next time Harry Osmond went through the usual form of duty inquiries about her father, she added to the usual answer, that he was busy in his laboratory, the observation:

"He is at a very interesting stage of his experiments just now," and Osmond was prompt to perceive by her manner, no longer restrained, as it had hitherto been, that she was ready and willing to enter upon the subject of those mysterious "experiments."

"I remember your father used to have a theory that certain secrets of the alchemists of old were not lost beyond discovery. They would be priceless secrets indeed if we could unravel them! If, instead of digging the gold out of the mines—which is pretty hard work I can tell you—we could learn the making of it!"

"My father thinks," said Grace, with a tender smile of hope and trust, "that the transmutation of gold is a hopeless dream! But there is something more precious than gold, the secret of the making of which might be learned. You know—we all know—that the diamond is only carbon in its purest form! My father has devoted years of his life to the study of this subject. He is steadily working out his theory; I think we are getting very near the light now!" and her soft eyes lit up with a beautiful confidence.

"I see, I see!" said Harry Osmond; and he did see, not only the father's dream, but the daughter's devoted faith.

When the ice had been once broken, and it was understood that Osmond was aware of the nature of the Doctor's pursuits, he was soon taken freely into the family confidence. Grace was glad to be able to talk to some sympathetic friend upon the subject which absorbed her father's very life, and held possession, though to a lesser extent, of hers. For long years past, while the external interests of everyday existence came and went, just skimming the surface, this secret pursuit had been the whole deep under-current of their lives.

It was an incalculable comfort to Grace to feel herself free to allude openly to what hitherto had been spoken of only between father and daughter, shut down in silence and reserve.

Even the Doctor, having once broken the seal of his secrecy, also found it a relief to talk to Harry Osmond about his life-long dream, which he confidently hoped soon to realise. No one knew of the real drift of his experiments except one or two men, who paid occasional long visits to the Kenricks' place, bringing with them mysterious and bulky parcels—who were assisting him in the construction of the needed apparatus, and who were sworn to secrecy; and even these had not been fully taken into his confidence. None, indeed, not even Grace, knew what were the ingredients by the employment of which he hoped to bring about the desired result. That was his great secret, religiously kept from even his daughter. Whatever these ingredients were, his idea was that their mixture in certain proportions and fusion under a powerful pressure would produce the crystallisation of carbon into its purest form—the diamond.

There were, he admitted, many difficulties in the way—one hitherto insurmountable difficulty had been the application of a compressive force of sufficient power—the construction of a machine strong enough to stand the shock.

But patient study and practical experiment had brought him now very near the goal. The hour of success was at hand—so he assured Harry Osmond. In his laboratory even now stood a great globe of solid iron, with a passage drilled through it to a circular chamber hollowed out in the centre.

This chamber was to be charged with certain materials, the composition of which was the great secret, and its contents fired by a powerful battery.

He had tried similiar experiments before, though hitherto with no other result than the shattering of the apparatus, and the smashing of windows in the neighbourhood—vigorous protests of indignant neighbours—and enforced retreat of the Doctor and his belongings to a more secluded locality.

But this time he believed he had insured against failure. The apparatus was the strongest that could be made; the time for the final trial was almost ripe—not quite—a few more final experiments had yet to be made—one or two possibly weak points to be guarded. And here a little difficulty occurred. To finally assure himself of the security of certain parts of the theory he had so long been working out needed expensive materials. And money was scarce at Kenricks'. Only Grace, always bravely and faithfully standing between her father and all domestic anxieties, from which her care could guard him, knew how scarce. She was up early and late, working hard to keep the household wheels running smoothly—doing all she could to save, but the poor girl could not coin money. The Doctor began to chafe at feeling himself delayed and hindered in his great work by what seemed to him so petty and paltry a thing as money, or the want of it.

"I have spent all my means and all the best years of my life," he said once, to Harry Osmond, in an unusual expansion of confidence. "The little fortune that should have been Grace's—her mother's dowry, which should have come to the child—all gone! The returns will be a thousandfold the cost—I should be a fool to grudge it—but straightened circumstances cause a little temporary annoyance and delay sometimes. My researches are expensive—they could not be carried on without diamonds. Diamond dust was the first thing necessary, and is the last—the last before the production of the perfect gem!"

It was on a Sunday, and Harry Osmond had done honour to the day and to the object of his visit by arraying himself in his best. He had bought his diamond studs and handsome solitaire ring with his own hard-earned dollars; he took a boyish pleasure in their sparkle; and he put them on to visit Grace simply because they were the best he had. He caught a yearning glance in Dr. Kenrick's eyes as they turned for a moment on these jewels—only for a moment, and then were hastily averted, as if the Doctor was fairly tearing that eager gaze away.

"Why, now—would these be any use to you?" said the young man cordially.

The Doctor's eyes glistened.

"No, no!" he said, drawing back. "They would save weeks of time and labour! They would turn probability into certainty, make assurance doubly sure. But I won't—no, no, I wouldn't rob you of them, Osmond, my dear boy! Likely you set store by those stones? They may have a value to you apart from their price, and any gems I have must be pounded—pulverised! For I must test the pure dust of the diamond yet once more."

"You're right welcome," rejoined Osmond, drawing the ring off his finger.

"You mean it?" said the Doctor, evidently resisting by sheer force the impulse to pounce on the jewel.

"With all my heart," the young man protested. "Why, what earthly good can these bits of trinkets be to me, compared to what they'll do if they can be the slightest help to you in your important experiments? See, now, here, take them all," and he loosened the studs.

And now the day drew near when the great trial was to be made. Before it came Harry made up his mind to speak to Grace. He told her, in the rough and broken phrases that are the eloquence of deep feeling, how dear she was to him, and that she would be even dearer still if, by any mischance, the experiment that was to crown her father's lifelong ambition resulted in failure.

He knew she could not leave her father while the great question was unsettled; he would never ask her to desert the old man, nor to fail in that daughterly devotion which was the first thing for which he had loved her; he only asked her to give him a grain of hope to live on—only wished her to know that he was hers, heart and soul, and hers only, for ever, whatever might be "the end of that day's business!" And, if all he had asked to make him happy was hope, he was more than happy when he pressed his first kiss on Grace's sweet lips, and knew that he had won the love that was his heart's desire.

Of course, she could not enter into any thoughts of marriage in the present state of things. While her father's aim was unattained, the result of his long labours uncertain, her place was by his side. But now the crisis was near. If all went well, and the great object were successfully accomplished, then—then they might talk things over. And Osmond, having gained all, and more than all, that he had dared to hope for, was well content and light of heart when the day for the important ordeal came.

Two friends of the Doctor, who had assisted him in the construction of the apparatus, came to help in its transportation to a safe distance from the house. They conveyed it out by twilight to a lonely spot, secure from interruption.

The Doctor had charged the central chamber with the composition, of which the ingredients and their proportions and preparation constituted his great secret. This charge was to be fired and fused by means of a galvanic battery. They laid the connecting wires, and fixed the battery at what the Doctor deemed a prudent distance from the machine. They stood round the battery in the deepening dusk, a silent and anxious group of four men, and a woman—for Grace would not be left behind. Harry Osmond looked at her as she stood by her father's side, and even in the twilight he saw, if with his mind's eye rather than with his bodily sight, the loyal loving look on her pale face, the steadfast light in her shining eyes. He took a step that brought him between her and the machine, to shield her, so far as he could, in case of any accident.

The Doctor touched the handle of the battery.

There was a crash and a blinding cloud of dust. For a moment the watchers caught their breath, and, with one impulse, drew closer together. Then the Doctor, shaking himself free from Grace's clinging hold, seized the lantern, and rushed forward. The iron globe had burst, and lay in pieces. He knelt down to examine the fragments, and the rays of the light wavered and flickered as the hand that held the lantern shook. Osmond, the first to follow him, took the lantern from his trembling fingers, and stooped to help in the examination. The others joined, and all eagerly inspected and searched among the scattered fragments of the broken machine.

He told her how dear she was to him.

Not a word was spoken until Grace at last whispered, softly touching Harry's arm:

"Is there—is there—any sign of success?"

He looked round at her and hesitated, in anxious silence, for a moment or two; then, as no one else answered, he said reluctantly:

"I am afraid—there—there doesn't seem to be any—any result."

But the Doctor knelt and patiently and persistently sought amongst the shattered pieces still.

"Father, dear," Grace presently whispered tenderly, "hadn't we better be going home?"

"I must look by daylight," he said, taking no notice of her words. "It's impossible to make a full search by this light. I must wait till daylight."

"Yes," said Osmond, "we'll come back early in the morning."

"Come back?" the Doctor repeated. "I shall not stir from this place! Leave it—here—now—all night? No; I wait here. You can all go home. I stay where I am."

Grace laid her fingers lightly on her father's shoulder, and gently but firmly took the matter into her own hands.

"I will go home and fetch some blankets and things, and come back here and camp out with father," she said.

And so it was decided; it seemed, indeed, the best way. It was a fine night—a clear, dry, and dewless Californian night; and although Harry did not at all like the idea of Grace "roughing it" and camping out, he still could not but admit that it would probably do her no harm. The other men proposed division of forces, one of them remaining with the Doctor, the other accompanying Grace and Osmond to the house to fetch wraps, coverings, and comforts for the night; but finally the whole quartette set off on this errand, the Doctor protesting he would rather be left alone awhile, and Osmond being strongly of the mind that four are much better company than three.

He walked with Grace, and did his best to cheer her with the idea that failure might be only a temporary postponement of the attainment of the longed-for end. They returned laden with materials for rigging up a sort of tent for Grace, and plenty of wraps for her father. Harry Osmond said that he too would camp out that night; the other two men, having given their assistance in the arrangements, decided to go home to their hotel; they possibly thought the daylight investigation was not worth waiting for. With Western taciturnity and good-feeling they did not say much, but bade the Doctor "keep up his spirits," for "he'd do it yet—maybe!" added the less sanguine of the two.

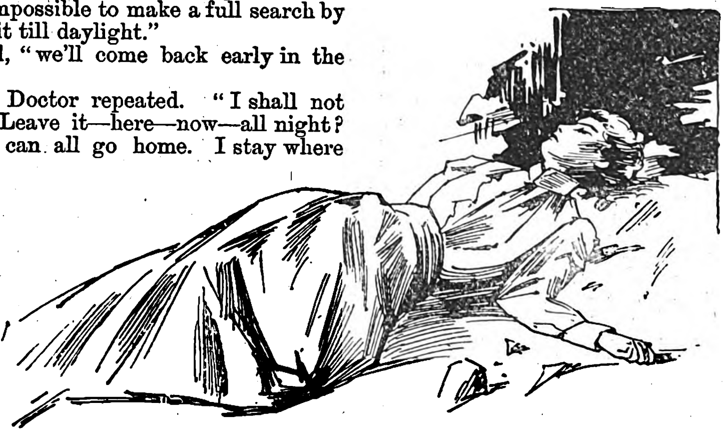
The level rays of the morning sun were streaming broad and bright across the valley, and Harry Osmond, rolled up in his Mexican blanket, was sleeping soundly still. In his dreams he heard the name so often in his mind, of which his heart was so full that it seemed only natural it should echo in his sleep! But the sound grew louder—the call pierced through the shadows of dreamland.

"Grace! child! wake up! Grace—Osmond—look here! look here!"

"Eh—what? What's up?" exclaimed Harry starting, and scrambling out of his blanket.

The Doctor's worn face was flushed and transfigured with a look of wild hope and trembling joy; his eyes shone with a strange light, as if his whole being were strained to the very verge of sanity. In the palm of his quivering hand he held out to show them a pinch of sparkling dust.

Grace and Harry hastened to inspect the glistening atoms. Somehow they carefully avoided looking in each other's eyes. That tiny pinch of shining dust—was it in very truth real diamond dust?



But Grace would never open her eyes.

Grace strove to convince herself that she had no doubt. She could not dash her father's joy by a question of it. He knew best. She soon persuaded herself to share his confidence. He harped exultantly on the theme all the way home. The experiment had been no failure. Here, in these few grains of glittering dust, was the successful result! The only drawback was that the result was small—certainly very small. This was the pure material of the diamond—only there was so very little of it! A little more care, a little harder study, a little change in the conditions, a stronger machine—so strong as to stand the shock without bursting and thus diffusing the force, and next time they would see the success of which these atoms gave the sure and certain promise!

He was so confident that Harry Osmond, who had at first looked doubtfully at the little pinch of precious dust, began to be persuaded—or at least in his heart regarded it as an open question. It might indeed be as the Doctor declared it was. On the other hand, Osmond could not entirely exclude from his mind a suspicion that it might be only a fragment of felspar—some grain of crystal or quartz pulverised by the shock.

After this eventful night the Doctor resumed his studies and experiments with renewed energy. With wild and feverish eagerness he devoted himself to the pursuit of that long-sought object on which it seemed to him now that his hand was at last about to close.

The difficulty of constructing an apparatus of sufficient strength to stand the shock that his trusted globe of iron had proved incapable of bearing, exercised the Doctor's mind, and presently formed a plan. Some distance down the valley, near the opening of a wide gully leading back into the hills, a most lonely and deserted spot, was a stretch of barren stony land, strewn with great rocks and boulders. On these the Doctor cast his eye. The loneliness of the situation attracted him.

He proposed to utilise one of the largest boulders for his purpose. A hole was to be drilled deep into the heart of the solid rock, into this molten iron was to be poured; then through the cooled iron a passage was to be bored, and the chamber to hold the secret composition scooped out in the centre. Finally, the rock itself was to be bound round with broad and massive clamps of iron. By means of this device he was convinced he could employ a battery of even greater power than before, without risk of the bursting to pieces of the apparatus.

Time slipped away, and the long-anticipated day of the great trial came at last.

"You're pale, my darling," said Harry Osmond tenderly, to his betrothed. "Don't fret yourself with anxiety! Nothing's worth fretting your sweet self about! Success means fame and fortune; but we have what is dearer than fame—and more than all the money in the world could buy for us!"

"It is not money—no, nor fame! that I care for," murmured Grace; "it is that my father's very life is bound up in this!"

"It will all go well, dearest. You'll see it will be all right," he answered soothingly, anxious to reassure her, although he felt in his heart that he was not so very sure himself.

And now the hour had come!

This time it was broad daylight. Dr. Kenrick, taking warning from his experiences on the occasion of the former trial, had resolved not to trust again to lantern light for the important examination of the results.

Dead silence had fallen upon all the group.

They glanced from the great rock to the battery with its motionless wires, from the battery to the lever-handle in the doctor's hands.

A moment, and he grasped and pressed it.

There was a deafening, rending crash, that shook the solid earth beneath their feet and darkened the sky above their heads. Not a man kept footing or breath or sense in the terrific concussion. Riven rock and shattered iron flew high and wide. Far off, birds fell dead from the shock, and the alarmed neighbours from many a mile round started for the scene of disaster.

But long before the nearest neighbour on the fleetest horse could reach the spot the stunned and bruised members of the company of fortune-seekers had picked themselves up from the ground—all but one!—and the worst was known.

Harry Osmond, for a few moments stunned and dazed, but otherwise uninjured, sat up and looked round for Grace. Side by side, as they had stood, father and daughter had fallen, and both lay motionless. Harry staggered over to them, and fell on his knees by Grace.

In a minute or two the Doctor also moved, sighed, raised himself on his elbow, and when the mists had cleared from his dazed eyes, and he looked at the little group beside him, he dragged himself up and bent over his daughter.

"Grace, why Gracie!" he said hoarsely. "She's fainted, the poor child! Come, Gracie, rouse up, my girl! Speak to me! Why do you look like that, Harry? She's only fainted—girls often faint! why even I—I—was a little faint and giddy myself! Come, Gracie, my brave girl, rouse up! Open your eyes and speak to your old father!"

But Grace would never open her eyes and speak to him, nor to any other any more in this world. A large splinter of iron had struck her on the head. Life pulsated feebly on at her heart for awhile, a little while; but she never gave word, or look, or sign of consciousness again.

* * * * *

A few days after the tragic event of this too-memorable night, one of the leading jewellers in San Francisco was called into the parlour behind his "store" to see a gentleman who wished to speak to him on particular business. The visitor, an old man with white hair and beard, and bright, restless eyes, looked haggard, untidy, dusty, and travel-worn, but his manner was unmistakeably that of a gentleman, as he informed the jeweller that the business on which he had called was disposal of some splendid diamonds.

"It is a rare chance I have to offer you," he said, fumbling in his breast and producing a little wash-leather bag. "They are perfect stones, of the purest water. I think you'll say you have never seen finer diamonds. I have only brought a few for your inspection; but there are more where these came from! I would not part with them, but they are my daughter's dowry; I want to turn them into hard cash for her. My intention," he continued, untying the knotted string of the little bag with eager fingers, "is to keep a few of the very finest stones to be set for her as a bridal present to wear on her wedding-day, and turn all the rest into hard dollars for her dowry."

The jeweller nodded, not unsympathetically.

"Well, let us look at them," he said.

The old man carefully poured the contents of his bag upon the table.

The jeweller frowned impatiently, with disgusted surprise. He did not mind a good joke, but this was an excessively poor one—the poorest of practical jokes, to befool him into listening to a tale of diamonds, and then turn out some broken bits of a common glass bottle! A few splinters of a smashed bottle—a paltry, shabby jest indeed!

He was pushing the glittering fragments away roughly, with an angry look of contempt, when he noticed the fond and almost ecstatic look the visitor bent on his bits of bottle-glass, the earnest, exultant, agitated tone in which he was dilating on the perfection of these priceless and flawless gems.

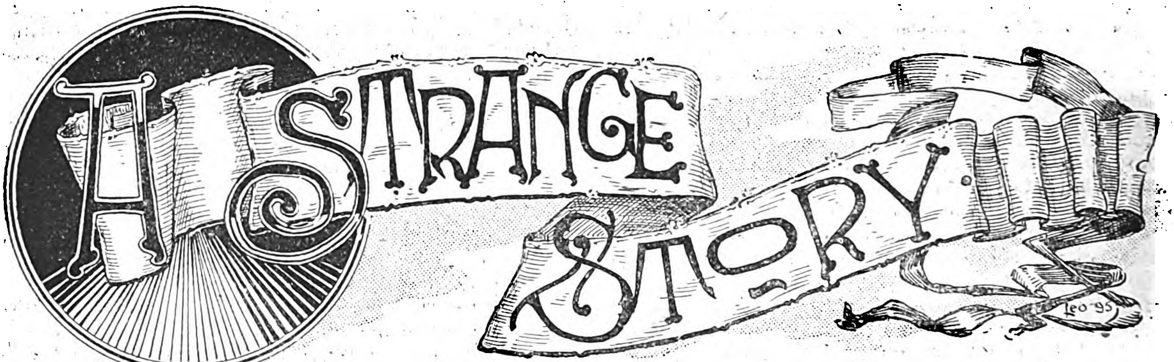
The jeweller's frown softened into a expression of pitying comprehension. He saw now that this was no jest.

When Harry Osmond, who had followed fast upon the Doctor's track, traced him that evening, he found him in a small room at one of the best hotels, counting over his treasures.

"I wish Gracie would come," he said. "I feel to-night that I'm old, and lonely and ailing. People are very kind—but it's my own flesh and blood I want now. Seems to me that Grace is a long time. I hope she will come soon, and I'll go home with her."

"It won't be very long, I think, before Grace is with you again," Harry replied, with a quiver in his voice. "And meanwhile, you'll let me stay with you, and I'll look after you and try to be all a son could be to you, until—until Grace comes to fetch you home."

It was a long time that the broken old man lingered, helpless and harmless, bereft of reason and strength, in a world wherein he had no longer part nor place; but Harry Osmond kept his word and devoted himself to the care of this poor wreck of life until the summons came that re-united father and daughter, and Dr. Kenrick's great secret died with him.



A STRANGE STORY

THE inhabitants of the usually sleepy little town of Eminster had for once in a way thrown aside their habitual apathy, and the veriest stranger would have said at once—and he would have been right, too—that something unusual was about to take place.

The annual assizes were being held, and although the calendar of crime was not a heavy one, it comprised one case that had for weeks past excited the greatest interest in the town and neighbourhood; and it was now about to culminate in the prisoner being put upon his trial, charged with the murder of a man, name unknown.

Gathered about at street corners were little groups of men, all eagerly discussing the coming trial; in respect to the prisoner's guilt or evidence there was a decided divergence of opinion.

"You see, the body ain't been found, that's one thing in his favour."

"Yes, but his hat have; there's no getting away from that."

"Then there's the blood on the——"

"Yes, but there weren't none found on his hands, or his clothes, was there now? Answer me that."

"Well, seeing as how he most likely carried him head downwards, as being most easy-like—the same as I was a showing you the other night, you know, with my boy Willum—it ain't to be expected as he'd have any blood about him. No! no! he was too artful for that; it's my belief he'll hang anyway."

"Hallo! here he comes."

A closed conveyance came up the street, driven at a rapid pace by a policeman out of uniform, but, nevertheless, a constable all over. A uniformed officer sat by his side on the box, and inside, as the vehicle passed rapidly by, could be seen two other men in blue and the prisoner.

There was a rush towards the Town Hall to get a view of the latter; but his custodians took the precaution of going into the yard at the back, and the curiosity of the onlookers was defeated.

Inside the precincts of the court every inch of space was occupied by an eager and excited body of spectators, and there was the usual hum of murmured conversation, until the usher shouted: "Silence, silence in the court," and the judge entered and took his seat.

The twelve good men and true composing the jury were immediately sworn, and filed into the jury-box, and then every eye in court was turned towards the door through which it was known the prisoner would make his appearance.

First a warder, and then a smart, well-set-up, muscular young fellow, aged apparently two or three-and-twenty, with a somewhat foreign class of features, a profusion of black curly hair, and a dejected look upon his face that denoted how the several weeks' confinement he had already undergone had told upon him—needless to say, this was the prisoner, Martin Smith.

When he had taken up his position in the dock after taking one swift look round the court, and apparently failing to recognise anyone present, he looked earnestly at the jury, as if to try and discover what manner of men they were in whose hands his fate was so soon to be placed.

To the usual question: "Guilty or not guilty?" he responded in a distinct tone: "Not guilty, my lord."

There was a rustle of expectancy as the counsel for the prosecution rose in his place.

"My lord, and gentlemen of the Jury, the case I have to lay before you is one of extreme mystery, and the only evidence I am prepared to offer will be almost, although not entirely, circumstantial. It will be proved that on the 20th June last, the prisoner came to the neighbouring town of Lymeton by rail, and that he travelled by the hotel bus from the station to the "Golden Cross," being the only passenger. Arrived there he inquired if he could have a bed for the night, and a room was assigned to him. He partook of some refreshment in the coffee room, and, having done so, wrote two or three letters which he himself went to post, having asked in what direction the post office lay. The recipients of these letters have not been traced, and the incident has therefore no further bearing upon the case.

"On his return, after an absence of less than a quarter of an hour, the hotel bus, conveying passengers from the last down train of the day, had just deposited a passenger who also desired to put up for the night, remarking that his luggage had been taken on in the train by mistake; but he was informed every room was full, the boots turning to the prisoner, remarking: 'This gentleman has just taken the last.' Whereupon the now missing man seemed much put out, saying it was most annoying, as he had a special appointment to keep in the neighbourhood the next day.

"The prisoner, you will be told, voluntarily offered to share his room with the stranger, an offer the latter very willingly accepted, and in a short time the two men were engaged in friendly chat in the smoking-room. Later on the conversation drifted into politics, and the arguments became warm on both sides, so much so that the attention of the waiter was attracted thereby. The prisoner, it appears, was advocating physical force for the remedy of constitutional grievances, whereas the stranger expressed himself as strongly opposed to such proceedings.

"Eventually, about eleven o'clock, both men retired to rest, the prisoner instructing the chambermaid to bring him some hot water, as he always shaved over-night. To do so necessitated her going to the lower part of the house, and she will tell you that on her return to the bedroom she heard an angry altercation going on between the two men, which, however, ceased when she knocked at the door, and she was unable to hear the purport of their remarks. But on the door being opened for her to place the water inside, she noticed that the prisoner seemed, as she expresses herself, much put out.

"Gentlemen, what subsequently took place I am unable to tell you, but the next morning the prisoner came down to breakfast at nine a.m., and remarked casually, that his bedfellow was up before him, and he supposed he had gone out to keep an appointment. As events proved, gentlemen, that appointment was never kept. There was, however, nothing to arouse suspicion beyond the fact that the stranger did not put in an appearance, but it seems that the chambermaid, when making up the bed, noticed what appeared to be blood stains on the carpet—(sensation in court)—and lost no time in communicating the fact to the landlord of the hotel, who himself visited the room and found not only that the girl's statement was true, but that on some steps leading from the verandah outside the bedroom down to the garden below (a plan of the house and grounds will be submitted to you) there were unmistakable signs of what appeared to be blood. There was also a small pool of blood just by the footbridge spanning the river, which, as you are doubtless aware, is a swift tidal tributary running into the sea, less than a mile distant.

"This is as far as I can carry the case, no trace of the missing man having since been found, although a few hundred yards below the bridge, at low water the same day, was found a hat, bearing no maker's name or other means of identification, but corresponding in appearance with the one worn by the missing man on his arrival at the hotel the night before.

"These are the facts, gentlemen, as I am instructed, and you will not be surprised to hear that on their coming to light the prisoner before you was arrested, charged before the local magistrates, and by them committed for trial. It is but fair to the prisoner to say that on the morning of the discovery he made no effort to leave the hotel, but busied himself in writing an essay, apparently for publication, on the gross injustice under which certain of Her Majesty's subjects suffer, and I shall not be exceeding, I think, the bounds of fairness and justice when I say that, from papers found in his possession when searched, he would appear to be a member of at least one revolutionary society.

"Beyond his name, the correctness of which is borne out by its being written on several articles of wearing apparel, it has been impossible to discover anything as to his identity, although, from the fact of his being defended by one of the most able advocates of the English Bar" (the defending counsel acknowledged the compliment by bowing), "it is, I think, pretty evident that he is not friendless or penniless. Gentlemen, that is the case before you. I will now proceed to call witnesses in support of what I have stated."

The first witness called was the driver of the bus, who deposed to having driven the prisoner from the station to the hotel, and subsequently, the missing man, who came in by the last train; his evidence was purely formal; and the prisoner's counsel did not make any cross-examination.

The same thing occurred with the boots of the hotel, and the coffee-room waiter; whose evidence was nothing beyond a bare statement of facts.

A chambermaid next entered the witness-box; and after detailing how she had been instructed to carry hot water to the bedroom, described how she heard the voices of the two men engaged in angry altercation, the sound of which ceased when she knocked at the door.

In cross-examination she admitted that she could not be sure it was an angry argument, as she could not distinguish anything that was said.

"Might they not have been laughing uproariously at some joke?"

They might, for all she knew; she heard a good deal of noisy talk.

"I thought you said, just now, 'angry talk? Be careful what you say; mind, you are on your oath."

"I couldn't swear they were what you might call quarreling, but they were talking loud."

"You did not happen to hear anything they said, I think?"

"No, sir, I did not."

"Thank you, that will do," with a significant glance at the jury.

Several other witnesses followed, their evidence merely referring to the prisoner's movements on the night of arrival and the morning of the supposed murder; and then there was a visible excitement in court as the chief witness in the case, the chambermaid who made the discovery of the blood on the carpet, took her place and was sworn.

"Your name is Esther Gough?"

"Yes, sir."

"And on the 21st June last you were engaged in making up the bed and tidying up the apartment known as the balcony room at the Golden Cross, Lymeton?"

"Yes, sir."

"Now, look at the jury, please, and tell us what you saw."

"I had nearly done the room, when at the side of the bed next to the window I noticed a dark stain on the carpet, and when I went to wipe it up with my cloth it was wet, and I found it was blood" (sensation), "and I at once went and told the master."

"That is all you know about it?"

"Yes, sir."

Cross-examined: "In the bedroom was a table with writing materials, I think?"

"Yes, sir."

"Ink and papers, etc.?"

"Yes, sir; it is a rule of the house."

"Quite so. Black ink, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir."

"And red?"

"Yes, sir; all the inkstands are the same pattern, with two bottles—one for black ink, the other red."

"And it would be your duty to see they are supplied with ink regularly?"

"Yes, sir."

The defending counsel sat down.

James Goold, landlord of the hotel, deposed to being informed by the last witness of there being a stain of what appeared to be blood on the carpet in the balcony room, and went to see for himself. There was a small stain, and he certainly thought it looked like blood. He opened the window leading to the verandah and steps, and went down into the garden, and in doing so he noticed on the steps and along the gravel path what he took to be more blood marks; and, pursuing his investigation until he came to the bridge over the river, he found a pool of blood just by the edge of the water. He had not at the time been apprised that the second gentleman, who had occupied the balcony room, had not been seen; but, on hearing of this, his suspicions were aroused, and he gave notice of the matter to the police. Having done so he felt his responsibility was at an end.

Cross-examined: "He was out at the time the missing man arrived."

"Beneath the verandah there is, I believe, a fowl run?"

"There is."

"And you keep fowls there?"

"I do."

"And when any are killed it would, I suppose, be convenient to hang them by the legs on the railing of the iron staircase?"

"I have seen my man do it."

"Are all the fowls thus killed consumed in the house?"

"Most of them; not all."

"And what becomes of the others?"

"I sell them."

"And—now pay attention, please—in the event of any fowls being killed for sale, where would they be taken? Up the steps and into the house through the bedroom?"

"No; they would in all probability be handed to a higgler, who calls in his boat once or twice a week."

"And he would come to the landing-place by the bridge, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir."

A murmur of applause ran through the court as counsel resumed his seat.

The only other important witness called for the prosecution was the man who at low water found a hat in the mud near the bridge.

Several witnesses were then called to prove that it was similar in shape and colour to the one worn by the missing man on his arrival, and this closed the case for the prosecution.

The prisoner elected to be sworn, and his counsel proceeded to examine him, by asking if he had ever seen the missing man before June 20th; to which he replied he had not. On being asked as to what was the nature of the conversation between them in the bedroom, the prisoner entered into a tirade against the inequality existing between the rich and poor in this country, and boldly announced himself as a revolutionary Anarchist; in vain did his counsel try and intervene, to prevent him giving expression to sentiments, which it was plain to see—by watching the faces of the jury—were speedily alienating any sympathy he might have aroused in their minds. It was a useless effort, as having once begun, he continued in a strain of almost ferocious invective, and it was not until he had well-nigh exhausted himself by the vehemence of his utterances that he seemed to realise the injury he had done his case. But he finished his harangue, and then looked defiantly at judge and jury, as if he would say: "Those are my sentiments, my lord and gentlemen, and I glory in them."

After putting one or two more or less irrelevan questions, his counsel resumed his seat.

Knowing the ability of the prosecuting counsel, it was anticipated that the cross-examination would be a severe one, but to the surprise of everyone in court, addressing his lordship, he said, in a tone of voice, the significance of which made itself felt:

"My lord, after what the prisoner has himself said, I do not think there is any necessity for me to cross-examine him, and I will, with your lordship's permission, proceed to address the jury, a task which will not occupy me long.

"My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the evidence brought before you, and despite the prisoner's rash utterances"—the prisoner's face never relaxed a muscle at this pertinent observation; he appeared, in fact, to regard the whole matter more in the light of a disinterested spectator than anything else—"despite, I say, the prisoner's vehement declarations, amongst which was the statement that under certain circumstances the taking of human life might be regarded as justifiable; despite all this, I say, which may, I think, be regarded more as the outcome of the pernicious doctrines of certain fanatical revolutionists of this age than any actual belief he himself holds, I would ask you to view calmly and dispassionately the evidence which has been laid before you.

"That a man—name unknown—did on the night of the 20th June occupy a bedroom conjointly with the prisoner has not been attempted to be disproved. And the fact that since the two men retired to rest one of them has not been seen alive, or heard of, is also undisputed. Beyond this I admit the case entirely rests upon circumstantial evidence, with this important addition that blood was found upon the carpet, on the verandah steps, on the gravel, and, finally, by the side of the river, in which, as you have been told, the tide flows very quickly, quickly enough, gentlemen, to carry away with it the body of a man. And last of all there is the finding of a hat similar in shape and appearance to that worn by the missing man.

"These are the facts, gentlemen, on which you are asked to arrive at a verdict, and I cannot doubt in my own mind what it will be. It is not for me to foreshadow the line of defence, but I may perhaps be allowed to suggest that the absence of any weapon will be dwelt on by my learned friend; this I may discuss at once, as I venture to submit that strangulation would not have been difficult to accomplish for a man of the prisoner's build, bearing in mind that the missing man has been described to you as of slim stature, and below the average height; no match, in fact, in a physical encounter for the man before you; and the fact of only a small quantity of blood having been found would support this view, it being well known that in cases of death by strangulation or hanging, only a small quantity of blood is as a rule discharged through the nose or ears of the victim; not having inflicted any wound, the prisoner may have imagined to himself that no trace would remain of his crime. Whilst on this subject, I may remind you that the prisoner's counsel ingeniously suggested that the blood stains might have been those of a slaughtered fowl!

"Gentlemen, you will have observed this point was merely suggested, not pressed home. Had it been," in an impressive tone of voice, "I was prepared to call two medical men who would have sworn that they had severally, and independently of each other, analysed the red substance which had become congealed on one of the iron steps of the staircase and found it to be human blood!" (Sensation.) "This, I think, gentlemen, satisfactorily disposes of the suggested theory. Had it been more than a suggestion I should have been prepared to refute it, but as it was I did not deem it necessary to unduly occupy the time of the court.

"Gentlemen, as counsel for the prosecution, I have tried to do my duty, it is for you, and you alone, to decide what the verdict shall be, and I leave the issue of the case unreservedly in your hands."

There was a death-like silence in court, and every eye was directed towards the prisoner, who had listened unmoved to the terrible indictment preferred against him with all the force and ability of one of the most skilful lawyers of the day, the prosecutor for the Crown.

To say that the prisoner looked altogether unmoved was perhaps to understate the fact. The look of anxiety which his face had worn at the commencement of the proceedings had been replaced by one of stolid indifference, and his counsel scanned his features carefully before rising to reply.

To everybody's surprise his opening sentence was as follows:

"After what has fallen from the lips of my learned friend—and there was nothing in his speech to which I take exception—it is, I feel, useless for me to attempt to put forward any ordinary line of defence. But, gentlemen of the jury, I would ask you to look for a moment at the prisoner." (The jury, to a man, instinctively looked in the direction of the dock.) "But a short while ago, gentlemen, you heard the prisoner declaim against the existing conditions of society, and even go so far as to say that, under certain circumstances, the taking of human life was a justifiable act. Placed in the awful position the prisoner is, I ask you, gentlemen, is that the outcome of sanity or otherwise? I can anticipate your reply. It is the utterance of a madman, you will say, and I agree with you. When I undertook the prisoner's defence I felt assured that he was not guilty of the crime of murder. Now, I confess, my belief is shaken; but another conviction has been irresistibly borne in upon me—and in it I shall, I think, have your concurrence—it is, that the prisoner is insane; and, such being the case, I ask your lordship that the prisoner's state of mind may be inquired into, and that your lordship defers summing-up until to-morrow, with a view of such investigation being made."

Surprise and amazement was predicted on the face of every person in the court. His lordship, after consideration, said he would accede to the request; meanwhile the prisoner was, he directed, to be closely watched, and he would take the next case on the list.

* * * * *

The extraordinary turn affairs had taken was the one subject of conversation in the town of Eminster during the rest of the day and late into the night; one enterprising individual even cabled a brief account of the trial to a London news agency.

Before the assembling of the court on the day following, a man, evidently only just recovering from a serious illness, called at the judge's lodgings, and asked to see his lordship.

The witnesses, in what had been called the Lymeton mystery were hastily summoned, and one and all, on being confronted with him, immediately acknowledged the identity of the new arrival as the missing individual, for whose murder Martin Smith had been tried the day preceding.

His story was briefly as follows: It was, he said, quite true that he and the prisoner had, before retiring to rest, had a heated argument on the subject of anarchy, in which the prisoner had expressed himself as a strong believer. Early in the morning he—the missing man—had got up tempted by the fineness of the day, and, when dressing, his nose had commenced to bleed; he had endeavoured to staunch it as best he could, and seeing that the window of the room led into the garden, down a flight of steps, he emerged; hoping the fresh air would refresh him.

Arrived at the river he copiously bathed his face, and then went across the bridge. Suddenly it occurred to him that he was absolutely without money, his pocket-book having been left in his hand-bag which (as explained) had gone on in the train without him the night he came to the hotel; his sole luggage consisting of a travelling cap he had placed in his pocket.

When bathing his face he lost his round felt hat and put on his cap. Feeling better for his exercise in the fresh air, he continued his walk across some fields and presently came to a railway-station, thinking that he would find it somewhat embarrassing to go back to a strange hotel and have to explain that he had no money wherewith to pay his bill; he determined to take the next train home, his return ticket being in his pocket, and he was influenced in his decision by seeing an up train come into sight just as he approached the station. Once in the train it happened that his nose started bleeding afresh, and by the time he had reached his destination he had lost so much blood that he was compelled to call in a medical man, who informed him he had broken a blood-vessel, and was in a very critical state, as the result proved.

He was confined to his room for several weeks, and it was only by the merest chance that he saw in a daily paper an account of the Lymeton Mystery, on reading which, and realising the dire necessity of the case, he—ill as he still was—came on by the first train.

* * * * *

Martin Smith was not only liberated the same day, but, marvellous to relate, was also certified to be insane as well.

* * * * *

The warders of the prison in which he had been detained pending his trial, had never noticed anything unusual, and the medical men expressed their opinion that his mind had become unhinged only on the day of the trial itself; when he realised for the first time probably the terrible position in which he stood.

But the strangest part of this strange story remains to be told.

The defending counsel admitted to his learned brother—the prosecutor—when it was all over, that it was a sudden inspiration on his part to assume that his client was insane, and that he had not the slightest idea such was the case when he made the assertion, feeling that it was altogether hopeless to attempt any other line of defence.

S. J. F. Newbery.

NUMBER 53.

ONE beautiful evening, in the summer of 18——, I was seated with my friend, Captain P——, at the open window of his room, situated on the second storey of the end house in the Boulevard M——. Outside, in the square, a band was playing some lively music. Nursemaids, with little children, ran races to and fro.

An old veteran in a large straw hat was describing, with frantic gestures, how he had lost his arm. In a corner, beneath some trees, a flock of youngsters were romping with a monkey, and the rays of the setting sun glanced over the housetops, flickered upon the green foliage, and upon the white pavement, over which it cast long, straggling shadows.

For some time we had maintained a profound silence, when the door of our apartment was thrown open and admitted our old neighbour, Monsieur Sang.

He showed us a lottery ticket, which he said he had found secreted in the back of a book which he had bought the day before at one of the bookstalls.

I took the piece of paper and examined it. It was for five hundred thousand francs (£20,000), and would be drawn for in five weeks' time.

Captain P——, leaning out of the window, with his chin resting on his hands, had scarcely noticed the entrance of the old man, but when I called him, and held the scrap of flimsy paper out towards him, he turned terribly pale, and sank back into his seat.

"Number 53!" he murmured aghast.

Not another word could we get out of him. He sat pale and dumb, like one turned into stone.

Monsieur Sang placed the ticket inside his pocket-book, and muttered loud enough for us to hear——

"Five hundred thousand francs! Why, that is a fortune! But an old fool like me will never win."

"You will win!" suddenly cried the Captain in strange low tones, which made us both start.

"How can you tell, monsieur?" whispered the old man eagerly.

"I want you to get rid of that ticket, for as sure as we are living men, you will be the loser in the end."

"Ah! Perhaps you would like to secure the ticket, monsieur?" said the old fellow, with a peculiar smile.

The Captain only shrugged his shoulders, and turned to the window.

"I know," said Monsieur Sang, "that I could get a good sum for this ticket, if it were known I had it for sale. However, as the Captain is so positive it will be drawn, I will retain the ticket, and run the risk of being the loser. Five hundred thousand francs! Why, I see what it is; the Captain is jealous! Ha! ha!"

He went out, and as he descended the stairs I heard him mumbling——

"You will be the loser in the end. What can the Captain mean, I wonder? Five hundred—" But he gained the street, and I could hear no more.

I turned to Captain P——; he was standing silent and motionless at the window. Although his eyes were directed to where the performers stood, I knew from their fixed and steady gaze that he saw none.

For a long time I sat watching him, standing there so pale and silent, all the while racking my brain how to account for his strange conduct on seeing the number of the lottery ticket—number fifty-three. What painful recollections did these two figures recall to his mind? I asked myself this question over and over again, but I still remained in the dark.

All at once he closed the window, and simply said, as if speaking to himself——

"There can be no doubt about it! Number fifty-three is an accursed number!"

"I do not understand you, Captain," I said, for I began to feel curious.

He remained silent for some time as if in deep thought, and I did not interrupt him.

"Listen," he said suddenly, "and you can judge for yourself as to the truth of my statement."

He lit a cigarette, and drew his chair to the table.

"Eleven years ago," he began, "my father, although considered to be a very sensible man, invested a sum of money in a lottery. His ticket was drawn, and he became possessed of five hundred thousand francs. He was fortunate. So everybody said. I, too, thought so at the time. One evening he entered one of the gambling saloons, and becoming fascinated by the play, he lost all his ready money in a few hours. Then all his property went, and when he arose from the table at midnight he was a beggar. Maddened by his losses, and rendered insane by the knowledge of the grief of his family, he shot himself through the heart. His ticket was Number 53!"

"Yet I cannot see how that goes to prove your statement," I said. "The same thing could happen with any number."

"True," he replied. "I attached no importance to the number at the time. Four years went by, and I had almost forgotten Number 53, when a friend of mine in poor circumstances managed to buy a lottery ticket. He won, like my father, five hundred thousand francs. Poor fellow it was the price of his reason. The sudden rise to wealth turned his brain, and he is now an immate of an asylum. Now you will understand me when I tell you his ticket was Number 53!"

I shuddered, but remained silent.

"You can have an idea," he went on, "as to the state of my feelings on seeing Monsieur Sang in possession of a lottery ticket bearing the fatal Number 53!"

I could answer nothing. To me it seemed inexplicable.

The day of drawing slowly came round, and as the Captain had foretold, Monsieur Sang's ticket was drawn. Number 53 was announced the winner!

When the Captain heard it, he shook his head and murmured——

"Wait! Wait!"

Monsieur Sang forsook the Boulevard M——, and bought for himself a nice little villa. He was talked of as being a lucky man, and was envied by all, except Captain P——.

"You will be the loser in the end," the Captain had said. But now I began to think he was mistaken.

One morning, scarcely three months after the drawing, Captain P—— placed a newspaper before me, and without a word, pointed out a certain paragraph.

I read with almost stifled heart, that a thief had entered Monsieur Sang's house the night before, and while searching for the money, which was believed to be secreted in the house, he aroused the owner, whom he stabbed to death.

The Captain was right. Monsieur Sang was the loser!

There is a solution to every mystery. Can you solve the mystery of Number 53? Captain P——, and myself confess ourselves baffled. N. N.

THE OUTLAWS' TREASURE

CHAPTER XXXVI

The Cypher Stolen.

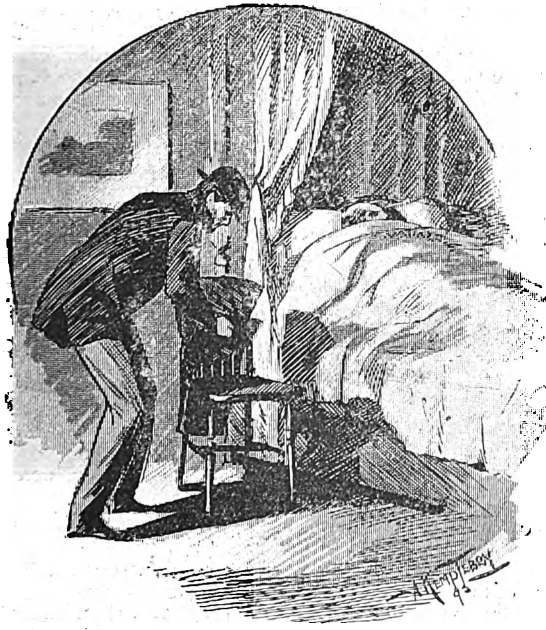
The discovery that Detective Squirrek made on his return from Judge Woodland's caused him no little uneasiness.

He remembered now during the conversation he had twice heard a slight noise at the window, and had turned his head inquiringly in that direction; but as it excited no remark either upon the part of the judge or his daughter, he did not think that it was the work of anything more than the wind or some stray cat.

But the more he reflected upon the circumstance the more satisfied did he become that it was the noise of an eavesdropper, and that whoever this might be, he had overheard everything that passed between the company.

“Furthermore,” he reflected, “this man does not belong in this town; he has followed me all the way from Chicago, suspecting that I carried some such secret.”

And then he fell to speculating upon the identity of the individual. This was all conjecture, as a matter of course, but so skilfully did he probe the matter, in his own mind, that when he retired to his room at the hotel he had fixed upon the man, and, as it afterwards proved, he was correct.



The cypher had been stolen.

That night Detective Squirrek very carefully placed his revolver under his pillow and left his door unlocked.

“If he wants to pay me a visit, I will not place anything in his way,” was his conclusion.

He believed that his pursuer would endeavour to enter the room during the night, and obtain possession of his paper, although there really was no necessity for doing so, if he had caught all the translation from the lips of the fair translator. But it was more than probable that he had not caught it all, but enough to give him the clue by which to read it for himself. The detective was drowsy, for he had slept but little during the past week. Still, he believed he could keep wide awake, as he had often done under similar circumstances.

An hour passed away, and all was still. In a country town like Somerville, the hotel closed comparatively early in the evening. He listened intently for stealthy footsteps along the hall—but none came, and he finally passed off into the land of unconsciousness.

“Jingo! but I must have slept soundly,” muttered Detective Squirrek, sitting on the edge of his bed and rubbing his eyes, while the rays of the morning sun diffused their golden sunlight over the floor. “I intended to keep awake, but must have forgotten all about it.”

He seemed unusually drowsy, and rubbed and rubbed his eyes, and gaped and gaped, and stretched and finally staggered to his feet.

“Hullo! how came my trousers there? I am sure I left them across the chair at the head of my bed, and there they lie in the middle of the floor—”

All at once he stopped, and began snuffing the air of the room.

“My gracious! there is no mistaking that smell. If that isn't chloroform, then I ain't—”

He paused again, as he fumbled over his trousers, and whipped out his pocket-book. There lay all the bank notes, snugly folded, and plump and tempting; but wedged in between them where he had carefully placed the paper last evening was—nothing.

The cypher had been stolen.

Detective Squirrek solemnly completed his toilet like a man who was preparing for a funeral.

When it was completed, and he was ready to descend to his breakfast, he placed both hands in his pockets, and looked down at the floor, his favourite attitude when in a brown study.

“No,” he muttered, with a sad shake of his head. “I am in the situation of the man whose apples rolled out of his waggon without his knowing it. I can't do justice to it. But it's funny. Here I set a trap to catch him, and he caught me, and that, too, as completely as ever a patent trap nabbed a mouse. That young gentleman has got the start of me, and if I ain't careful he will keep it.”

He hastily swallowed his breakfast, during which a horse attached to a light trap was brought to the door, and ten minutes later he was bowling along towards the home of Fred Weldon.

“Just in time!” he exclaimed, reining up, as he encountered the young man coming out of the gate. “Jump in; important business.”

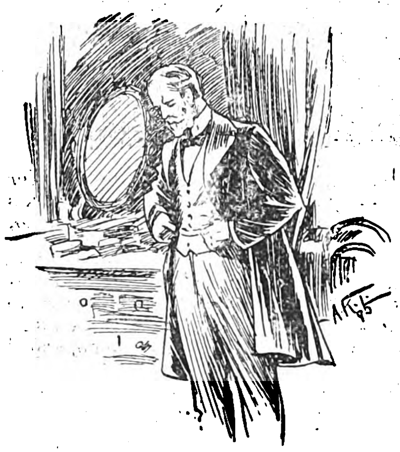
As soon as they were fairly beyond the town, Squirrek drew his horse down to a walk, and explained the translation of the cypher, and, in fact, all he knew about it, up to its disappearance during the preceding night.

"Do you remember that Doctor Ruthven, who was so assiduous in his attentions to you?" he asked, at the conclusion of his recital.

"I rather think I do," replied Fred, with a laugh.

"Well, he is the man that has followed me."

"No; impossible!"



Detective Squirrek solemnly completed his toilet.

"I am sure of it, and could give you a dozen reasons that would convince you, if it were necessary. The Cuban, Almanaz, must have given him to understand the nature of the secret he carried, and he has managed to learn, or at least to suspect, that I was following it up, and he had only need to watch me."

"And you did not know that you were followed?"

"Never suspected it until I was returning from Judge Woodland's ——"

"But suppose he has the cypher—and it looks very strongly that way—and suppose he can read it, what good will it do him?"

"The same good that it will us. You see that this looks as if the 'Fifty yards north, under the white oak' is the spot where the Mulligans buried the greater amount of their thievery. In all probability there is enough there to tempt a man to undertake any risk, especially such an unprincipled one as Doctor Ruthven."

"You are afraid he will get the start of us?"

"That's it; and finding that he himself cannot defeat us, he can easily spread the tidings through the town of what we are searching for, and in six hours there would be a thousand people surging up and down Devil's Creek as crazy over this as they were over the oil discoveries in Pennsylvania, and you see what a prospect there would be for us."

"Have you noticed one thing?" asked young Weldon, as they rode quietly along; "there is a very important omission in this cypher of yours, and one which is going to make no little difficulty."

"No, I haven't observed it, and Miss Woodland didn't refer to it," replied the detective in no little surprise.

"There is no starting point given you. It says 'fifty yards north.' Now, 'fifty yards north' of what? That's the question."

"Why—I declare I never thought of that," replied the detective, with a laugh. "Singular, isn't it?"

"If Doctor Ruthven finds the starting point before us, he will have just that much the advantage."

"You are right," replied Squirrek, giving his horse a sharp cut with the whip, which sent him bounding along the road at a rattling pace.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Searching for the Treasure.

It was a clear morning in the Indian summer, when there was just enough warmth in the sunshine to make it the most delightful season of the year. There was a mellow smoky haze resting upon hill and meadow, and a quiet stillness in the atmosphere, such as is seen only during the lingering days of summer.

Detective Squirrek was a good judge of horseflesh, and he was driving behind an admirable traveller, which passed every vehicle on the road excepting one.

Perhaps a third of a mile ahead of them, as they whirled round a bend in the road, they detected a man seated in a trap, who raised a cloud of dust as he sped swiftly forward over the highway.

"I think we can pass that trap," said the detective, straightening up in his seat, and putting his horse to his best gait.

The fugitive, as he might be termed, sped along at an astonishing rate, and soon proved that he was able to maintain his relative position without the least difficulty.

He was not seen to look behind even once while this desperate attempt was being made to overtake him, but seemed to know, as if by intuition, that he was pursued.

For fully an hour the exciting chase continued, at the end of which time it could not be seen that the distance between the pursuer and pursued had decreased in the least. On the contrary Weldon declared that they had lost ground.

"Let him go!" exclaimed Squirrek, reining up, so as to let him get out of sight.

"That is a philosophical way of taking it when you can't help it," laughed Weldon.

"Do you know who that gentleman is?" asked his companion.

"Certainly not."

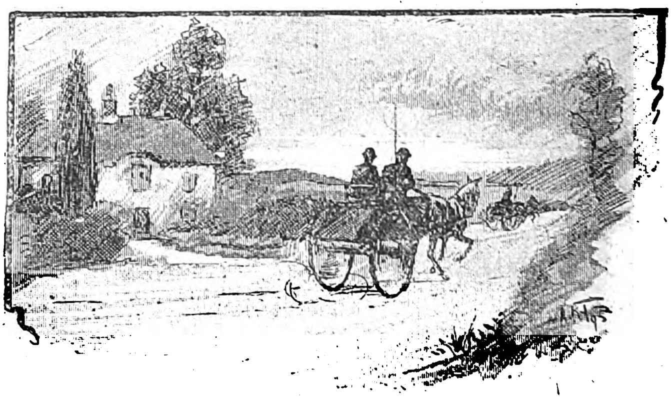
"I am certain that it is no one else but Doctor Ruthven. I thought at first that we would try and pass him, and then leave him behind; but, as we can't do that, we will let him leave us."

This was easily effected. The Jehu ahead continued his furious driving, and soon disappeared in a cloud of dust, while our friends continued with a good pace, so as not to lose too much ground.

There were many miles yet to travel, and it was past noon when they reached the road bridge crossing Devil's Creek, and at the nearest inn they put up their horses, and then went on foot.

"If that was Doctor Ruthven," said the detective, "we shall be very likely to encounter him somewhere in the wood."

The stream where they crossed it was quite small. About half a mile further down in the woods, the banks spread out and deepened into a gorge, over which the noted High Bridge of the railway was erected, and where Fred Weldon came so near meeting his death.



For fully an hour the exciting chase continued.

Turning down into the wood, they moved cautiously forward, carefully looking about them to see whether they were followed, and to make sure as to whether or not there was any one ahead of them.

In this manner they advanced until they reached the bridge, over which at that moment, and high above their heads, a train of carriages was passing.

"Now from what point do we start to measure off our fifty yards?" asked Fred Weldon, as they paused for a few moments.

"That is the point, indeed. I have had the idea all along that this bridge is the starting point."

"Have you any reason for thinking so?"

"No—only a sort of instinctive feeling. We shall soon learn, however, whether I am right or not. Now you take the other side, and I will this, and we will see what we can see."

"I suppose I am to make search for a white oak?"

"We will both look for such an object."

Squirrek remained on the upper part of the bridge, while Weldon passed below. There was a rapid beating of the hearts of both, as the feeling came over them that perhaps they were now upon the eve of an important discovery—one which very probably would have a great influence upon their future lives.

The detective fixed that keen grey eye of his upon a point that he judged to be about fifty yards distant; and then slowly turning on his heel, scanned every tree that came within his range of vision.

This was repeated again and again, but the conclusion was that he had not seen a single tree that would answer the description.

"I have failed completely," said he, passing through to where Weldon was standing in the same position. "What have you discovered? Anything?"

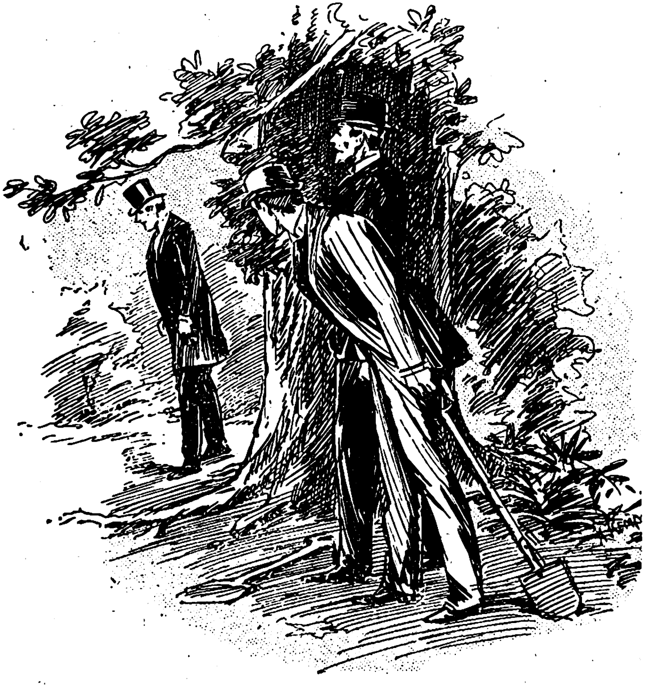
"My idea of what we want is still invisible," was the reply; "but off yonder, a short distance to the left, is what possibly may be the object of our search."

"I very much doubt it; it is too small. Let me take a look also."

He took several, but was compelled to accept the conclusion of his young friend.

The two men made their way to the tree that had attracted the attention of both, but, on nearing it, it was found to be a moderately-sized maple.

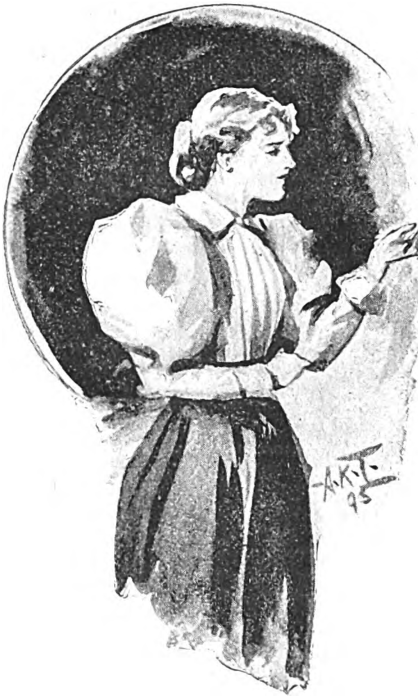
They stared at it a moment in silence, and then the detective remarked with his laugh:



Doctor Ruthven emerged to view.

"No use in digging there."

"It will do no harm to try," said Weldon, showing a disposition to use his shovel; but his companion shook his head.



"I examined it very carefully."

"Love's labour lost; we must go back to Somerville, call on Miss Woodland, and get her to help us out of the difficulty—sh!"

The crackling of undergrowth caught their hearing, and, stooping down, they both concealed themselves in the undergrowth, which grew here quite luxuriantly.

A moment later Doctor Ruthven emerged to view, walking slowly down the ravine, with the air and manner of a man who was searching for something.

He frequently paused and looked about him, but, failing to discover that for which he was searching, he finally disappeared from view.

"There goes another poor fellow groping in the dark," laughed the detective. "Now for Judge Woodland's."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A Disappointment and a Fresh Start.

The evening succeeding the fruitless search of Fred Weldon and the detective, both were seated in the parlour of Judge Woodland, himself and daughter being present.

The embarrassment between the young lady and the young lawyer was mutual, and was watched with no little interest by the detective, who was now satisfied that everything was moving along smoothly in that direction. He managed to throw them together during the early part of the interview as much as possible, and they finally succeeded in engaging in a sort of fragmentary conversation.

They were left thus alone for some time, but as the detective had called upon business, he was compelled to state it.

Florence Woodland listened until the request was stated, and then she asked for the writing.

"I have lost it," replied the detective, who did not care to explain the manner by which it had left his possession.

"I don't know that it makes any difference, for I am certain there was nothing more upon it. When you first sent it to me, I examined it very carefully, and would have noted anything else."

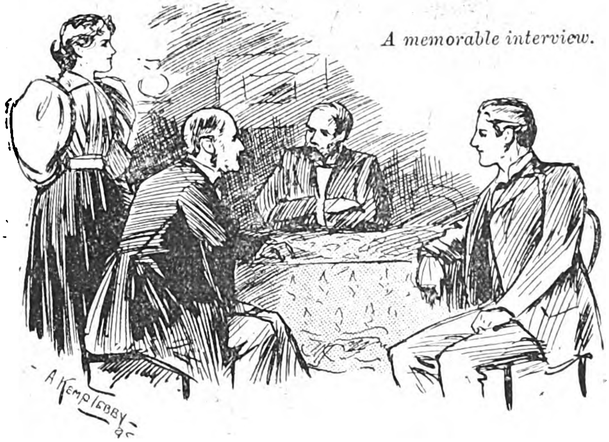
"Can you give us no additional clue, then?" he said.

She thought for a moment before replying.

"I do not see how it can be done."

"Then we are off the track entirely, which perhaps is for the best, as I am urgently needed in Cincinnati, and am under a partial promise to be there this week. I will go, and leave Weldon here to work out the problem. Perhaps he may succeed in doing so. I observe, judge, you are laughing."

The old gentleman was twirling his spectacles in his hand, and smiling like one who was enjoying something all to himself.



A memorable interview.

"It serves you right for not coming to me for assistance, instead of going to Florence, who is totally lost."

"You," repeated the detective in turn. "Indeed we deserve censure for forgetting you."

"That you do, and I am tempted to allow you to remain in ignorance for your criminal forgetfulness."

"We can only bow our heads meekly to the infliction," was the humble reply.

"Then you acknowledge that it is deserved?"

"We do."

After jesting in this manner for some minutes the judge became serious.

"Laying this badinage aside, I really have the power to assist you out of your dilemma."

All listened attentively to his words.

"You fixed upon High Bridge as your standpoint, and there is where you made your fatal error."

"What should we have done?"

"The directions, as you have them, or as you did have them, until you lost them, clearly imply that your point of observation should have been at the beginning of Devil's Creek."

"At the beginning," exclaimed Squirrek. "I suppose the stream commences up country in some little spring, or drips from underneath a rock."

"Not so fast. Many years ago, when I was a youngster, and used to go hunting and nutting in the woods, I recollect that the stream along which you made your search was not known as Devil's Creek. About a third of a mile below High Bridge a smaller stream debouches into this one, and from the point of their junction until it empties into the river, ten miles distant, the brook bore the euphonious name which of late years, and especially since the railway was built, has been applied to the other. Take your station at the junction of these two, and my word for it, you will have no difficulty in finding the white oak for which you so longingly sigh."

The next question of the detective was characteristic.

"It seems singular that these men should have been aware of this fact regarding the name of the stream."

"Not at all; they daily came in contact with many of the old inhabitants, and very naturally heard of it."

"Well, you deserve the medal," was the enthusiastic commentary of Squirrek. "You have cut the Gordian knot."

Once or twice during the interview the officer had taken the liberty of going outside to see whether there were any eavesdroppers. On each occasion when he did so he placed his hand upon his revolver, and had he seen Doctor Ruthven there can be little doubt of what would have followed.

But the coast was found clear, and as all were guarded in their tones during conversation, they had the satisfaction of knowing the secret was with them alone.

During this memorable interview there were many stolen glances between Florence Woodland and Fred Weldon. She, who was so brilliant and so completely herself in any assemblage, experienced a strange, nervous uneasiness in the presence of this former playmate of her childhood, which showed itself in a hesitancy and abruptness of speech, and a tendency to look down upon the carpet immediately in front of her.

And Fred Weldon, who had confronted the most towering legal minds of his country, and fearlessly joined issue with them, was a child in this regal presence.

Occasionally their glances met, and at such times a blush suffused the faces of both. When the "good-nights" were said she lingered in the room, as though she were unable to accompany him to the door.

All the indications were that the young but powerful love in the hearts of both was giving unmistakable evidence of its existence and growth.

The following morning the two men were on the road again, and about the middle of the forenoon were standing under the High Bridge, Fred Weldon with a shovel on his shoulder, and Adolph Squirrek, with an instrument generally known as an adze, principally used for cutting away the roots of trees.

They had made cautious inquiries, and carefully looked about for Doctor Ruthven, but had not seen him since the meeting in the wood.

At this stage of the proceedings it was all important that their motions should escape observation, and the detective said:

"You move ahead, and I will follow at a safe distance. If I see anything suspicious I will whistle, and you must wait for me to come up with you."

The "line of march" was taken up in this fashion, and proceeded slowly, as the officer was resolved not to spoil everything by a misstep at the beginning.

On every side he glanced, frequently pausing and walking backwards and listening for the slightest sound; but all went well.

They were now in the very depths of the wood, and it seemed to the men, as they trod stealthily along, that they were stealing their way into an enemy's camp.

The detective was walking along in this cautious manner, when he unexpectedly came upon his companion.

"What is the matter? What are you waiting for?" he asked, in some surprise.

He replied by pointing a rod or two in advance, to where a small stream poured into the one which they were following.

"There is Judge Woodland's standpoint."

"So it is; now we will both take an observation."

Both did so, and at the first glance caught sight of a large, towering white oak, about fifty yards to the north of them.

"The judge was right," exclaimed the detective, his face lighting up with the glow of a man who has conquered victory at last; "we are on the eve of success."

Both looked at each other, as if undecided what to do next. The officer, as usual, took the lead.

"Walk down the stream a hundred yards, and I will go up the same distance. We must not be discovered at this work."

This precautionary measure was acted upon, and a most searching reconnaissance made, resulting in the discovery of no living creature in the woods besides themselves.

Both came back and stood by the trunk of the tree, and Weldon looked inquiringly in the face of his friend.

"Begin," said the latter, "and when the roots stop you I will strike a blow."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Discovery of the Treasure.

A strange feeling came over the young man as he pressed the shovel down into the soft alluvium. The thought of what in all probability was a few feet underneath his shovel, and the strange dreams of the future that in those few brief moments flashed through his mind, almost unnerved him for the time.

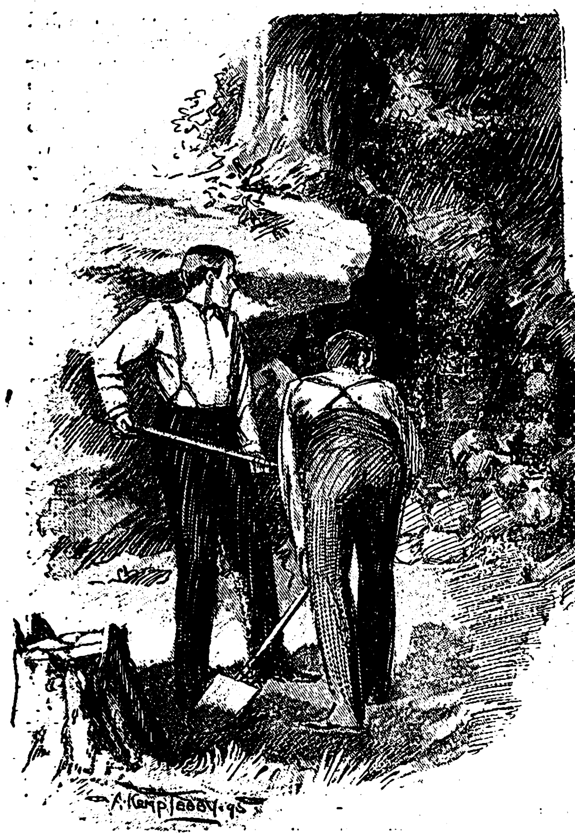
But he worked all the harder, as if to force back these tumultuous imaginings which were thronging upon him.

Even Detective Squirrek, grim, stern, and emotionless, standing like a statue, except that his sharp glance flitted through the wood, and then down upon the work before him, was more nervous than he had been for a long time.

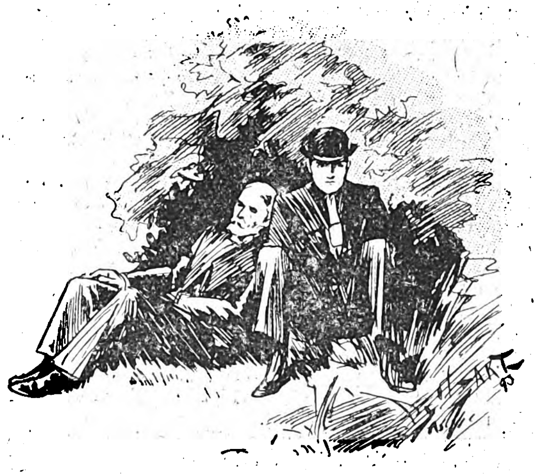
But he had an iron will, and there was no ebullition upon the surface to show the tumult below.

He stood ready with his adze to take his turn at the work, should any roots be encountered, but Weldon found nothing more than soft earth to resist the action of his implement.

Furthermore, as he toiled, he found that he was passing through a network of roots that had been cut off near the trunk, and by the sides of the aperture he was delving.



The hidden treasure was discovered.



The men were thoroughly exhausted.

"What does that mean?" asked Weldon, pausing in his work, and looking up in his companion's face.

"That we are repeating what has been done before. Those roots have all been carefully cut away for some purpose."

"I wonder what purpose?" he asked significantly, as he leant upon his shovel.

"We shall probably learn in a few minutes. Let me take a turn at the work."

"No; I am not tired."

But Squirrek was anxious to try his hand, for he felt need of doing something to repress his excitement, which was increasing upon him.

So he grasped the shovel, and laboured with an almost desperate fierceness, that soon placed him waist-deep in the pit which he was excavating.

The detective had laboured scarcely ten minutes, when, thinking he was working too far from the tree, he thrust the shovel into the wall of earth in front of him.

As he did so it broke through the thin soft crust, and the blow being quite a powerful one, the shovel went clean through, almost the length of the handle, throwing him upon his hands and knees.

The dirt and débris came tumbling down, and displayed a cavernous opening, some five or six feet in height and breadth, the dirt of which must have been skilfully scooped out and carried away, while the ground above was covered with leaves, so as to effectually conceal what had been done from any who might accidentally wander that way.

The Hidden Treasure was discovered!

Over thirty sacks, filled with golden coin, lay piled upon each other like so many salt bags. Each was filled so nearly full that there was only barely room to tie the tops, while the strong canvas seemed ready to burst with its concentrated wealth.

Besides this, there were a dozen boxes of diamonds and the most valuable jewellery. Hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of plunder was spread out before their eyes.

For a few seconds the two men were speechless. Great drops of perspiration stood upon the brows of each, and they were almost overcome.

"Now what's to be done with it?" was the first question of Weldon.

"Get it out of there, and deposit it in the nearest bank, and then advertise for the claimants to this."

But the first part of this was no slight task. The weight was sufficient to make a good load for a horse, and the nearest point to which they could bring their waggon was fully a mile away.

The secret was too valuable and tempting to be trusted to a third party, and the only thing that could be done was to carry the coin and jewellery piecemeal to the waggon.

After a careful deliberation, the course of action was decided upon. It was determined to transport the treasure to a point within a few rods of the road, and there conceal it until the morrow, when it could be placed in the carriage in a few minutes, and carried to the Cornwall bank for safe-keeping.

Fred Weldon loaded himself with all the sacks he felt able to carry, and started up the ravine, while the detective remained behind to watch the treasure during his absence.

In the course of an hour he returned, and described the place where he had concealed it with such minuteness that there was no fear of the other experiencing any difficulty in finding it.

Now Squirrek loaded himself down and started on his tramp. When he came in sight of High Bridge he heard the whistle of an approaching train, and carefully kept out of sight until it had passed. His load cautiously placed in position he rejoined his friend.

This procedure was kept up until more than one-half the treasure had been deposited under some thick shrubbery in full sight of the main road, when the sentry post was changed to this place, and maintained until the last load was removed.

By this time night was closing in, and the men were thoroughly exhausted and used up. They sat down panting, and drew their handkerchiefs across their heated brows.

"Here we must spend the night, I suppose," said Weldon.

Although both were so greatly exhausted, they were too feverish and excited to sleep. The detective lit his cigar and smoked, and recounted many of his surprising experiences to Weldon, who became greatly interested in them, and they found the hours passed much more rapidly than they had anticipated.

When it began to grow light Weldon cautiously left their retreat and made his way to the tavern where the horse and carriage had been left. He was too "flustered" to feel the need of food, but he procured a lunch for himself and Squirrek, and, as soon as his horse was harnessed, was speeding down the road again.

The entire treasure was placed in the carriage without attracting the attention of any passers-by, and at an early hour they started towards Cornwall. It was speedily discovered that their vehicle was loaded to its utmost capacity, and it was dangerous to travel faster than a walk.

At this gait they proceeded, first one walking beside the carriage and then the other, so as not to tax their animal too much, or incur too great a risk of breaking down.

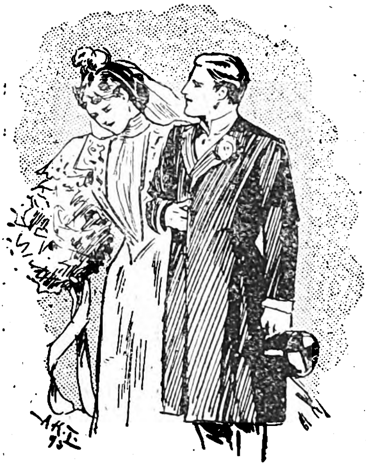
CHAPTER XL.

All Ends in the Usual Way—Happily.

It was about noon when Fred and Squirrek entered the small town of Cornwall. They went straight to the bank, where, as may be supposed, their appearance created no little excitement; but in a few words the detective explained matters to the manager, who happened to be in, and in a very short time the treasure was safely deposited in the vault, and a receipt given to Squirrek, who, after another consultation with the officers, explaining fully his intentions, took his departure with Weldon to the hotel, where they enjoyed their dinner, and, for the first time since they had fairly got into this business, felt at liberty to breathe freely, and take a few minutes' rest.

Detective Squirrek next began an elaborate attempt to trace the recovered property to the rightful owners. There were marks upon the jewel-cases and some of the jewellery itself which enabled him to discover the parties from whom it had been stolen, especially as he advertised the articles very widely.

Multitudes of false claimants appeared, but they found themselves dealing with a man too shrewd to be deceived. Nearly all of those who regained their valuables in this manner pressed some souvenirs upon the officer, who resolutely refused to receive any reward from them in that shape.



All ends in the usual way.

After every effort had been exhausted, there still remained something over eighty thousand dollars in gold for which no owners could be found. It looked as if the Mulligans had brought a large portion of their booty from a distance.

Several carrier companies were able to identify their bags of coin from the peculiar marks upon them, and each of these had the manliness to send a handsome fee to the man who had been instrumental in recovering it, and he was sensible enough to accept it from them.

The end of the whole matter was that when the business was fairly wound up Detective Squirrek found about a hundred thousand dollars in his hands. One half of this was given to Fred Weldon, who positively refused to take it until the sum which the detective had previously given his mother was deducted from his share.

This compromise was finally agreed upon, and so ended the history of the hidden and recovered treasure.

During these proceedings Doctor Ruthven was once or twice seen in Somerville and Cornwall, as if he were meditating some scheme by which to gain a share of the riches of the two men, but evidently he was unable to discover any method, for he finally disappeared altogether.

For a time young Fred Weldon was somewhat dazzled by the large fortune thus placed in his hands.

Taking the advice of Squirrek and Judge Woodland, he invested it in land where there was a certainty of a rapid appreciation in value, and devoted himself with renewed energy to the practice of his profession, living in Somerville, and studying and labouring hard.

Detective Squirrek took his departure for other scenes of his peculiar labour, where by the last accounts he was still engaged at work that evidently suited him.

Encouraged by his own trembling hope, Fred Weldon became bolder in his visits to Judge Woodland's, as he saw that his coming lit up the eye of the fair being who was there, and brought the blush to her cheek as she met him at the door and bade him good-bye.

The course of true love ran smooth in this instance—that is, dating from its outward beginning, but the vast trials encountered by the hero, when his great passion was all unspoken, were such as to verify the observation of the immortal Bard of Avon.

It was a marriage which all, even those who were most keenly disappointed, admitted was eminently fit to be made, and the most misanthropic could not refuse the couple their best wishes for a safe and pleasant journey through life.

The End.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street London, W.C.

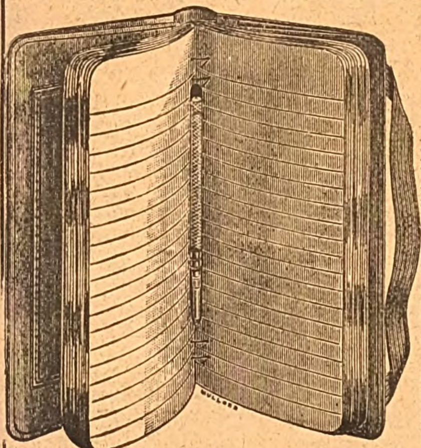
THE MISERY OF CORPULENCY.

A copy has come to hand of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (246 pages), the clever little volume which, more than anything else, has brought a revolution in the treatment of obesity. That the still larger circulation implied by the issue of the new edition of this popular work is necessary is proved by such a paragraph as the following. It appears among the answers to correspondents in the "Dress and Fashion" column of a Sunday newspaper with a large circulation: "Miserable.—A young girl of 18 ought not to have such a large stomach that no dress looks well. Perhaps you require exercise and dieting." The helpless vagueness of this reply to a young girl who is naturally "miserable" on account of her unseemly obesity is a sufficient evidence that Mr. Russell does well in seeking to make known, even more widely than they are at present, the simplicity, the efficiency, the rapidity, and the delightful surroundings of his treatment for the reduction of superabundant fat. The young girl in question, who might exercise and diet herself for months without any appreciable improvement, may easily learn to imitate the example of thousands of ladies of all ages, who, by the use of Mr. Russell's pure vegetable preparation, have reduced their weight at the rate of pounds per week, and sometimes (but only when necessary, for the working of the cure is virtually automatic, stopping its effects when the normal limit is reached) stones per month. She may acquire this open secret—for the author makes no mystery about the ingredients of his recipe, by sending six penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when a copy of the book will be sent post free. If she follows his instructions, "Miserable," without any fasting regimen, and without excessive exercise, will find herself being quickly reduced to shapely proportions, with an improved appetite, and full liberty to gratify it.

LONGEVITY AND CORPULENCY.

We have received a copy of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). This issue is in itself indicative of the widespread influence which the author now exercises as a successful expert in the treatment of obesity, while the additions to the evidence which, as a statistician, he is in the habit of collecting on the subject are suggestive of some curious reflections. It is evident that Mr. Russell is annually treating thousands of cases of excessive fat with a success which, in the rapidity and the permanence of its manifestation is truly marvellous. That the enormous popularity of his system is likely to increase in the future is most probable, because it is free from all the drawbacks which have rendered the Banting and other methods of reducing corpulence unacceptable to the majority of the sufferers, who have regarded these cures as rather worse than the complaint. By attacking the causes rather than the symptoms of obesity, he strengthens the digestive organs, thus actually increasing, instead of decreasing, the appetite, while the surplus weight is being reduced at a wonderfully rapid rate, amounting to pounds per week, and often stones per month. Add to this that there is no mystery about the nature of the absolutely innoculous preparation, the recipe for which Mr. Russell supplies in his capital little volume (256 pages), which may be obtained post free by sending six penny stamps to the author's offices, at the address given above. It seems certain, therefore, that, as a result of the happy revolution which the patient research of this specialist, with the aid of a distinguished physician as a collaborateur, has effected, the average of longevity will, before long, be appreciably raised. Obesity is, indeed, one of the few antagonistic influences remaining which, especially among the more prosperous classes, prevent the great majority of people of both sexes becoming centenarians. With advanced ideas in regard to wholesome food, clothing, and sanitary arrangements, it only remains to get rid of clogging fat to live an ideally hygienic, and therefore, a very prolonged life.

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.
Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,
E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps from THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent. Please mention this paper.

CAMBRIC

Bordered.	per doz	Hem-stitched.	per doz.
Children's	1/3
Ladies',	2/3	Ladies',	2/9
Gents',	3/3	Gents',	3/11

Direct from the Manufacturers

POCKET

"The Irish Cambrics of Messrs. Robinson & Cleaver have a world-wide fame."
The Queen.

Samples and Price Lists Post Free.

HANDKERCHIEFS

LINEN

Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, 3/6 per doz.
" Gents' 4-fold, 4/11 per doz.
Cuffs for Ladies or Gentlemen from 5/11 per doz.

COLLARS, CUFFS,

Shirts, Best quality Long Cloth, with 4-fold Linen Fronts, 35/6 per ½ doz. (to measure 2/- extra).

"Exquisite quality, most moderate in price."—Myra's Journal.

AND SHIRTS.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENTS TO THE QUEEN AND EMPRESS FREDERICK OF GERMANY.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

32 PAGES. READ GEORGE GRIFFITH'S NEW STORY. 32 PAGES.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 349. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 7TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO CUT

10,000 RUGS
GIVEN AWAY.

THIS PHENOMINAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 6s. or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered, and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets are manufactured from a material equal in wear to wool, and are undoubtedly the cheapest in the world.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 10s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers.

"16, Clarendon Villas,
"West Brighton.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for your prompt attention to my wire of Friday. The Carpet came duly to hand on Saturday, and I am exceedingly pleased with it, so much so that I purpose calling at your warehouse one day this week, when I expect to be in town, to see if I can supply myself with two more to suit my present requirements.—Yours faithfully, W. HEATH HAYWOOD."

"45, George Street, Plymouth.

"GENTLEMEN,—The Carpet is duly to hand, and gives entire satisfaction.—Yours truly, J. C. PICKFORD."

"Mullaghmore.

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of Carpets, with which I am very pleased; they are splendid value for the money, and far superior to what I expected. Later on I shall be pleased to favour you with further orders.—Yours sincerely, H. CUNNINGHAM."

This offer is made to the readers of th's paper only, and may not be repeated. All orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec. Established 1872. Address—

The BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THIS OUT.
IT MAY NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S
CAMOMILE
PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S,
Limited.

NORTON'S
Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

21, Spital Square,
London, E.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, Hanley

Are Selling Fast the most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once. Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

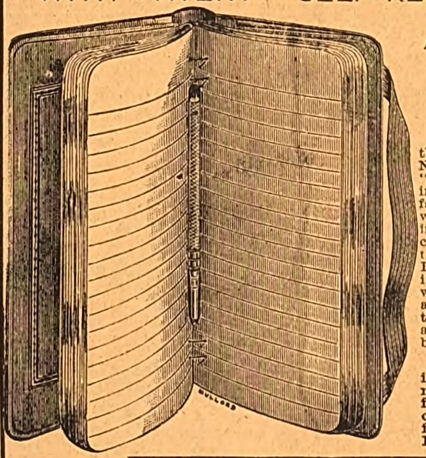
Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST
AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST
AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

Chronic Indigestion.
(The Early Symptoms.)

The approach of this obstinate complaint may be clearly recognised by Pain, Fulness, and General Uneasiness after Food, Loss of Appetite (especially for Breakfast), Foul Tongue, Nausea, Sleepiness, Flushings of the Face, Redness about the Nose, Sick-Headache, and Giddiness. By bracing up the Mucous Membrane of the Stomach, increasing the quantity and improving the quality of the Gastric Juice, Guy's Tonic acts in a most wonderful way on every form of indigestion.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Will you allow me to add my testimony to the great value of Guy's Tonic? It restored my Appetite, cleared the Tongue, and acted most beneficially on the Liver and Nerves. It also gave me Refreshing Sleep, Freedom from Dreams, and a Pleasant Waking. The Distressing Symptoms of Melancholia and Despondency have never returned since I took the first bottle of Guy's Tonic."

Note Carefully!

It is particularly in cases of Indigestion and Nervousness that the remarkable strengthening and restoring properties of Guy's Tonic are most conspicuous. Its action upon the digestive and assimilative organs—and through these upon the entire frame—is little short of the miraculous.

Guy's Tonic is a pure vegetable preparation, recommended by the Faculty as being the purest and safest strengthening remedy we possess. Simple directions are contained in the pamphlet on "Digestion" that accompanies each bottle.

Guy's Tonic may be procured of all Chemists and Medicine Vendors throughout the world. It is prepared under the direct supervision of a qualified Pharmacist, from the purest materials that money can purchase and the most careful selection ensure.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S
PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

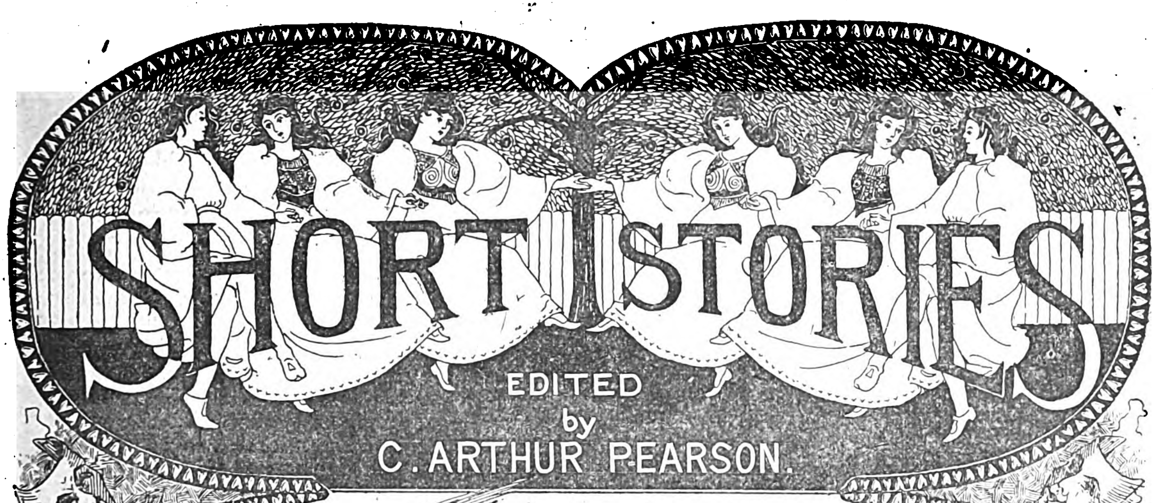
ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.



No. 349.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending September 7th, 1895.

ROMANCE
ADVENTURE
HUMOUR
LOVE
WAR
PATHOS

A BUNCH OF GREENS.

An individual whose right arm was encased in splints and hung in a sling entered a magnificent jewellery shop, the proprietor of which was a Mr. James Green. The stranger had that in his appearance generally styled distingué. His carriage and garb revealed the military veteran, and his manners the finished gentleman. At the door halted an elegant carriage, and the good taste of its owner was made apparent by the plain but neat livery of the groom and the choice trappings of the handsome high-bred horses.

The stranger stated that he was desirous of procuring a complete silver table service, rich, solid, and elegant, with but little ornamentation. Could Mr. Green prepare such an one for him? The goldsmith answered, of course, in the affirmative, and showed several patterns to his visitor, who then described very minutely the style in which he wished the articles to be made, and asked by what time they could be got ready. At the same time he insisted on punctuality, saying he must use the set at a reception he would soon give at his new residence in Leicester Square. Green promised to have it done in three weeks, and then the two parties discussed the terms.

The jeweller very carefully made up all his calculations, and demanded twelve hundred pounds. The stranger reflected a few moments, then said he had determined on getting a service at the cost of fifteen hundred pounds, and requested Mr. Green to add as many more pieces to the set as would fix the price at that sum. Mr. Green thanked the gentleman for this mark of confidence, and inquired of him to whose recommendation he owed his patronage.

"No one has recommended you to me," replied he.

The jeweller looked up in surprise. The stranger, who had hitherto worn an air of dignity almost amounting to austerity, now became more friendly, and continued:

"I'm a soldier. I have served for years in India, and more recently in Egypt. At Tel-el-Kebir I received a severe wound in my right arm and hand which will perhaps disable the member for life. My patronage you owe to your parents, grandparents, and, in fact, to the whole line of your ancestors."

The jeweller was amazed and bewildered. His parents and other ancestors had long been dead, and could not have referred the soldier to him. The latter apparently enjoyed Mr. Green's perplexity, and smilingly continued:

"I will make myself clearer. When, in consequence of this unfortunate wound"—here a sudden twinge in his arm made him start painfully—"I was compelled to leave the service, I resolved to settle down in London. While riding out the other day I was attracted by the appearance of your splendidly-furnished shop, but more so by the name on your sign, for mine is precisely the same. To this simple reason you owe the present visit of Colonel James Green, of the Grenadier Guards."

All rights reserved.]

The jeweller expressed his delight at the honour of being the namesake of so distinguished a warrior, and, after a few more pleasantries of this nature, reverted to the business in hand.

"May I now inform you," said the jeweller, with some hesitation, "of the conditions which must generally be complied with previous to making a sale?"

"No," said the Colonel sharply; "I have my own way of doing business. You and I do not know each other, and although my order is not an uncommonly large one, yet it amounts to a sum with which you cannot credit a stranger. I will, therefore, pay you one hundred pounds cash down for a surety, the remaining fourteen hundred pounds when I call for the service."

Mr. Green accepted the offer with profuse thanks.

"You need not thank me," the officer interrupted; "as I remarked, I always have a way of my own, from which I never like to deviate. Now, do me the favour to take my pocket-book from my coat pocket, my unfortunate wound"—the Colonel again winced with pain—"has lamed my right arm and hand completely."

Mr. Green expressed his sympathy in the warmest terms, carefully pulled the pocket-book from the veteran's coat, opened it at the latter's desire, and from four or five new notes took one, which the Colonel requested him to keep. Mr. Green wrote off a receipt, and placed it in the old pocket-book, which he then very carefully restored to its resting place. He then assisted the Colonel to enter the carriage, and the groom—Colonel Green could not drive on account of his injured arm—rapidly drove off in the direction of Leicester Square. The jeweller, though much overjoyed, was a cautious business man, and, notwithstanding the considerable deposit, proceeded to make his safety certain.

In the "War List" he readily found the name and rank of his customer, just as they had been given, and from the estate agent who rented out the splendid mansion in Leicester Square he had ascertained that it had recently been occupied by Colonel James Green, of the Guards, and that the latter had brought the most excellent recommendations from his banker, and sundry other distinguished personages.

In the course of three weeks, at the end of which the set was to be done, the Colonel often came into the shop to see how the work was going on, and always discoursed so affably with the goldsmith that the latter could not find sufficient words of praise for his genial customer when speaking to others about him. At last the service was completed. It was placed upon a large table and covered with a cloth of blue velvet. Punctual at the stipulated time in the afternoon Colonel Green entered the shop, his excellent carriage with the spirited horses remaining before the door in care of the groom.

The officer stepped into the room, and Mr. Green, swelling with pride, removed the velvet cloth from the service. The Colonel, though usually a quiet man, declared that it surpassed his expectations, and insisted upon paying the entire one thousand five hundred pounds, and also upon the jeweller retaining the deposit of one hundred pounds as a douceur for the satisfaction he had given.

"Now to business," said the Colonel. "Be so kind as to take out my pocket-book and count off your one thousand five hundred pounds, for I do not wish to tarry a moment before showing your chef d'œuvre to my wife."

The jeweller hastened to comply. He took from the officer's breast coat pocket a card-case, a set of ivory tablets, and a silk purse, through whose meshes glittered some five or six sovereigns, but no pocket-book. Upon the Colonel's request he then examined all of his pockets. The search was futile.

"Strange. Incomprehensible. Could I have lost it, or been robbed?" muttered the Colonel, audibly perplexed and provoked. "What o'clock is it?" he suddenly asked.

"Twenty minutes to five."

"Good; it is time enough. You must make yourself serviceable to me once more, my dear Mr. Green, and act as my secretary. You know I cannot use my right hand. Will you have the goodness to write a few lines for me to my wife?"

With these words the Colonel stepped to the jeweller's desk, on which lay some writing paper, printed with the name of the firm. Taking a sheet, he placed it before the jeweller, saying: "This will do; my wife knows that I am here." He then dictated, and the jeweller wrote:

> MY DEAR WIFE,—Have the goodness to send me at once fifteen hundred pounds, through the bearer. You know where the money is kept. I am in immediate need of it; therefore, do not detain the messenger, who is a trustworthy person.
>
> Your affectionate husband,
>
> JAMES GREEN.

"Thank you," said the Colonel, after perusing the epistle. "Michael," he cried, "take this letter, drive home as fast as you can, and return at once to this place with that which my wife will give you."

The groom took the letter, bowed, and quickly went off.

Fifteen minutes, a half-hour, nearly an hour passed away, and Michael did not return. The Colonel waxed impatient, and wished that he had gone in person for the money. The jeweller essayed to tranquillise him, but ineffectually.

The Colonel could contain himself no longer.

"Do me the favour, Mr. Green, to call a cab," he said, in the greatest impatience. "I shall go home myself and will return within half an hour."

The cab drove off as rapidly as the horse could go. The goldsmith meantime had the service packed up, and then waited for his patron's return. The clock struck six, seven, eight, nine. The Colonel did not come. Something unusual must have detained him; but the jeweller felt no anxiety, for had he not still the service and a deposit of one hundred pounds?

Tired of waiting, at last he closed his shop at half-past nine, and went home. His wife who had long been expecting him, had grown sleepy, and was slumbering on a sofa. An open letter lay in her lap. Mr. Green stepped lightly to her, intending to wake her with a kiss, when his eye fell upon the letter.

"What is this?" he cried dumfounded, as he recognised his own handwriting and the letter he had just written for the Colonel.

The reader can readily guess the sequel and the connection.

True, there existed a right Colonel Green, who had served in India, and had been wounded at Tel-el-Kebir, who had rented a house in Leicester Square, and who possessed a considerable fortune, but, alas, he was not the Colonel Green who had ordered the silver service.

The man personating the groom, of course, was an accomplice, and the letter which Mr. James Green had penned for the pseudo Colonel James Green, was delivered by him to the jeweller's wife, who did not hesitate a minute to deliver to him the fifteen hundred pounds, because she recognised her husband's handwriting upon the paper stamped with the name of the jeweller's firm. Who the rogues were never came to light.

M. L.

GOLDEN ✱ STAR.

A Romance

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

PROLOGUE.

THE BRIDAL OF VILCAROYA AND GOLDEN STAR.

FAR and wide throughout the vast empire of the Incas had spread the momentous news of the coming of the mysterious strangers whose advent had been prophesied generation after generation from the remote ages in which Manco Capac and Mama Occlu, first Children of the Sun, had journeyed northward from the great lake of the south, bearing the golden wedge which, according to the divine promise, had sunk out of sight into the earth when they reached the northern end of the valley of Cuzco and so marked the site of the city which, in after ages, was to be the home of the Children of the Sun.

It was the eve of the great festival of the Raymi, that day on which the sun, rising from his grave in the north, greeted with golden promises of reborn splendour the eyes of his chosen children. The last sun of winter had set, and to-morrow the great feast would be held, and yet not held as of yore, as, indeed, it might never be held again, for the hearts of the Children of the Sun were heavy with the forebodings of evil times to come and the too well-grounded belief that, though on the morrow the sun might rise in all its accustomed splendour over the guardian mountains of Cuzco, and flood the glorious valley of gardens with the same rivers of light which for ages had flowed along its verdant shores, that other sun of empire which had shone undimmed in the zenith of power for twenty generations had already begun to decline towards the nadir from which it might never rise again.

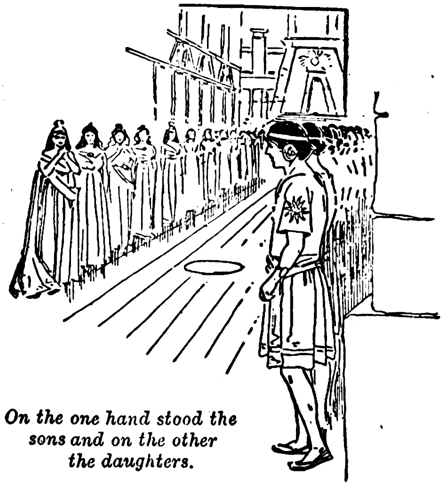
From all parts of the empire the worst of tidings had been fast flowing in through the four portals of the City of the Sun. News at once as mysterious as it was momentous. The air was full of forebodings, and men's hearts were failing them for fear of the things that were soon to come to pass. All over the great city, in the houses and the streets and the squares, groups of men and women were talking in the low tones of fearful apprehension of the wondrous things that had come to pass within the last few moons—things which no man had dreamed of, which no man had believed possible, so marvellous and unheard of were they. Was the end of all things coming? Was the golden dream of the Inca empire to end in the awakening of a grey morning of sorrow and strife, forerunner of the black darkness of a night of everlasting ruin?

Was the great dominion, which had been fashioned by the hands of the Celestials who had descended from the sun and had spread from beyond the southern shores of the great lake to the impassable mountains of the north, to wither away in the grasp of the mysterious beings who had come from beyond the portals of the sun? Were the long generations of uninterrupted conquest without and of unbroken peace and ever-growing prosperity within to end in the gloom of defeat and the chaos of irretrievable ruin?

All the portents foretold that it should be so, and the hearts of the Children of the Sun were heavy with the apprehension of coming sorrows. For three days the great city had fasted, neither fire nor light had been kindled within its precincts, and now the last hours of the fast had come. To-morrow the sun himself would tell them whether the portents were to be realised in very truth or whether those who had read them had erred in their reading.

The hour of midnight had long passed, the great central Sanctuary of the House of the Sun was filled with the descendants of his earliest children, who stood ranged in silent ranks along its two sides. On the one hand stood the sons and on the other the daughters of the sacred race, and above them, under the great golden cornice that ran round its walls, sat in twenty niches on either side facing each other, the mummies of the fathers and mothers of twenty generations of Incas looking down through the eyeholes of their golden masks upon this, the last gathering of their faithful children.

At the western end rose from a flight of broad, low steps, paved alternately with plates of gold and silver, the great Altar of the Sun—a huge block of black sienite, on which burnt the eternal fire fed every year with the sacred fleece kindled by the Sun himself without the aid of human hands. Above this was the great image of the Sun, a vast circular plate of gold fashioned in the form of a human face, with great diamonds for eyes, rubies for lips, with emerald pendants hanging from the ears, and all round it a halo of curving rays of gold thick-set with jewels that glittered each with its hundred rays of light in the rising and falling flame of the altar fire. In front of this, at the eastern end of the sanctuary, was a great circular window, through which the rays of the rising sun would fall, first upon its image over the altar, and then on the great golden vessel at the bottom of which lay the sacred fleece, which its concentrated rays should set on fire.



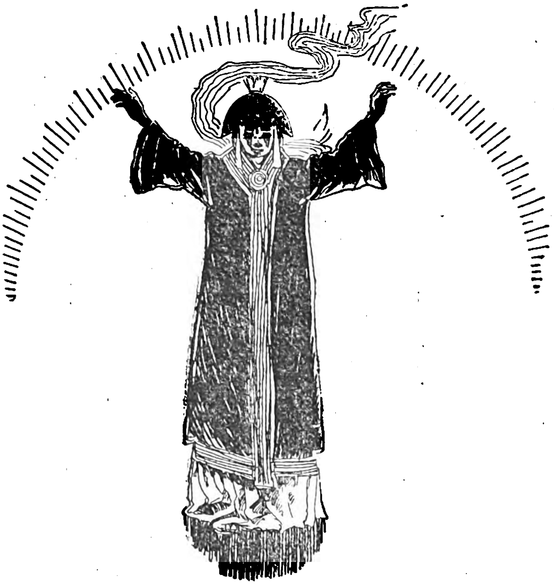
On the one hand stood the sons and on the other the daughters.

In front of the altar, on the highest step, stood Anda-Huillac, High Priest of the Sun, and brother of the great Huayni Capac, who had spread the empire of his ancestors from the deserts of Chili to Quito, the great city of the north, and from the Cordilleras of the east to the shoreless ocean of the west. The fourth hour of the morning had been called, and ere long the eastern sky would be brightened by the coming of the heralds of the dawn.

All lights, save the sacred altar fire, had been extinguished. For many minutes a breathless silence had reigned throughout the sanctuary, for the Villac Umu had been standing with his head bowed over the altar and his arms uplifted as though in supplication to the image of the Deity. At length his arms sank down until his hands were buried in the folds of his flowing robe. He turned round and faced the silent ranks on either side of him, with the flickering flames behind him outlining a figure full of weird and almost unearthly majesty.

Then he raised his arms again, at once in supplication to the Deity and in blessing on those who stood before him, and broke the long silence with an invocation to the Sun-God, in the concluding words of which the whole audience joined in a low, many-voiced whisper which sent its weird echoes murmuring among the niches where the dead Incas and their consorts sat, as though they were whispering in the ears that had so long been deaf to all earthly sounds. Then for a moment there was silence again, and then the Villac Umu spoke again:

"Children of the Sun, and sons and daughters of the long line of conquerors who, in the ages that are forgotten, received the divine command to create the empire over which your ancestors have ruled with ever-growing glory—to me, the last of my sacred line, has fallen by the inscrutable decrees of the Lord of the Universe, our common father, the Sun, the awful task of telling you that the day of our empire is past, and that the night of ruin is fast approaching."



Then he raised his arms again.

He paused for a moment, and from the ranks on either side of him there came a low murmuring wail, half of fear and half of wonder, for though the lips of the High Priest of the Sun were believed to voice the very thoughts of Deity itself, these tidings seemed to them too marvellous and too fearful for belief. He waited till the wail had died out into the silence again and then he went on:

"Yes, alas, it is too truly so, for the auguries, which cannot lie, have told the tale, and the voices of the stars themselves have confirmed it. When the great Inca Yupanqui heard the summons that called him home to the mansions of the Sun he foretold, speaking with the lore that is given to men only when they stand between the sunset of to-day and the dawn of to-morrow, in the midst of the brief passage which leads from this life to the next, that when the imperial Llautu should adorn the brow of two Incas in the Land of the Four Regions, and when the hostile hands of two brothers should grasp the sceptre of the divine Manco, there should come strangers from the north and the east armed with thunder and flame, and terrors unknown to the Children of the Sun, who, through the gateway opened by the strife of brothers, and the divisions of the people who were one, should march through fire and blood to a chaos of ruin and desolation in which all the long glories of the Incas should be buried.

"Now the eve of that day has come. You know how the sons of the great Huayni Capac, Huascar and Atahuallpa, have drenched the Land of the Sun with the blood of its children in their unholy strife for empire. You know how both have worn the Llautu, the one in the south and the other in the north, and how in the midst of their strife the strangers came, few in number but irresistible in might, and seized Atahuallpa in the midst of his conquering armies; how Huascar fell beneath the assassin's knife but a few days ago; and you know, too, how now this great City, with all its priceless treasures, lies open to the ravages of our conquerors."

Another wail broke, half stifled, from the trembling lips of his auditors. It sobbed itself away into silence among the echoes, and he went on, speaking now in a somewhat higher tone, through which sounded something like a note of hope:

"But yet one augury is wanting to make the prophecy complete. If when the hour of dawn comes our Lord and Father, the Sun, shall rise with his accustomed splendour and look through his portal yonder with a kindly eye upon us, his waiting children; if he shall greet us as of yore, and if the sacred fleece shall once more burst into flame under the burning light of his ardent eyes, then all hope is not lost, and the sorrows of to-day may melt away as the mists on the mountain tops dissolve ere the snowy peaks grow rosy red in the light of dawn. But if not, then the worst is certain, and so must be prepared for.

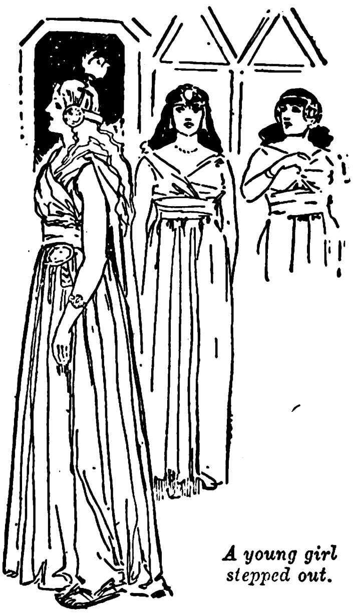
"But even then, though hope must die in the present, yet, as the stars have said, it may be revived in the future. For this the Golden Chain, the symbol of the unity of our empire and the image of that mystic bond which unites earth with heaven and the Sun with his children, must be saved from the polluting touch of the stranger and the oppressor, and with it must go into a place of secure hiding the best and greatest of those treasures of gold and silver and jewels, the report of whose priceless worth has lured these ruthless ravagers from afar.

"There they shall go, nay, many of them have already gone, under the care of my brethren and myself, to a place where none shall find them save those to whom we give the secret. But in the inscrutable wisdom of the powers that rule all human destiny, it has been ordained that only the hand of one who has been dead and shall be alive again shall draw them forth from their hiding-place. Only to such an one may be intrusted the secret of the hidden treasures, and with that secret the glorious task of restoring in another and perhaps distant age the ancient glories of the Children of the Sun.

"Now, who is he amongst you, if, indeed, there be one, who of his own free will will take this awful task upon himself—who will go through the gates of Death and dwell awhile in the shadowland that lies between this world and the Mansions of the Sun, who will take that dreadful secret with him into the grave, yet in the perfect faith and certain hope that some day he will come forth into the world of living men again, to perform the rest of the task which he has taken upon himself?"

He ceased speaking, and a long silence followed. In the pale flickering light of the altar flame, the Children of the Sun looked at each other wide-eyed in wonder at the strange words that they had heard, as though mutely asking which of them would undertake a task of which the first condition was death. Then from the ranks of the women a young girl stepped out, fair-skinned and golden-haired, with deep blue eyes that shone darkly in the light of the sacred fire as she approached it. She went to the foot of the altar steps, and, kneeling on the lowest of them, stretched out her arms above her head and said:

"O, priest of the Sun, and brother of His brother, thou hast asked if there is a man here who will dare and do this great and awful task of which thou hast told us, and I am but a girl who is hardly yet a woman. Yet the noblest of the sons of our divine race, aye, even the Inca Huascar himself, have sought in vain to win my favour. Now, I kneel here before the altar of the Sun and the sacred emblem of our ancient faith, and swear by it and the souls of our ancestors, who are looking down upon us, that with him who shall dare this thing I will wed in the chambers of Death and go down into the grave itself, well satisfied that in him the prophecy shall be fulfilled, and that when the awakening summons comes he and I will return to the halls of life, he to be the father, and I the mother, of those new children of the Sun in whom shall be restored the glories that are about to be taken from us."



A young girl stepped out.

Scarcely had the last words left her trembling lips than another figure sank on its knees beside her. Two other hands went up with hers, and the deep music of a man's voice uplifted to the pitch of ecstasy rang clearly through the gloom of the great sanctuary, and said:

"There is no death that the love of woman cannot conquer, nor any danger that shall not be dared to win such love as thine, O Golden Star! Lo! I will go with thee, for I love thee, and the grave hath no terrors if thou wilt go with me to its brink. Whether to wake again on earth or in the Mansions of the Sun, I will sleep the sleep of death with thee, and if it shall please our Father the Sun to recall us to mortal life in some other age, I swear by his glory to devote that new life to thy love and his service, and love and life and all that shall be mine to the restoration of the ancient glories of the Children of the Sun. Now I have sworn this for love of thee, O Golden Star, wilt thou accept my oath, and put thy hand in mine and be my bride in death and in the life that is to be?"

There was silence again for a little space, and then Golden Star's right hand stole out and found a resting-place in one stretched out to meet it. She turned her head for a moment and raised her eyes till they met those of the man kneeling beside her. A faint flush rose in her cheeks, and her lips parted in a smile as she answered:

"Yes, I will take thine oath and thy love, most willingly, O Vilcaroya, for there is no other of the sons of the Sun with whom I would so gladly go, whether to life or death, as with thee; and thou hast proved thyself worthy of the love that has been hidden until now, for thou alone of all here hast had the faith and boldness to believe the prophecy and venture all upon its truth. Thou art mine, and I am thine, for death or life, for the grave that is so near, and the empire that may be afar off."

"Well said, true son and daughter of our sacred race," said the Villac Umu, in solemn tones, spreading his hands out over them in blessing as they knelt before him, "for the lives that you give now, devoted to death in the faith and hope that shall not be betrayed, our Divine Father shall give you other lives better and brighter than those of to-day. You shall take the secrets of our doomed race, and the key to our most precious treasures into a place of safe keeping; and in the appointed time you shall bring them forth again, and through them in you, if you are but faithful to your trust, shall be restored the ancient splendours of the empire of the Children of the Sun. Now let your hearts and the hearts of all here melt and mingle in silence, for our Lord and Father approaches to make manifest his will unto his children."

As the priest ceased he pointed to the eastern window beyond which the sky was whitening and brightening with the swiftly coming dawn. Every face was turned towards it for an instant, then all with a single movement prostrated themselves on the floor of the sanctuary. Only the priest remained standing, and he stood on the lowest step between Golden Star and Vilcaroya with clasped hands and head thrown back, the fading glimmer of the altar behind him, and the fast growing light of the dawn falling on his pale upturned face and long silver hair.

Amidst utter silence the light brightened fast till a sun-ray shot over the lower rim of the window and shone on the golden rafters of the roof. Foot by foot it crept along the rooftree, broadening and brightening as it went, till it touched the western wall. Then, followed by the anxious eyes of the silent throng, it descended until the great Symbol of the sun flamed and flashed with new born radiance. Then the great polished golden concave, at the bottom of which lay the Sacred Fleece, began to glow with the concentrated rays, and the moment for the giving of the heaven-sent sign had come. Then something—cloud or mist or vapour drifting through the crystal air—passed over the face of the sun, and the glowing focus of rays in the golden concave grew dim for an instant. A faint wreath of pale-blue smoke curled round the Sacred Fleece and vanished.

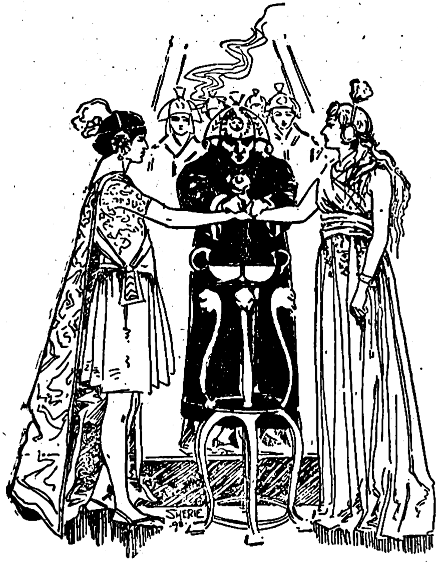
The haze passed away from the face of the sun, but the moment had gone by. The golden vessel grew dim as the rays left it one by one. A last sunbeam fell on the figure of the high priest and the heads of the pair that knelt before him. Then the sun's disc passed beyond the upper rim of the window. An oval shape of light swept slowly along the floor between the two prostrate files till it vanished like the symbol of the departing glory of the empire that was soon to be no more. The altar fire leapt upward once, then fell and flickered out. A wail of sorrow and despair broke from the pale lips of the Children of the Sun, and sobbed away into silence as Anda-Huillac threw his hands aloft again, and cried:

"The Sun himself hath spoken, and the doom of his children is certain. The Sacred Fleece lies cold, unkindled by the smile that has never been denied till now. The fire that was lit by celestial hands is quenched, and the last hour of the long empire of the Incas is struck. It is for us to save what may be saved, and then meet the fate assigned to us by our lord and father like true and faithful children submissive to his will. Rise now sons and daughters of the Sun, last heirs of our glories and first inheritors of our shame and sorrow! Bear witness to what has been said and done this night; and you Vilcaroya and Golden Star make ready to fulfil the oath that you have sworn, and to take your sacred charge through the shadows that are already gathering on the brink of your common grave from which, if the Divine Powers permit, you shall come forth again to life and love and glory, and the gloom that is falling upon the Land of the Sun shall have passed away in the dawn of a brighter age!"

As he ceased speaking he descended from the altar steps, and with down-bent head and hands crossed on his breast, walked with slow steps down between the silent files towards the eastern door of the sanctuary, followed by Golden Star and Vilcaroya hand in hand. Then, two and two, the bright-haired Virgins of the Sun filed out after them, and after these went in the same order the sons of the Sun, the flower of the Inca manhood, leaving the sanctuary cold and dark and deserted, with the ashes of the sacred fire lying cold upon the altar of a dying faith.

The feast of Raymi passed in gloom and silence only broken by the low wailings of mourners bemoaning the gloomy portents of the speedy fulfilment of which there seemed now to be no possible doubt. The Sun, their father and their god had veiled his face at the very moment when they looked most eagerly and anxiously for the kindly glance which was to promise light and life, and peace for yet another year

All that day Golden Star and Vilcaroya fasted and prayed in preparation for the solemn ordeal that awaited them at night, and at sunset the Villac Umu took them back into the sanctuary and there in the presence of a great gathering of the priests of the Sun they repeated their oaths and plighted their death-troth once more. Then two priests brought out the marriage-font and placed it between them as they stood before the altar. It was a double vessel of gold composed of two shallow cups divided by a partition which was pierced by a single hole. The cup on Vilcaroya's side was filled with a deep blood-red liquid, and the one towards Golden Star with crystal clear water. The hole in the partition was stopped with a golden plug to which was attached a little chain. The high priest joined their hands over the mystic vessel and drew out the plug. Immediately the two liquids began to mingle, and as they did so, the priest said in a low clear voice:

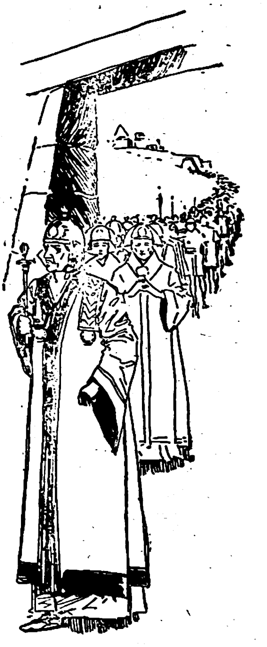


The high priest joined their hands over the vessel.

"Here Vilcaroya and Golden Star, son and daughter of the Sun, see the emblem of the solemn union between you. As the strong red wine tinges and strengthens the pure water, so, Golden Star, shall the stronger nature of thy husband colour and strengthen thine, and as the pure water tempers and purifies the ruddy wine, so, Vilcaroya, shall the gentler and purer nature of her who is now thy wife soften and purify thine, according to the will and purpose of our Father the Sun, who to this end sent man and woman upon the earth, that together they might possess and enjoy it, each helping the other, man making the earth fruitful and beautiful by his labour, and woman sweetening his toil by the reward of her love and constancy."

Still holding their clasped hands over the mingling fluids, symbol of their now united lives, the wedded lovers who had known each other's love but for a day, heard the priests chant the marriage song, and then with blanching cheeks and suddenly aching hearts heard the cheerful strains change into the mournful cadences of the dirge for the dead. When these died away the high priest took the golden vase from the altar. Still with clasped hands they turned and faced him. He held it before them, and said, in a voice at length shaken by the strength of his emotion:

"Son and daughter, man and wife, who have sworn to lead each other through the shadows, whose eyes must soon close on the untasted joys of your most holy union perchance to open upon the things of a better and a brighter age—this is the draught of death which yet may not be death for you. Drink it in the fulfilment of your oaths and in pledge of the faith you have professed in the truth of the prophecy and of the loving mercy of your father the Sun."



First went the Villac Umu and the twelve priests.

He gave the vase to Vilcaroya, who raised it to his lips with unshaking hand and drank half of the pale golden fluid that it contained. Then he gave it to Golden Star, but now his hands trembled and he saw her take it and drain it with eyes that looked through a mist of tears. Then the high priest took the empty goblet in silence and laid it on the altar, and then hand in hand the bride and bridegroom of death were led by the Villac Umu and the twelve chief priests of the Sun to the bridal couch that had been prepared for them in an inner chamber of the sanctuary.

There they lay down side by side in their splendid bridal robes, and the priests standing round began to chant the marriage song again, but this time in the slow and slumberous cadences of the death chant. When the song ere long had died away in silence Vilcaroya and Golden Star lay with closed eyes and gently heaving breasts, sleeping the long sleep which, unless a miracle was wrought, should for them know no waking.

At midnight a long procession moved silently and swiftly out of the western gate of the City of the Sun. First went the Villac Umu and the twelve priests, then came two closed litters each borne by eight bearers, and each containing a recumbent, motionless form. After these came a long line of men walking about six feet apart, and over their shoulders, right and left alternately, lay what looked like a huge rope wrapped in folds of woollen cloth. Yet it could hardly have been a rope, for it hung down too heavily and swung too regularly between the bearers, and when every now and then others stepped in from the two files and walked alongside to relieve them there was a sound of metal clinking musically upon metal.

The procession left the city amidst the tears and prayers of a silent multitude of the Children of the Sun, and filed out into the plain towards the western mountains, and was lost in the darkness. Ten days later the Villac Umu and the twelve chief priests returned. The litters and the long, strange burden and all their bearers had vanished, nor were any of them ever seen again by the eyes of that generation of the Children of the Sun.

(End of the Prologue.)

A LITERARY ASPIRANT

One of the leading lights of a certain small country parish in Virginia was the zealous young man rejoicing in the name of the Rev. Josiah Meeking, who presided over the local chapel and looked upon himself as responsible for the moral principles of his congregation.

In addition to being a zealous worker he was not without his ambitions, one of them being to shine in the ranks of literature. Possibly the fact that his salary was small and he had heard that there was money to be made by writing stories, may have had something to do with his desire to become an author.

His fate—he persuaded himself—lay in the direction of stories having a moral attached to them, and for a long time he racked his brains for a suitable plot in which the hero, after being subjected to all sorts of trials and temptations, emerged triumphant in the end and became a noted character for the rest of his life.

Somehow the idea didn't work out as he could have wished. Whenever he had thought of a really good plot, it occurred to him that he had heard or read something very much like it before, and reference to the selection of volumes comprising the parish library generally proved his surmise to have been correct.

By continual reference in this way he became intimately associated with the titles of nearly every story in the library, and he was surprised to find what a number had to do with boys and girls—were written apparently for their sole edification and benefit, further than this there was a marvellous sameness about them when compared with each other, one of the most favourite themes being a wolf story, the scene of which was, he observed, almost always laid in Russia.

Here was an opportunity; he would write a wolf story, but change the venue to his own district, and make his hero one of his own countrymen.

The next thing to be done was to get the nucleus of a plot, something new and original, but at the same time working in the old familiar details.

Quite by chance one day, he noticed an advertisement of a book entitled, "How to Write a Story," and promptly sent for a copy. When he received it he imagined his difficulties were practically at an end, but after reading it through carefully he felt bound to confess that he was not much nearer his goal than before.

The little work, excellent in its way, afforded no end of hints to would-be writers of fiction as to how they should commence, develop, and finish off a story; but what the Rev. Josiah needed was a plot, and this simple matter of detail strange as it may appear had apparently been deemed unworthy of the writer's notice. There was, however, one gleam of hope; in the appendix was the following suggestion: "Young authors will often find the means of inspiration for literary efforts by perusing the daily newspapers. Many an excellent plot may by this means be evolved."

The Rev. Josiah once more hied him to the parish reading-room and anxiously scanned the contents of every paper he could lay his hands upon. For a while he worked in vain, and then his eye lighted on a short paragraph narrating that a man, recently deceased, who had in his time fought for his country, was wont to narrate how in one battle in which he was engaged, he was struck by an enemy's bullet, and that his life was saved from the fact that he had always made it a practice, in addition to his ordinary military equipment, to carry a Testament in the left breast of his tunic; and the bullet, which he ever after retained as a memento of his marvellous escape, found its progress to his heart, or somewhere thereabouts, arrested by this shield of protection, to which he owed his life.

Here was a suggestion at last; he would make his hero—an eminently good young man—go through life with a prayer-book somewhere about him. He could not very well always have it in his pocket, as wolves did not usually go for a man's pocket, he fancied, but for the throat of their victims—at least, all the stories he had read attributed this proceeding to them.

Obviously his hero could not go about the world with a prayer-book, like a charm, hung around his neck; and for a brief while the incompatibility of the thing staggered him.

Suddenly an inspiration struck him, and he wondered why he had not thought of it before; he would make his hero carry his prayer-book, not too bulky a one, in his outside coat tail pocket and then when the pursuing wolf had gained upon him, and was just about to make his fatal spring, he would valiantly face him, holding his shield of protection in front of his throat.

The brute would spring and find his teeth embedded in the book. It was to have limp leather covers as being more likely to serve his purpose than the board ones which turned the bullet, and in case this meal of literature was not sufficient, his hero, an exemplary young man, should have his various pockets well filled with religious books and tracts of a bulky and satisfying nature so that if the prayer-book failed to effect its object in the way of warding off the wolf's attack, there would be a reserve of ammunition as it were to hurl at him, until at length mad with rage and impotence at being unable to reach his victim's throat, the wolf would desist. Great stress it will be observed was to be placed on the exact portion of the human anatomy to be attacked.

Having at length worked out the incidents of the plot to his entire satisfaction, the Rev. Josiah Meeking retired to rest, well satisfied in his mind, and with a secret inward conviction that the gates of fame were about to open to him, and that a comfortable addition to his small stipend might reasonably be looked for in the immediate future.

The hero, a man of small stature, but indomitable courage, was to be a young clergyman living near the banks of a large lake in a wild and sparsely populated district; in addition to his own parish he had occasionally to do duty in another some miles distant, and in winter time, the whole surface of the vast lake being frozen over, he would be in the habit of making the journey between the two places on skates. It was to be in one of these expeditions, when returning at night after taking an afternoon service, that the terrific encounter between man and wolf was to be brought about.

The story was to read something like this:

The whole surface of the vast watery expanse was as smooth as glass, a few clouds drifted in the blue sky overhead, but the Rev. Abraham Smirke noted them not, for, as he sped on his homeward way, conscious of having done a good day's work, his thoughts were busily centred in the all-absorbing problem of his life, how he was to raise the necessary funds for building the new church of which his rapidly increasing flock was sadly in need.

Even while his mind was thus busily engaged, his thoughts were divided as it were, and being an expert skater, and withal possessed of excellent eyesight, he read as he sped along out of a theological work, one of several, in addition to a whole bundle of tracts which it was his custom to carry about with him in his daily peregrinations. For be it understood the Rev. Smirke was regarded by all who knew him as an exemplary young man in every respect, and no one in his community had ever dared to say so much as a word against him.

By degrees the light failed, and, realising that he had yet many miles to traverse before he would be in sight of his humble lodging, he, not without a sigh, placed in his outside overcoat pocket the work he had been reading—"Holy Living"—and set to vigorously to accomplish the remainder of the journey before nightfall. For had it not been rumoured that owing to the severity of the winter wolves from the adjoining woods had latterly become so emboldened as to leave the security of their retreats and approach the confines of civilisation.

Ha! what was that? a low ominous howl arrested his attention, and as he turned his head without for a moment relaxing his efforts to keep up the speed he was travelling at, he saw following immediately in his track an enormous wolf which he judged could not be more than a quarter of a mile distant. Full seven miles off was the the house he lived in, but before that there was a small tavern, and if he could only reach it before the wolf he would be saved. Fear lent energy to his legs, and his skates rang out as they skimmed over the frozen surface in a way they had never done before. He looked back; the wolf was unmistakably gaining on him, and he could see the open mouth and cruel hungry fangs waiting as it seemed to devour him.

For the first time in his life, the habit he had of carrying a small library of religious works about with him, weighed upon his mind, or, to be more correct, upon his body, the "Holy Living" in his overcoat pocket especially making its presence uncomfortably felt by banging about against his legs.

For a moment the thought entered his mind to throw it away, but almost instantly he repented of having allowed such an idea to even temporarily take possession of him, and he sped on, encumbered though he was.

On came the wolf, with that long galloping stride (for description of how wolves do gallop when pursuing belated travellers vide any popular story-book) and was evidently gaining on his victim, yard by yard. To make matters worse for the reverend gentleman a stiff breeze had lately sprung up—a side wind, too—which not only made progression more difficult, but also caused the various volumes in his different pockets to wobble about and flap against his legs more than ever.

The temptation to discard "Holy Living" again made itself felt, and he is on the point of throwing it from him in the hopes that it may, momentarily at all events, serve to distract the wolves attention, when he sees before him at no great distance a long slender black object lying on the ice. "Thank Heaven!" he ejaculates to himself, "it must be a gun, or failing that a stout staff. If I can but gain it my life may yet be spared." He has almost come up with it when the wolf makes a mighty spring, not at the horrified man's throat, as had been the writer's intention, it will be remembered, but at the nearest spot available, which happened to be the outflying coat-tail in the pocket of which reposed "Holy Living."

There is a sound as of a mighty tear, the coat—excellent material as it was—(the author had felt half inclined to work in an advertisement here, but on reflection came to the conclusion it would detract from the otherwise highly moral tone of the story) the coat as has been said, unable to stand the strain, gave way; the lower portion of the garment, including the good book, remaining embedded in the wolf's hungry and capacious maw. Mr. Smirke, released by the sudden severance, fell forwards on his face and immediately on top of the dark object already referred to, which, with wondrous presence of mind, he managed to secure. It proves to be a stout oaken stave. Armed with this, and with the powerful consciousness of having resisted temptation at a time of direst extremity, he turns to face his foe, with that undaunted courage which had ever been one of his main characteristics.

The wolf is sprawling on the ice, panting convulsively at the air. His fangs had closed over the overcoat just where "Holy Living" was reposing in the tail pocket, and thus having become embedded in that excellent, but somewhat weighty volume, he was powerless to make any further attack. With a single blow of the trusty oak, Mr. Smirke puts him hors de combat, and heartily congratulates himself on not having yielded to temptation at what had, he felt, been one of the most trying moments of his life.

Finally, he earned the gratitude of his community by killing the ferocious beast, to say nothing of the pecuniary reward from the State for so doing.

Such in brief was the outline—omitting the abundant supply of padding—of the Rev. Josiah Meeking's first effort at literary composition.

It was, he felt, little short of sublime, the moral it taught being sufficient to insure its acceptance at the hands of the editor of a certain religious weekly publication to whose care he lost no time in consigning it.

Now, as often happens, the publishing offices of the paper in question were also those of a periodical of an altogether different type, the contributors to which were not altogether renowned for their piety, but rather the reverse—a decidedly worldly paper, in fact—and one whose sole aim and desire was to excite risibility in its readers, rather than convey a moral to adorn a tale.

And it chanced that by some unaccountable blunder Mr. Smirke's MS. found itself on the editorial table of the humorous publication, instead of the religious one for which it was intended.

In due course it was opened and read, the address on the cover not being noticed, and before the editor had proceeded far, he saw that it was not quite the sort of story for his journal, but he smiled to himself as he read on, and the idea suggested itself to him that with a little careful revision it might be made to do duty exceedingly well.

A few days later the Rev. Mr. Smirke was no less surprised than gratified to receive a notification that his story was accepted, and would appear in due course. Meanwhile, in accordance with the rule, payment was forwarded; a cheque for a guinea and a half—exactly a guinea more than Mr. Smirke had dared to hope for—was inclosed.

Weeks passed by, and although Mr. Smirke had contemplated writing a second story, he had not done so, being desirous to see how his first venture would be criticised.

One day he received a copy of the Humorous Joker! Mechanically tearing it open, what was his surprise to find his story occupying a prominent position in its pages.

He could hardly believe his eyes, but there it was right enough, and if anything were necessary to convince him it was the fact that the opening sentences, on which he had particularly prided himself, were left exactly as he had written them, a piece of discernment on the editor's part for which he felt highly gratified, and resolved to write and tell him so. But as he went on his face changed, as well it might; for if the editor had been content to leave the opening part alone, he had taken most unwarrantable liberties with the action of the plot in its most exciting episodes. This is what he read:

"On came the wolves" (wolves, indeed! he had only described one wolf!), "their mouths gaping wide open as they viewed with avidity the literary treat in store for them, for, in addition to his usual impedimenta in the way of clothing, including a long overcoat, the Rev. Jonas Sleeke had loaded himself with a small library of religious books, not necessary to be read so much as a profession of the faith that was within him. Tracts, missionary reports, and the rest, all served to swell his pockets, and at the same time retard his progress.

"Still he kept resolutely on, and the temptation which assailed him to throw some of his cargo away, in the hopes of distracting the wolves' attention—our readers will remember something of this sort has been worked into a story before: then it was a bad Russian woman who threw her children one by one (she seems to have had a large family) to ward off the wolves' attack from herself; but we let this pass—the thought occurred, we remark, to Mr. Sleeke to attempt to distract the wolves' attention by tract distribution, at which he had always been proficient, but he immediately put it from him; arguing that it would be wrong to waste upon brute beast what had been the means of gaining him a character for piety and devotion; and further, he thought to himself, with a chuckle, that if the wolves continued to keep their mouths open much longer in the face of the keen wind that was blowing, added to the fact of the thermometer being several degrees below zero, they would in all probability be unable to close them again, as they would be frozen open! And then being incapable of attacking him they would fall an easy victim to his prowess, and better still he would obtain a satisfactory pecuniary reward from the State for the destruction of each one.

"Buoyed up with this pleasant vision, he urges on his wild career, notwithstanding that his movements are sadly hampered by his load of goody goody literature; but still he perseveres, for it would never do, after years of exemplary conduct, to throw away his credentials as it were.

"In front of him he sees something—what it is he knows not—it may be a gun, possibly a big German sausage—whatever it is he will strive to reach it, and he does. At last he is almost upon it, when the three foremost of the pack of wolves, as if actuated by one common impulse, make a mighty spring at him. One seizes his overcoat by the left tail, the other by the right, and the third goes for the centre of the skirt. One and all succeed in getting a firm hold, and there is a tearing sound which results in the garment giving way. Mr. Sleeke falls forward upon the black object, which is not a gun or a sausage, but a stout ebony cane, since we understand identified as belonging to a member of Mr. Sleeke's congregation. But how it came to be upon the ice in that particular spot, unless the worthy member had been paying a surreptitious visit to a certain tavern in the neighbourhood, and had dropped it on his way home, we are unable to say.

"At any rate there it was, and armed therewith and using it as a ramrod, Mr. Sleeke felt safe—for are not the wolves rolling on their backs, convulsively pawing at the air? The literary feast had disagreed with them, one and all. They had got their teeth embedded either in a good book, a missionary report, or a tract, and they were powerless to attack the pale but resolute man in front of them. The remainder of the pack, true to the traditions of their species, when they saw the leaders in difficulties had slunk away, leaving their companions to their fate.

"And what did Mr. Sleeke do? Did he hesitate? No! A thousand times, no! Endowed with that indomitable courage which had ever been one of his chief characteristics, and realising, probably, that the rapidly suffocating animals could not possibly do him any injury, he hastily took a bundle of remaining tracts from one pocket, and using his trusty stick as a rammer, proceeded to load the throat of wolf number one until he succumbed; and then performed the same humane operation to numbers two and three.

"And as he looked at his three vanquished and now defunct foes, and realised the good deed he had done, and the prospective reward in store for him from a grateful State, he felt a glow of satisfaction, and a feeling of deep gratitude almost overpowered him at the thought that in his direst extremities he had not given way to temptation.

"It is said, but we decline to believe it without convincing proof, that Mr. Sleeke so far forgot what was due to him as a Christian minister as to visit the neighbouring tavern and partake of certain alcoholic refreshment, his excuse being that the terrible ordeal he had undergone had completely unnerved him!"

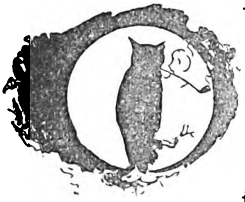
* * * * *

At a meeting of the Rev. Josiah Meeking's flock shortly afterwards held, it was pointed out to him by an elder that admirable as might be the desire to seek fame and obtain emolument by the narration of fiction, it was not becoming in the person of a Christian minister to make mock of religion, and he was kindly invited to tender his resignation.

His next story will probably be of a different type.

S. J. F. Newbery.

The People Across The Way



OUT of a full heart I tell this story.

The haunted house across the way was once a country residence, standing amid lawns and gardens and orchards and green fields, with a little village at its gate. But in time the village grew and encompassed it about and hemmed it in and swallowed up the orchards and green fields, and encroached upon the lawns and gardens, till of the broad lands there remained only a few scant acres. About these the owner built a high brick wall with a wicket gate, and then he died.

Those who came after chose to live elsewhere, and the house, which in days gone by had been a jolly house, became haunted from being untenanted. Years passed.

A rumour went abroad—the haunted house was rented at last. And the rumour was verified; for late one evening in early March, a closed carriage pulled up at the wicket gate, two female forms in black, closely veiled and followed by a woolly dog, stepped out, and the wicket gate closed on them. Upon inquiry I learnt that these were Mrs. and Miss Durand, French women of unknown antecedents, whose reasons for coming to Hallowell were, as yet, a mystery.

Strangers never came to Hallowell, as there was nothing in the town to attract them—neither the idler, the invalid, nor the artist; therefore the advent of madame and mademoiselle, as they came to be called, created something of a sensation. But it happened that only I and old Peggy, their cook, could bear witness to their life.

I was an idle fellow, with plenty of time and a good field-glass, and my window overlooked the high brick wall; therefore I soon learnt something of my neighbours. Madame was tall, of full figure, and had lost a tooth; further than this I took no immediate note; but mademoiselle—her mother called her Antoinette—was charming, beautiful! Her eyes were green like olives; her hair was red like sienna-tinted marsh grass in November; her skin resembled thick cream—as fine of texture and as colourless; and from the fact that there was a hint of that wondering youthfulness which the world wipes so soon from a woman's face, as a rude hand wipes the dust from a butterfly's wing, I guessed that she was not yet twenty. For the rest, her form, her voice, the grace of her body, her clothes—which, nevertheless, were very simple—and the way she wore them, were beyond the reach of pen and tongue.

Madame was a most devoted mother, mademoiselle a loving daughter. Madame was sometimes sad, mademoiselle was always gay. Both were industrious. Mademoiselle did the housekeeping, marketing, and shopping; madame affected gardening. Under her hand the scant acres blossomed as the rose; and so fascinated was she with her work that she never went abroad, except on occasional jaunts in the country with her daughter, whence they returned at twilight, laden with sweet spring flowers. At night they sat together in the porch, and mademoiselle, her head on madame's knee, sang chansonettes to a mandolin. Their life seemed to me most happy, innocent, and sweet.

And yet, since they went to no church, since—as told by Peggy, a prying gossip!—the hair of mademoiselle was made red by champagne, and—as told by Peggy, but denied by me—they drank much wine, and, oh, horror of horrors! smoked cigarettes after their late dinner, they were blackballed by the tradesmen's wives of Hallowell. But they were not altogether friendless. Mademoiselle gathered the little ragged children of the town, and held her salon in the sunny garden. Often have I watched her frolic with them in the mild spring weather, and sing to them, and tell them stories on the grass, under overhanging fruit trees which rained down scented petals on their heads.

But one day I discovered that life was not all sunshine for my charming mademoiselle. In a certain little wood near town, where flowers grow in wild luxuriance, and chestnut trees and oaks lift their long arms to the sky, I loved to wander with my dogs and books on pleasant Sunday mornings when all the world was on its knees in prayer. One day I came upon a woman sitting on a fallen tree and weeping, her white hands pressed against her face. In her lap was a bunch of wild azaleas, at her feet a woolly dog. Since there was no one in the world like her, I recognised mademoiselle.

Is there a man who understands the great mobility of a woman's nature? An hour later she arranged her azaleas on a little breakfast table in the garden. Her eyes glowed, her teeth gleamed through her parted lips—she was telling a good story to madame.

"Ah!" thought I, "there is a secret sorrow, and you take it to the wood, my pretty lady, that your mother may not see your tears!" I look back now and smile at my conclusion. Alas! some smiles are more bitter than tears!

I was a student and a dreamer, with a few thousands and no ambition. I was small, freckled, and insignificant in appearance, and—lacking the will to please my own sex, and the art to please the other—lived the life of any recluse, with my books, my flute, and my dog for company. I will not deny that, as time passed, I fell in love with mademoiselle, as needs must any man, indeed, who had peeped at her through a shutter's chink at intervals during one long season. When she wrapped her veil about her—she never went abroad without her veil—and tripped along the garden path and through the wicket gate, I seized my hat and followed after; when I passed her in the street I raised my hat, as is the custom of the town.

One day I met her in a grocer's shop. She was buying sausages, cheese, and other commonplace things. I was pretending to examine a box of cigars.

"You will send my basket at once, Mr. Brown?" she said, and turned to go.

The grocer scratched his head—it gave him pain to disoblige a customer—and explained, that since his boy was out, he feared it would be impossible.

Mademoiselle frowned slightly, and I, recognising my opportunity, came forward and said, with many blushes: "I hope you will excuse me, my name is Adams. I do not wish to presume, but, since we go in the same direction, may I take your basket?"

She wavered. "I fear the basket might be heavy."

For answer I swung it from the counter, then stepped aside that she might precede me to the street.

And so we took our first walk together. There was no awkwardness in the situation. Her unaffected manner relieved me of all embarrassment; her conversation cleared my brain like a draught of wine. I thought her as witty as she was lovely and innocent.

After this, when we met in the street she smiled, and sometimes stopped to give me a word upon a topic of passing interest. But our friendship was not consummated until one day when the woolly dog was lost and I restored him to her arms. It was in June, and she stood at the wicket gate and wrung her hands, while her friends, the little children, clung to her in sympathy.

"Bijou! My little dog! He is lost!" she cried. "Oh, Mr. Adams, have you seen him?"

I had not, but assured her that if he lived she should have him in an hour. And I made my assurance good.

Her pleasure in the wanderer's return and my share in it would have been reward enough for me had there not been a better one in store.

She folded Bijou to her breast and raised her grateful eyes to mine. "Oh, sir! is there anything—anything that I can do for you?"

I was discreet in my reply. "A young girl whom I know will be married to-night. There is a scarcity of flowers——" I began.

"Flowers!" she interrupted. "We have many, and you shall have them all! Come! Let us gather them at once," and she invited me to enter at the wicket gate.

Madame was in her garden, knee-deep in sweet peas. Mademoiselle bade me wait and ran to her; then, after a minute or two, beckoned me to approach.

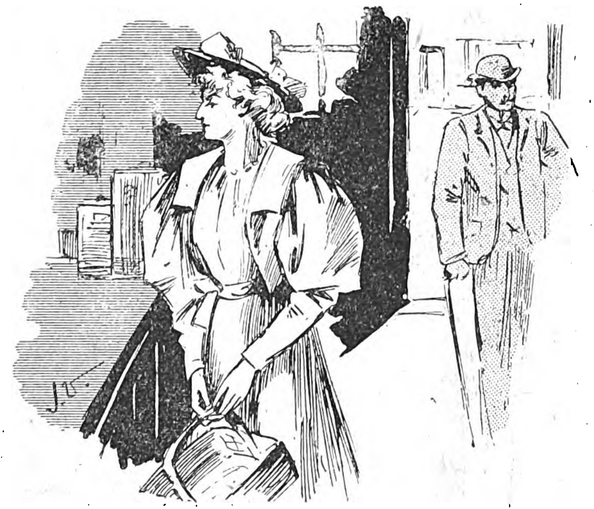
"Mamma," said she, "this is Mr. Adams, the gentleman who plays upon the flute, and who has just restored my little Bijou. I have promised him some flowers!"

Madame muttered some unintelligible French and offered a lean hand in a mitten of black silk.

"Mamma is grateful to the circumstance that has given her this great pleasure. Mamma does not speak your language, though she understands it perfectly," said mademoiselle.

We gathered a basketful of flowers, mademoiselle and I, and agreed that we loved them better than anything in the world, except poetry and music—yes; and children and all the helpless creatures. Madame took no part in this; she had returned to her garden.

"Au revoir," said I at last; "or must it be good-bye?"



"You will send my basket at once, Mr. Brown?"

We were standing at the gate. She had suddenly grown silent, and her pretty fingers tore a rose to bits.

"May I speak to you as to a friend?" she said, and turned her eyes to mine. "Ah, sir, we are two lonely women, removed from our country and our friends! In France we were gay; here this life wearies us. For me it does not matter—I am young. But each day I watch her and I believe she pines for human fellowship. She is a Parisienne and gay by nature, though suffering and loneliness have made her sad. During many nights we have listened while you played the arias we loved upon your flute, which seemed to us like the voices of friends from over the wide sea, and often she has said to me: 'Monsieur is sympathetic and he is alone, comme nous.'" Then with a sudden change of manner and a shrug, "Do I offend the good taste of provincial society, or presume upon the accidental acquaintance if I ask you to come sometimes and cheer us in our exile?"

The next evening I made a careful toilette and my first call at the haunted house. It was a delightful call, and the next night but one I made another. In passing, I must admit that, as regards two things, old Peggy had reported truly. No sensible man will cavil at wine in moderation, but a cigarette between the lips of the woman he loves is a different matter altogether. One evening I made an unexpected call, and seeing, as I thought, a glow-worm in the grass, stopped to find a half-smoked cigarette. Both ladies were in the porch. Mademoiselle burst into a merry laugh.

"Monsieur is shocked!" she cried. Then more seriously, "Ah, monsieur, you in this country here are selfish, cruel. You refuse to women, who are too weak to bear the burden of life, the comforter that you will not deny yourselves. Men are more generous in France." Then she took three cigarettes from a silver case and lighted one for madame, another for me, and the third for herself.

I smoked the cigarette and shortened my call. But love does not die with such as this. In a week I was more in love than ever.

Except that mademoiselle looked pale and almost old sometimes, and sometimes madame was sad and again hilariously gay, and that their wine bill, as I learnt from their merchant, was the largest in town, the summer passed without event.

One evening in September, as I sat at my window and watched the animated shadows on the blinds across the way, a loud and sudden scream froze the blood within my heart.

I rushed downstairs and out into the street, meeting Peggy at the wicket gate.

"What is the matter, woman?" I cried, and grabbed her arm.

"Matter? Why, it's the old lady who is drunk again. And when she's drunk, sir, she's dangerous; so I came out, and wild horses won't git me back again to-night."

"Dangerous! Drunk! What do you mean?"

"You heard that scream, sir. Well she tried to blow her brains out——"

In a moment I was through the gate and beating fiercely at the knocker. No one came, and since the front door had been left ajar, I opened it and entered the dark hall.

The parlour door stood open. Within there was a brilliant light, by which I saw madame with her face bowed in her hands, as though abandoned to despair. She was seated, and by her side, close to her heart, knelt mademoiselle, whose sobs alone disturbed the silence.

I stole away on tiptoe.

"Go back," I said to Peggy, who stood shivering at the gate. "There is no danger."

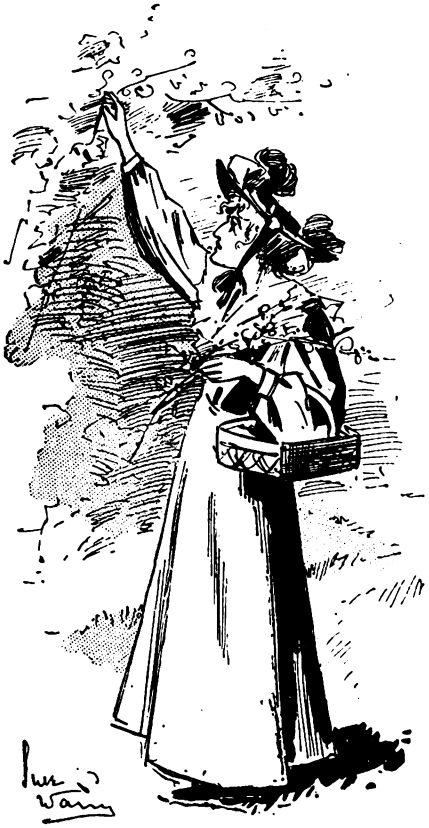
And so the mother of the girl I loved was one of the most contemptible of living creatures—a drunken woman!

I understood it all—the gloom, the wild hilarity, the young girl's paleness, and her effort to be gay while hiding from the world's cold eye. After a troubled night I resolved to tell her that I knew her secret, to warn her of her danger, and to implore her to become my wife. Since I rarely saw her for any length of time alone, it was a month before there occurred an opportunity to execute my resolution.

One afternoon I found her standing at the wicket gate. Her dress was black, and a picturesque black hat was tied under her round chin. She had a basket on her arm, and some children were clinging to her skirts, while Bijou barked and capered in anticipation of an outing.

"We go for chestnuts. Come with us!" she called to me.

It was a still October afternoon. The fields were brown, and purple mists hung on the horizon, sobering the gay colouring of the distant trees. The woods were at their best—more beautiful by far than they had been in spring. Dropping chestnuts sounded pleasant to our ears; squirrels peeped at us coquettishly from their fastness in hollow trees; sunbeams sifted down upon us through the golden leaves.



Stopped to reach a maple branch above her head.

The children ran on in advance, and mademoiselle, whose arms were already full of flaming foliage, stopped to reach a maple branch above her head. Her wondrous beauty, the singular grace of her posture, and the contrast of her black gown upon the sunlit yellow background wrung from me a cry of admiration.

"Lazy fellow! Why do you not climb the chestnut tree?" she asked.

"Leave that to the children," I replied, "let me stay with you." She smiled and I hurried on impetuously: "Ah! mademoiselle, I am only a man and do not know the art of putting a plain truth so that it may not offend. Forgive me, I have thought the matter over during many wakeful nights, and believe me it is my duty to warn you of your danger."

Her face grew white, her breath came in short gasps as though exhausted by a sudden fear.

"I know your secret," I went on.

"What do you mean?" She made a mighty effort to be calm.

"I mean that you are a noble daughter, but, at the same time, ill-advised. Forgive me—I do not know how to say it—but your mother—is it well to put temptation in her way?—the wine, you know!"

She gave me one strange glance and turned away her head. She pressed her hands against her face and her shoulders shook with violent emotion. When she looked at me again her eyes were solemn and full of tears, her cheeks were crimson and bore the imprint of her fingers, and there was a twitching about the dimpled corners of her mouth that puzzled me.

She laid her hand upon her heart. "Ah! I have suffered so much, and all alone! But what is it that you wish to say to me?"

"I wish to say that there are places where the habit can be cured——"

She shook her head. "The great physicians of your country tell me that her case is hopeless. But sit down by me on this log, my friend, and I will tell you all." She paused a moment, then began:

"My father was killed at Paris and left us destitute, without a sou! She was a woman who knew only the gay life of a Parisienne; I was a child. We arrived in London, and starvation stared us in the face. However, she had learned to make embroidery, and through the kindness of some good people, was engaged to work on the trousseau of a young lady of position. Afterwards she obtained other work, but, oh! it was a cruel life for one who had lived as she had lived; and if she sought the means to make herself forget, we must give her our pity and our prayers. In a year or two my uncle died and left us his small fortune, and I have brought her to this quiet place that the world may not know our shame. That is our story." She paused and watched the children play with their fallen leaves. "Do you know why I love those children and my little dog so tenderly?" she said. "I will tell you. It is because they love and trust me though they cannot read my heart, and would love and trust me still though all the world cried out against me. Can I say as much for you, monsieur?"

"There is no need to ask."

She searched my face with her inscrutable green eyes. "Yes, I believe you are a friend."

"And since I am a friend it is my duty to advise. Will you hear me?"

"Not if you would part us; she would die away from me, and I have not the courage to fight the world alone."

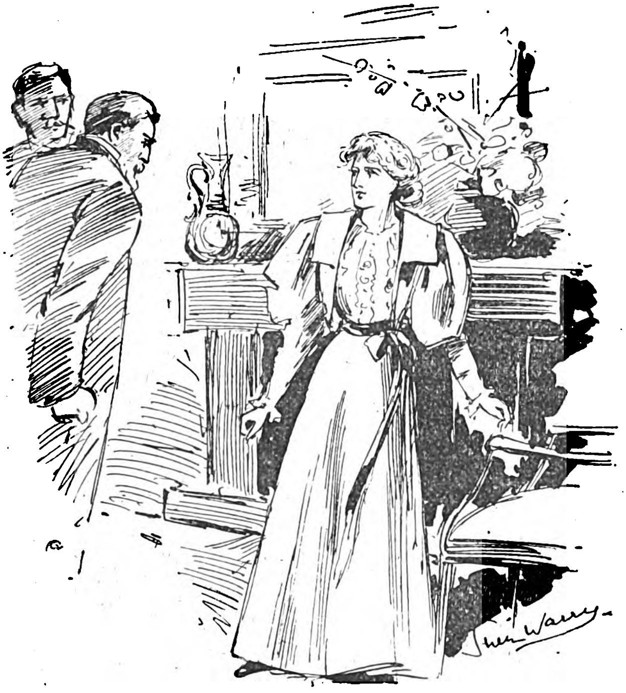
"I will fight it for you. Be my wife."

The deep, mysterious look of Mona Lisa crossed her face. It seemed that in her heart she laughed at me while striving to be pitiful.

"You are good and true, my friend," she said, "and I bless you for your kindness; but it cannot be. You have guessed one secret. I have yet another. There is some one else whom I loved during many years, and who is more to me than the salvation of my soul. Ah! would that we were dead, my love and I."

There was a long silence.

"And you have given him up for this?" cried at last.



Instantly mademoiselle was on her feet.

She laid a finger on her lip. "Hush! I have told you nothing." Then she rose and called out to the children: "Come, my children, you have gathered many chestnuts, and I am lazy, and have not one. Allons! We will return."

"Well," thought I, when alone once more, "there is a lover after all! But he does not care for her, or he would seek her through the world, as I would in his place. And she is young; she may forget, and I have heard somewhere that the man who loves a woman stands a better chance than the man she loves when the former has the advantage of propinquity. Who knows how this may end?"

It was an evening in December and intensely cold. I sat between a candle with a shade of ruby tissue paper and a blazing fire, with a tiger skin beneath my feet; madame dozed over her knitting in a corner! Bijou stretched himself before the fire, and mademoiselle, lovelier than I had ever seen her, in a gown of olive-green embroidered heavily with threads of burnished copper, held on her knee a box of sandalwood and fitted a key into the lock.

"These are the photographs that I promised to show you," said she, as the lid flew back.

The first was of a lady in the costume of the First Empire.

"You! mademoiselle!" I cried.

"Oh, no. It is my grandmother, taken and coloured from an old pastel. You see her hair is black and mine is blonde; her cheeks are red and mine are pale; otherwise we much resemble. This is my father in his uniform. Is he not a handsome man? This is myself as an infant. Don't laugh! I was of an age when one does not compel one's self to smile upon the camera. Ah! and this is Naman as a bride! The face is blurred; but observe the costume! Oh! she was a beauty in her youth, and very accomplished. She made the cushion upon which you rest your arm—the flowers, as you see, are fine, like a painting. But alas! since the last few years, her eyes have been impaired. Now she can only knit stockings!"

Suddenly Bijou raised himself and gave utterance to a series of staccato barks followed by a prolonged growl.

"Tenez!" cried mademoiselle. "What is that sound that I hear?"

"It is the wind," said I.

"It is the ghosts who howl and bite their thumbs at us," laughed mademoiselle. "And now, monsieur, revenons à nos moutons! This is the salon of our hotel in Paris. My father reads the Figaro. I rest my head against his arm, and Maman——"

In the hall beyond there was a sound as of stealthy steps on creaking timbers, then the door softly opened, and admitted three men in great coats.

Instantly mademoiselle was on her feet; her face was grey like ashes, her lips were blue, she shook in every limb, and yet her voice was calm and even cordial as she said:

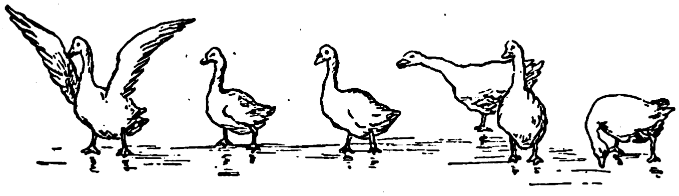
"Gentlemen, to what circumstance do we owe the honour of this visit?"

The spokesman, a powerful man, bowed low. "Madame la Comtesse de la Tour," said he. Then with the quickness of thought he crossed the room, and, with the grip of a vice, he brought down his hand on the shoulder of madame. "Comte Jean Phillipe de la Tour, I arrest you in the name of the Republic of France for the murder of Baron François de l'Hautemonde in Paris one year ago!"

* * * * *

For those who are interested in the story of the crime that shook all Paris to its centre, now about fifteen years ago, there are the papers of the time with harrowing particulars, published on the death of the Comte de la Tour in the Palace de la Revolution, and the suicide of the Comtesse, formerly the talented Mademoiselle Victorine, of the Théâtre Français. For me, the old love lives yet, and two new ghosts have come to burn their midnight lamps and show their haggard faces at the latticed windows of the haunted house across the way.

Mabel Miller.



THE SIMPLETON
LEO '95

THE Simpleton had made a break of fifty-two, and he turned round on his father with the do-that-every-time air of a man whose lush conceit takes the form of unctuous modesty.

"There is at least one thing you can do," said the old man, taking up his cue and chuckling a little to himself. "I am glad to have found it out."

"Any fool can play billiards," returned the Simpleton complacently—his father could not.

"It is a pity—a genuine pity, that you do not appreciate me more," he added, a little injured by the reflection on his intellectual faculties. "You miss the fundamental principle of my system."

"Your what?" queried the old man with something like concern.

"My system," repeated the Simpleton unabashed. "Go at everything backwards and you avoid any possible smacks in the eye—that's my theory," and he emphasised it by retreating a step on to the edge of the door as the footman entered with the coffee.

"Besides," he resumed, as soon as his voice could be heard above the clatter of breaking crockery, "to come down to first principles I am not self made. The law of heredity has been my curse. Whatever partial failure has attended my life is due to you. It is a severe handicap having a father and mother at all. The one thing which a man would thank his parents for they cannot transmit—experience."

The old man snorted.

"Were a child born with the accumulated experience of his ancestors," he observed, "that child would be insane before the end of its first year. Such an acquaintance with the world, the flesh, and the devil, would make his life sad, miserable, utterly joyless and desolate. The illusions of youth are life's ideal; disillusion makes no one happier or better. Indeed," added the old man, "contentment is a state of ignorance, not a state of knowledge."

"On second thoughts, I am inclined to agree with you," responded the Simpleton magnanimously. "All that old age and learning do for a man is to reveal the fact that he knows nothing. On second thoughts, too, there is something better even than experience that may be transmitted from father to son—money." The Simpleton was too polite to do more than emphasise the "may." But the expression was eloquent.

The scene was the billiard-room of Elthorne Manor. The old man was Sir Hamilton Aston-Superfield, and the Simpleton his son and heir.

Now Hamilton the second, known in familiar parlance as Tony, had not been, and was never likely to be, a success. His disgraceful career at school had culminated in expulsion, for having committed every crime in the calendar of youth. His first term at Oxford had added little to his own credit, and a good deal to that of the University tradesmen. It was this matter which now came up for discussion.

"I am very sorry," observed Sir Hamilton, "but these bills of yours are no affair of mine. You have seen fit to be extravagant, and now you must have lessons in economy. If there is one thing I can never forgive, one fault I can never overlook, it is running into debt."

The Simpleton looked unconcerned.

"It was you who drove me to it," he remarked, poising a liqueur-glass on his fingers. "If you send your son to the 'Varsity, you ought to see that his means are sufficient."

"Your allowance was extremely liberal," replied Sir Hamilton, "extremely liberal. When I was at Oxford, my father gave me a cheque for exactly half the amount you have found so insufficient, and I remember well how he told me he did not expect me to spend it all. But I somehow managed to keep out of debt. In fact, I made a point of paying for everything as I bought it, and consequently I never found myself in the humiliating embarrassment from which you now expect me to extricate you. Look at the tailor's bill—upon my soul it's musty with old age. And £80 for clothes in one term, too. Extravagance is a tendency which you will do very well to check, because there may come a time when we shall not be so well off as we are now."

"The end of the world has been prophesied," observed the Simpleton quite unperturbed. Then he extended his hand, and said very quietly: "May I look at that bill?"

"You may," said the old man.

The Simpleton examined it critically.

"I forgot to tell you about this," he observed. "Gilding thought you might settle it with the others. You notice it is drawn out to Hamilton Aston-Superfield, Esq., but the date is 1857; that, sir, I think is a little account of yours that still remains open on Gilding's books."

"You don't mean that," cried the old man. His face turned pink. He gasped a little, and, thinking of nothing more to say, took refuge in silence.

There was a look of triumph in the Simpleton's eyes.

"Taking them all round, I am not sure that our fathers were so much better than we are," he remarked, apparently addressing the billiard-table. "I am sure, my dear parent, in drawing a cheque for this little account, you will also settle mine." And before the old man could think of anything to say, the Simpleton had risen nonchalantly and gone off to bed.

* * * * *

It was the day before Tony returned to Oxford. Nothing more had been heard about the bills, but the question of his allowance naturally had to be broached.

"I am sorry," the old man said, "but the last year has been financially a bad one. I cannot afford you even the same allowance as you had last term. You must do as well as you can, and pray Heaven for better times."

The Simpleton sniggered. He looked at his father standing with his back to the fire, his coat-tails under his arms, and came to the conclusion that these bad times were a myth.

Owing to extreme youth, the Simpleton did not think himself half the fool that he was. Elated by the success of the little conspiracy which he and his tailor had concocted, he thought more of himself than ever.

"My worthy parent cannot deceive me like that," he confided to the ear of his confidential friend, as they sat together one evening in his rooms overlooking the "Broad." "The only question is, how am I to have my revenge? His niggardly spirit must be broken."

The confidential friend considered.

"Is your governor proud?" he queried.

"As proud as he is rich," replied the Simpleton. "What's your idea?"

"This," said his confidential friend. "Do as you have done before, only more so. Run up bills until they reach the length of a national petition to Parliament, or the manuscript of a country parson's sermon."

"What for?" said the Simpleton dully. "The old man would not pay them, and I should be ruined."

"He might say that he wouldn't," retorted the confidential friend, "but when it came to the point he would. A proud man will do anything to save his family name from disgrace. You know that yourself."

The Simpleton assented.

"I think," he observed, "that debts of honour would carry more weight than tradesmen's bills. But I like your idea, chummie."

And he set to work. Now, Oxford is not a difficult place in which to spend money—and there came a time when the Simpleton pulled up short, terrified by the extent of his liabilities.

"Double them," was the laconic advice of his confidential friend. "It is no good doing the thing at all unless you make a job of it. Besides, 'In for a penny, in for a pound,' you know. If there is going to be any hitch you may as well be a bankrupt for £2,000 as for £1,000."

"My dear fellow," said the Simpleton, in a sepulchral voice, "I owe nearly £5,000 already."

The confidential friend drew a long whistle of admiration.

"The dickins you do," he said. "Make it £10,000." One can afford to be reckless in advice.

The Simpleton began to regret that he had ever taken any from his friend. But it was too late to go back; too late for regret or remorse. After all, what was £10,000—or £20,000 for the matter of that—to his father. It was nonsense for him to talk about bad times. He was a mean miser, and this should be a lesson.

So the Simpleton argued. By the time that the end of the term approached, his indebtedness amounted exactly to £7,200.

"Capital," said his confidential friend.

The morning for going home arrived. The Simpleton felt exultant. It was certainly a triumph. He pictured his father's face of horror; and the more he thought of the dénoûment, the greater his exhilaration. There was a letter waiting for him on his breakfast-table. It was from the family solicitor, and ran thus:

Pump Handle Court.

Dear Sir,—It is our sad and painful duty to acquaint you of the fact that your respected father passed peacefully away yesterday at two o'clock. The doctors, we believe, attribute the cause of this sudden death to heart disease. We did not see that we should gain anything by wiring you. We trust you will allow us to express our sincerest sympathy in your bereavement. It is also our unfortunate duty to inform you that while Elthorne Manor is mortgaged up to £50,000, your beloved father's personality amounts to only £8,000. It will be necessary, therefore, that the house and estates are handed over to the mortgagees, which will leave you £8,000 in ready money. We happen to know of an admirable investment should you feel inclined to put this capital in some reliable business. You will have, of course, to pay your educational expenses at Oxford; and as we understand that you have overdrawn your allowance at the local bankers, it would be best, perhaps, if you would send them a cheque for the amount before we come to any decision about further investments.

We beg once more to express our sympathy with you, dear sir, and to remain, your humble servants, Jeremiah, Jones, and Jacob.

It was a very pale-faced, wreckish-looking individual who sat all that morning in the room overlooking the "Broad," with a pencil in his hand, and the table strewn with paper.

It came out in this manner, and the confidential friend himself said it was sad.

Legacy … … … …		£8,000
Amount due to University …	£200
Overdrawn at the Bank … …	£500
Thrown away … … …	£7,200
		£7,900
Balance … …		£100

"It is not every man who has the pleasure of paying for his own education in classics and mathematics," the Simpleton observed, with something very much like a sob, "but when it comes to paying for his youthful indiscretions"——He broke off so overcome that he could not finish the sentence.

"I tell you what it is," he went on with melancholy philosophy, "the wisest men in the world are fools who do not think themselves smart."

"Or those who only give advice," said the confidential friend.

W. A. W.

Pink Blossoms.

War is always sacrifice—never mercy. War demands death and wounds and destruction. He who can kill and wound and destroy most is the greatest hero. War respects nothing, venerates nothing, blackens everything. It moves in trails across a country as a venomous serpent winds through the grass. You follow the trails, and look in vain for one single spot where mercy and pity stayed the hand of destruction. Blackness, desolation, death, and new-made graves are the milestones on the trails of war.

It was a May day, with the peach trees everywhere in blossom. Behind us were the smoke and flame of destruction; ahead the old farmhouses, which sheltered no one who could march in the ranks and fight against us. The fragrant blossoms, the green hills, the sunny skies—everything told of peace, and yet war was at hand as the flaxen-haired children came running to the doors.

Just below a farmhouse we halt to water our thirsty horses at a brook flowing lazily across the road. A few men ride on to the house. We can hear children crying in affright. We can hear the voice of a woman raised in tearful protestation. We can see an old grey-haired man with a child in his arms at the door, and though his voice is too weak to reach us, we can see by his gestures that he resents the lawless invasion of the premises.

Some of us ride to the right to reach the banks, where the waggons are already drawn up; some to the left, where the horses are at pasture; the remainder straight on up the road. Suddenly the bugles sound the alarm, and then warn us to rally on the centre. In one minute the scene is changed from dreamy peace to active war. A body of the enemy, having the same object in view as ourselves, has come up from the south and attacked us at sight. Many a saddle on our side is emptied before we check their fierce charge, and push them back till once more we have room to form.

Each side has a light battery. The guns get to work almost as soon as the carbine. The old farmhouse is the key of the battlefield.

An old man and a mother and four children are in there, but what of it? This is war. No one gives them a thought. Shot and shell plough through the ancient structure—bullets search out every nook and corner.

Now our right wing drives the enemy back with a cheer—now the enemy presses back our left and shouts in exultation. It is a hot fight for thirty minutes—time enough for the dead and wounded to number 150. The reverberation of the guns brings down a shower of blossoms at every discharge, and the black powder smoke floats up through the branches, and smirches and discolours and leaves its grime.

"Rally on the centre! Forward—trot—gallop—charge!"

We have broke the enemy and sent them flying. We follow them for a mile or more, shooting and hacking, and then the bugles blow the recall, and we cease the pursuit. There are dead men on the dusty highway, in the ditches, among the May weeds and the thistles, and dead horses almost block the way at certain points. Yes, a hot little fight, and we are proud of our victory as we return to the old farmhouse.

We have our dead to bury, and our wounded to look after, and it is only when an officer starts to enter the house to say that it must be turned into a shambles that the inmates are remembered. The officer cries out and starts back in horror. Under the peach tree growing close to the back door lies the body of the grey-haired man—father and grandfather to the woman and children respectively.

He must have been in flight when struck by a solid shot, which cut him almost in two at the hips. He was carrying a child not more than two years old hugged to his breast. Her little arms were round his neck, and her face was hidden in his bosom. We unclasped the old man's arms and took her up. She was dead—dead without a wound. She had died of terror as he sank down with her, perhaps kissing her in his last breath.

As we stood with uncovered heads the woman came out. Great Heavens! but how white her face—how ghastly the colour of her lips—how red the blood which dripped from her wounded shoulder on the pink blossoms at her feet! She looked at her father and gasped for breath. She looked at her youngest born, and her throat swelled up, and her eyes dilated until her look frightened me.

"Dead, both dead?" she asked in a whisper.

"Poor woman!" replied the officer as we turned our heads away.

"Go in," she hissed, pointing to the door; "go in and gaze upon the rest of your work."

There they lay—the other three children—all killed and mangled by the same shell as it exploded in the kitchen. Flaxen hair and chubby hands and little blue sun-bonnets contrast strangely with the red blood of war. We tiptoed out, and stood beside the mother, who had prostrated herself on the bodies of those so dear to her. She could not weep and wail. She could only moan and croon to them in the agony of her breaking heart.

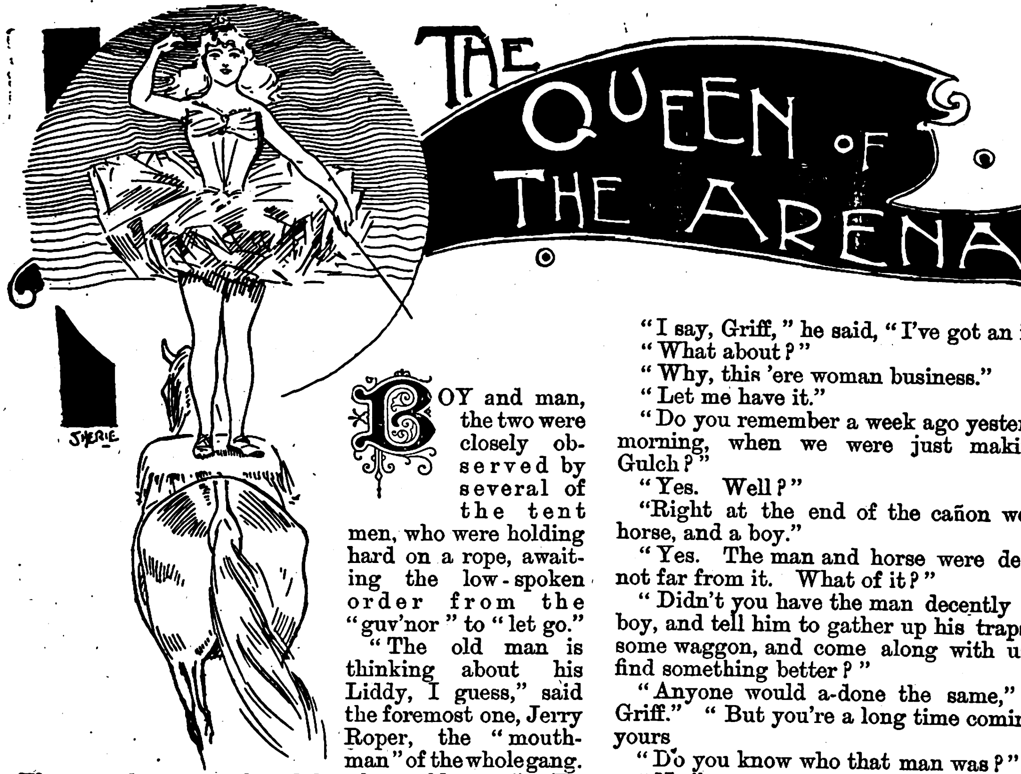
"Poor woman, poor woman!" sighed one.

She rose up slowly, looked from face to face as if to picture it on her memory, and said:

"Leave me! May the God of Heaven take vengeance upon you to the uttermost!"

And we called it a hot little fight, and we felt proud of a victory won over a superior force, and we—well, each and every trooper prayed Heaven to be merciful and pitiful to that poor woman, and over the graves of her dear ones a hundred rough and blood-stained hands scattered peach-tree blossoms in atonement. We could do no more. War was impatient and angered even as we did that.

N. N.



THE QUEEN OF THE ARENA

BOY and man, the two were closely observed by several of the tent men, who were holding hard on a rope, awaiting the low-spoken order from the "guv'nor" to "let go."

"The old man is thinking about his Liddy, I guess," said the foremost one, Jerry Roper, the "mouth-man" of the whole gang.

The remark was overheard by the "old man." He unfolded his arms, lifted the brim of his hat so that the nearest torch shot its sallow yellow light into his eyes, brightening up a worried, unpleasant countenance.

"And sorry was the day for all of us," he said, "when my lady, the Queen of the Arena, left us for good and all."

"Right you are!" exclaimed Jerry. "A man's wife is the best friend he can have in the world, and when she's gone, good-bye to all that is worth living for."

The "old man" sighed and shook his head in sympathy with the remark.

He was an "old man" and "old Griff" thus interchangeably called by his men—only in a figurative sense, for his age was but little past thirty. A man ages fast in experience, conducting such a show as his, and travelling as it was through the rough mining districts of California. On heavily displayed bills that were posted on the sides of tents and shanties, and on some of the larger trees, he was, besides, "the most renowned bareback rider that the world has ever seen."

Presently he said:

"Somethin's got to be done—somethin's got to be done right off. I'd like to know what kind of a show that is in these days that has no woman in it. We hain't made money enough in the past week," he growled in conclusion, "to buy horsefeed, let alone settling up the salary list."

This was something of an exaggeration, but fitted in well with "old Griff's" moody condition, and he again pulled his hat over his eyes, shrugging his shoulders as he did so.

Jerry Roper had had something of an idea, too; and he lounged with it towards the centre pole.

"I say, Griff," he said, "I've got an idea."

"What about?"

"Why, this 'ere woman business."

"Let me have it."

"Do you remember a week ago yesterday, early in the morning, when we were just making Lazy Man's Gulch?"

"Yes. Well?"

"Right at the end of the cañon we saw a man, a horse, and a boy."

"Yes. The man and horse were dead, and the boy not far from it. What of it?"

"Didn't you have the man decently buried, feed the boy, and tell him to gather up his traps, stow them in some waggon, and come along with us until he could find something better?"

"Anyone would a-done the same," grumbled "old Griff." "But you're a long time coming to that idea of yours

"Do you know who that man was?"

"No."

"Well, I've talked with the boy. He's took quite a fancy to me, and he says as how his father was a sort of a showman in the juggling way. He was pretty old, and badly down at the heel. So when his old horse gave out he gave out too, and they laid down there and died together."

"Old Griff" stopped Jerry abruptly, by touching him gently on the breast with his forefinger, and said solemnly: "That's just what I was thinking about myself." And Jerry added, as though there had not been the least break in his remarks: "The boy is supple and graceful, learns easily, and in a week has picked up a good many tricks of the ring."

All this time Griff had never once taken his eyes off the slender lad who was still seated beside him. Griff walked over towards him.

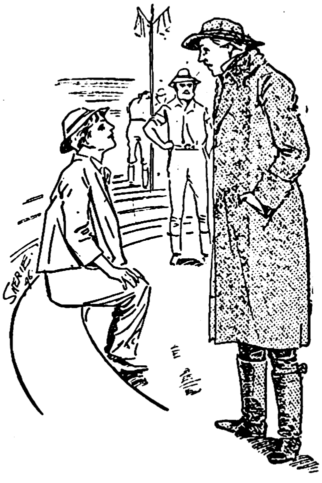
"How old are you?" he asked.

"Don't know," replied the lad. "About sixteen or seventeen, I should think."

"Did you ever ride a horse?" pursued Griff.

The boy's bright face lighted up, and he repeated, slowly:

"Did—I—ever—ride



"Did you ever ride a horse?" pursued Griff.

—a—horse?" He smiled serenely. "I—should—just—think—so."

"Do you like horses?"

The lad's only reply was a partial whistle.

"As soon as the tent is up to-morrow morning," said Griff, "you come to me wherever you can find me." Then he walked away again, repeating his words: "Somethin's got to be done, and done at once, and I'd like to know why not."

Thirty miles away from there, by nine o'clock next morning the tent was up, with all its flags flying, and the busy side-show people screaming their attractions to the early comers. Griff was in the ring, and the boy was with him. By the light of day the lad was seen to be a slender youth, straight-limbed and erect, head nicely poised on his shoulders; a fair, fresh complexion, and light hair, but with eyes so dark a brown that they seemed, in contrast with the flesh, to be dead black. Over a flannel shirt he wore an old blue blouse, fitting his form loosely, and brown trousers that must have been made originally for his father; and blouse, trousers, patched low shoes, and ragged slouch hat, were all of ancient pedigree.

Griff looked the boy all over, and his eyes and face showed that his scrutiny had satisfied him. He had given some previous directions, for as they stood there, one of the attendants led into the ring a horse having on his back a well-worn "pad."

"There she is," the attendant said.

The lad looked up at him quickly.

"Do you think you could stand on that pad while the horse walked round the ring?" Griff asked.

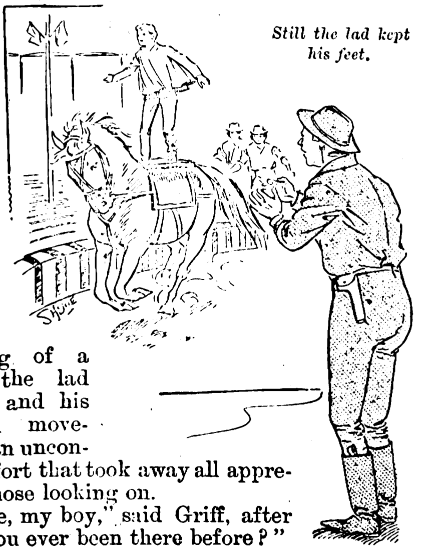
"Try me and see," was the reply.

"Well—get on."

The lad sat down in the ring and pulled off his shoes, leaving his feet bare. Then he tossed his ragged cap towards the centre pole, and with a short run and spring he was astride the horse.

"Lead him slowly round," said Griff to the attendant, and then as his order was obeyed, he added: "Let's see what you can do." This latter to the lad.

He was on his feet instantly, and his various movements were as free and unconstrained as though he had been on a level floor.



Still the lad kept his feet.

"Let him go faster," he said to the attendant, and Griff nodded.

The horse, an old and safe hand at the business, with a touch sprang into one of those long, slow, regular strides, whose rise and fall can be timed by the ticking of a clock. Still the lad kept his feet, and his lithe, graceful movements showed an unconsciousness of effort that took away all apprehension from those looking on.

"Look a-here, my boy," said Griff, after a time, "have you ever been there before?"

"Never," replied the lad.

"Well, that settles it, then," said Griff.

The boy looked at him curiously, but nothing more was said.

Simms, advance agent of the show, was recalled. He and Griff had a long conference one morning, and off he went again. For two weeks every morning for an hour, and every afternoon for two hours, the boy was in the ring, with Griff looking on. No one knew exactly what it meant, and no one suspected, excepting Jerry Roper.

One morning Griff called the lad into the dressing-tent, and they went to a great chest in the corner. Griff knelt down and unlocked it. Lifting the cover, he displayed a quantity of dresses, brilliant-coloured ribbons, gilt and spangles. The lad standing by thought he saw tears in his eyes, and felt certain that he sighed.

"This hasn't been opened for more'n six months since she died," said Griff, half soliloquising, as he touched very gently the soft fabrics that were exposed to view. "But somethin's got to be done," he added, as though bracing himself with the thought—"somethin's got to be done at once. Why not?"

The lad looked at him with curiosity.

Griff raised his head.

"Look here," he said. "You see our show. It's a good one as far as it goes, but it don't go far enough. It used to be perfect when she was with us. She could draw. She was as pretty and sweet as a rose, and she'd fill our tent three times a day. Our business has dropped off to almost nothin'—that is, nothin' beyond expenses—and somethin's got to be done. I wouldn't let no other woman wear her clothes, but I'd let you, for I think you'll be a credit to 'em. We can fix you up so's no one could tell that you wasn't as pretty a girl as ever danced a sailor's hornpipe. Some red on your cheeks and lips, a little black on your eyebrows and eyelashes, and a nice blonde wig, and there you are. You can help us out, and make a nice pile for yourself too."

The boy stood still with his eyes cast rather disdainfully upon the finery on the ground. His attitude, with his hands crossed in front of him, was that of decided unwillingness.

"Come now," continued Griff, "where would you a' been except for me? I don't want to preach up my own deeds, but I helped you out of a pinch. Turn about, my boy, and help me out of a pinch."

The boy was evidently touched by this appeal, and by Griff's serious manner.

"If I do, I'll have to wear these things all of the time," objected the boy, touching the skirts disdainfully. "Then it's cheating, and if they ever find out—phew!"—ending with a low-drawn whistle.

"They? Who?" asked Griff.

"Why, these wild men of the mines. They'd tear your tent all to pieces to find themselves sold."

"Never you mind about that," said Griff. "I'll take care of them, and you would not have to wear a dress exceptin' durin' your acts."

"Well, give me the things, and I'll see how they look," said the boy rather petulantly. He grasped a quantity in his hands, and moved towards an inner dressing-room.

A week after that, as in the early morning the great "London Sensation," under Alonzo Griffin, drove into the neighbourhood of a great mining camp, there were some new and very red and blue bills to be seen, announcing the first appearance in this country, and secured at an enormous outlay, of Annetta Belora, the Bavarian Equestrienne. All down the bills were frequent reference to her, sometimes with great alliterative attractiveness as the "Bavarian Beauty" or the "Beautiful Bavarian," or, again, as being as sparkling and lively and bewitching as the beer of her native country.

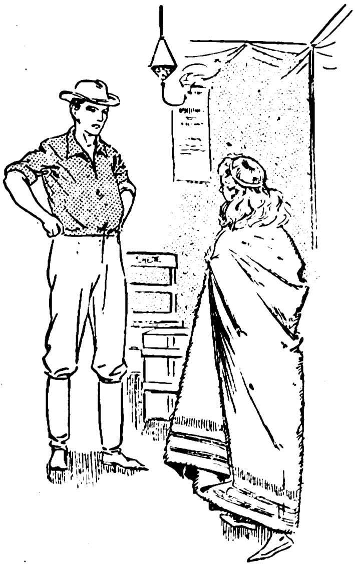
As Jerry Roper said that evening:

"He took those fellows clean off their feet, and it's business again. I never saw this tent packed as it was this afternoon and evening, and Griff says he's already received seven offers of marriage and five chances at a share in a successful silver mine." Then Jerry very quietly chuckled as he thought of the solid basis on which the salary list was suddenly placed.

Whether or not it was true that the lad had taken all the men of that comparatively womanless town off their feet, he had at least had a powerful effect on one young fellow. This one had drifted in with the throng in the afternoon, and had been a rather listless spectator until the appearance of the "Bavarian." He was attracted at first, and then completely captivated. He returned in the evening, and in lieu of the bouquets and other flowers that are showered on favourites in the East, he flung at the lad, as he passed from the ring to the dressing-tent, a small bag of gold dust. "Annetta" picked it up, and gave a grateful glance at the donor that put the finishing touch upon his infatuation.



"I say. I want to speak to you."

The young fellow, as powerful as Hercules, crushed his way through the throng at the conclusion of the entertainment and ran round to the dressing-tent. He pushed his way past the helpers and horses until he approached the corner where the lad stood, wrapped in so large a blanket that he was entirely hidden except his face and curly blonde wig. The stranger brusquely cried out:

"I say. I want to speak to you."

"Out with it," replied the lad.

"I had a little sister once, who, if she had grown up to be a girl, would have looked, I think, just as you look. What's your name?"

Old Griff came up at this.

"The sister dodge is played out here," he said.

Annetta laugh a chirrupy laugh, and disappeared as directed.

Griff gave a little whistle, and wherever he came from, there suddenly appeared between the young stranger and the curtained corner an immense man with a particularly brutal countenance, and muscles so big you could almost see them working beneath his garments as he moved. He was one of the canvas men, and rejoiced in the name of "Rocky the Rough."

"Better go back, young fellow," said Rocky. "You ain't wanted here."

"I believe you've stolen my sister," said the young man. "I'm going to see her, and get from her own mouth something about herself."

"Oh are yer?" said Rocky.

"Get out of the way," cried the stranger, and he made a move to push past his opponent; but it was only a move, for he felt himself, in spite of his own strength, which was by no means small, lifted from the ground, and carried outside the tent.

"Stay outside," said Rocky, as he placed the young stranger firmly on his feet. "I don't think it will be healthy for you to try to come inside again. Your sister? Ho, ho!" Then he disappeared inside.

The young man was greatly put out in more senses than one, and stood just a minute thinking what he should do next. No one could have entertained for a moment any doubt of his honesty of purpose and earnestness if he could have seen the expression of his face.

He felt a slight touch on his elbow, and, turning by the dim light of the stars, saw a lad standing close beside him.

"I say," said the boy, looking up with an eager expression in his eyes, "what is the sister racket that you have been a-givin' of us?"

The young man looked curiously down at the slender figure at his side, whose words were so unlike the tone used or the earnestness of the attitude unconsciously chosen.

"If you'd tell me," continued the boy, "perhaps I might help you. I know 'em all well in there. And if I couldn't, perhaps I could tell you somethin' that'd make you holler."

There was a sober earnestness about the boy that attracted the young man to him strangely.

"Well, there ain't any but little, anyhow," he said, "and it won't take long; but if you don't do as you say you will, I'll break every bone in your body. D'ye hear?"

"Yes; gallop along; my bones are all safe enough."

"My mother," began the young man, "was one of the best ring performers in the whole profession. She was the first woman in the world that ever did a bareback act, and my father was one of those old-fashioned clowns, who told stories in the ring and flung stale jokes at the audience when nothing else was going on. When I was about twelve years old my mother was kicked by a vicious horse, and so badly hurt that after lingering a few weeks in great agony, she died. We were three left—father, myself, and a little sister only about four years of age at that time. Misfortunes heaped upon us then. Father lost his voice, became rheumatic, and wasn't fit for the ring or any show. I was a stout lad of fourteen or fifteen, and put out into the world for myself. I travelled three or four seasons with a show, but I didn't like it, and it didn't like me. So I came out here, and here I've been, sometimes in luck, sometimes dead down on it, ever since, with the exception of one winter, when I thought it was about time for me to hunt up my relations and went east to do it. None of us were much in the letter way, and we hadn't heard of each other during the twelve or fourteen years of our separation but once or twice. I might as well have stayed here, for I didn't find hind or hair of them. Even their names were forgotten, except by some of the 'old timers' who recalled the daring horsemanship of my mother. That's all, my boy," concluded the young man. "Now bring me to Annetta."

"What has Annetta got to do with it all?"

"Do?" said the young man eagerly. "Everything. She was the image of my mother as she rode to-day. It was for all the world to me as though I was a little boy again, and sat looking with a child's delight at the picture she made in her ribbons, laces, and spangles, flying round the ring."

"What's your name?" asked the lad.

"What's that got to do with it?" angrily replied the young man, clutching his arm. "Bring me to the girl, as you said you would, or I'll crush you into a thousand pieces!"

The boy uttered a cry of pain, and followed it up with the exclamation:

"Don't! don't! I'm Annetta myself."

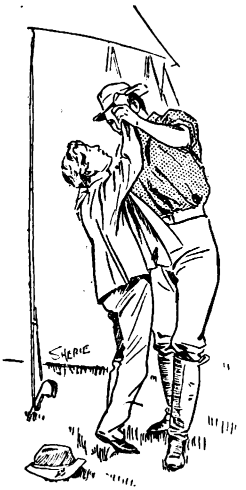
"You!" The young man looked at him in the shadow with a fierce scowl. "Why, you little liar!" he continued. "I ought to have known that you were putting up some showman's job on me. If you were bigger I'd pummel you into a jelly!" and he flung him to one side.

Luckily the place where the boy struck was on the canvas, and between two of the tent poles, or he might have been seriously injured by the shock.

"I'm not a liar," he said. "Look here!" and he took from his pocket the bag of gold dust that the young man had flung at him after his act. The young man seized him again and dragged him towards the light that glimmered through a chink in the dressing-tent. He took his head roughly in both hands, holding the face so that the light fell full upon it.

An eager and intent expression came into the young man's eyes as he looked, and the lad trembled in the rough grasp. The paint was not entirely washed from the face and eyes, and there was enough there to show that the lad had told the truth. The scrutiny was kept up until the boy fairly writhed in the grasp with which he was held, and then the young man, loosening his hold and exclaiming: "Well, I'm blessed!" went wrathfully away, disappearing in the darkness.

The lad had dropped upon the ground, and alternately rubbing his arm and his head, was crying bitterly.



"Don't! don't! I'm Annetta myself."

"Why didn't he tell me his real name," he muttered to himself. "He ain't got no sister—leastways he don't deserve to have none, to treat a poor little fellow like me so. He'll be sorry for it some day."

The tent was suffocatingly full at each of the three performances on the next day. Old Griff was very happy, and Jerry Roper made frequent allusions to the salary list. At night it seemed as though the throng was so large that it made the canvas bulge out all round, and if any more had made an effort to come in it would have split the tent from centre pole to entrance-door. The crowd was not an orderly one. It was boisterous and unruly, and had duly provided itself with deep potations to keep its feelings up to the proper height.

Few women were present, and most of the men were without coats, some without hats, and many with their brawny chests bare. It was the last night of the show at that camp, and there seemed to be a determination, perhaps a predetermination from the first, to make trouble and guy the whole performance.

Old Griff thought the final act in the ring, when the lad made his appearance, would settle the whole difficulty, and hurried along the several numbers on his programme in order to reach it.

The increasing clamour and tumult should have shown him how mistaken he was. It seemed as though the crowd was working itself up to a climax, and reached it when the master in the ring announced the coming of the "most wonderful, and at the same time the most beautiful lady equestrian in the world."

The lad appeared from the dressing-tent, looking, indeed, in his make-up, and by the glare of the central ring of blazing lights, very pretty. He was greeted with a shout whose character, whether of derision or delight, it would have been difficult to tell, it was so tumultuous. He tripped lightly over the sawdust, and sprang easily upon the spirited horse.

They went twice round the ring amid comparative quiet; but it was only as though the crowd had stopped for a moment to take breath, or like a wild animal hesitating just before it springs upon its expected victim.

In the midst of this quiet a rough voice cried out from the throng:

"That's him! We're fooled! It's only a boy dressed up as a girl!" Then came shouts from all directions: "Out with him! Down with the tent! Away with the fraud!"

For an instant old Griff was dismayed at the situation of affairs, coming in such an unexpected way to him. He was never before placed in quite such a close corner. Thoughts flew through his head like lightning, suggesting ways out of the difficulty that surrounded him. The very thing that he thought would restore quiet, order, and good feeling, was the very thing towards which the tumult had been making up its way.

The frightened horse on which the equally alarmed lad rode did not get three times round the ring. A tall man, lying flat on his face on the ground, not twenty feet away from him, laid the long muzzle of a pistol on the top of the earthen ring. There was a report, a wreath of smoke, and the handsomest and most valuable horse in old Griff's whole stud, with a bullet that entered his body just behind the near foreleg, fell dead.

The lad luckily sprang nimbly to his feet and looked round for some way out of the ring. The shot stirred up the final drop in the animosity and venom of the drunken mob. The boy saw, in the instant that he looked, surrounding him an angry circle, glance whichever way he would, of fierce ugly-faced wild men, bent on mischief. He shrank away towards the centre pole in an agony of fear, covered his face with his hands, sank upon the ground and burst into tears.

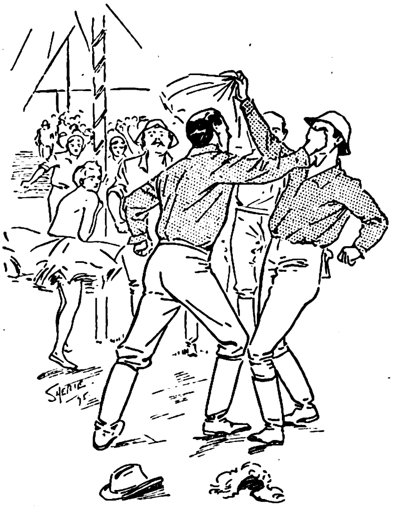
He was not alone, however. Old Griff called to "Rocky the Rough" and his three or four other helpers, and the half dozen or so men were able to spring into the ring and gather about the centre pole before the throng could stumble over the low embankment and have it all to themselves.

"Look out for the boy!" old Griff shouted to his men.

The screaming, frenzied mob surged in upon the half dozen men within the ring. The contest was too close for the use of the ever-present and ever-ready pistol, and it was at first a question of muscle and strength. "Rocky the Rough" swung his huge form, arms, and fists in every direction, and where the latter stopped a man was sure to drop. Three or four pistol shots were heard outside, and then someone called out: "They've cut the stay ropes of the centre pole."

That this was true, the tall spar itself instantly began to show. It swayed this way and that. but was held for a time by the canvas and the ropes of the side walls.

Old Griff stood just in front of the lad, and there the pushing, struggling and fighting seemed to be the fiercest, as though the crowd was most eager to wreak its vengeance on him who had himself acted the deception. With a surge and a swing from the rear that could not be resisted, old Griff was thrown on one side, and the foremost in the throng had his hand on the boy. He tore the curly blonde wig from his head and, holding it in the air, called the attention of the mob to it, who replied with yells of satisfaction.



Then he was struck squarely between the eyes.

He tossed it among them, and it was torn to pieces. Then he forced the shrinking boy upon his feet. He, with clasped hands, begged for mercy, where there was none. Griff tore the thin gauze skirts from the trembling form, and tossed them piecemeal over at the crowd. These, too, were torn in shreds by eager hands. He seized the lace, ribbons, and spangles at the neck, and, with one wrench, tore them away down to the waist.

There was a sudden hush in the tumult.

He who still held the torn pieces of gauze in his hands stood a moment as if petrified, then he was struck squarely between the eyes, and dropped like a piece of lead to the ground. The young stranger who had sought to see Annetta the evening before had delivered the blow, and seized the lad in his arms.

There was a single unanimity of expression amongst those standing the nearest as they looked. Old Griff started it.

"Good gracious! Can it be?" he cried.

"Rocky the Rough," looking round, echoed the cry. A third took it up, and, finding it too deep for any other word, could only add:

"Well—well—well—well!"

Then Jerry Roper came in with a good fourth, adding to make sure his position——

"He's a woman after all!"

The young stranger holding the trembling form close to his own, and looking down into the painted, but so much the more haggard face, asked:

"Then you are Frank Crohger?"

"And—you—Robert?"

He nodded, but she could not see him, for she had fainted.

With the wayward and quick changing moods of a mob, the fact that they had been warring upon a woman, and that the mistake was all their own, almost instantly becoming known to them, their animosity changed to a friendliness that was almost as rough as had been their anger in its manifestations. They hunted up the man who had shot the horse, and forced him to "settle" to an amount three or four times the value of the animal. They decided, late as it was, that the performance must all be gone through with again; that the tent must be cleared, and everybody must pay for admission. Woe be to that person, too, who showed the least inclination to criticise or to object to anything. He should die. And they meant it.

The tent was cleared, and the ring again prepared for work. The ticket seller took his place in the waggon, and his only difficulty was in handing out the bits of pasteboard fast enough. No one stopped for any change or asked for it, and old Griff said, when he came to settle up next morning, that one more such benefit would have made him the richest man in the profession anywhere.

Playing to such an audience, the whole company fairly outdid themselves, and for the "Beautiful Bavarian" there was a tremendous ovation. When she did finally retire, threatened with a returning unconsciousness, from which she had not fairly recovered when she made her appearance, she could call herself a very well-to-do girl from the favours cast upon her by the generous crowd.

"Why didn't you tell me who you were last night?" asked her brother after the performance was over.

"I would have done so if you had let me," was the reply; "but you were so awfully rough and hasty with me. Besides, I remembered the last words father ever spoke to me. 'Be a boy, Frank,' he said, 'as long as you can. Boys get along better'n girls. You have been such to me for more'n fifteen years now. And don't give yourself away to anybody—anybody, d'ye hear?—unless you're cock sure you've got 'em dead to rights.'"

"She played it pretty fine on all of us, didn't she?" struck in Jerry Roper, "but I suspected her, after all!"

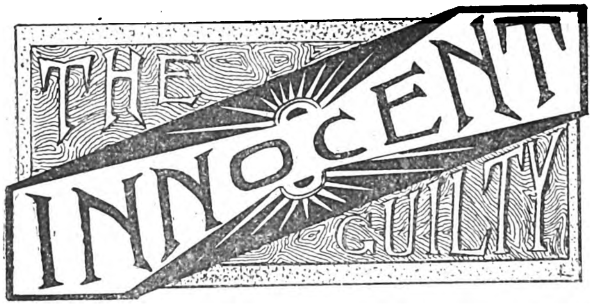
Robert tried to persuade his sister to remain with him, but old Griff seemed to have obtained a stronger influence over her than he could exert, and the next day she travelled on with the show, her and its reputation made by an incident that was made the most of.

During the year Robert had intimations now and then from her how it would all end, and the next season, when the show made its annual visit to the camp, she was, as Jerry Roper explained it: "No longer Frank Crohger, nor even Annetta Belora, except on the bills, but Mrs. Alonzo Griffin, as sprightly as a new india-rubber ball, as pretty as her mother, as prosperous and fortunate as a diamond king, and as happy as a good husband, plenty of money, and immense popularity with the public could make her."

J. P. L.

Next Week

"The Queen of Night," a thrilling story by Headon Hill, author of "Guilty Gold," etc., etc., will commence in Short Stories, illustrated profusely each week by Raymond Potter.



THE INNOCENT GUILTY

"WE find him guilty," announced the jury, and he accepted the verdict with the air of a man in a dream—and a very unpleasant one at that.

"'Tis very queer," exclaimed all his friends, with more or less sympathy, according to their capacity. "Who would have thought him such a brute?"

"He is innocent," cried those who loved him, and so he was. But he is still in prison. Never mind what his name is. We will call him the Innocent Guilty.

When he was innocent only, and some year and a half before he was guilty, he made the mistake of loving the Wrong Girl. This he promptly followed up by another—that of tiring of her. She was the Wrong Girl for him to tire of, also, and I have often thought how much better it would have been for him to have stuck to his first mistake. But he thought he could not.

A woman would have pretended to do so, but being a man he was more honest in his badness. And he thought it was a fine, bold, manly thing to explain to the Wrong Girl just how he felt about it. He told her that he had made a mistake, and that it would be a terrible thing, not to say a wicked thing, for a man to marry a woman he no longer loved.

It almost seemed as if she agreed with him, she was so still. They had just returned from the theatre, and she said nothing until she had carefully removed the hat-pins from her little round toque. She looked in the glass as she did so, and her face grew very grey. He could see her reflection from where he stood, and it seemed almost as if the words came from that grey face in the glass when she finally muttered:

"You shall never marry her!"

This startled him extremely, as he found it hard to imagine where she had heard of the Right Girl. For there was a Right Girl, or one whom he now considered to be right. But the Wrong Girl had never heard of the Right Girl, and it was merely a guess—a very natural one. But the poor Innocent Guilty stood first on one foot and then on the other, and felt very sad, and very sorry for her, especially so as he congratulated himself that she was taking it so quietly.

This was where he made his third mistake. If he had looked less at the childish, wide open eyes, and more at the close shut lips and strongly curved chin, he might still have been disporting himself in this very pleasant outer world.

"I—I—thought I loved you," said the Innocent Guilty; "but—it—was all a mistake—and—it is over now."

In this the Innocent Guilty was again mistaken.

But the Wrong Girl only stared thoughtfully at the pretty red flowers in the shabby carpet of the little room.

"And so—this is the end?" she asked finally, after carefully wetting her dainty lips with her kitten-like tongue.

"It is better so," he answered softly and quite tenderly. She seemed so young and so helpless in her sorrow. But what could he do? You cannot force love to stay at the first hotel he comes to. So they both stood there looking at each other in an odd, still way.

"Kiss me, then," said she, and almost smiled. He was much relieved. What he had dreaded was over. But it occurred to him that it would be well to wait until out of doors before allowing his set face to relax. He turned to leave the room.

Her lips had not trembled when he kissed her, and her hand was just as steady. Suddenly there was a sharp, stinging report, and the cheap paper of the walls flashed under a pale blue glare. At first the Innocent Guilty feared he was shot. Since then he has wished that he had been.

Then he turned, and there in a little soft huddled heap lay the Wrong Girl on the floor, close beside a small toilet-table draped with faded chintz. Its upper drawer was open, and at her side in one clenched hand was a pistol—a toy affair—one of his own.

Here he made another mistake. He stood above her where she lay like a wounded bird, with her bright, dilated eyes fixed on him, and closed the drawer; then he put himself still more on record as a fool by gently unclasping her small fingers and taking from them the pistol, wondering dully as he did so why her blood was not as red as the flowers in the carpet; and like a taunt came the words:

"You shall never marry her!"

And as he gazed, as if fascinated by the round, wide-open eyes of the Wrong Girl, the door burst open, and framed another ghastly face within its square. It was that of the landlady, who apparently disapproved of the whole affair. And he immediately told her he was sorry the thing had happened, and that he feared it might injure the letting of her rooms. She was afterwards, it is unnecessary to state, the principal witness for the prosecution.

And the Wrong Girl turned her eyes from one to the other with a queer look of appreciation.

She hung closely to life for about forty-eight very unpleasant hours, and then let go serenely enough, as a tired child turns to sleep in its nursery bed.

And all through those hours he—the Innocent Guilty—begged her in an agony which was naturally very genuine, to make a statement which would clear him.

But she would only look at him with that first queer gaze, and then whimpering softly, clasp his neck with her languid arms, while she repeated again and again that she had loved him always. And his questions and her answers sounded very badly when they were repeated at the trial. They proved his guilt very conclusively.

And as gradually breath became a rare thing greatly to be desired, and her eyes grew dull and bead-like, she would only moan plaintively and say nothing.

And when she at last died, and her baby face regained its roundness and soft smiling lips which had caused him to make his first mistake, he showed how depraved he really was for the first time, as he ejaculated in what seemed the helplessness of despairing rage:

"I hate you!"

Which unguarded expression told against him particularly heavily at the trial.

He had been in prison quite a year, however, before he received a letter from the Right Girl, in which she strongly advised him to so occupy the superfluous time which was now his, that when they should all meet once more in another world they should be happy together again, and adding that, in the meantime, she had married his Best Friend.

E. C. WAGGENER.

A Romance of the Stage.

Mr. and Mrs. Clifford were on their honeymoon; it was not difficult for anyone to see that; but in the quiet little seaside village of Lytham, few, if any, probably, of the visitors recognised in Mr. Clifford the popular tenor of a certain well-known London theatre; a man whose magnificent voice night after night caused the theatre he was performing in to be crowded to suffocation.

As he lounged lazily on the beach, with his clean-shaven face turned towards his companion, he was not an exceptionally handsome-looking man, although his features were clearly defined and well cut, and his eyes, dark brown, had an irresistible look about them. At east, so thought his newly-made bride, who, oddly enough, had never as yet seen him on the stage. Had she done so with all the adventitious aid of the dresser's art, she would have been fain to confess that he was indeed a handsome man.

However, she was quite content with him as he was, and she might not have been surprised to hear that half the women in fashionable London had at one time or other fancied themselves in love with him.

Not that she would have cared for that, for had he not chosen her in preference to all others? and was he not her very own hubby, and the best hubby in the world? The sweets of honeymooning had not as yet begun to pall upon her. It was, in fact, less than a week since they had been married, and this had been their first real stopping place, the intervening period having been spent in moving about from one place to another.

Theirs had been purely a love match. Thrown together at a large country house in August, when the fashionable tenor, in consequence of the theatre being closed, had been able to snatch a few weeks' holiday—"resting," he had called it—he had been attracted by her sweet, girlish ways, so different to what he had been used to, and she, on her part, had in maidenly fashion reciprocated his attentions.

Shyly at first, being impressed with the importance attached to such a universal favourite of the London public as he was; then by degrees her dread of him vanishing. Before the time came for the party to break up, Mr. Clifford, as he was known off the stage, had proposed and been accepted.

At first her people, who occupied a good position in the county, had objected, but seeing that remonstrance would be worse than useless, had finally consented, with one stipulation, that the marriage should not take place for a year from the date of the engagement, during which time there was to be no seeing each other. They argued to themselves, probably, that long before the stated period had elapsed in the rush and excitement consequent upon the position of a popular tenor in a fashionable London theatre, who had the entrée to some of the best society in town, Clifford's infatuation for their little country Dorothy would have become effectually dispelled. But in this they reckoned without their man. He had kept his word, and had not attempted to see his lady love. Nothing, however, had been said as to their not writing to each other, an omission of which they took full advantage.

And now, exactly at the stipulated time, London having emptied itself of its fashionable votaries, including the majority of people who occupy the best boxes and orchestra stalls, the theatres in the West-End were for the most part closed, the one at which Mr. Clifford proved such an attraction amongst the rest, and he was free until the autumn to go where he would.

Having honestly kept his word, Dorothy's parents felt that they could no longer raise any reasonable objection, and one bright August day she and Mr. Clifford were married, very quietly, in the little church at Westerhay. So quietly, in fact, that the event was not even chronicled, as it most assuredly would have been had it been known generally, in the London papers. The orthodox announcement in the Times had not revealed the secret to the world at large, Mr. Clifford and Mr. Arthur Montgomery not being associated as one and the same, except in the case of his intimate friends.

"And so you want to hear me sing in public, do you, little woman? I am afraid you will hardly know me in my stage attire."

"Oh, George, as if I shouldn't know you anywhere."

"Oh, but I am quite a different personage on and off the stage, I assure you. When I am made up as a gay Lothario, for instance."

"George, dear."

"Yes, little woman?"

"Do you—do you have to make love much in your part?"

"What! Jealous, little woman?"

"No; but I shouldn't like to see you ki—kiss another woman, somehow."

"My dear child, the leading lady that I have to do my billing and cooing with is old enough to be your mother. You will see her, of course, when we get back, and are settled down."

"Oh, but aren't there any young ladies in the piece?"

"Lots of 'em, my dear."

"And do you ever——"

"Oh, yes—chuck 'em under the chin, put my arm round their waists, and all that, you know—all in the way of business, of course—one has to; but what a silly little goose it is." And here followed—— Fortunately it was a very secluded part of the beach:

"Oh, don't, George. Somebody may see us," jumping up. "And now, you lazy boy, are you going to get your letters?"

"I left word, little woman, that that small boy at our lodgings was to bring them to me here; I told him where we should be, and here he is," as a bright-faced, tanned complexioned youngster came round the corner of the cliff.

"Thanks, my little man. Here's something for you," handing him a sixpence.

"Here you are, Dolly, one, two, three, for you; and, let me see, a baker's dozen for me."

Both were soon speedily engaged in reading their correspondence. Mr. Clifford's was not of a very interesting nature apparently, as, after glancing at one letter after another casually, he threw them down by his side.

Mrs. Clifford evidently found more enjoyment in hers, as she read them through with a look of pleasurable interest, and having done so, placed them in her pocket, leaving the envelopes on the sand at her feet.

"What are yours all about, George? I had such a nice one from mamma, another from Dick (her brother), and one from a girl-friend in Town."

"Mine; oh, most of 'em business," tearing another open as he spoke. This he glanced at casually; a cynical smile came over his face, and he quietly put it in his pocket.

"Ah, this is better," he said, the next moment, as he opened the last of the batch; "this is something like, now." And, having read it, he handed it over to his wife.

It ran as follows: "Dear Montgomery,—Things are so frightfully slow here in London that I contemplate taking a company over to the States to play light opera for a period of three months, or longer, beginning in the spring. Your agreement with the Piccadilly people terminates, I think you said, in December, and, if you haven't made arrangements, I should like to secure your services. Name your own terms. I shan't object, as you know. A spell away from town will do you no end of good, and increase your popularity on your return. So just think it over. By the way, I must congratulate you on your marriage. Who's the lady? You must let me call on you both directly you come back to town."

"Well, George, what do you mean to do?"

"Do, darling? Why, go like a shot. You won't mind, will you?" seeing a shade of disappointment come over her face.

"It will be dreadfully lonely."

"Lonely, not a bit of it. Why," laughing aloud, "you surely did not think I meant going without you, did you?"

"I thought that perhaps it wouldn't be convenient," half-crying.

"Not convenient, indeed; why I wouldn't go without you for a million a year!"

"Any other letters to show me, dear?"

"Only these," handing them over, "and they are not much likely to interest you."

She looked at two or three of them, and made a pretty little moue of dissent.

"What was that one you put into your pocket just now? You seemed vexed at it, I thought."

"Oh, that," with a short laugh; "only a business communication."

"Do you know, I wish you would let me see it, George?"

"I don't think you would care to, little woman; in fact, you had better not, perhaps."

That settled it.

"Better not. Then it's something you don't care to show me."

"It's only a silly letter from a very silly woman."

"Somebody in your company at the theatre, I suppose."

"No, it's not. Here, you can see it, if you like," fishing it out of his pocket. "I get enough of her, goodness knows."

Mrs. Clifford was only a woman after all, and when she saw that it commenced "Dearest Mr. Montgomery," she felt the blood surge up into her face; but as she proceeded to read further her face became ashy pale, and her hands trembled so she could hardly hold the letter. Briefly, it was a declaration of admiration for her husband, and a hope that the expressive glances he had cast at the writer from time to time during the past season, when she had been in a certain box in the theatre, the exact position of which she described so that there should be no mistake, had not been altogether devoid of meaning.

And then—Mrs. Clifford could scarcely believe her eyes—the letter continued that at a certain hour on a day named, the writer would be in Regent's Park Botanical Gardens, and gave a description of how she would be attired, so that her admirer might be able to easily recognise her, winding up, "yours devotedly, Marion."

With womanly instinct Mrs. Clifford looked for the post-mark and date. It was "London, W.," and the date nearly a fortnight old, so that the time of the appointed assignation had long gone by. There was a ray of comfort in that, at least.

The letter dropped helplessly from her trembling hands, and she burst into tears.

"Oh, George, how dreadful! do you often get letters like that?"

"Tons of 'em, my darling; but what of that? I can't tell people who come to hear me and other members of the company sing and act for their amusement that they must on no account touch the figures—no, no—must not hold any written communications with the people behind the footlights."

"I can understand that quite well, but—but if you didn't attach any importance to that letter, why did you so carefully conceal it from me? Why not have torn it up at once?"

"But, my dear girl, I do attach importance to it"—Dorothy gasped—"and when we get home I can show you a whole boxful of almost similar effusions, some of them rather more silly than this perhaps," reflectively, "but one and all having the same tenour. Can't you understand, little woman," in a gentle tone of voice, "they are to the actor or actress as much credentials to his or her ability as a whole host of printed testimonials would be, and it's only by catering to the public taste that I am able to earn the income that I do, and have gained for a wife the dearest little woman in the world?"

The argument to most minds would have seemed irrefutable, but not so to a newly-made bride of a week only.

"I don't doubt your word for a moment—but what I want to know is, did you—did you—look at this—this woman in the way she suggests?"

"Not knowingly, my dear; but when the exigencies of a play demand that I should be stone blind as to what is going on on the stage, I must look away at the audience, and I can't always be staring at the front row of the gallery, can I, now?"

"It is not always necessary to single out a box with a woman in it, I should imagine!"

"Now, my dear girl, you are surely not going to be jealous, it's too absurd; only just think to yourself, now," looking at the letter, "this silly woman will have kept her selfmade appointment at the Botanical Gardens, only to find the individual to her known as Mr. Montgomery has not thought it worth while to turn up, and after waiting about for a long time in vain, she will probably have realised what an egregious idiot she has been; and yet," contemplatively, "others will do it again, as they have done before, I suppose. I can't help it. You can see that yourself."

Mrs. Clifford was bound to confess that there was nothing more to be said, and the incident ended to all outward appearances. Indeed, she was sensible little woman enough to say that she did not ever want to see any of his "business" correspondence again.

The honeymoon had come to an end, the newly-married couple were duly installed in a cosy little flat in Kensington, which was to be their future home. The theatres had re-opened, amongst them the one in which Mr. Montgomery was engaged, and flaming posters had announced that on such and such a date the noted tenor would resume the rôle in which he had earned for himself such unbounded popularity.

Little Mrs. Clifford had prevailed upon her husband to let her witness his resumed triumph, and having obtained a box for her in a good position, she, with an old schoolgirl friend and an attendant cavalier, sat breathlessly awaiting his appearance on the stage. At last, after the manner of fashionable tenors in light comic opera, she heard him announce his on-coming by singing a few bars of the opening song in his part. In another instant he was before her, casting one brief glance of recognition towards the box in which she was seated, he threw his whole energy into his task, and the deafening applause which greeted the conclusion of his song testified beyond doubt the estimation in which the vast audience held him.

In addition to a splendid voice, he was, as he stood there in the centre of the stage, arrayed in a most becoming costume, and his upper lip adorned with a magnificent moustache, which, to all appearance, had grown there, a strikingly handsome man, and Mrs. Clifford could not fail to note the glances of admiration bestowed upon him from the feminine members in the various parts of the auditorium, and she could not help saying to herself that some women—she was particular to emphasise the "some"—might be excused for making stupids of themselves about him.

As the opera proceeded she became interested in the development of the plot—her theatre-going experience had been extremely limited—but ever and anon the uncomfortable feeling of her husband's numerous anonymous admirers would be borne in upon her.

"Not that she need mind," she said to herself, "for is he not true to me, and me alone? And to think that an insignificant little person like myself should have been singled out by him to the exclusion of all these grand dames."

In her heart she was not altogether sorry when the curtain fell on the last act, and the principal performers had been called before the curtain.

Mr. Clifford did not keep his wife and her companions waiting long in the brougham, and the whole four were soon speeding westwards. Of the party three were in uproarious spirits, but Mrs. Clifford was silent and reserved, a fact which did not escape her husband's observation, although he had enough tact not to appear to notice it.

When the lady and her escort had been put down at their respective destinations, Mr. Clifford spoke:

"Well, little woman, and how did you like me in my borrowed plumes?"

"I thought the whole thing was just lovely, dear; but I shouldn't care to go often, I think. You must find it dreadfully monotonous singing the same songs night after night."

"Oh! I don't know; one gets used to it in time; but I shan't be sorry of a change in the spring."

"Have you decided to go to America, then?"

"Yes, dear, old X—— came round to the theatre to-night and got me to sign an agreement. He is giving me just double what I am getting now."

"Oh, I'm so glad," clapping her hands delightedly.

"What an avaricious little woman it is," was his laughing reply.

Had he been able to read his Dolly's innermost thoughts, he would perhaps have been surprised to find that it was not the idea of increased wealth which was paramount amongst them.

It was when one of these moods were upon her one night, that she hastily went to her writing-table and dashed off a short note to the friend who had shared her box on the occasion of her one and only visit to the theatre.

"Dearest Kitty,—If you have nothing else to do, come over to-morrow evening, and let us have a cosy chat together. It will be quite like old times."

Miss Kitty promptly wrote to say she would come.

For a while after her arrival the conversation was devoted to topics dear to the feminine mind, and then the visitor remarked:

"Wasn't your husband splendid the other night? Do you know, I almost envied you."

"I suppose George is what you would call good-looking, isn't he?"

"Good-looking, my dear, doesn't express it; he's just divine!—when he is on the stage, I mean. Why, before he married you, half the women in London set their caps at him."

"But do they know he is married now, do you think?" was the anxious rejoinder.

"It doesn't matter much whether they do or not, you little goose. Women who go mad after a popular actor don't bother much about his marital relations."

"Oh; do you know, George showed me a letter from someone before he was married, and said he was always getting them, and that he thought nothing of them. Do all actors, do you think, get letters of—of that description?"

"Well, my dear, not all of them, perhaps. Fancy a woman writing to old ————, for instance. But with your husband it's different, you see. Yes, quite different."

"Kitty, you don't mean to say that you ——"

"No! No!! No!!!" laughing, "on my honour. Never did—not to him, anyway," she added, sotto voce. But the sentence caught Mrs. Clifford's ear all the same.

"Of course not—but Kitty—you seem to know all about this—this sort of thing. You don't think George ever would ——"

"Would what? Why, you silly little goose, of course he wouldn't. Women write to him—he can't help that—but you take my word for it, he is much too sensible and too fond of you, too, I fancy, to ever bother to reply to them."

"I'm sure of that, dear old George; and yet, do you know, I should like to try him. Only just for a joke, you know, and then I could tell him all about it after, and we could have a good laugh over it."

"My dear Dorothy, do you think you could disguise your writing so that he wouldn't know it? Impossible."

"I don't see the impossibility of it, Kitty. I had no idea" (calmly) "of writing to George myself, but there can be no possible harm or objection in your doing so. It's only a joke, you know."

"Me!"

"And why not? I heard you say just now you had never been guilty of such an indiscretion. 'Not to him, anyway,' were your exact words, I think. So it can't be anything very dreadful for you to undertake, and oh, Kitty" (in a sudden outburst of excitement) "I do so want to be sure, quite, quite sure. I don't doubt George the least bit in the world, you know, but——"

"Well, you have a strange way of showing your implicit trust in him, that's all I can say."

"Now, Kitty, do be reasonable; you don't know what it is to be married, and I do love George so; I can't bear to think that any other woman could ever cause him to forget me even for a moment. Oh, Kitty, the idea of it is awful, too awful to contemplate!"

"There, there, don't cry; give me pen, ink, and paper, and I'll just do it this very minute."

"Have you got any plain paper?"

"Yes; I have some extra glazed in my desk; here it is."

"Yes, this will do"—holding it up to the light—"there is no distinguishing water-mark; one can't be too careful in these matters."

Mrs. Clifford looked at her friend in silent admiration.

"Now, then, what am I to say?"

"How should I know, dear; I thought you would. I mean, you know so much more of the world than I do. You say just what you think best."

Miss Kitty pursed her lips and began to write, and in a few minutes handed over the letter for inspection.

"Dearest Mr. Montgomery,—I may, of course, be mistaken, but it seemed to me the other evening that when singing that charming love song of yours in the second act your glances were directed towards a certain box on the second tier. I will not particularise which until I hear that my suspicions were not absolutely incorrect. I am going to the play again on Monday next; will you let me know what are your favourite flowers; then I will wear them, and if you will say where I can see you afterwards you may rely on my being in good time."

"There, my dear, that ought to do the trick, I think."

"Capital; why it's the very way in which that other woman wrote to him; but hadn't you better sign it? The letter George showed me was signed, I remember."

"Oh, I don't think it matters much; I am sure your husband is much too sensible a man to take any notice of it."

"I am sure he is; but we may as well do the thing properly while we are about it."

"Very well, then, 'Yours devotedly, Florrie.' There's another thing, though. Supposing—I only say supposing, mind you—he should be tempted to reply, we have given no address."

"Ah! I never thought of that," with dismay. "We can't invent an address as well as a name—oh, dear! oh, dear!—and so we can't do it after all."

A curious little smile passed over Miss Kitty's face. "Do you know, I am not at all sure that I am doing right in aiding and abetting you in this matter; but, having begun, I suppose we may as well see it through."

"Well?"

"Well, just this. I believe—in fact, I have heard—that there are certain libraries in London where one can have one's letters addressed. Let me see! Yes, of course. I know; there's Liber's, in Bayswater—not far from our house, you know—and you can come and call on me, and just look in as you pass and see if there any answer."

"Kitty, you are an angel!"

"Perhaps—perhaps not. I don't think it is quite certain."

The address named having been duly added, the two friends, one of them feeling decidedly like a conspirator, together went out and posted the precious missive in an adjacent pillar-box.

"Of course, if no answer comes within a day or two, I shall tell George all about——"

"Not implicating me, if you please."

"Of course not—as if I should."

"But supposing he does reply, what then?" in a joking tone.

"But he won't," with decision.

The next day, putting on as bold a face on the matter as she could, Mrs. Clifford walked into Liber's, and in a voice not altogether free from emotion, asked if there were any letters for "Florrie." The assistant looked into a pigeon-hole, and in the most matter-of-fact way handed one over to her.

She recognised the handwriting—his handwriting—at a glance, and, hailing the first cab, got in, told the man where to drive, and with trembling fingers opened the envelope.

"Dearest and adorable one,—So you have discovered my secret? It is true that when you are present I seem inspired, and the words I sing have for once a meaning that I never at other times experience. Much as I should like to see you at the theatre on Monday next, I do not think it altogether wise. People are so apt to be curious, and as it is I have had to put up with a certain amount of chaff about Box——. So you see I know who my fair correspondent is. The better plan will be for you to take a cab, and go quietly to the Café à Londres, and ask for private Room No. 8. The door-keeper will have had his instructions, and, if you will pardon my saying so, it will be well to dress as quietly as possible, and you can easily wear a wrap which will conceal your identity to a certain extent. Don't be later than 11.45, as I want to go to a dance after. Yours devotedly, George——"

"The brute! And to sign his own name, too! Monday next, the very night he promised to take me to a dance at the Upton's! Oh, I shall go out of my mind!"

"You look bored, little woman," said George, at dinner a few hours later. "I fancy you stay in by yourself too much. Why don't you go to the theatre some times; Mrs. FitzWilliam would be only to glad to take you any evening."

"Oh, it is a little dull sometimes; but do you know I have got an idea I should like to see you play again just once; it's a fancy I have got. Could you get me a box for next Monday?"

"Very sorry, my dear, but there isn't a seat in the house open for next week."

"You ought to be a very proud man to create such a furore. Well, if it can't be managed, some other night will do. By the way, we are asked to Mrs. Upton's dance that night. Can you take me?"

"Of course I can. But don't bother to come to the theatre for me; it only means coming all the way back here again. Their house is close by, you know."

Mrs. Clifford said nothing, but reflected on the duplicity of human nature, and that of the genus man in particular.

On the Monday night, having left word for her husband that she had gone to Mrs. Upton's, just after eleven o'clock she drove in a cab to the Café à Londres. She had been careful to observe the instructions conveyed in the letter, which she had taken the precaution to put in her pocket, and the white woolly wrap wound loosely about her head effectually served to veil her identity.

An obsequious doorkeeper assisted her to alight, and, in response to her somewhat tremulous inquiry for Room No. 8, a waiter with an ivory tablet bearing that number in his coat, came forward and ushered her into a snug little room, on the table of which was an elegant little supper laid for two persons.

She glanced at the clock; it was just 11.45. Now, then, she would not have long to wait; for Mr. Clifford prided himself on nothing more than his punctuality. Still the hands went on, and presently the French clock chimed the hour of twelve, and still he did not appear.

Quarter past, half past, and then she became desperate. She rang the bell. A waiter appeared instantly; so quickly, indeed, that he might have been at the other side of the door.

"There is no other number 8 room, I suppose?" was the only thing that occurred to her.

"No, miss."

Miss, indeed! "Thank you," and the waiter retired.

Mrs. Clifford began to think possibly he had repented after all, and had gone home. If so all was bound to come out. But worse still, how was she to get away from this odious place. The unconsumed supper would have to be paid for, she supposed, and instinctively she took out her purse. Horror of horrors, it contained a few shillings only! Once more she rang the bell; the waiter appeared without delay.

"The gentleman," he began, with a smirk.

"Has he arrived?"

"No, miss; I was going to observe——" but his observation, whatever it might have been, remained unsaid.

"Tell the manager I wish to speak to him, please. I had ah—an appointment to sup here with a gentleman at 11.45, but now I see it's nearly one o'clock, and I fear something must have occurred to prevent my hu——" she had almost said husband, but just managed to substitute the word friend, "from keeping his appointment, and I am sorry to say I have come out without any money, beyond some silver; otherwise I should have been pleased to pay for——"

"Pray do not mention such a thing, madam; mistakes will occur, and the gentleman will doubtless call to-morrow and explain; allow me to have a cab called."

Mrs. Clifford did not know how to be grateful enough to him.

Just as the clock struck two she turned the latch-key in the door of her flat, her feelings being not easily described.

In the dining-room sat Mr. Clifford, in evening dress, reading a book.

She started at the unexpected apparition.

"How early you went away, dear. I was here just before twelve o'clock, and you had gone."

"You did come for me, then, as you promised?"

"Of course I did, little woman; and do you know I had such a queer story to tell you. Ever since I have resumed my part in our show I have been more than ever bothered with letters from inane women, like the one I showed you at Lytham. Well, last week I got an even more than usually venturesome effusion from someone styling herself Florrie. I can't think why I did it, but instead of putting it away unanswered I actually took the trouble to reply to it, making an appointment to sup with her this very night."

"But you didn't mean to go, George?"

"My dear girl, what could have put such an idea into your head? Hadn't I promised to take you to this dance? and I couldn't be in two places at once very well, could I?"

"Of course not, how silly of me."

"Well, as I was saying, I made the appointment, ordered the supper, and, being a stranger, paid for it beforehand, and just mentioned casually to the waiter I might be late, and that he was to show the lady in directly she came."

"Oh, George, and she may be there yet!"

"I don't fancy so. She might have waited a while, and then she would realise she had been duped, and find her way home, a wiser woman, it is to be hoped."

"It was hardly fair to play such a trick, was it?"

"Oh, I don't know; women are such idiots, they must expect to put up with inconveniences sometimes. By the way, do you remember my opening a letter from some girl friend of yours when we were down at Lytham? It struck me the writing was wonderfully like this," producing the fatal envelope.

"Oh, no; it is alike, certainly, somewhat alike, but there is a difference; besides, Kitty would never do such a thing, I'm sure."

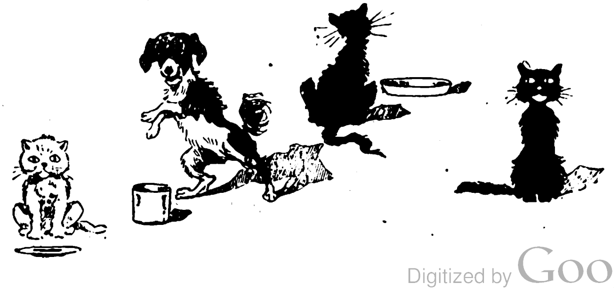
"Well, you know best, little woman, and now I'm going to turn in. Why, you haven't given me a kiss, puss; getting tired of me already?"

"Oh, no, no, George," kissing him passionately, "I can never, never love you enough, I think; but only think of that poor infatuated woman; supposing she is waiting for you still?"

"Serve her right if she is," was the brutal reply. "Now, trot along upstairs; I'll follow you in a couple of minutes, as soon as I get to the end of this cigar."

He re-entered the dining-room and picked up his book. It was Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." What in the name of all creation could Mr. Clifford find in this book that he should be compelled to stuff a silk handkerchief into his mouth to prevent him exploding with laughter. The writer does not know. Possibly Kitty does.

ANNIE DAVIS



UNFINISHED

THESE pictures!—Well, I see they puzzle you. I never knew any one they didn't. People who have no love of art think them simply absurd, but the artists and you connoisseurs are just puzzled by them. I know what you are saying to yourself:

"'When the man could get qualities like that, could see things in that astounding way, why in the name of all that exists did he not do more? What did he leave his things in that condition for? And what under the sun is the matter with them? I can't pick out one that is not a failure, notwithstanding the delightful colour, and that feeling in their execution which is so delicate and subtle as to be almost uncanny. But there is something wanting, something left undone, as though the hand had been arrested in the making, so that a bit of the soul of the thing had been left out. It is so with the least scrap of a sketch you have here. Curious!"

"Well, I give those pictures that corner of my studio, and I usually let people look and marvel about them, but I have never fully explained them to any one.

"You say you are a metaphysician; that you are interested in the curiosities of human nature. I feel compelled to give you the history of the man who painted them. He was my chum when I was a student in Paris, ten years ago. I did not know him before, though we both were English. His name was Ralph Esby. I shall not soon forget the day Ralph Esby came walking into the studio. We were under Bonnat—a splendid lot of strong men, that class was—Frenchmen, English, Greeks, Danes, Americans, and I don't know what other nationalities. He came walking in, looking like a young god. A tall fellow, of about twenty-three, with a certain slenderness, although rather strongly built. And he had a grace of movement which matched his handsome face. Yet, strange to say, he would sometimes do things in the most awkward and rigid way, as if to contradict the assumption that he possessed this charming grace. For instance, he would throw himself back from his work to give it a critical look with a motion in which there was more of an inspiration to us fellows than in the prettiest model we had. When, suddenly, just as you felt an admiring thrill going over you, especially if you had conceived the enthusiasm for Esby which I had, he would give your æsthetic nerves a shock by drawing himself up rigidly—snap!—as though something had left him. And he'd abandon his work, and off he'd go without a word to anyone.

"We had such a respect for him and his work, though, that no one said much that might look critical. Occasionally a fellow with more callous sensibilities than the usual run of men, would go up to his easel with:

"'Isn't that jolly, now; but, I say, Esby, why don't you finish?'

"He'd just get a little red, smile, with a strange look in his eye—if he had let himself out more you might have called it a hopeless sort of look—and he'd turn off with a joke about something no one ever ventured to notice. This was a personal peculiarity of his. The coat-sleeve of his left arm was empty. It had come from no accident—he had been born without the arm. What he would say was:

"'You can't expect an unfinished fellow to finish his picture.'

"It wasn't in character for him to make a joke of that kind. It rather jarred upon you. We used to wish those 'thick-skins,' would let him alone.

"I attached myself to him from the beginning. I am an enthusiastic person, and naturally express what I feel. But, in spite of my enthusiasm for Esby, which grew daily, there was always something essential lacking in our friendship.

"Evidently he was not a rich fellow, though he never seemed to want for means. He had an atelier, like many of us, and lived at the restaurants. He had no friends in Paris outside our set, and I was the only one there whom he visited intimately. However, the fellows all felt honoured by an invitation to Esby's atelier, and many a good bottle of wine and crust of bread we've broken there.

"There was a piano which Smith used to play, and we had some good voices, too. Esby himself never touched the piano before anyone. Of course, he only had one hand to play with, and yet I've heard him make music, pretty, strange, and beautiful, as I've sometimes come up the stairs, which would stop as soon as he heard my step.

"He was particularly sensitive about his music. A song he never sang through with the fellows, though in particularly fine passages he would often join in, and his voice had a rich quality. But if ever he sang more than a few notes there would be the consciousness of something out of harmony in the singing—something which you did not quite like to hear, though not out of tune or anything of that kind. He would immediately stop himself then, with a slight, impatient movement, and probably not try it again the rest of the evening. There was one subject that we never broached at Esby's. That was the ladies. It always fell flat, and we learnt by-and-bye that either Esby was totally indifferent to the fair sex—his manner implied it—or else he had had a wound from Cupid which was not healed. The fellows speculated somewhat about it.

"Imagine, then, my surprise when I came in on him one evening and found him sitting over his fire with a letter in his hand, which he held in a listless, melancholy way. As he didn't put it away or make any movement to conceal his attitude of mind, the characteristic thing for him to do, of course, I looked at him inquiringly. I said: 'What's up, Esby?' He just handed over the letter, with 'I'm a confounded rascal, Harry,' and then he got up and began pacing the floor.

"The letter was a delicate-scented thing, in a woman's handwriting. It ran thus:

> "My Dear Ralph—You will be surprised to receive this letter so soon after my last, which I posted but two days ago. But that last was like all the letters which I have been writing to you this winter, not a true, frank letter, but a kind of make-believe. And to-day I have determined to tell you all I have been thinking, that once more things may be open and real between us; for your letters, dear Ralph, have been make-believes, too. Indeed, is it not so that our happy frankness had disappeared even before you said farewell? I felt it, though I would not believe it then. I cannot explain—I cannot understand it. Not in regard to you, Ralph. With another person it might be different. Oh! Ralph, my dear Ralph, you still love me?

"The letter was blistered with tears, and there was no signature.

"Esby came over and took it out of my hand, saying: 'I shall write to her to come over, and I'll give it a fair trial. Perhaps it will return to me. I thought it might by absence. But I'm afraid it's like the painting and everything else, I can't put anything more into it. It must be left unfinished. I'm afraid it's constitutional!' And Esby—reserved Esby—actually buried his face in his hands and wept.

"I felt sure that it was the first time he had candidly declared that last even to himself.

"The month following this Esby worked in a particularly spasmodic way, and he was in a more than usually reticent frame of mind. We had no confidential talks, he did not come to my room without one of the other fellows, and I avoided surprising him alone in his.

"But one evening he came in with the expression of dejected determination, which had been growing on his face for six weeks, a good deal deepened.

"'Bright,' he said, 'I'd like you to meet some friends of mine—Miss Hartley and her father—just come over.'

"I understood who Miss Hartley was, and I was somewhat agitated by the invitation. After all it was only a formal call we made, but I came away feeling that if Ralph could cease to love Madge Hartley there must be something normally wrong about him.

"For a whole week Ralph and I saw Mr. Hartley and his daughter. We showed them Paris—Ralph devotedly attended the lady, and I piloted the old gentleman. He and I kept up a pretty even flow of spirits and conversation, but Ralph and his lady were a melancholy pair.

"Her father was not an observant person, but even he began to think there was that in the atmosphere beyond his ken, and he confided to me that he thought there must be something amiss between young Esby and his daughter. They used to be famous friends.

"By Saturday morning I felt that I could not keep an indifferent look upon things any longer. Those two faces haunted me tragically when they were not before my eyes. I called for Esby about nine o'clock. We were to take his friends to Versailles by boat. A pleasant plan enough for people in real holiday humour.

"A second time Esby sat dejectedly in his room with a letter in his hand.

"He rose and said, quickly: 'You'd better go to the class, Bright, and hear the criticism. Miss Hartley is not well, and we shall not go to Versailles. It's a shame to have kept you from work all this week—but you're a good fellow, Bright, a stunning good fellow,' and Esby shook my hand with great warmth.

"'Shan't we call or send some flowers, Ralph?' said I.

"'No,' he replied; 'I'll write her a note.'

"I did go up to the atelier, but my thoughts were not much upon what Bonnat was saying, although the other fellows seemed more than usually interested. They twitted me a bit about having been kept away by one of the fair sex. 'We might have expected it of an enormous creature like you, Bright; but what's taken hold of Esby?' I wasn't in a joking nor confiding humour, so I muttered something about Esby attending to his own affairs, and I went off for a walk by the Seine. I'm not often irritable, but the fellows jarred on me.

"Esby rested on my mind, and I thought of Madge Hartley, shut in her room in this strange city, sad, despairing thoughts haunting her. Towards evening I wandered up to Ralph's room. Pinned upon the door was a paper, and on it written: 'Go in, Bright.' I quickly turned the handle and entered.

"The room was entirely vacant, but opposite me stood a portrait of Esby—a portrait which I had never seen, yet immediately recognised as done with the most exaggerated peculiarities of his brush; so strangely like my friend was it, yet a weird thing, uncanny, ghostly. He never did a piece of work more beautiful in colour, and full of a wonderfully strange inspiration. But the sadness and despair which shone through its ghostliness was so great that it was with a heart stilled by premonition that I read a word painted beneath with a slender brush of carmine. This was the word, 'Unfinished.'

"I stood some time gazing upon the portrait in a blind kind of way, repeating mechanically, 'Unfinished!' And gradually the terrible fear grew that Ralph had done something desperate. Poor Ralph! No one in his sane mind ever painted a portrait like that.

"I rushed up to the Hartley's. Mr. Hartley received me with a grave face, and gave me a letter.

"It was a letter from Ralph to Madge. He told her frankly what he had told me—the whole course of his feelings towards her:

> "'And now,' he said, 'if you were a woman to receive such a thing I should offer myself as your husband, but to you I am well aware that would be useless. Many years ago the suspicion of this strange peculiarity of my nature dawned upon me—this incapacity for completion, in any condition or acting of my life. I have been ever since warding off an acknowledgment of it to myself. How much braver, how infinitely better a thing it would have been to have acknowledged it, the pain which I have brought upon you and upon myself is witness. I cannot even ask you to forgive me.
>
> "'Yet you will not deem that I am without realisation of what I have done, when I tell you that I have gone into banishment—a man without an arm, symbol of the incomplete. It is not the ending of a miserable life I am contemplating. It is but complete retirement from life as it is, its daily contact with my fellow men. In the wilderness of some primitive land, perhaps a kindly providence will some day say 'Finished.'

"It is ten years since I read that, and that's the last I've seen of Ralph Esby. I've heard that his father was killed in a duel, shot in the arm, and that his mother died when he was born, soon after. One can put two and two together in regard to poor Ralph's peculiarities. All these years we have been wondering where Ralph might be, but the uncertainty came to an end a year since, when a fellow from Australia came into my studio and handed me a card, upon which was written, in a feeble hand, 'Harry, my boy, I've finished!'

"'It was a wild colt finished him,' said the man.

"Miss Hartley? Oh, she had a severe illness. But her father and I nursed her through.

"For six years I did not say anything to her in regard to the state of my feelings. Then I asked her to be my wife, and we've been married four years now.

"I wish we could have told Ralph."

Richard Sibest.

IT CAME TO PASS

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM

CHAPTER IX.

Charlotte received a telegram forestalling Raymond's arrival. Her joy quite equalled the sender's, as she sought Hugh with a radiant gleam of pleasure in her eyes, waving the glad tidings aloft.

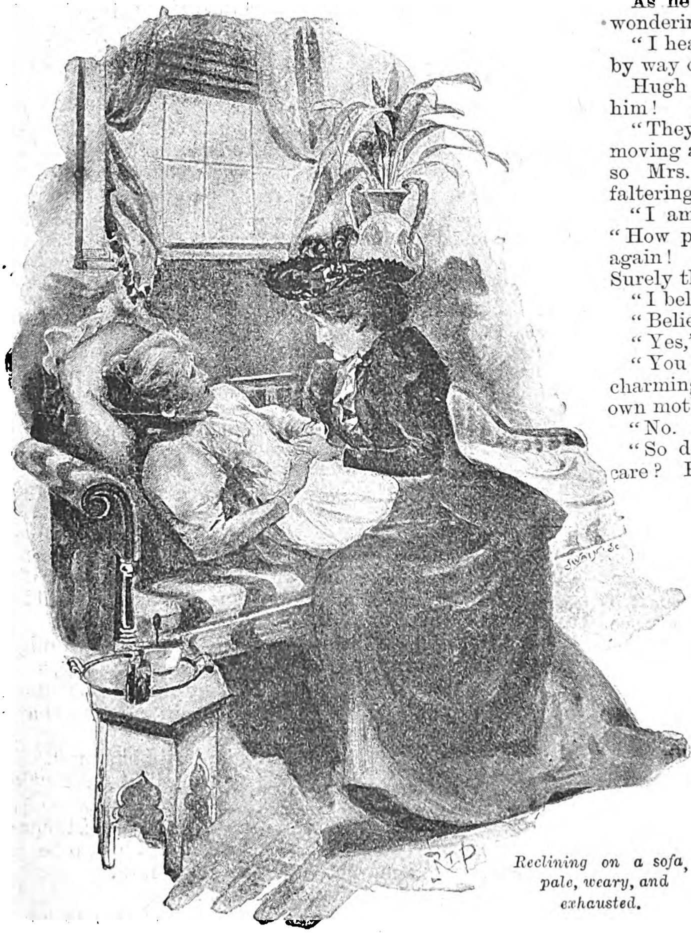
"He is coming," she cried, joyfully, with almost childish excitement. "Oh! Hugh, dear, I am so glad!"

Their beaming faces flushed and glowed as they re-read his message together.

"How I shall count the hours to meeting him!" she sighed, her heart overwhelming with gratitude and content.

It had all seemed like an evil dream to Charlotte, and a great load fell from her shoulders, as she carried a bouquet of roses to Mrs. Leigh, who was reclining on a sofa, pale, weary, and exhausted.

"How thoughtful of you to bring coloured flowers," she said, pressing them lovingly to her cheek. "The white blossoms look so funereal, and there will be time enough for them by-and-bye."



Reclining on a sofa, pale, weary, and exhausted.

"Oh! do not speak so gloomily!" cried Charlotte. "I fancy the doctor here is an alarmist, for Nurse Evelyn is very hopeful, and declares you are a 'splendid patient!'"

"Dear little soul! She is always bright, yet so quiet, and tricks me into believing myself better. I don't think I care whether I live or die, the last twenty years have been so full of sorrow. Death is sometimes a release."

"Would you like to see Hugh? Nurse said we might sit with you, and he is waiting outside to hear how you are."

"Oh! do call him in!" she exclaimed eagerly. "I should love it above all things."

Hugh came gladly, thinking of his own illness, and the lonely suffering.

As he entered, Mrs. Leigh gazed at him with the same wondering expression she had worn on the first night.

"I hear you are expecting your father shortly," she said, by way of conversation. "Are you considered like him?"

Hugh coloured. How could he admit he had never seen him!

"They have the same eyes," murmured Charlotte, moving across the room to arrange the flowers. As she did so Mrs. Leigh lowered her voice, addressing Hugh falteringly.

"I am so glad that Mrs. Peel is happy," she whispered. "How pleased you will be to have your father with you again! His wife is a different woman at the mere prospect. Surely they are wonderfully devoted?"

"I believe so."

"Believe! Are you not certain?"

"Yes," answered Hugh emphatically.

"You must have a very delightful home with such a charming step-mother, or perhaps you still remember your own mother?"

"No. She died when I was an infant."

"So during your childhood you never knew a mother's care? Poor little boy!"

Tears filled her eyes, as she held out her hand sympathetically.

Charlotte returned to her seat by the couch, and noticed a hungry hunted look on Mrs. Leigh's face, such as she had seen stamped on the features of men who race behind luggage-laden vehicles. The invalid shivered in the sunshine as if an icy blast had struck her.

"Are you cold?" asked Mrs. Peel.

"No," she replied, drawing her fleecy shawl about her throat. "I don't think I am really cold, but I said just now I did not care to live—you remember?"

Charlotte bent her head in assent.

"Well, I take back my words. I shivered just then at the thought of death."

She spoke slowly and with effort.

"Have you no home?" Hugh was constrained to ask.

"Not now. I was once a happy young wife like Mrs. Peel, with life before instead of behind me. Then I had a beautiful house, standing in a high-walled garden, and dogs and horses and carriages of my own; but lately I have wandered from one Pension to another, till I grew to know the courses and the conversation by heart, and the smell of the cooking and the shape of the rooms, and the position of the bed, and the people.

A happy young wife like Mrs. Peel.

"Yes, the people were the worst of all. They could only talk of their own affairs—not one wasted a moment to sympathise with me. They were indeed a contrast to you and your step-mother. Then when I knew I could only live a few months, I gave up economising, and came to this hotel. My good angel must have led me here, but it is sad to make friends, only to part."

Charlotte bent over the tear-stained cheek, and kissed it lovingly.

"You must not talk too much," she whispered, "or nurse won't let us stay. Shall I read to you?"

"Yes, if you don't mind. I prefer poetry, it soothes my nerves."

She drew a little red book from under her pillow, entitled, "Lays and Lyrics," by Clement Scott.

"These are my favourites," she said. "Read me one verse, the first you come to, and I will close my eyes and listen."

As the shadows deepened into twilight Charlotte read softly, while Hugh sat watching the wan face on the couch with unspeakable awe. He had never seen death, and the grim spectre hovering over their new friend chilled his blood.

Charlotte's voice was naturally low and musical, and she murmured the lines slowly, hoping the patient might fall asleep:

"What was your life ten years ago?
  You woman with the haunting face;
With eyes so soft and voice so low,
  Who came in fancy to this place.
You touched my face and took my hand,
  And whispered of a life to be,
Some day in distant flower-land,
  When calling you would answer me.
What was the hope that seemed to grow,
In dreams of you ten years ago?"

"No—it was not ten—twenty!" cried Mrs. Leigh starting up with staring eyes. "Twenty years ago!"

CHAPTER X.

"No one in the whole world could be happier than I am to-day!" whispered Charlotte, glancing from her husband's loving eyes to the smile of peaceful content upon Hugh's face.

She felt justly proud of uniting these two lives, and a great joy reigned in her heart at the complete success of her plans.

"You gave me a terrible period of suspense," Raymond declared, turning to his wife and laying his hand tenderly on hers.

"And finally my letter was brought to you in church," she replied, gazing at him with her soul in her eyes. "I think it was a good omen, dear, don't you?"

"Perhaps."

"I did not want you to be miserable," she continued, "and yet I am glad it was not a theatre. It is so nice to be missed."

"My tyrant conscience gave me no time for amusement," he replied; "and even now I hardly dare look away from you, for fear you should vanish again. Anyhow, darling, I deserved to suffer, and your mind may be easy on one point. I can see that Hugh and I are not going to quarrel over any miserable misunderstandings. He is the best of sons, since he forgives those long years spent apart, for the sake of our sweet peacemaker—Charlotte Peel." He kissed her hand as he spoke.

"It was almost worth the separation to be reunited," she said, realising how passionately in love she was still with her husband.

Hugh slipped quietly away, knowing they would like to be alone. So engrosssd was he with his own thoughts, that he never saw Nurse Evelyn on the staircase, and woke from his reverie with a start at the sound of her voice.

"Have you a minute to spare?" she asked.

"Yes. Can I do anything for you?"

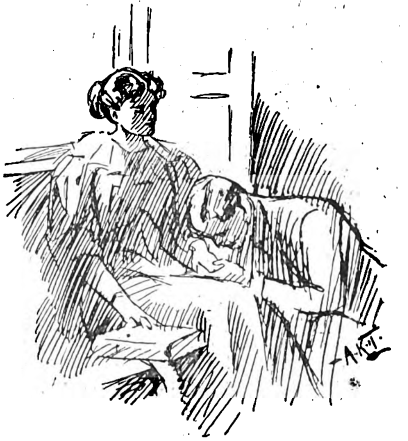
"Mrs. Leigh wants you to bid her good-bye. She is convinced that she will die before the morning. I promised to tell you, she begged so hard."

"I will come," he answered, gravely.

It was a summons he could not disobey.

In the meanwhile, Raymond and Charlotte unburdened their hearts to each other, and perfect confidence reigned between them.

"We will live a newer, freer life dear," she said, a glad light leaping into her eyes. "The barrier between us is broken down now I know everything."



He kissed her hand as he spoke.

He had recounted to her his quarrel with Augusta, and a smile played round Charlotte's lips as he spoke of Mrs. Donnington-Bain's threatening letter.

"You do not fear that woman, Raymond?"

"No. But she nearly drove me frantic refusing to reveal the boy's address, and laughing at my misery. Then when I disregarded her, she fired off an insane epistle, which I did not condescend to answer."

"What is this unknown evil she speaks of?"

"I do not know, but certainly nothing that need trouble you. It probably merely exists in her melodramatic brain."

"She is the sublimity of ignorance and impertinence," laughed Charlotte.

"I received a sarcastic telegram from her, declaring she would tell 'her news' before the week closes. It is only a trick to obtain money."

"Let her proclaim our story on the housetops," cried Charlotte, with a defiant shrug of her shoulders. "I do not care. We are happy together in our love, and the world, or rather the people in it, cannot interfere with our lives. We will be utterly free."

"You could say nothing to please me more," he replied. "You took me 'for better, for worse,' Charlotte, and have remained staunch even through slander, not only drawing me to my son, but rescuing his life at a critical moment."

"There is still a shadow over this brightest of bright days," she replied, "which is troubling me, Raymond. Since our arrival we have been deeply interested in a forlorn lady dying in this hotel. It seems such a very sad case! She has no friends, and Hugh and I cheer her in any little way we can. To-day she is sinking fast, yet still takes a keen interest in all our doings. I must not forget her in the midst of my own happiness."

"I wondered," she continued, slipping her hand in his, "whether you would come and see her? I think it might be kind. We need only stay a few minutes."

"You are always thoughtful for others, Charlotte," he said, tenderly. "But is she strong enough to see a stranger?"

"Oh, yes, just say a few words, and show interest. That is what she craves, poor soul."

Raymond followed willingly, as Charlotte led the way to 149, creeping with gentle footsteps to the door and opening it cautiously.

"May we come in, Nurse?" she whispered. "I have brought my husband to see Mrs. Leigh."

"You must talk very little," Nurse Evelyn replied.

"The young gentleman is here. She asked to see him." They entered noiselessly. The blind was lowered, casting queer shadow's over the patient's face.

"Is she asleep?" asked Mrs. Peel.

"No," whispered the nurse. "I heard her speak a moment since."

Raymond approached the sofa at a sign from Charlotte, and the dying woman opened her eyes, staring at him wonderingly. She stretched out her wasted arms, her figure trembling like an aspen leaf, while suddenly there poured from her lips a torrent of incoherent words.

Charlotte watched the ghastly face unheedful of Raymond.

"At last!" moaned the feeble voice—"at last—husband—forgive me!"

"Her mind is wandering," said Nurse Evelyn, anxiously.

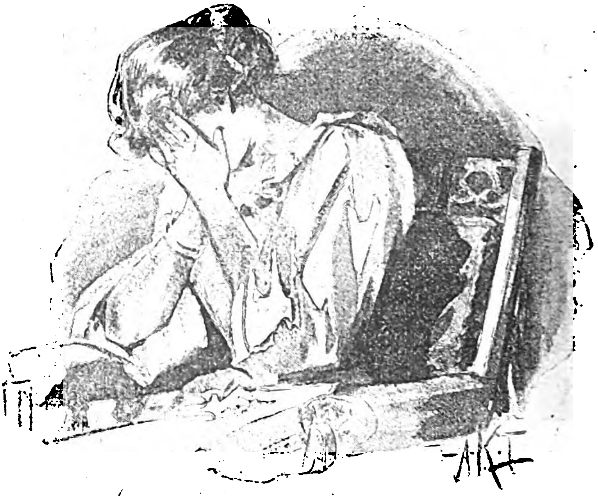
"And she mistakes Raymond——" began Charlotte, but her sentence was interrupted by wild disjointed phrases.

"Heaven has sent you. Bless me—my husband—bless me—and forgive me before I die. Let me feel your hand in mine—your kiss upon my cheek. Oh, Heaven! the crime—the crime—it was red—all red. Look at the boy! He is not stained—but pure as the free air—nearly twenty years—twenty years since that awful day. Husband—good-bye! God bless you!"

She fell forward with a sharp cry, as Raymond caught her in his arms. The frail form stiffened, and the horrible struggle of death took place. Charlotte hid her face, while Nurse Evelyn moved hastily between them.

"It is over," she whispered, when Raymond staggered back.

"Are you ill, Raymond?" Charlotte asked, leading him away. "Is anything the matter? She might almost have been your wife, you look so white and faint!"



Charlotte hid her face.

He gazed at her a moment, while great drops of perspiration stood out on his brow. Then he grasped her arm in a frenzy of uncontrollable emotion.

"Charlotte!" he cried, in a voice that froze her. "You have spoken truly. God knows how, but that woman was my wife!"

CHAPTER XI.

The tragic life in 149 had ended, yet its latter history was revealed that same evening in the promised letter from Mrs. Donnington-Bain.

Charlotte read it with aching eyes—Charlotte who had no real right to the name of Peel. It was a heartless epistle from a heartless woman.

Dear Raymond,—You might have avoided the shame and disgrace of a surprising revelation had you accepted my terms and not flouted my warning. Now you have only yourself to thank for the knowledge. The startling fact you force from me is that my sister—your wife—still lives! You believed she met a felon's death when you fled to the wilds of Africa. You had not the courage to wait or you would have heard of her reprieve. While you cast off the burden she dragged out her weary twenty years in prison. However, I still give you a chance of keeping this secret from your Charlotte, but you must pay for it. Double the allowance you have been making me, or she and the whole world shall know the truth! Do you now realise you are in the clutch of Augusta Donnington-Bain?

How little she knew that her plot was foiled, and powerless to destroy.

* * * * * *

Once more Charlotte and Raymond knelt before the altar, and when they returned to England her name was really Charlotte Peel.

The End.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's
CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST OVER 2,000 New and Second-hand. Easy Terms—From 10s. per month. Lists (100 pages) and Testimonials post free. British Cycle Manufacturing Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." Tobacconists' Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. Myers.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

NERVINE

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

HAIR DESTROYED.

◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, OR NO CHARGE MADE. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address

Mrs. E. GOULD,
129, New Kent Road,
London, S.E.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full particulars of a Remedy, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street,
Liverpool.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING.

permanently cured. A pamphlet giving sound practical advice, and full particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. W. Holt, (Rooms O), Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

DOES YOUR COMPLEXION SATISFY YOU?
IF NOT, USE

GIBSON'S TONIC FERROUS ARSENICAL PILLS,

which quickly remove Pimples, Blackheads, Blotches, and all Eruptions arising from Impure Blood. Quickest known cure for Anæmia and its distressing symptoms (Headache, Neuralgia, etc.). Strongly recommended to delicate young people of both sexes. Sugar coated, pleasant to take. 1s. 6d. box, post free.—Gibson, Chemist, Reading.

ONE BOX
OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's
Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
Balham Hill, London, S.W.
Beware of injurious imitations.

MADAME FRAIN'S
FAMOUS
FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

TOWLE'S PILLS

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

NOSE

A Radical Permanent Cure Medically approved for Red Noses, 3s. 9d. post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1s. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp. Lees Ray, Specialist, Wavertree, L'pool.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

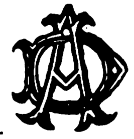
Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

RUBBER STAMPS
Free by Post.
AGENTS WANTED.
Liberal commissions.

Your Monogram, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.



S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

ATOMS AND ORGANISMS.

Mr. Kingdon Clifford, the brilliant young scientist whose death at Madeira several years ago was properly regarded as a loss to the circle of original investigators, affirmed that atoms flew about in the air of an ordinary room at the exact rate of seventeen miles per minute. How he could know that fact no other scientist has ever pretended to understand, as an atom is defined to be a particle of matter so small as to be beyond recognition by the senses. Yet isn't the custom of explaining the existence of certain diseases by attributing them to the action of "micro-organisms" almost as far-fetched? Take a simple illustration:

In October, 1891, Mr. James Miles, of Brown's Lane, Bright Waltham, Wantage, Berks, had a severe attack of influenza which left him very feeble and languid. He had a foul taste in the mouth, and his tongue and teeth were so coated with a slimy phlegm that he says he could scarcely get his lips apart. In a little time his skin turned a deep yellow, the whites of his eyes being tinged with the same colour. His appetite was very poor, and after every morsel he ate he suffered intense pain at the chest and around the waist. "On occasions," says Mr. Miles, "this pain amounted to agony; what I endured because of it is beyond my power to describe. It continued for hours."

This, of course, was the result of a nervous reaction from some deep-lying cause. But what was the cause? Was it a sequence of influenza, or something very different? Let us hear him a little further.

"I was much troubled with flatulency," he continues, "and my heart fluttered and throbbed until I became alarmed."

Certainly this cardiac disturbance could not have been set up by any "micro-organisms," as every physiologist knows. The stomach, expanded by gas, pressed against the heart and disordered its action. This was a purely mechanical trouble—but whence arose the gas? it is not, surely, a symptom of influenza.

"I got little sleep day or night," says Mr. Miles, "and was so restless that I tossed about the bed all night long. Cold clammy sweats broke out all over me, and I trembled and shook from head to foot. I had a harassing cough, and spat up quantities of thick phlegm, and my breathing was short and hurried."

This looked like asthma; in fact, the presence of consumption was inferred from it by some observers. Yet the outcome of the case discredited this view.

"I rapidly lost flesh," he writes, "and became so weak that I was unable to speak aloud, and so nervous that I could not bear to be spoken to. Gradually I sank lower and lower until my breathing became so difficult that for three weeks I sat before the fire night and day, powerless to move. When at last they got me to bed I remained there propped up with pillows. The doctor allowed me to take liquid food only, saying my heart was diseased and I must be careful.

"I got as weak as it is possible for a man to be and live. Many times I thought I must die."

When we consider his excessively debilitated condition, the last paragraph of Mr. Miles's letter becomes of public interest and importance. Here it is, word for word:

"In this state I continued until Easter of 1892, when a friend brought me a bottle of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. After I had taken this medicine for a week I felt great relief. I could eat, and my food gave me strength. I kept on taking it and got stronger daily. When I had used two bottles I was well and strong as ever in my life, and have been so ever since. This remedy saved my life, and I wish others to know it. I therefore not only consent to the publication of this statement, but will gladly answer inquiries. (Signed) James Miles."

Mr. Miles is a man well known and thoroughly respected in his district, and the facts as he gives them are supported by Mr. William Jordan, Postmaster at Bright Waltham, and by many others.

But a word of comment is called for. The influenza is, no doubt, primarily caused by impurity of the blood, and developed by exposure acting upon pre-existing weakness; and both the weakness and the blood poison are caused by indigestion and dyspepsia, the only disease from which our friend suffered—influenza being an incident and symptom.

Thus we see that to fathom most diseases it is not necessary to trouble our heads about invisible forces in the atmosphere, as the seeds germinate in the stomach—not in the air. To remember this fact and act upon it will prove a matter of public and personal good sense. To guard against influenza keep the digestion in order and the body well nourished. Prevent indigestion by using Mother Seigel's Syrup on the first sign of its approach.

GOLDEN STAR. . . . . }
THE QUEEN OF NIGHT } TWO GRAND NEW SERIALS JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 350. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 14TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A GEOGRAPHICAL VIEW OF ✠ ✠ A GLOBE-ULAR ANTIDOTE.

BEECHAM'S PILLS always BRIGHTON you up like a summer's BATH.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will lift you from the SLOUGH of despondency.
BEECHAM'S PILLS make a bright EYE and a BLYTHE step.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make you WARE like an IRON BRIDGE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are good travelling companions wherever you may ROME.
BEECHAM'S PILLS bring a NICE complexion; take one during your IDLE moments.
BEECHAM'S PILLS should accompany FLORENCE and VICTORIA on their summer TOURS.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are known from TASMANIA to SPITZBERGEN.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have been over ANDOVER again admitted to be worth a NEW GUINEA a box.
BEECHAM'S PILLS should accompany every ship's CREWE, in case illness "springs a LEEK" on them.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make your constitution as hard as FLINT or STONE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS find a NEW-MARKET and a NEW-PORT daily; their SALE is immense.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are decidedly calculated to bring a DEAL of benefit to you.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are grand nerve reposers when you cannot SETTLE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are likely to exist as long as STONEHENGE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have no BOURN, no limit, as to their effectiveness.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have invariably the power to take all the MOLD off you.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will make your spirits light as AYR and buoyant as a CORK.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly take all the WALES and cries out of SYDNEY and ADELAIDE.
BEECHAM'S PILLS annual Sale of Six Million Boxes yearly surely LEEDS the way.
BEECHAM'S PILLS when you have ETON too free, or imbibed too DIEPPE, will right you at once.
BEECHAM'S PILLS truthfully MALAY claim to saving thousands of lives yearly.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are the best present for SUEZ handsome BOW when he is indisposed.
BEECHAM'S PILLS preserve you from the MENAI STRAITS a neglected system is subject to.
BEECHAM'S PILLS glide DOWN as pleasantly as a LONDON oyster.
BEECHAM'S PILLS never fail to cool the system when you BERNE with HITCHIN sensations.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will suit either MISSIS-SIPPI or MISS-OURI at home or travelling.
BEECHAM'S PILLS are PACIFIC in their action; once tried you never TYRE of them.
BEECHAM'S PILLS will benefit either an ASIA MINOR or an adult AMAZON.
BEECHAM'S PILLS have the power of bringing you to a NEW-HAVEN of health.

Google

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's

EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF - GUINEA COSTUMES

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, at less than Half Ordinary Prices.

Over 1,000 Well-Paid Workers employed in John Noble's own Factories, under the strictest conditions of Sanitation and cleanliness.

Highest Diploma & Gold Medal Awarded British & Colonial Industrial Exhibition.

These Costumes are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge (the same quality worn by Miss Böcker at the time of her rescue from the disastrous Wreck of the "Elbe," and sold at 7/6 the Dress Length). They are trimmed bold silk cord, and supplied complete for the ridiculous price of 10/6 each, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Ordinary stock sizes fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms; larger sizes 1/6 extra.

10/6

The JOHN NOBLE MODEL COSTUMES have secured beyond a doubt

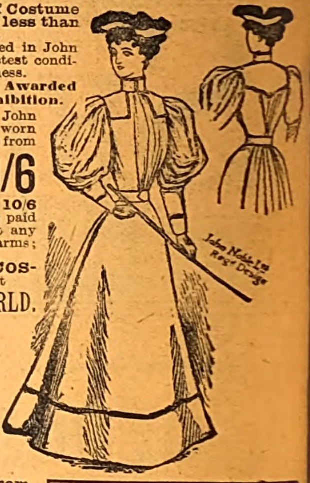
THE ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD.

They are far and away ahead of all other Costumes on the market for style, cut, make, finish and quality; the skirts are wider and the sleeves fuller than in the slop-made "skimpy" looking garments generally sold at low prices and often produced by ill-paid workers in the lowest sweating dens, therefore ladies can with confidence place their orders with John Noble Ltd., The Warehouse, Manchester.



KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at the following low prices: From 1/6 each.

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	ea.

Lengths	36	39	42	45	ins.
Prices	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6	ea.

Postage 4½d. extra.

NOBLE'S NOVELTIES
IN DRESS FABRICS.
From 4½d. to 4/6 per yard.

Large Box containing over 1,000 Patters post free on approval.

Every purchaser delighted. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: The above garment can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Tan, Grey, or Drab.

"THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," also PATTERNS and FASHION SHEETS of up-to-date Costumes, Blouses, Mantles, etc., sent Post Free on application.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS, which are always inferior, and remember that John Noble Ltd. have no agents, no travellers, or branch shops, and the genuine goods can only be obtained direct from their Manchester establishments.

Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., The Warehouse, MANCHESTER.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay.
Saves Extraction.
Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

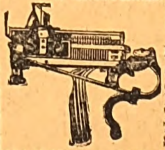
A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER



KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

ONE BOX
OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's
Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
5, DENMAN STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, S.E.

Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED

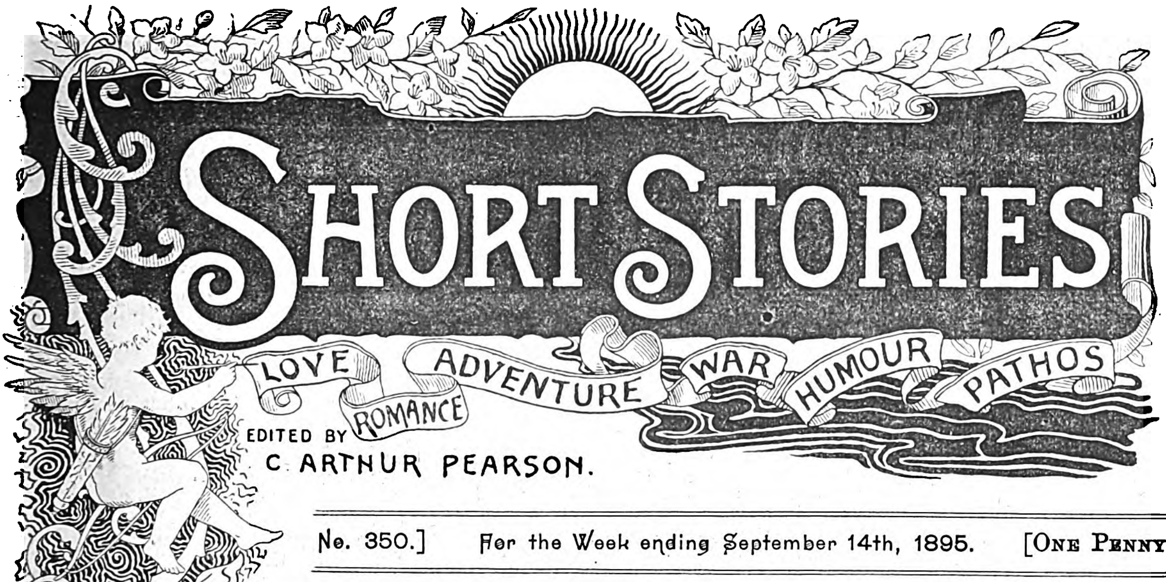
permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. HOWELL, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.



SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 350.] For the Week ending September 14th, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

Merely Coincidence.

THE STORY OF A WITHHELD RUPEE.

I.

"PROTECTOR of the poor, from your wealth, which is boundless, look upon your servant with pity."

"You unmitigated old scarecrow, what do mean by coming to the door of my tent, and doing your abominable gymnastic tricks to offend my eyes? Be off! Do you understand? We give nothing to such as you, you hoary old heathen scamp."

"Of your pity, have pity, sahibs, give a very little unto your servant for his daily needs."

"Take yourself off, old pig, and son of fifty thousand pigs. Comprehendest thou what I say? Pollute no longer the sight of my eyes by thy most hideous presence; it is unto my blood as rennet unto the milk of thy most sacred cow. Be off! I have not the smallest intention of bestowing a single anna upon you, or allowing one of these sahibs to do so, though thou stayest a century of years entreating before me."

Seven Englishmen were sitting in the door of a spacious tent, which had that day been pitched for them in a clearing of the jungle; a hanging lamp swung behind them, and on the table were cigar boxes, decanters of wine, and glasses.

They had dined comfortably, and an excellent day's sport had been the topic of their conversation, until out of the gloom of the fast gathering night had crept the gaunt figure of this fakir, who had squatted himself down before them, and interrupted everything by his monotonous appeal for alms.

Apparently, the old fellow spoke English with a certain facility from the fluency with which he begged, yet he seemed not to comprehend that his demand was rejected, or his person vituperated, as he calmly turned his wrinkled old face with placid composure from one man to another, and went on in a gentle, persuasive monotone with his appeal:

"Protectors of the poor." He held out a little dirty wooden bowl, and seemed to watch for a look of relenting in the eye of anyone. "Look upon your servant, protectors of the poor."

He caught the eye of a fair-haired, sunburnt English lad this time, and made a little involuntary movement forward, as of hope realised, and extended his bowl.

The boy drew back, all the more ashamed of himself because he knew that he had contemplated the venerable beggar with sympathy for the space of one second, and he hated the idea that the other men should consider him soft.

"I have looked at you till I'm sorry for myself," said the boy mockingly. "Where do you hail from? What do you want with the 'oof-bird? There ain't no shops nor shows out here in the wilderness. I never was any good at the collecting-bag game, my old friend. Try Bailey, now; he's a soft-hearted chap."

Two or three of the men laughed in a comfortable and subdued way, as if they might find some humour in this observation if they could so far trouble themselves as to be amused; and the old fanatic listened to their mirth and watched their faces with interested, eager eyes, and crouched a little closer up to them, squatting on his heels.

A man blew rings out from the smoke of his cigarette, and watched them melt into the motionless air. Another refilled a pipe and struck a match, which blazed up, and burnt out on the grass where he threw it, while his wicker chair creaked uneasily as he crossed and recrossed his legs, and there was the bubbling sound of a man drawing deeply at a pipe which was a trifle foul, and but for such sounds an absolute stillness reigned, while, nothing daunted, the man of mystery sat on.

All rights reserved.]

He was a very venerable old fellow, unusually tall of stature, with thin limbs of the hue of well-polished ancient oak, and his small tufts of snowy hair and the white garment twisted around his body were the most conspicuous objects about him against the background of the night. He was irritatingly patient, and once again he varied his silent persistence by a softly murmured monosyllable of entreaty. The situation became embarrassing.

"Well, you're a pretty object, aren't you?" spoke the boy again, turning round upon his elbow on the arm of his great wicker chair to address the ancient man.

"I wonder, now, if your mother knows you're out so late? What's her candid opinion of you, hey? Can't you do any tricks for the money, then? Turn yourself into a mango tree, or some such trifle, and we might entertain your application, you know. Stand on your head, then, merely for argument's sake, to prove that you're genuine, and the wealth of my waistcoat pocket shall instantly be yours."

The young fellow put a thumb and finger into his watch-pocket, and held up a coin. For a moment the old fakir mistook him. He drew out a long dark arm quickly towards the money, and they saw the whites of his eyes as he raised them to the foolish boy's face.

"No, no, not by any means so cheap! We must have a trick first. You chaps are such swells at these things. Merely tie yourself into a knot for my pleasure, and the bawbee shall be yours."

"Don't take notice of him, Durward. If you chaff him, we shall have the filthy old beast prowling round here all the night. You've no idea what a nuisance these begging fakir chaps can make of themselves among the servants. The men live in awe of them, and they'll lay hands on anything for the sake of satisfying them. A chap like that has no personal property, you know, but he makes a thundering good thing out of begging. Be off, now! Depart, thou hoary impostor, from the door of the tent of the Englishman, whose charity begins and ends at home! And, mark thou my words, let me not hear of thee as interfering with one among the least of all my servants while the camp is here, or I will see thy face again, and the form of my visage then thou shalt never forget."

The old visitor had listened with mild-eyed interest; but he comprehended now full well. And, at length, he rose slowly, drawing out his long, snake-like limbs, until he stood before them at his full and extraordinary height, a venerable and gaunt object, scarcely human at all.

"Out of pity for yourselves, sahibs have pity, for thy servant serveth no master but one," he said, speaking still in his insinuating monotone, and holding his little alms-bowl again before each man.

One and all the seven Englishmen went on smoking, or reading, or dozing, and took no notice of him.

He waited; slowly eyeing them, his inexhaustible patience seeming to linger with a sort of pity for them over this, their last, opportunity. Then, suddenly, the dirty little alms-bowl seemed somehow to vanish from the extended hand of the old man, and he raised his bare, long arm:

"The curse of Salii Lal Pal shall rest upon the head of every man in the door of this tent," said he slowly, in the same monotonous, yet incisive voice.

"To-night has the All-Merciful sent here to you his servant, and you bid him go from you with empty hands." He extended the shrivelled palms, and exhibited their bareness; and then, with a finger of his right hand, he counted the Englishmen.

"One, two, three, four, five, six, seven; the number of Judgment. Hear me now, sahibs, lords of this earth. Again in three years—three, the number of Fate—will I cross the paths that ye walk, and I will make inquiry for ye, and men shall tell me that from every one of ye Death hath taken what ye would not give to-night. It is the curse of Salii Lal Pal, the servant of the All-Merciful. He has spoken by His servant. His word goeth not back."

Before the Englishmen seemed to have finished hearing him the mysterious old man had vanished into the night.

"That's beastly grim and nasty on the part of the old gentleman," said the boy who had chaffed him, examining his pipe uneasily; "why didn't you let me shut his mouth up with a rupee, Colonel?"

"I hate to hear one of those old bags of mystery say a thing like that, myself," observed the man they called Bailey, very thoughtfully; "one hears stories so often from fellows about warnings like that coming true, somehow. They are not comfortable hearing; confound the old ghoul."

"What idiots you men are to take notice of such tomfoolery! If one of you now were to whistle the recall, the old buffoon would come out of his hiding and take an anna from Tommy, there, who was the prime offender, and who'll go first assuredly, when the curse begins to work. Tommy, he'd assure you a thousand years of life, even now, I'm convinced, for the consideration of double fees, only I'll not have the old hound brought back to add to your natural years one half-hour. Come, won't some of you men make up a rubber? That old ghoul isn't going to begin his work of destruction by spoiling our evening, I presume. Bailey, you ought to be seeing if Chuder has got Wilson's tiger skinned yet. The chap's morally convinced that the beast's ears are his lawful spoil, if there isn't someone to look after him."

II.

"Looks as if that old ghoul meant his evil words to come true," said Durward next day, when they carried into camp Wilson mortally injured in a gun accident. "Poor old Wilson, it's rough on him that he should have first turn."

And the party that returned to Burrapur went back only six men strong, not counting the servants who bore between them a melancholy something which once had been a living, hoping, pleasure-loving man.

For a while society in Burrapur was shadowed by the gloom of that mournful return, and everyone spoke nicely and feelingly concerning Wilson. Then the gay season of the place came on, and boiling seething water cannot retain on its surface the ripples of a splash, however big.

"Poor Wilson" ceased to be a topic of conversation, and if the dead man could have learned from the weird fakir that secret so profoundly hid of "how to come back and be forgiven," he might have found that the balance of pardons lay all on the wrong side, which he doubtless would have overlooked, having been a man who understood his world.

They play polo a great deal at Burrapur during the cool weather, and that season two very serious mishaps took place upon the polo ground.

One man was killed on the spot, and another received a blow in a vital part, which, however, for the sake of everyone he made light of at the time.

He got invalided on account of it, by-and-bye, and went home to England, from whence, later on, came news of his death.

"I tell you, Barbour, I feel like a doomed man," said Tommy Durward, when reading his newspaper; "both those poor chaps were with us up in the camp, and heard the curse of that old fool. Look at that accident to Wilson, too! How he lay on the little camp-bed and watched us, and knew it was all up. Goodness knows now whose turn's got to come next."

"Hum—goodness knows, and goodness don't need to be helped out in its nasty tricks upon humanity by a dirty old heathen fakir."

"Don't talk that way, Barbour. I wish you wouldn't. I call it an uncommon awful thing to have to die——"

"You've got to, my dear chap."

"So've you, old boy; but not within three years, please God—that's a bit too soon for you or me," and Thomas Durward, Esq., of Her Majesty's Native Cavalry, looked desperately seriously out of his very blue eyes, and thought of a certain girl he knew. Perhaps he may have recalled the confident words of Barbour, and his round, jolly face, when the troop-ship carrying him home to England next spring struck in a fog upon the treacherous Portuguese coast, and, giving very little time for thought to anyone, settled down among the relentless breakers with nearly every hand on board.

"There's only three of us left now," said ungrammatic Tommy ruefully to the girl of his heart, recounting to her the story of the fakir's grim prophecy on the day when the news of the loss of the Caspian and Barbour's death reached Burrapur.

"I decline positively to be your widow, Tommy. You must live long enough to attend my funeral, and be my mourner, or I'll never, never have you, you silly boy," the girl protested, though Durward's story had started an uneasy sensation at her heart.

"Darling," Tom said, in a voice which signified everything, even to undertaking to fulfil these last offices for her, when the needful time arrived.

"You don't really believe it, Tommy? Not really? It's merely coincidence. You only tell me to tease me?"

"I don't believe anything ever, my Lilla, except that I love you, and can't live without you. I couldn't die ever, Lilla, if you were by, I think." Such very foolish young people were these.

It is needless to tell by what means the lives of old Colonel Howard or of the other surviving men were ended. Suffice it to say, that within the time limited by the fakir, there was promotion into their shoes for juniors of the regiment.

Meantime, the infatuated Tommy Durward was married, and apparently lost account of time.

It was only on the last night of the fatal three years that the recollection of the grim curse, which still might be said to hang over him, recurred to his mind.

He was at his club in Burrapur, and had to ride out half a mile or so to his bungalow and his wife.

"Good Heavens!" thought the young fellow, in an agonised way, as he suddenly noticed the date; "if there's any truth in that old heathen's prophecy, it'll come true to-night, and there's little Lilla at home."

"I'm going to ride a bit of the way out with you," said a friend to him, when he was mounting at the club-house door. "The air of the hills out your way'll be cool, perhaps, after the heat of a day like to-day."

"I'll be very glad of your company," Tommy said, and they trotted together out of the town and along the broad track of the moonlit road towards the hills in the direction of Durward's place.

The light was very clear and silver-like, and their horses were made a trifle nervous by the blackness of the shadows that were cast upon the road.

"Steady, there!" cried the man riding with Durward, for his animal had reared right upon its haunches till it almost lost its balance and fell back. It righted itself, however, and stood trembling and snorting with fear.

"What was it?" asked the man, appealing to his companion, as he thought the scuffling of horses' feet he had heard had been only those of his own mare. He looked, and Tommy Durward and his mount had disappeared. Then he urged his own terrified animal up the road; perhaps two hundred yards or more an unaccountable dark patch lay out in the midst of a flood of moonlight.

"Tommy—Tommy Durward, is that you?" He stopped, bent over and listened, and then dismounted in haste.

The curious thing about it was that Durward never felt any sensation of pain. He was acutely alive to all that went on around him, though his spine was dislocated, and his body paralysed.

"Gone, yes—over that way. It's no use going after him. He came to tell me the time was up. I'd had the longest of them all. Your mare was frightened, too. I knew what it meant when I saw him by the road-side. To-day was the last of those three years—and this is the end. Could you go and tell Lilla? It's not far from here. Don't frighten her; say it's only a little accident at first. But if she'd come here to me I might have a little longer time than if you tried to move me to her. No, I don't mind being left—only be quick. Once I told her I couldn't die if she were with me."

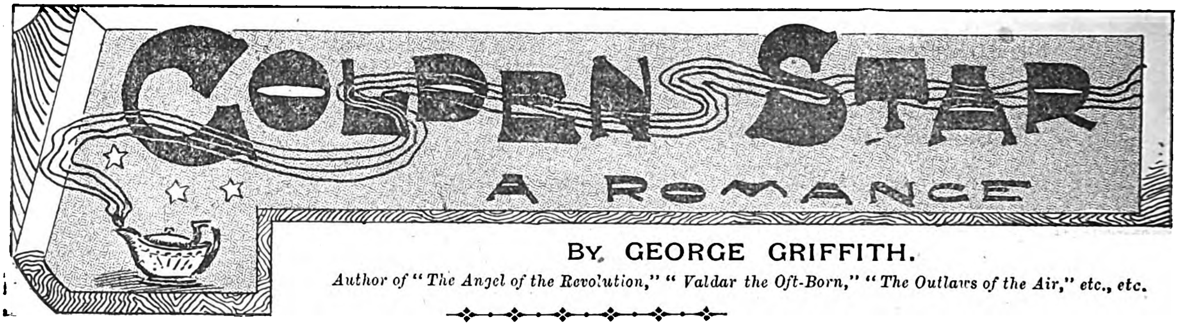
The man touched Durward's hand, and then was gone, and in less than a quarter of an hour came hastening back in company with a little, terror-stricken woman, with a shawl cast over her pretty evening dress.

When the little woman knelt down by Durward in the moonlight, very brave in her determination to control herself, she was his widow.

* * * * *

Thus did the fakir's curse come true, although there are people who tell us that such things are merely coincidence.

Gertrude M. Hayward.



GOLDEN STAR

A ROMANCE

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

SUMMARY OF THE PROLOGUE.

The prologue tells of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, in the Sanctuary of the Sun in Cuzco, on the eve of the Spanish invasion and the fall of the Inca empire. It has been prophesied that when the sceptre of the Incas shall be grasped by the hand of one who has been dead, and is alive again, the ancient glories of their empire shall be restored. Golden Star, one of the sacred Virgins of the Sun, kneels at the foot of the altar and offers herself as the bride of him who will fulfil the prophecy. Vilcaroya swears for love of her to dare the ordeal. On the night of their bridal they are carried away to their secret resting place, and at the same time immense treasures are taken out of Cuzco and hidden against the time of their awakening.

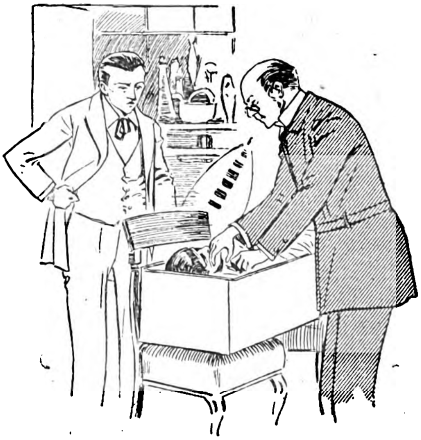
BOOK I.

FROM THE PAST TO THE PRESENT.

CHAPTER I.

His Highness the Mummy.

"Ah, what a thing it would be for us if his Inca Highness were really only asleep, as he looks to be. Just think what he could tell us—how easily he could re-create that lost wonderland of his for us, what riddles he could answer, what lies he could contradict. And then think of all the lost treasures that he could show us the way to. Upon my word, if Mephistopheles were to walk into this room just now I think I should be tempted to make a bargain with him. Do you know, Djama, I believe I would give half the remainder of my own life, whatever that may be, to learn the secrets that were once locked up in that withered, desiccated brain of his."



They were standing over a long packing-case.

The speaker was one of two men who were standing in a large room, half study half museum, in a big old-fashioned house in Maida Vale. Wherever the science of archæology was studied, Professor Martin Lamson was known as the highest living authority on the subject of the antiquities of South America. He had just returned from a year's relic hunting in Peru and Bolivia, and was enjoying the luxury of unpacking his treasures with the almost boyish delight that under such circumstances comes only to the true enthusiast. His companion was a somewhat slenderly built man, of medium height, whose clear, olive skin, straight black hair, and deep blue-black eyes betrayed a not very remote Eastern origin.

Dr. Laurens Djama was a physiologist, whose rapidly acquired fame—he was barely thirty-two—would have been considered sounder by his professional brethren if he had not been, as they thought, tarnished by excursions into bye-ways of science, which were believed to lead him perilously near to the borders of occultism. Five years before he had pulled the Professor through a very bad attack of the calentura in Panama, where they met by the merest traveller's chance, and since then they been fast friends.

They were standing over a long packing-case, some seven feet in length and two and a half in breadth, in which lay, at full length, wrapped in graveclothes that had once been gaily coloured, which were now faded and grey with the grave dust, the figure of a man with hands crossed over the breast, dead to all appearances, and yet so gruesomely lifelike, that it seemed hard to believe that the broad, muscular chest over which the crossed hands lay was not actually heaving and falling with the breath of life.

The face had been uncovered. It was that of a man still in the early prime of life. The dull brown hair was long and thick, the features somewhat aquiline, the cheek-bones rather prominent, the skin of a pale bronze, though darkened by the hues of death. Yet every detail of the face was so perfect and so life-like that, as the Professor had said, it seemed to be rather the face of a man in a deep sleep than that of an Inca prince, who must have been dead and buried for over three hundred years. The closed eyes, though somewhat sunken in their sockets, were the eyes of sleep rather than of death, and the lids seemed to lie so lightly over them that it looked as though one awakening touch would raise them.

"It is beyond all question the most perfect specimen of a mummy that I have seen," said the Doctor, stooping down and drawing his thin nervous fingers very lightly over the dried skin of the right cheek. "On my honour I really can't believe that His Highness, as you call him, ever really went to the other world by any of the orthodox routes. If you could imagine an absolute suspension of all the vital functions induced by the influence of something, some drug or hypnotic process unknown to modern science, brought into action on a human being in the very prime of his vital strength, then, so far as I can see, the results of that influence would be exactly what you see here."

"But surely that can't be anything but a dream. How would it be possible to bring all the vital functions to a dead stop like that, and yet keep them in such a state that it might be possible—for that's what I suppose you are driving at—to start them into activity again just as one might wind up a clock that had been stopped for a few weeks and set it going once more."

"My dear fellow, the borderland between life and death is so utterly unknown to the very best of us that there is no telling what frightful possibilities there may be lying hidden under the shadows that are over it. You know as well as I do that there are perfectly well-authenticated instances on record of Hindoo Fakirs who have allowed themselves to be placed in a state of suspended animation and had their tongues turned back into their throats, their mouths and noses covered with clay, and have then been buried in graves that have been filled up and had sentries watching day and night over them for as long a period as six weeks, and then have been dug up and restored to perfect health and strength again in a few hours. Now, if life can be suspended for six weeks and then restored to an organism which, from all physiological standpoints, must be regarded as inanimate, why not for six years or six hundred years, for the matter of that? Given once the possibility, which we may assume as proved, of a restoration to life after total suspension of animation, then it only becomes a question of preservation of tissue for more or less indefinite periods. Granted the tissue can so be preserved, then, given the other possibility already proved, and—well, we will talk about the other possibility afterwards. Now, tell me, don't you, as an archæologist, see anything peculiar about this Inca prince of yours?"

The Professor had been looking keenly at his friend during the delivery of this curious physiological lecture. He seemed as though he were trying to read the thoughts that were chasing each other through his brain behind the impenetrable mask of that smooth, broad forehead of his. He looked into his eyes, but saw nothing there save a cold, steady light that he had often seen before when the Doctor was discussing subjects that interested him deeply. As for his face, it was utterly impassive, the face of a dispassionate scientist quietly discussing the possible solution of a problem that had been laid before him. Whether his friend was really driving at some unheard of and unearthly solution of the problem which he himself had raised, or whether he was merely discussing the possible issue of some abstract question in physiology he was utterly unable to discover, and so he thought it best to confine himself to the matter in hand without hazarding any risky guesses that might possibly result in his own confusion. So he answered as quietly as he could:

"Yes, I must confess that there are two perhaps very important points of difference between this and any other Peruvian mummy that I have ever seen or heard of."

"Ah, I thought so," said Djama, half closing his eyes and allowing just the ghost of a smile to flit across his lips. "I thought I knew enough about archæology and the science of mummies in general to expect you to say that. Now, just for the gratification of my own vanity, I should like to try and anticipate what you are going to say, and if I'm wrong, well, of course, I shall only be too happy to be contradicted."

"Very well," laughed the Professor; "say on."

"Well, in the first place I believe I'm right in saying that all Peruvian mummies that have so far been discovered have been found in a sitting posture, with the legs drawn close up to the body by means of bindings and burial clothes so that the chin rested between the knees, while the arms were brought round the legs and folded over them. Then, again, these mummies have always been found in an upright position while you found this one lying down."

"Quite so, quite so," said the Professor. "In fact, I may say that no one save myself has ever discovered such a mummy as this among all the thousands that have been taken out of Peruvian burying-places. And, now, what is your other point?"

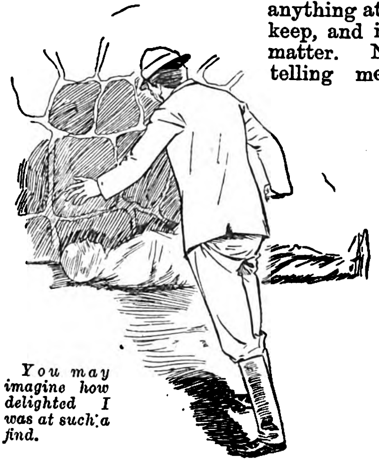
"Simply this," said Djama, kneeling down beside the case, and laying his hands over the abdomen of the recumbent figure. "In the case of all mummies, whether Egyptian or Peruvian, it was the invariable practice of the embalmers to take out the intestines and fill the abdominal cavity with preservative herbs and spices. Now, this has not been done in this case. Look here."

And deftly and swiftly he removed the dusty, half-decayed coverings from the body of the mummy while the Professor looked on half-wondering and half-frightened for the safety of his treasure.

"That has not been done here. You see the man's body is as perfect as it was on the day he died, to use a conventional term. Now, am I not right?"

"Yes, yes; perfectly right," answered the Professor, who felt himself fast losing his grip of the conversation which had taken so strange a turn. "But what has all this got to do with the most unique mummy that ever was brought from South America? Surely, in the name of all that's sacred, you don't mean——"

"My dear fellow, never mind what I mean for the present," replied Djama with another of his half smiles. "If I mean anything at all, the meaning will keep, and if I don't it doesn't matter. Now, do you mind telling me exactly how and where you came across this extraordinary specimen of, well, for want of a better term, we will say Inca embalming?"



You may imagine how delighted I was at such a find.

"Yes, willingly," said the Professor, glad to get back again on to the familiar ground of his own experiences. "I found it almost by accident in a little valley about four days' ride to the westward of Cuzco. I was on my way to Abancay across the Apurimac. My mule had fallen lame, and so I got belated. Night came on, and somehow we got off the track crossing one of the Punas—those elevated tablelands, you know, up among the mountains—and when the mule could go no farther we camped, and the next morning I found myself in an almost circular valley completely walled in by enormous mountains, save for the narrow, crooked gorge through which we had stumbled by the purest accident. The bottom of this gorge was filled by a little lake, and while I was exploring the shores of this I saw hidden underneath an overhanging ledge of rock a couple of courses of that wonderful mortarless masonry which the Incas alone seemed to know how to build. I had no sooner seen it than all desire of getting to Abancay or anywhere else had left me. I made my arriero turn the animals loose for the day, and then I sent him back to a village we had passed through the day before to buy more provisions and bring them to me.

"As soon as he had got out of sight I set to work to get some of the stones out and see what there was behind them. I knew there must be something, for the Incas never wasted labour. It was hard work, for the stones were fitted together as perfectly as the pieces of a Chinese puzzle; but at last I got one out and then the rest was easy. Behind the stones I found a little chamber hollowed out of the rock, perfectly clean and dry, and on the floor of this I found, without any other covering than what you see there, the mummy of his Highness lying on what had once been a bed of soft Vicuña skins, as perfect and as lifelike as though he had only crept in there twelve hours before and had laid down for a good night's rest.

"You may imagine how delighted I was at such a find. I hardly knew how to contain myself until my man came back. I put the stones back into their places as well as I could, and when José returned the next day I had the animals saddled up, and started off instantly back to Cuzco. There I had this case made, bought two extra mules, came back to the valley, packed up my mummy, took it back to Cuzco, and from there to the railway terminus at Sicuani and took it down by train to Arequipa, where I left it in safe keeping until I had finished the rest of my exploration. Then I went back, took it down to Mollendo, got it on board the steamer, and here it is."

"And you didn't find any traces of other treasure-places, I suppose, in the valley," said Djama, who had listened with the most perfect attention to the Professor's story.

"No, I didn't, though I must confess that one side of the cave in which I found this was walled up with the same kind of masonry as there was in front of it; but, to tell you the truth, the Peruvian Government has such insane ideas about treasure-hunting, and the life of a man who is believed to have discovered anything worth having is worth so little in the wilder districts of the interior, that I was afraid of losing the treasure that I had got, perhaps for the sake of a few gold ornaments that might have been dug out of the hill, that I decided to be content with what I'd found."

"H'm," said the Doctor. "Well, you may have been wise under the circumstances; I dare say you were. But we can see about that afterwards. Meanwhile there is something else to be talked about."

He stopped suddenly, took a quick turn or two up and down the room, with his hands clasped behind him and his eyes fixed on the floor. Then he went to the door, opened it, looked out, shut it and locked it, and then came back again and sat down without a word in his chair, staring steadily at the impassive face of the mummy in the packing-case.

CHAPTER II.

A PHYSIOLOGICAL EXPERIMENT.

"WHY, what's the matter, Doctor?" said the Professor, a trifle sharply. "You don't suppose I am afraid of anyone coming to steal my treasure, do you?"

"My dear fellow," said Djama, looking him straight in the eyes, and speaking very slowly, as though his mind was doing something else besides shaping the thoughts to which he was giving utterance, "I don't for a moment suppose that there are thieves about, or that if there were any burglar with a competent knowledge of his profession would think of stealing your mummy, priceless as it may prove to be. I locked the door because I don't want to be interrupted. I want to talk to you about a very important matter."

"And that is?"

"Mephistopheles."

"What?"

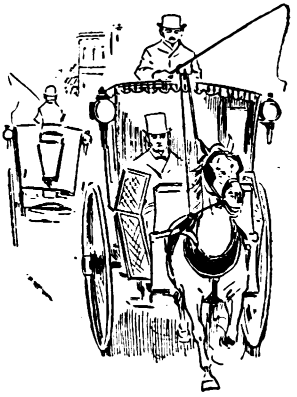
"Gently, my friend, gently, don't get excited yet. You will want all your nerves soon, I can assure you. Yes, I am quite serious. You know that in the good old days when people still believed in His Majesty of Darkness, such a speech as the one you remember making a short time ago was quite enough to call up one of his agents armed with full powers to make contracts and do all necessary business."

"Look here, Laurens, if you go on talking like that, I shall begin to think you have gone out of your mind."

"My dear fellow, to be quite candid with you, I don't care two pins what you think on that subject. I have been called mad too many times for that. Now, suppose, just for argument's sake, that I were Mephistopheles, and staked my diabolic reputation on the statement that in that thing you possess a possible key to those lost treasures of the Incas which ten generations of men have hunted for in vain, what kind of a bargain would you be inclined to make with me on the strength of it? Half the rest of your life, I think you said, and as that wouldn't be very much good to me, suppose we say the half of any treasures we may discover by the help of our silent friend there? Eh—will that suit you?"

"Are you really serious, Djama, or are you only dreaming another of these wild scientific dreams of yours?" exclaimed the Professor, taking a couple of quick strides towards him. "What connection can there possibly be between a mummy, some three hundred years old, and the lost treasures of the Incas?"

"This man was an Inca, wasn't he?" said the Doctor, abruptly, "and one of high rank, too, from what you have said. He lived just about the time of the Conquest, didn't he—the time when the priests stripped their temples, and the nobles emptied their palaces of their treasures to save them from the Spaniards. Is it not likely that he would know where, at any rate, a great part of them was buried? Nay, may he not even have known the localities of the lost mines that the Incas got their hundredweights of gold from, and of the emerald mines which no one has ever been able to find? Why, Lamson, if these dead lips could speak, I believe they could make you and me millionaires in an hour; and why shouldn't they speak?"



In a hansom and on his way to Kilburn.

"Don't talk like that, Djama, for Heaven's sake. It is too serious a thing to joke about," said the Professor, with a half-frightened glance in his set and shining eyes. "I should have thought you, of all men, knew enough of the facts of life and death not to talk such nonsense as that."

"Nonsense!" said the physiologist, interrupting him almost angrily; "may I not know enough of the facts of life and death, as you call them, to know that that is not nonsense? But there, it's no use arguing about things like this. Will you allow this mummy of yours to be made the subject of, well, we will say, an experiment in physiology?"

"What, the finest and most unique huaca that was ever brought to Europe——"

"It would only be made finer still by the experiment, even if it failed. I know what you are going to say, and I will give you my word of honour, and, if you like, I'll pledge you my professional reputation, that not a hair of its head shall be injured. Let me take it to my laboratory, and I promise you solemnly that in a week you shall have it back, not as it is now, but either the body of your Inca, as perfect as it was the day he died, or——"

He stopped, and looked hard at his friend, as if wondering what the effects of his next words would be upon him.

"Or what?" asked the Professor, almost in a whisper.

"Your Inca prince, roused from his three-hundred-year sleep, and able to answer your questions and guide us to his lost mines and treasure houses."

"Are you in earnest, Djama?" the Professor whispered, catching him by the arm and looking round at the mummy as though he half thought that the silent witness in the packing-case might be listening to the words which, if it could have heard, would have had such a terrible significance for it. "Do you really mean to say in sober earnest that there is the remotest chance of your science being able to work such a miracle as that?"

"A chance, yes," replied Djama steadily. "It is not a certainty, of course, but I believe it to be possible. Will you let me try?"

"Yes, you shall try," answered the Professor in a voice nothing like as steady as his. "If any other man but you had even hinted at such a thing, I would have seen him—well, in a lunatic asylum first. But there, I will trust my Inca to you. It seems a fearful thing even to attempt, and yet, after all, if it fails there will be no harm done, and if it succeeds—ah, yes, if it succeeds—it will mean——"

"Endless fame for you, my friend, as the re-creator of a lost society, and for both of us wealth, perhaps beyond counting. But stop a moment, granted success, how shall we talk with our Inca revenant? Have I not heard you say that the Aymaru dialect of the Quichua tongue is lost as completely as the Inca treasures?"

"Not quite, though I believe I am now the only white man on earth who understands it."

"Good! then let me get to work at once, and in a week—well, in a week we shall see."

The physiologist dined with the Professor that night, and the small hours were growing large before they ended the long talk which their strange bargain and the still stranger experiment which was to result from it formed the subject. The next day the packing-case containing the mummy was transferred to Djama's laboratory, and then for a whole week neither the Professor nor any other of his friends or acquaintances had either sight or speech of him.

Every caller at his house in Brondesbury Park was politely but firmly denied admittance on professional grounds, and three letters and two telegrams which the Professor had sent to him, after being himself denied admittance, remained unanswered.

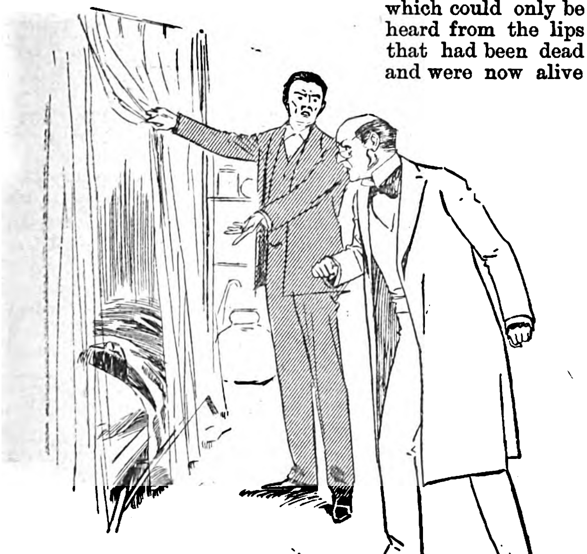
At last, on the Thursday following the Friday on which the mummy had been sent to the laboratory, the Professor received a telegram telling him to come at once to the doctor. Three minutes after he had read it he was in a hansom and on his way to Kilburn, wondering what it was that he was to be brought face to face with during the next half hour.

This time there was no denial. The door opened as he went up the steps, and the servant handed him a note. He tore it open and read:

"Come round to the laboratory and make a new acquaintance who will yet be an old one."

His heart stood still, and he caught his breath sharply as he read the words which told him that the unearthly experiment for which he had furnished the subject had been successful.

The Doctor's laboratory stood apart from the house in the long, narrow garden at the back, and as he approached the door he stopped for a moment, and an almost irresistible impulse to go away and have nothing more to do with the unholy work in hand took possession of him. Then the love of his science and the longing to hear the marvels which could only be heard from the lips that had been dead and were now alive again overcame his fears, and he went up to the door and knocked softly.

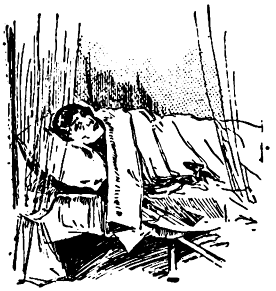


Djama pulled aside a curtain

It was opened by a haggard, wild-eyed man, whom he scarcely recognised as his old friend. Djama did not speak, he simply caught hold of the sleeve of his coat with a nervous, trembling grasp, drew him in, shut the door, and led him to a corner of the room where there was a little camp bed, curtained all round with thin, transparent muslin, through which he could see the shape of a man lying under the sheets.

Djama pulled the curtain aside and said in a hoarse whisper: "Look, it has been hard work, and terrible work, too, but I have succeeded. Do you see, he is breathing."

The Professor stared, wide-eyed at the white pillow on which lay the head of what, a week before, had been his mummy. Now it was the head of a living man; the pale bronze of the skin was clear and moist with the dew of life; the lips were no longer brown and dry, but faintly red and slightly parted, and the counterpane, which was pulled close up under the chin, was slowly rising and falling with the regular rhythm of a sleeper's breathing. He looked from the face of him who had been dead and was alive again to the face of the man whose daring science and perfect skill had wrought the unholy miracle, and then he shrank back from the bedside, pulling Djama with him, and whispering:



"Good God, it is even more awful than it is wonderful! How did you do it?"

"That is my secret," whispered Djama, his dry lips shaping themselves into a ghastly smile, "and for all the treasures that that man ever saw, I wouldn't tell it to a living soul, or do such hideous work again. I tell you I have seen life and death fighting together for two days and nights in this room—not, mind you, as they fight on a death-bed, but the other way, and I would rather see a thousand men die than one more come back out of death into life. You see, he is sleeping now. He opened his eyes just before day-break this morning, that's nearly ten hours ago, but if I lived ten thousand years I should never forget that one look he gave me before he shut them again. Since then he has slept, and I stood by that bed testing his pulse and his breathing for eight hours before I wired you. Then I knew he would live, and so I sent for you."

The Professor looked at his friend with an involuntary and unconquerable aversion rising in his heart against him; an aversion that was half fear, half horror, and then he remembered that he himself had a share in the fearful work which had been done, a work that could not now be undone without murder.

With another backward look at the bed, he said, in a whisper that was almost a smothered groan:

"When will he wake?"

Before Djama could reply, the question was answered by a faint rustle, and a low, long-drawn sigh from the bed. They looked and saw the Inca's face turned towards them, and two fever-bright eyes shining through the curtains.

"He is awake already, two hours sooner than I expected," said Djama, in a voice that he strove vainly to keep steady. "Come, now, you are the only man on earth who can talk to him. Let us see if he has come back to reason as well as to life."

"Yes, I will try," said the Professor faintly. He took a couple of trembling steps. Then the lights in the room began to dance, the whitewashed walls reeled round him, and he pitched forward and fell unconscious by the side of the bed.

(To be continued.)

Lost, a Bag of Gold.

"ARE you engaged, coachman?"

I had stopped at that moment to water my horse, and to quench my own thirst in a tavern near. I had scarcely reached my horse's head, when I heard the above question, and saw, as I turned round, a young lady standing by the side of my cab. Without delay I answered, and, opening the door, I helped the lady in.

Her face had a certain hesitating, timid expression, which made me judge that my fare was not an independent lady, but a housekeeper or a governess. She wore a black silk dress and a woollen shawl. Her hands and feet were small, but it did not escape me that her gloves were very much worn.

I asked her where she wished to be taken. She named a locality not of the best, and with a trembling voice, as if ashamed of it. I climbed on the box, and whipped up. Although it was nothing to me where my fare wished to go, I felt a sort of curiosity as to who and what the lady might be. I had observed that she seemed to have a pretty face, although the veil that she wore over it did not let me see her features plainly. During the trip I was driven by my curiosity to peep through the cab window behind me, and saw that she had put up her veil. She looked frightfully pale and thin. Her skin was like wax, and one did not need to be a doctor to know that she was consumptive.

She held in her hands something on which her eyes were fixed, and there came over her face an expression of thankfulness and satisfaction. What the object was I could not tell exactly. I only saw that it was light-coloured, and had no decided shape. I had only two seconds for my observation. I had to see to my horse in the crowded street.

I gave him a lash with the whip, and at a quick trot we soon arrived at the part of the city indicated. As soon as I found the number which the lady had given me, I stopped, got off the box, and opened the door to help her out. She appeared to be in great agitation, as if an unpleasant interview was before her. I received from her over the price of her fare, which she evidently knew, an extra tip, thanked her, and she hurried away, while I turned my carriage towards a neighbouring public-house to invest immediately in a glass of beer.

But before I went in I proceeded to straighten the cab cushions, and see that all was right inside. As soon as I opened the door again I saw some object lying on the seat. It was a small linen bag—without doubt what the lady had held in her lap. I took it in my hand, and its weight astonished me. With not a little curiosity I looked at it again and again, and at last tried to open it. It was easily done, for the bag was fastened only by a little piece of string.

One can imagine my surprise when I found that it was filled with gold pieces! I dared not look at them further in this place, as a policeman might possibly notice, and ask how I came by the gold. Meanwhile, I tied the bag up again, and put it in the wide pocket of my coat. Instead of indulging myself in the glass of beer, I drove to the nearest cab-stand, and took my place in the rear of the line of cabs, so that I could be sure of not being wanted for the next half hour.

I got into my cab, as cabmen often do when they want a little rest, and I examined for the second time my new-found treasure. I shook the contents of the bag on the seat, and sat with dazed eyes before quite a pile of gold.

After delighting my eyes with it for a while, I counted the money, partly half, partly whole sovereigns, singly, again into the bag, and found that it amounted to exactly the sum of £150.

I could not think otherwise than that this money belonged to the pale young lady whom I had last carried. How she came by it, and what she was going to do with it, was another thing. I had found it, and it was a great temptation to me to keep it. What could I not undertake with such capital? I could buy myself a cab and horses, and instead of being a miserable hired cabman, would myself own cabs, or establish a livery-stable, which would make me independent.

The picture of the future, which I painted in this way, was alluring enough, but along with it was the consideration that I should be a thief if I retained the money. My selfishness had a severe struggle with my conscience.

While I now looked more closely at the bag, I found, written in ink upon it, the address, "Miss Mildred Berkeley, No. 4, Bentley Place." This address, which had hitherto escaped me, I read with as much disgust as astonishment; for there now remained to me, as an honourable man, but one way. I meditated over it a time, but could come to no conclusion. "With honesty," said one voice in my soul, "you will earn no bread; with honesty you can go, in your old age, to the poor-house."

At last selfish interest and conscience came to a compromise, and I resolved to keep the money till the following day. Then, I thought, there will be a reward offered, and no one can blame me for at least profiting by that.

I remained all day in a fever of excitement; and, when night came, I felt really ill. I could not sleep. Next morning I was pale and wretched. I went to breakfast where cabmen are in the habit of drinking their coffee, and eagerly looked for the morning paper. Sure enough, at the top of the column for lost and found articles, I found this advertisement:

LOST. Yesterday, in a cab, a bag of gold. The finder is earnestly entreated to bring the money to No. 7, Grattan Street, three flights up, where he will receive a liberal reward.

I knew well what this last passage signified, for I had already in many cases learned that this common expression allowed great latitude. A liberal reward meant perhaps from one to five shillings and a glass of beer. That would be fine amends for resigning £150.

I went about all day with the bag in my pocket like a madman, which made me once or twice nearly run over people. My night's rest was disturbed by phantoms, and the morning brought me no relief. I felt miserable, and, what was worse, even in my waking hours the phantoms did not fade from my eyes.

To my great surprise the advertisement was not repeated. I could not explain it to myself, but began to fear that the police were on my track, and that some fine day I must walk into prison.

A week passed, and I had become a mere shadow of the strong, healthy man I had previously been. I could reproach myself only with not having returned the bag to its owner. I had not taken a penny of its contents.

Strangely enough, I had during this time unusual good luck. My cab was always occupied, and I earned a good deal of money. When I reflected on this fact, I believed that Providence thereby gave me a plain hint. The result was that on the tenth day I came to the resolution to return the lost property. The money had become a burden to me ever since I stretched my hand out towards it. I had had no rest by night or day; I felt weak and wretched.

I had noted the address given in the advertisement, and so I drove at noon on the tenth day to 7, Grattan Street. It was the place where I had driven the young lady. The door stood wide open. I called a boy to hold my horse, and went up the stairs. I asked a girl I met for Miss Berkeley, and she thought that such a person lived on the attic floor. I went up higher, and knocked at the door I presumed to be the right one. I could not help feeling that I had been a rascal, and only the consciousness that I was at last going to do right gave any ease to my conscience.

At my knock a weak voice called, "Come in!" I opened the door and entered.

For a moment the darkness prevented my seeing the interior. The windows were dim with dust, smoke, and dirt, and some broken panes were pasted over with paper. A table and two chairs, with a miserable bed, made the whole furniture.

"Step softly; Death is here," said a trembling voice, in which I only too well recognised the young lady whom I had brought there ten days before. But how she had changed in this short time! Her cheeks were hollow, her face was pale as death, and her eyes had an unusual brightness.

When I had gained the necessary self-command, I said, with my face turned away, for it was impossible for me to look on myself as other than a cowardly villain:

"I bring the bag of gold which——" and then I muttered something about having only just seen the notice.

"It is too late!" she whispered sadly, "he for whom that money was destined is no longer living. Here he lies. He died some hours ago. Yesterday you could have saved him—saved us both—but now it is too late, too late!"

And she went on murmuring to herself, "too late, too late," as if she had fallen into a stupor.

Suddenly the poor woman rose slowly from the chair where she sat by the death-bed, and, after walking up and staring at me, gave a hollow cry, which thrilled me to the marrow of my bones.

"It is only right that you should know what you have to answer for," she said, "that is your work; you can be proud of it, it has been a complete success."

She laughed wildly—it was more a mingling of laughing and crying—and looked at me.

"He was my husband," she went on, after a while; "we lived apart; why and wherefore is nothing to you. For five years I heard nothing of him. During this time I lived out as a governess, and earned that money which you hold in your hand. May God forgive you for what you have done!"

"At last he found me," she continued weakly, "and wrote, begging me to return to him. I came. He lived in this hole in sickness and poverty. Had I not lost my gold then I would have taken him away and cared well for him. He died of hunger. We have had no food for the last three days, and there is no other fate for me but to follow him. Oh, you have done a manly deed! Look there—your work!"

She drew a cloth from the face of the corpse; it looked almost a skeleton, and the sorrow of the sight overpowered her. She threw herself over it, and sobbed violently.

The emotion brought on a terrible fit of coughing. Her disease had gone too far for her to survive the shock of her husband's death, and if she could not die in his arms, she died by his side.

Terrified, I spread the sheet over the two dead forms, and hurried to call the landlady. I still held the gold in my hand. It seemed to burn like fire, and I would have hurled it from me if I had not a duty to fulfil. The landlady was very indifferent about the fate of the unfortunate pair. She merely said that nothing different had been expected, but was much pleased when I asked what they owed, and proceeded to pay her.

I went to an undertaker, and arranged with him for a fitting funeral for the couple united in death. I could not and would not seek for their friends and relatives to draw suspicion upon myself. It was now clear to me why the advertisement for the loss of the money appeared but once. The poor souls had not the means to pay for a repetition.

I followed the coffins to the grave. No stone marks it; but I know it well, and it often follows me in my dreams.

The very next day I drove to the Hospital for Consumptives, and put the rest of the bag of gold in the collection box, for I would rather have died of hunger than have kept a penny of it. W. H. H.

AFTER MANY MONTHS

WHEN I first met Owen Johnson he had not long come to London, and the iron of disappointment had not entered into his soul. For some time he had contributed short stories to the weekly journal in the little Devonshire town where he had been brought up. They had not been paid for, I gathered from him, and his friends, imbued with the idea that he had in him the making of a journalist, had counselled him to try his luck in London.

He had some small means of his own, which was a good thing, as although the editor of the local organ had been good enough to give him a letter of introduction to the editor of a somewhat obscure London weekly, it had not resulted in his obtaining more than very occasional employment; not enough, indeed, to keep him, and he was always on the look out for other openings for his literary productions.

To give him his due, he was an indefatigable worker, and writing came naturally to him; but somehow he lacked the all-important knowledge of how to suit the critical taste of the average London editor, the result being that almost every post brought him back a more or less bulky MS. with the usual formula, "declined with thanks."

Shortly after our first acquaintance he wanted to change his apartments, and there happening to be a "combined" bed and sitting-room to let in the house in which I was then living, I suggested that it might suit him to take it, and that we could live together, an idea that he cordially assented to, and from mere friends we quickly became intimate associates.

Before long I learnt from him all there was to tell about himself and his belongings. Left an orphan at an early age, he and his sister had been brought up by an uncle in the West of England, and when the time came for him to go out into the world and seek his own living, a berth had been found for him in a large warehouse. But the work was always distasteful to him, his desire being to embark upon the precarious undertaking of journalism, and that he had succeeded in a modest way I have already stated. Whether he would ever make sufficient by his pen to support himself and his sister, who, he informed me, was a confirmed invalid, seemed doubtful, and I often did my best to persuade him to relinquish the idea and go back to commercial life.

On one occasion, indeed, the opportunity having unexpectedly offered itself, I was in a position to obtain him a berth in a city firm, at a salary which was considerably higher than his average earnings had been during the few months we had known each other. I suggested that by accepting it he might still in his spare time devote himself to literary work, and then, if the latter increased sufficiently to justify such a step, he might discard the former.

He was very grateful to me for the offer, and I half hoped would see his way to entering the situation, but, after a night's reflection, he said he had become convinced he could never again submit to the drudgery of office work, and that having once relinquished it he would not again attempt it, but stick to his pen in another direction.

As if to justify his determination, that very morning's post brought him a proof—a most unusual occurrence—of a sketch he had written for one of the numerous "family" journals now circulating in London and elsewhere.

His face beamed with excitement as he saw what it was, and he felt sure, he said, it was only the prelude of further successes in the same direction—a wish that was unfortunately not to be fulfilled.

Weeks went on, and, with the exception of one or two minor contributions being accepted by a friendly editor, who had taken a liking to the lad, and given him any little thing to write whenever he could, his literary aspirations remained unfulfilled.

Being myself employed in the City all day, we saw nothing of each other until the evening, but our landlady—a good soul, albeit somewhat loquacious—gave me to understand that my friend had spent almost the entire days in writing, hardly stopping to take his meals. He did not tell me so himself—in fact, he had become more than usually reserved just about this period—and I, knowing his disposition, did not attempt to draw his secret from him. My idea was that he was probably writing a longer story than usual—a shilling shocker, possibly—and that when it was finished he would tell me all about it.

As it happened, my surmise was partially, but not entirely, correct. At the end of a month, one evening on my return from business, it was evident he had something important to convey to me.

"Any good news to-day?"

"Yes, I've done it—done it at last. I meant to tell you two or three times, but I put it off, and put it off, and now it is done at last, and here it is," at the same time showing me a bulky roll of foolscap.

"One, two, or three volumes?" I asked laughingly.

"Guess again."

"A storyette?"

"No; a play. Ah! I thought you would be surprised. The fact is," he continued hurriedly, "I feel I am capable of attempting better work than I have been doing, and it has always been my ambition to write a play; something real, that will appeal to the sympathies of an audience, and not merely a story to be read in ten minutes, cast aside, and forgotten."

"And where have you gone to for your plot and incidents, may I ask?"

"Where? Here—here in London. The few short months I have been up here I have heard and seen things I little dreamt of before, and I have done my best to weave some of them into a play such as will, I hope, commend itself to the notice of some theatrical manager."

"I don't want to dishearten you, but I have always heard it is extremely difficult to get a manager to look at a play by an unknown writer. There is a glut of plays in the market, they always say."

"Ah, but there is a human interest in my work, which I feel must make itself felt. It is not imagination; it is reality, what I have seen and heard, and it is a picture of life as it is, as it actually exists here in London, not as it is supposed to."

"Have you any idea as to where to place it?"

"That's just it," delightedly. "I have not written it altogether on spec, as it were. The Editor of the Weekly Buzzer told me a month ago he knew one or two managers who were looking out for a play dealing with incidents of London life, not down east—that has been done to death, he says—nor the fashionable West-end; but a something between the two, an admixture of the dull respectability of the suburbs, the thievish rascality of the city, and the foibles of the aristocracy."

"You have allowed yourself plenty of scope, at all events."

"That's the beauty of it. My play will not appeal to any individual section; it will be of general interest, and I have a presentiment of its success, somehow."

"What do you say, now, if I light a pipe, and you read it over to me."

"No, Charley, anything but that; my ambition is for it to come upon you as a surprise. I want you to be in front the night it comes out. Ah! I see you smile. But it will come out, it must, it shall," he added vehemently, with a strange look in his eyes, that made me regard him with a feeling of dismay. The idea entered my head that he had overworked himself, and that his mind was beginning to give way.

Evidently he divined what was passing through my mind, for in an altogether different tone of voice, he went on:

"It may seem very ungenerous of me, but I can't help it. When I first began to write, my idea was to read over each act—it's in three acts—as I finished it, but as I went on I made up my mind I would wait till it was finally completed, and give you a surprise; and then I changed my mind again, and thought it would be best to keep it until the night. I haven't said a word to Lily about it even, and I want her to see it first in the papers. I hope the critics won't be too severe on me, that's all."

Seeing the confident frame of mind he was in, it seemed a shame to attempt to disillusionise him, and I began to talk about his sister, a never failing source of conversation between us.

"It is not for myself I care so much, you know; it's for her I want this play to be a success. She writes me as cheerful as usual, but my aunt says her cough continues troublesome, and the doctor says the South of France would be the best place for her. Do you know, I have a kind of a feeling that if my play is accepted—and it must be," he added, in the vehement tone he had used before—"it will be mainly due to her. It may be a strange thing to say, but if it had not been for her I could never have written it. The desire to take her away to a warmer clime seemed to inspire my thoughts in some way, and if it wasn't for her I should not be so sanguine about its acceptance as I am. My friend the editor advised me to try Mr. A—— first. 'He has a partiality,' he says, 'for plays dealing with present day life and incidents.' Would you try and see him or send it by post?" he inquired, anxiously.

"Perhaps the latter would be the best plan; you see he is a very busy man."

"I quite agree with you; I'll post it to-night."

In less than a week it came back with the usual stereotyped reply, "declined with thanks."

To my surprise, Johnson was not a bit disheartened. "He doesn't know what he is throwing away," was his remark, with a smile.

Poor boy, I felt he had not exactly hit the right nail on the head; but in view of his fatuous enthusiasm, I had not the heart to tell him so in so many words.

Once again it was sent forth, only to meet the same reception; and so it went on, but he never lost heart, only after a time he altered his tactics and used to wait on managers and attempt to induce them to see him. In most cases he was unsuccessful, although now and again he found one more complacent than the rest. But in every instance the result was the same, his play was not accepted. It was, they admitted, not without merit; but it was crude, over-burdened with action and incident, and in fact would not do at all.

Continual disappointments at last began to tell upon him. He did not actually become despondent, but he confided to me that perhaps he had been too ambitious; it would have been better had he commenced in a smaller way—a one-act play, a curtain raiser, what did I think of it? Several managers had told him there was power in his work. Would I advise him to try again?

I replied that a short play might reasonably be expected to stand a better chance of acceptance than a more ambitious effort. More I did not feel justified in saying.

"I think you are right. I'll have another try; and, do you know, it would be more convenient to me to be nearer the theatres. One never knows what may turn up; and although I shall be very sorry to leave here, where I have been so comfortable, still, I must go, and shall give a week's notice to-day. I shall look you up sometimes, you know, and tell you how I am getting on."

"Poor boy," I said to myself, "so it has come to that, has it?" feeling that a cheaper lodging was his real motive for moving more than anything else. I would gladly have offered him pecuniary help, but I knew him well enough to be sure it would not be accepted.

A week later he left, promising to send me his new address. He did not do so, however, and it was nearly ten days before I saw him. I was struck with his altered appearance. He was pale, and looked ill.

"You have been overworking yourself, I'm afraid."

"Oh, I don't know. I have been sticking to it pretty close. I have taken your advice and written a short play—one-act this time—and Mr. B—— promised to let me know to-morrow if it will do."

"I hope his answer will be favourable."

"Well, I'm not so sanguine as I used to be, but I gave him an outline of the plot, and he said he thought it might do. I'm to know to-morrow, and if it does I will meet you coming away from the office."

The next day I saw him coming towards me, his face radiant with delight.

"It's all right, and it is to come out as soon as possible."

"Well, let me be the first to congratulate you; and now come along and let's have dinner together."

Was it my fancy? or did he devour his food with the avidity of a man to whom regular meals had not been the rule of late?

By the time the meal was over he had become communicative. "Do you know, if it hadn't come off soon, I should have had to look for something to do, my finances have run down almost to vanishing point"—with an attempt at a laugh.

"You won't mind what I am going to say, will you?"

"Not a bit."

"Well, if two or three pounds would be any good just till you are paid, you know. You will be having some extra expenses I dare say."

"You are very good, and I could repay you in a week or two. My little play goes into rehearsal at once, and it will come out in about a fortnight's time, but I have managed somehow so far, and I won't forestall my inheritance now, many thanks all the same. I shall be busy attending rehearsals until then, so don't expect to see me again till it is all over. But you will come and see it, won't you?"

"See it! of course I will; and see you bow your acknowledgments to the audience, I hope."

A week later I got a post card bearing an address in Westminster, briefly announcing that his play would be produced on the following Wednesday.

Needless to say I booked a seat, and was in my place in good time.

The little play was an undoubted success; there was a freshness and originality about the plot that charmed the audience, and at the fall of the curtain on an extremely effective and well-arranged "curtain," their were loud cries for "Author, Author!" The heavy curtain was moved aside, and I looked forward to seeing my friend appear and receive, at last, his well-earned reward. In his place, however, came the manager, who announced briefly that the author was not in the house, but that the friendly reception accorded to his play should be duly conveyed to him.

A strange feeling of presentiment of something being wrong with my friend came over me. Hurrying out of the theatre I jumped into a cab, telling the man to drive me to his lodgings in Westminster. My acquaintance with the locality was nil, but after driving through a network of streets, my jehu stopped at No. 123, which, to my surprise, proved to be a tenement lodging-house of the lowest class. A slatternly woman stood in the doorway, and eyed me with suspicion.

"Is Mr. Johnson in?"

"Ain't no such name here."

"But there must be," I replied, producing his post card, and proceeding to describe his appearance.

"Oh, 'im, is it? You'll find him hup stairs in the top attic, unless he's gone hout. My gal took a tellygral to him just now. Didn't you, Liz?"

"Yus," said a smaller edition of the slatternly individual.

"May I go up and see him, please?"

"Certainly; and as he've got such fine friends, maybe I'll see the colour of my money some day."

Not noticing the remark, I proceeded hurriedly upstairs. "The top attic I think you said," I shouted back.

"Yus; number twenty-one on the door."

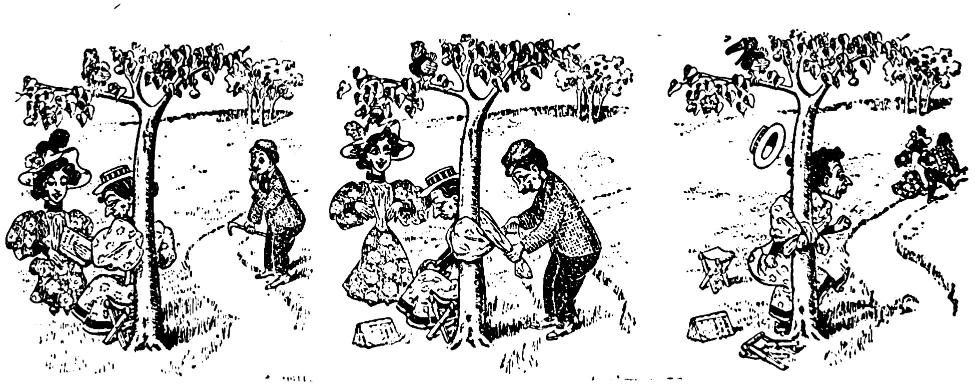
Hastily I opened the door. "Why, man, it's a gigantic succ——." The word was not finished. Seated on a broken chair, at an old rickety table, was my friend, with an open telegram in his clenched hand—dead!

Mechanically I read the telegram: "Your sister much worse. Come at once."

To summon the landlady was the work of an instant, and from her I learnt the truth. My poor friend must have been sadly pinched for means. He owed two weeks rent, and I gathered that for days he had been practically without food. The terrible message he had in his hand completed the work lack of proper nourishment had effectually commenced.

In the evening papers next day were two items of intelligence that to me possessed a sad significance. The one was a most favourable review of a new one-act play by an unknown author, and the other an account of an inquest held that afternoon on the body of Owen Johnson, the verdict of the jury being "Death from failure of the heart's action, accelerated by want of proper food." And this after many months!

PETER PARR.



FROM MURPHY'S DOWN TO ANGEL'S

We had ridden three hours with a stupid stage-driver, and I was chagrined and disappointed. I had engaged the front seat two weeks in advance, and, being a Britisher, had expected to have a chance to study one of the old-time stage-drivers on his native heath; but, though it was said he had been on the route twenty years, he simply chewed a quid of tobacco and could not be induced to talk. An occasional grunt of assent or dissent was the most he vouchsafed us, and it was with a feeling of relief we changed stages at Murphy's and had another driver.

The drive from Murphy's to Angel's is over fifteen miles of dusty, uninteresting road, and we had not looked forward to the prospect with pleasure; but our new driver had an air of business and a looseness of tongue that were very refreshing after the mummified silence of the other man, and promised well for our entertainment. The native Americans seemed to see this as well as I.

Then, too, we saw that we had made a mistake about our first driver. The second man was, of course, the old stager, with his many thrilling adventures and hair-breadth escapes, while the first man was evidently a novice in the business. We took our seats and prepared ourselves for a most interesting time.

"Hope you're all comfortable, ladies?" began our second man, in a manner very different from the other gruff bore. "I do like mighty well to have ladies in the front seat with me; but I'm quite a fav'rite with the ladies, it seems—they always want the front seat."

"Oh, I see, you are the old stage-driver!" I exclaimed, "and you will tell us some of your interesting stories. How lovely. What is your name?"

"My real name—no matter; but they all call me Tennessee up here. You see, I come from Tennessee, an' I've got the southern twang, an' when I first come I talked a heap 'bout my native state, an' bragged some, too, I guess, coming from the south, you know, an' the boys like to twit a fellow; but I've travelled round so much that I've lost most of my twang—knocked 'bout considerable in my day. Fellow can't help rubbing on some polish, you know—I expect that's why I'm such a fav'rite with the ladies. It's real funny how all the old maids get stuck on me, an' the widders, too," Tennessee chuckled. "By jimminy cricketts! Ex—cuse me, if I get off a swear-word now an' then—I don't know which is the worst, old maids or widders." (I took a sly glance at my companion, who was a young and pretty widow who lived in San Francisco.) "I'm writing a book on my experience with the women."

"Why," said the little widow, "I should think you would get married, with so many to choose from."

"Well, it does seem that way. You see, I did try it onst. I'm a widderer—got sons over twenty years old—wouldn't believe it, now, would you? Most people take me to be 'bout thirty. I'm by rights over forty; but, great Jupiter, whipstitch—ex—cuse me, we old stagers can't help a little profanity—I wouldn't have any trouble marrying. I most always propose to the women before I get them through!" (My pretty companion began to look alarmed.) "The women like it—particular the widows. Now, we're coming to a little down grade. Got on a pretty heavy load, so guess we'll take it easy. Go 'long there, Suse—Nick, you old rack-a-bones!"

We rounded the brow of the hill, and the horses began the steep descent with a gentle trot; but within a few seconds their speed had accelerated to a hard gallop. The old Concord coach rolled from side to side, and we seemed in danger of upsetting, but our time had not yet come, and we reached the level road in safety. The widow and I were gazing at Tennessee with admiration. How fearless he was! What splendid driving! But a timid man on the back seat was first to recover his speech.

"I think you had better use your brake, driver," he said, in a querulous voice; "that driving was altogether too fast for a heavy coach."

"Listen to that old duffer," said Tennessee, sotto voce. "Guess he's never seen a hill before." Then he raised his voice. "Well, I will try," he said calmly, glancing back. "Why, the brake's gone!" he exclaimed.

We all looked at the rear wheels in dismay. The brake was gone in truth.

"Well, we'll have to go back—that's plain," said the timid man.

"What! pull up that hill?" said Tennessee, with disgust; "not if I know myself, and I think I do. We'll just plough through, old man. I never had an accident in my life. Why, last week I had twelve people on board—two women an' a kid here in front, an' one of the front wheels rolled off right on this down grade, an' rolled a hundred yards down the road, an' we just settled down kind of comfortable like, an' I never spilled a person or broke a screw. Oh, I'll get you through safe, you can rest on that."

We were trotting along at a lively rate, and I glanced nervously at the heavy axles. I hoped devoutly that the wheels were secure.

Tennessee continued his talk with the most nonchalant air, as if brakes and wheels and things of that kind were of minor consideration.

"This house we are coming to is the only post-office between Murphy's and Angel's," he said. "Nice little woman keeps it—mighty sweet on me—plucky, too, I can tell you."

We drew up at the door, and a kindly-faced woman came out with the post-bag. She gave us a little nod of greeting, and retreated modestly into the doorway. Two or three tow-headed children peeped out from behind her skirts at the stage people.

"The schoolma'am's going down this morning," said the postmistress.

"We're pretty well loaded," said Tennessee.

I thought so, too, and wondered where we would put the schoolmistress; but Tennessee seemed equal to any emergency. He started the horses.

"Good-morning to you, ma'am," he called to the woman, and wafted a kiss from the tips of his fingers, presumably to the children, but I thought with intention to show us how he managed these things with the ladies. A few rods beyond we stopped, and a sunburnt girl came out.

"Good-morning," she called, in a fresh, clear voice, "have you room for me?"

"Oh, yes," answered the obliging Tennessee, "always room for one more. Got any trunks?"

"Yes; two," and she glanced apologetically at two enormous Saratogas which stood just by the door.

We wondered where they would be put, but Tennessee never hesitated. The trunks were placed somewhere in the back, and our driver sprang nimbly into his seat again. We started off at a brisk trot, and Tennessee launched forth in a string of thrilling narrative.

"See that hole over there?" he said. "A friend of mine dug out three thousand dollars in one day there. He wants to sell the mine now. I'm the agent. I tell you that I get more of that sort of thing than I can attend to. Why, I make more than four times my wages just selling out claims. Don't want to buy a claim now, do you? No? Well, there's something more interesting than claims—for a paying business beats claims all hollow—that's stage robbing. See that tree over yonder? That's where I was held up last time—robber didn't get anything, though. That's onst when he miscalculated."

I looked about quickly. We were now in a dusty wilderness of pine and chapparal. Not a sign of human habitation near. Tennessee saw my nervous glance.

"Mighty lonesome-looking now, ain't it? See them bullet holes in my stage cover? Them was put in when we were attacked by six road-agents over here by Joaquin Murietta's old home."

I felt my blood run cold. I had not seen the bullet holes before. The timid man gave vent to an audible "Ah!" and the others preserved an awe-struck silence.

"Why," continued Tennessee, "I guess every stone an' tree has hid its road-agent some time or other 'long here. I've had fifteen or twenty holds-ups, an' that's nothing compared with some of the old-timers."

"Do you think there is any danger at this particular time?" inquired the timid man.

"Why, that's hard to tell," said Tennessee dubiously. "It was just here where we had that last hold up two months ago, an' one of the passengers an' two of the road-agents was killed. The papers never got the straight of that. You see, it was that hold-up which showed me that the little widder postmistress was stuck on me.

"I was coming along here that day—had on a Wells-Fargo shot-gun messenger and a lot of passengers. There was about a hundred thousand dollars in bullion under the seat, an' the messenger held a loaded gun in his hand all the time. When we got just 'bout here coming up the hill, I saw the bushes move right there, an' I said, kinder under my breath, 'road-agents!' I whipped out my pistol, an' the messenger aimed his gun; but, Lord! who do you think it was? Why, the little postmistress back there. We came nigh shooting her. She looked frightened nigh to death, an' was white as a ghost.

"'Don't shoot,' she said, kinder soft like. 'Four men are going to rob the stage. I heard them planning it. They want to stop you before you git to the top of the grade, but if you hurry, you'll get there first, and maybe can git away on the down grade. Good-bye, and be quick,' an' she got out of sight in a twinkling. Done that for me, you see. We never waited to thank her. That's one thing I object to in these here mountains—you've got to sacrifice politeness sometimes.

"Well, I just gave my horses a cut, an' they jumped forward. That plucky little woman got out of sight pretty quick—had a horse, I guess. Well, we got to the top of the hill first, an' by Jupiter snupgrass!—excuse me, I always use strong language when I git excited—right on the other side was four masked men a-coming it up the hill as hard as they could tear."

There was a breathless silence on the stage coach. The horses were pulling up that very hill, and there was a possibility that we would be held up, too. Tennessee was getting a quid of tobacco. He kept us hanging breathless on his words until he had the morsel well rolled into his cheek.

"The first glimpse they caught of us they jumped behind trees an' called 'Halt!' but we were on the brow of the hill, an' I was prepared. I'd fastened the reins 'round my waist, an' guided with one hand while I used the other for my sixshooter. The messenger shouted 'Let her go!' It was just here, ladies—we left two men stretched out. I killed two road-agents, an' wounded another. The shooting scared the horses, or I think I'd have finished all four. That durned messenger—excuse me—was so scared that he shot one of my horses. Not used to the biz, you see. Of course, the horses stampeded—it's bad enough to hear the firing without being peppered by an unresponsible man who is frightened into next week.

"Well, they started on the dead run down the grade, an' I had to drop my pistol and hang on to the lines. I tell you, we buzzed round them turns—sometimes two wheels standing off the grade to onst. When we reached the bottom of the hill down at the station, the old hoss dropped dead, an' the people on the stage just come up to me a-crying an' a-thanking me for saving their lives, and took on turruble.

"Look!—at that rock," he ejaculated. We gazed with startled eyes in the direction indicated. "Oh, I guess it's all right this time, but I always expect to have a man step out from behind that rock—finest place to rob a stage in the country. Two men held me up there about fifteen years ago, when I first began to drive here—didn't get anything, though. Now, we're past. Guess that's a sigh of relief, ain't it? This is a mighty dangerous country 'bout here, but I guess I'll git you through, ladies. Don't you fear. If we git attacked, just keep still—keep perfectly cool 'an ca'm an' you probably won't get more than two or three scattering shots."

We were all frightened by this time. The little schoolmistress on the back held her peace, but the rest of us were looking about nervously, and trusting our lives to this wonderful Tennessee. The pretty widow was no longer haughty and distant, but at every noise in the bush grasped the brawny arm of the driver and looked appealingly into his face.

"Now, ladies, when we start down this mountain, we are on the home-stretch to Angel's. Just one mile more. I always feel glad when we pass this knoll. Joaquin Murietta held me upright here the first month I was on the road. I had five miners on board, an' they showed fight, an' they got the worst of it, too. I just held my horses an' kept cool. Indiscretion is no kind of valour, you know. Well, Murietta strung up every one of them five miners to a tree, an' told me to go into Angel's an' say that Tennessee was the only man about with any sense, an' for other people to take warning. That's the old tree over there, an' there's the ropes yet. See them right there."

We instinctively glanced in the direction indicated by the whip which Tennessee held outstretched in his right hand, and there were the ropes still dangling from a thick branch which overhung the road.

"Oh, do drive on fast—do drive on!" we all exclaimed shudderingly.

"Well, I guess we'll have to go on, an' pretty fast, too. The horses can't hold back much on this down grade. If we turn over, ladies, I guess it will be on my side, so just be prepared to swing yourselves out."

Down we started. In a few seconds the horses were trotting, and in a few seconds more they were galloping. Five badly-frightened people hung on in desperation to the seats, and the pretty widow hung to the arm of Tennessee. His feet were braced against the dashboard, and his body was stiffened out as he hung on to the taut lines.

Swinging, bumping, pitching, we careered down the long hill, and went tearing into the little mining camp of Angel's.

We drew up with a flourish at the door of the primitive hotel, and fairly fell into the arms of Tennessee, who had sprung to the ground to receive us.

Six thankful, admiring people stood in the tiny hotel parlour awaiting the next stage, and asking the driver of the present one what he'd have to drink. We were all so grateful to him. The little brown schoolmistress was there, too.

"Why," said the little widow, "I think I should have died of fright on that dreadful road if it hadn't been for Tennessee."

"Yes, indeed," cried number two. "The very thought of that brave man kept me calm, and I know if anyone else had been driving we would have been killed surely. What a splendid fellow he is!"

"Just the kind of driver I have always heard about," cried number three.

"You could pick him out from a thousand as a regular old stager," said number four.

"He's the bravest man I've ever seen," said number five.

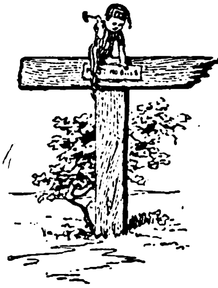
"He's a great, big-hearted, fine fellow," said the timid man, "and a genuine hero, too. I'm thankful we had such a competent man over that fearful road. I don't know what would have happened to us with an incapable driver."

"Pardon me," said the little brown schoolmistress, who had been a silent listener, "but I think you are all mistaken. Tennessee isn't much of a hero. He's only been in the State two weeks, and to judge by his driving he never saw a stage before, and—well—the postmistress is married to the shot-gun messenger, and all those tall stories he told you happened to Fred Green, who drove you down to Murphy's this morning. Evidently Tennessee knew what was expected of him, and proved himself equal to the occasion."

S. W. Belcher.

FIRE CRACKERS
FIRE CRACKERS
FIRE CRACKERS
FIRE CRACKERS

A Phial of Quicksilver



THE first two races of the day had been run, and now was to come the event of the year in the sporting neighbourhood of a certain county town in Loamshire: "The Top Boots Hunters' Steeplechase Plate," for horses regularly hunted during the past season with the Loamshire Hounds; prize, a valuable Cup; conditions, three miles over a fair hunting country, gentleman riders up.

The number of entries was just a dozen, amongst them being Mr. Spriggs' Shuffler (owner up), and Mr. Fred. Bolton's Carmen, to be ridden by the owner's particular friend, Will Walker, one of the most popular men in the neighbourhood. The interest of the forthcoming race had centred itself between these two, partly because it was known that they were immeasurably superior to any other horses in the race, that they were considered to be about as equally matched as any two horses could be, and the same weight having been allotted to each—eleven stone—it was thought by those best qualified to form an accurate opinion, that—bar accidents—one or other was almost sure to win.

There was also a spice of romance about the event, it being an open secret that one of the prettiest girls in the county, Miss Marriott, known to her intimate friends as Marie, was a special object of attraction to both Spriggs and Walker, and although the young lady had hitherto, to all outward appearances, shown equal preference to both, it was hinted that possibly the winner of the Cup might succeed in winning another prize of a very different description.

"If I could only be sure of her, my dear fellow, I wouldn't mind a bit," was Will Walker's remark to his chum Bolton, as they strolled up and down in the roped-off space designated by courtesy the saddling inclosure, the black mare Carmen, with her bridle loosely hanging on his arm, walking by his side as sedately as if equine vice was a thing that had never so much as entered her shapely little head.

"Well, old man, if you can't win on her, nobody can; she goes kinder with you than anybody else."

"It is very good of you to say so, but"—with a sigh—"I wish I could be sure of her—more depends on my winning this race than I dare to think of; and whereas one day she is as easy to ride as sitting in an armchair, all at once some little trifle upsets her, and it is all I can do to hold her. I hope she will be on her good behaviour to-day, and then — "

"Poor Mr. Walker," mocked a girl's fresh voice, "he would like Carmen to have no will of her own at all. That is a man's view of the whole duty of our sex nowadays, it appears," and she shook her head as implying the unjustness of the imputation.

A pained flush was the young man's silent rejoinder, and Marie, like the good-hearted girl she was, repented instantly of her thoughtless remark. Patting the mare's silken coat, she addressed her in a coaxing tone: "Now we are going to be on our best behaviour to-day, are we not?"

The expression on Walker's face changed instantaneously, and, raising his hat with a smile, he said: "It is very good of you to try and imbue Carmen with a sense of her duty, and I hope we may be lucky enough to win the Cup."

"That's better, Walker; I have been telling him, Miss Marriott, that our friend Spriggs' Shuffler is beyond doubt an excellent horse, and he won't miss winning for want of skill on his jockey's part, for although Spriggs is no favourite of mine, he is admittedly a first-class horseman; but then, as I was saying to Will, the mare has a wonderful turn of speed, and she always seems to do her best when he is on her. Hallo! here comes the man himself. How d'ye do, Spriggs? We were just calculating what chance my mare has of beating your horse."

"I suppose you have quite made up your mind to win, Mr. Spriggs?"

"Far from it, Miss Marriott. It is, I think, likely to be a close thing between us, and I think we both mean to do our best—don't we, Walker? Nothing venture nothing have." This with a certain emphasis that did not escape the notice of at least one of the assembled trio.

"An excellent motto, Mr. Spriggs, but for the honour of my sex I mean to pin my faith to the mare; but don't you think it is unfair for her; she is such a little thing compared to your big horse, to have to carry exactly the same weight. I see"—looking at her card—"each has eleven stone."

"If Spriggs would only concede me, say, seven pounds, or even five, I should feel much easier in my mind, that's all I can say."

"I dare say you would, my dear fellow; but all's fair in love and war, and you knew the conditions as soon as the weights were published."

"Well, it's no use talking now, I suppose, Jack," said Marie, turning to her brother. "I am going to bet you a dozen pairs of gloves that Carmen wins. Not that I anticipate that you will buy them for me if she does; that's the worst of betting with one's own brother."

"May I be allowed to accept the bet instead?" said Spriggs.

"No, thanks," with a slight flush. "Jack shall be my bookmaker, and, I hope, glove-provider for this occasion, at all events."

"Now Jack, come along, mamma will be wondering where I have got to, and Mr. Walker and Mr. Spriggs will soon be making their way to the starting post; there goes the saddling bell. You can't both win, gentlemen"—making a demure courtesy—"but I hope one or other of you may; we don't want the Cup to go out of our own neighbourhood."

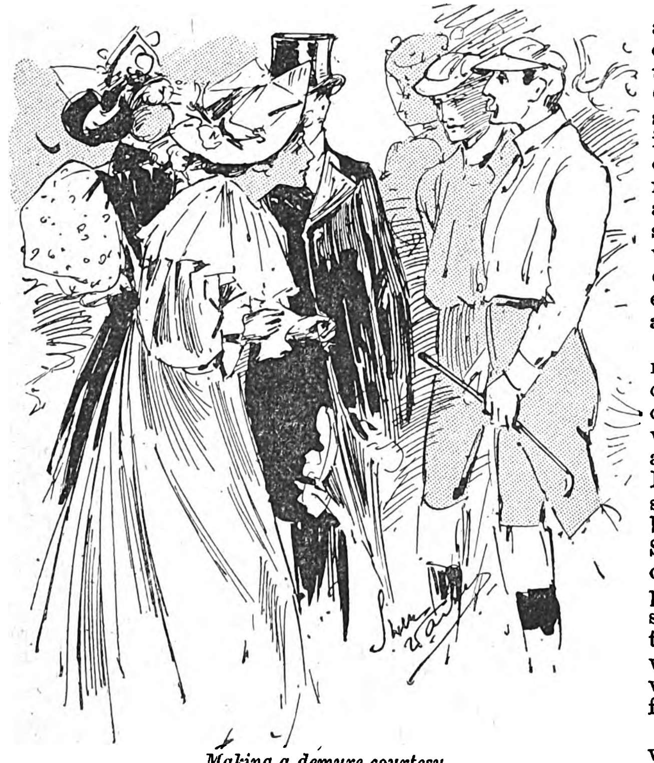
"Was it my fancy, I wonder?" mused Bolton to himself, as he and Walker moved away in one direction, whilst Spriggs went to where his horse was being led up and down by a groom, "but she certainly put Walker's name first, and didn't she refuse Spriggs' offer to bet with her pretty quick? Let me give you a leg up."

"No thanks, Carmen always stands better if I mount her my own way. Now then, old girl, steady does it;" and with the easy spring of a practised horseman, Walker swung himself lightly into the saddle.

A few minutes later saw the twelve competitors cantering down to the starting post, and as Walker passed Bolton, the latter noted with satisfaction that the mare was going easily, and not fretting or pulling away at her bridle.

"I hope you will win, old chap."

"And so do I, Fred, more than I can tell you. Well, it will be soon over anyway; Carmen is going like an angel."



Making a demure courtesy.

The crowd of onlookers—keen sportsmen everyone of them—were loud in their praises of the two favourites, Carmen and Shuffler, the other ten hardly coming in for any attention.

"The horse will beat the mare, I suppose," said a burly farmer to the man next to him—Teddy Geall—who was known to be part owner of Shuffler with Spriggs.

"He ought to; o' course, he ought to; but I wish to goodness I was riding instead of Spriggs, and I would have been but for this confounded knee of mine. I don't say Spriggs can't ride as well, or better, maybe, than I can, but then, you see, he has an old grudge against Walker, and now here's this girl come atween them, and all Spriggs cares about is to stop the mare from winning, and if he can do that he'd as lief as not throw the race away! fool that he is! and a nice thing that would be for me. I stand to win or lose a lot more than I can afford, bad luck to it, I do."

"Can you tell me what the weights are, sir?" queried a bystander.

"Weights? Who said anything about weights? I beg your pardon, you must be a stranger, sir. I thought everybody on the course knew they all carry the same in this race—eleven stone."

"Thanks. I heard you speaking of Shuffler a minute or two ago, and I wondered what he was carrying, that's all."

"Quite so, quite so; he ought to win, too; the weight won't stop him, anyway."

"A good many people seem to think that the little black mare will stand a good chance."

"And I dare say they're quite right, too; but my opinion is the horse will beat her. By Jove they're off! No, a false start! Shuffler's at his old trick again," as the big chestnut dashed past alone, his rider having apparently lost entire control of him; at all events he only succeeded in pulling up after going several hundred yards immediately in the direction of the line of carriages, on one of which was seated Miss Marriott.

"That's taken a lot out of your friend's horse, I'm thinking."

"Yes, worse luck; I wonder what on earth Spriggs could have been thinking about."

"A nice thing you've gone and done," he shouted, as Spriggs repassed him.

"I should liked to have seen you hold him," was the reply.

"They're off this time right enough," was the shout a minute or two after, and so it was.

As the dozen horses, all well together thus early in the race, passed the spot where Teddy Geall and the others were standing, it was interesting to note the expression on the face of the two rivals. Walker looked anxious, but not despondent, whereas Spriggs wore a frown of grim determination in which envy, hatred, and malice all had a share.

On they went without mishap over the first two or three fences, and then came the water-jump, at which Shuffler, Carmen, and one of the outsiders, Merlin, raced at best speed, the mare being between the other two. Seeing what was in front of her, she mechanically pricked up her ears, and seemed gathering herself together for an effort which her rider well knew would land her well on the far side of the obstacle.

Just, however, as she was within a few yards of taking off, Shuffler swerved slightly—not sufficiently to substantiate a charge of foul-riding against her jockey, as it might, Walker realised, have been purely accidental; but it was, nevertheless, sufficient to cause her to refuse, and her rider felt that, in consequence, the odds were a good 100 to one against his winning the race. To his credit, be it said, he did not proceed to thrash her for what was obviously no fault of hers, but, quickly turning her round, set her going again, and in an instant was well over, with a yard or two to spare. But the ground lost took a lot of making up, and it was not until well into the straight run home that the mare could get on anything like terms with the horse who had effectually outdistanced all the others. Bit by bit the distance between the two became lessened, and the spectators were well-nigh frantic with excitement as they saw the finish would be a near thing after all.

"The mare wins! No she don't! By Jove, she does! Come on, Walker, you'll do it yet!" were some of the shouts that rent the air, and the bonny little mare struggled gamely on, but she could not quite manage it, and the judge's verdict was "won by a head."

A triumphant look overspread Spriggs' face as he turned round to look at his defeated rival, who had eased up his mare as soon as he possibly could, and was patting her neck, although he felt he had lost considerably more than the race itself.

Everybody was anxious to console him, and it was evidently a matter for general regret that he had lost; on the other hand, the congratulations bestowed upon the winner were by no means numerous, as he walked his horse back to the paddock to weigh in.

Just at the same moment, Marie was saying to her groom: "You are quite sure of what you say?"

"Saw it with my own eyes, miss."

"Then Mr. Walker must know it without a moment's delay."

The man sped away, and reached the weighing-room just as Spriggs was in the act of dismounting.

Having done so, he gave the poor brute a dig in the ribs. "If you hadn't bolted, you beast, it wouldn't have been such a near thing."

"Well, he won the race for us, anyway; so you needn't be hard on him now," was his partner's reply. "Here, you've dropped your handkerchief; shove it in your pocket," handing it to him as he spoke.

Walker, who had also dismounted, was standing by, disconsolately thinking of what might have been, when he heard a voice saying to one of the stewards: "An urgent message, sir, for Mr. Walker."

The steward beckoned to Will to come to him. "You had better hear what this man has to say, Walker."

"You want me? Nothing wrong, I hope? Your mistress?"

"No, sir, not the missus, but Miss Marie sent me, saying as you ought to know——"

"Ought to know what?"

"Why, that you've won the Cup, sir," said the groom.

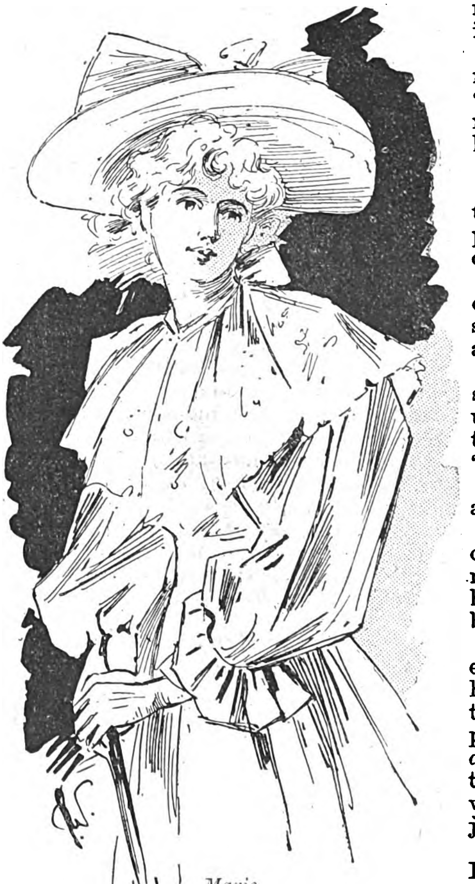
"Won the Cup? How?"

"Why, Mr. Spriggs didn't carry right weight; you object, sir, when he weighs in."

"Object? What's the good? He has just scaled, and the weight is right to an ounce. I heard the clerk of the course say so not a minute ago."

"Very well, sir, ask to see the weight cloth."

Spriggs' face suddenly assumed a livid paleness.



Marie.

"As second in the race Mr. Walker has a right to see the weights," interposed one of the stewards; "just turn them out."

The groom, who was close by, lost no time in obeying the order; there were two missing.

"Now what do you know about this, my man? Don't be afraid to speak out."

"Just this, sir; when Mr. Spriggs' horse bolted, I see him throw something away just as he was a pulling up, and if one of you gentlemen will be so good as to come with me to the spot, I think I can find the two missing weights."

The stewards looked at one another in consternation.

"This is a grave charge, Walker; but you yourself saw Mr. Spriggs weigh in, and he drew the full eleven stone."

"Yes, in spite of two weights being missing."

The steward turned to Spriggs.

"Have you any explanation to offer, sir?"

"If a groom's word is to be taken before that of a member of this Hunt, all I can say is——"

"It is my turn to speak, gentlemen, I think," interposed Walker. "Just now I saw Mr. Spriggs receive from his partner a handkerchief, and put it in his pocket."

"Really, gentlemen, I protest—"

"I am afraid we must ask you to submit it to examination; a pocket-handkerchief up or down can't make much difference."

"Take it then," said the now discomforted winner, as he hastily strode away, after throwing the article on the ground.

"By Jove! the man's right," said the steward, as he picked it up, and a small tin phial fell to the ground with a heavy thud. "Why, it is weighted!"

"What on earth is it? Let's have a look! Here, pass it this way!"

"I think you will find that phial contains quicksilver, unless I am mistaken," said a bookmaker; "I have known this dodge worked before."

"Let's weigh it. By Jove! it's exactly 5 lbs. Well, Walker, you have my best congratulations," said the steward, who had taken a prominent part in the unexpected dénouement; "if ever a man deserved to win a race you did, after the way you were baulked at the water-jump."

"Yes, it was a bit of a squeeze, I thought; but all's well that ends well. What about Mr. Geall's share in the business?"

"Yes, we shall have something to say to him presently. Of course, he and Spriggs must resign.

* * * * * *

"And so, Miss Marriott, thanks to your good efforts, Carmen has won the Cup, and you your gloves; and I say, Marie—Miss Marriott I mean, may I hope——"

Miss Marie's reply may be safely left to the reader's imagination, I think. S. J. F. N.

A BIT OF HUMAN NATURE

Only a little way from London, not half-a-dozen miles, in a country lane between Acton and Willesden, stands a little cottage. It looks very charming, this pleasant summer afternoon, and through the open window one can see a pleasantly furnished room and a young woman moving briskly to and fro as she makes preparations for the evening meal.

The little garden is gay with flowers, a blackbird in a wicker cage contributes his song of praise, and in the bright sunshine a little youngster, with chubby face and healthy brown legs and arms, sprawls upon the patch of grass in front of the cottage.

An old woman squats upon the roadside, and takes in the whole scene with a hungry glance.

Not a pleasant looking woman, with her dirty white hair, unkempt and dishevelled, and her red and blotchy face. She seems strangely out of the picture, this living bundle of rags, as she sits there munching a crust of bread, and indulging in idle speculation as to the occupants of the cottage.

"Yes, they're all right," she mutters, "plenty to eat and drink. I suppose it's a young couple not been married long, and that's their first little 'un. She's layin' the tea for 'im against 'im coming 'ome from work. I dare say they are 'appy. I wonder what it's like to be 'appy. You can't be 'appy, the chaplin used to say, unless you love someone. It's years since I did, and then it wasn't for long, not for long."

The girl inside the cottage opens the door and steps out into the sunshine. Catching her baby in her arms, she tosses him in the air, and then draws his laughing face close to her and kisses him.

With the child in her arms, she leans against the little gate waiting. "Waiting for 'er 'usband," sagely speculates the old woman; then suddenly: "Why, it's Emily, my daughter. Emily as I 'aven't seen for years. Yes, that's 'er, that's 'er. Why I'd know 'er among a million by the way she 'olds 'er 'ead. What a bit of luck. Why I 'aven't seen 'er not since they sent me to prison and 'er to a 'ome. 'Ow different she looks now. I wonder what she'll say when she sees me, 'er Ma," chuckles the woman. "It couldn't 'ave 'appened better. She'll 'ave to do something for me; so she ought. I brought 'er up, she's my daughter. I wonder if she told 'er 'usband who 'er mother was; p'raps I'd do better if I see 'er furst; she might come down 'ansome not to let 'er 'usband know. 'Ullo!"

The girl and the baby are waving their hands to someone coming along the road. The young wife's face brightens with happiness and love as her husband approaches—a fine sturdy young fellow, with broad shoulders and honest frank face.

"Jack, make haste," calls the girl; "baby and I are waiting; make haste, we've got such a lovely tea for you, haven't we baby?"

He reaches the gate, kisses them both, and then all three disappear into the cottage.

"Tea!" echoes the old woman, as she stands up. "Tea! I think, my dears, I'll join you. You've got a mother to provide for now, and it will cost you and your 'usband something before I'm satisfied," she chuckled again as she crossed the road.

The woman stopped when she reached the gate, and paused with her hand upon the latch.

A strange feeling which she had never experienced before took possession of her mind, a pure good feeling, an inspiration direct from God—"Be fair for once," it whispered. "You have never done anything for the girl except starve and beat her, don't spoil her life now."

"Leave 'er alone, why she's my daughter," and she half opened the gate. "Give up the chance of a 'ome and sovereigns and comfort, not me. Why should I?" As she stood at the gate wavering between good and evil, she could see her daughter through the open window —straight as an arrow, roses in her cheeks and happiness in her face.

How different when they were together last, both of them were standing in the charge room at Bishopsgate Police-station, and her daughter, a little thin-faced, hungry looking slip of a girl, hung on to her skirts, crying bitterly to her mother not to leave her.

But they were separated, the one to go to penal servitude, the other a Home.

"Do this one good deed," whispered the still small voice. "Be merciful. Her husband knows nothing, spare her and the child and him."

She turned quickly and walked from the place, pride in her eyes, and a new light in her heart, and yet withal a lurking fear; she knew herself too well. She had made this sacrifice. How long would it last? How long before hunger or drink or avarice tempted her back to the little cottage? She looked down upon the rags which covered her, the boots through which she could feel the sharp stones of the dusty road. She was old and disreputable; all she had in the world was a shilling and the memory of this one good action. With the money she determined to make her sacrifice complete.

* * * * *

Late that night there was almost a riot in a public house in Drury Lane, a white haired old woman, raving drunk, assaulted policemen, barmen, and bystanders indiscriminately. Shrieking defiance, she was taken to the station on a stretcher.

She smiled when she received her sentence, and still smiling left the dock. She was thinking, "My gal's safe now, safe from 'er mother."

E. C. Waggener.

The Pope's Mule.

AMONG all the choice sayings with which Provence peasants embellish their discourse I do not know of a more graphic or curious one than the following: For fifteen leagues round my mill, when they speak of a spiteful, vindictive man, they say: "He is like the Pope's mule, that kept her kick for seven years."

I have long sought the origin of this proverb, and have at last found what I wanted—the history of the mule, and of that famous kick. It is a pretty story, and I will try to tell it to you just as I read it yesterday morning in a manuscript coloured by time and well perfumed with dried lavender.

He who did not see Avignon in the days of the Popes has seen nothing. Never was there such a city for gaiety, animation, and fêtes. From morning till night there were processions and pilgrimages; streets strewn with flowers and hung with tapestry; soldiers singing Latin in the squares; cardinals arriving on the Rhone with galleys decked with flags and banners floating in the wind.

The houses which crowded about the grand papal palace hummed like bees round their hive with the tic-tac of the lace-looms, the flying of the shuttles, weaving the gold of the chasubles, the little hammers of the sculptors, the music of the lute-makers, and the songs of the weavers. Above was the constant ringing of the chimes, and below the constant drumming of the tambourines upon the bridge.

There was one Pope in particular—a good old man, called Boniface—and, oh, how many tears were shed at Avignon when he died! He was such an amiable and engaging prince; he smiled at you so sweetly from the back of his mule; and he gave you his benediction so politely, no matter whether you were a poor little madder-picker or a grand city magistrate. He was a true Pope of Yvetot—but of an Yvetot in Provence—with something subtle in his smile, a sprig of sweet marjoram in his hat, and not a sign of a sweetheart. The only sweetheart which this good father had ever known was his vineyard—a little vineyard which he himself had planted among the myrtles at Châteauneuf, three leagues from Avignon.

Next to his vineyard, the dearest thing in the world to the Pope was his mule. The good man was passionately fond of this beast. Every night before retiring he went to see that the stable door was closed, and that there was nothing lacking about the manger; and he never left the table without having prepared a great basin of French wine, with plenty of sugar and spices, which he took to her himself, despite the observations of his cardinals. But it must be admitted that the brute was worth the trouble. She was a beautiful black mule, with red spots, a glossy coat, large and full hindquarters, and sure of foot.

She had a haughty carriage of her little lean head, all harnessed with pompons, bows, silver bells, and ribbons. She was gentler than an angel, and had a naïve eye, and two long ears which were always jogging, and which gave her the appearance of a good girl. All Avignon respected her, and when she passed along the streets there was nothing in the way of politeness that was not shown to her, for everybody knew that this was the surest way of standing well at court, and that she, with her innocent air, had led more than one person to fortune. In proof of this latter, witness the remarkable adventures of Tistet Vedene.

Tistet Vedene was an impudent rascal whom his father, a gold engraver, had been obliged to drive from his house because he refused to work. For six months he was seen dragging his jacket through all the gutters of Avignon, but chiefly alongside of the papal palace, for the rogue had for some time been directing his mind towards the Pope's mule, and there was mischief in it, as you shall see.

One day when his holiness was walking with his beast under the ramparts, behold Tistet thus accosting him, with hands clasped in an attitude of admiration: "Ah! what a noble mule you have there, holy father. Stop a moment while I look at her. Ah, what a beautiful mule! The Emperor of Germany has not one equal to her!"

And he caressed her, and said to her, as sweetly as if she were a young lady: "Come here, my jewel, my treasure, my cunning pearl." The good Pope, greatly moved, said to himself: "What a nice little boy; how polite he is to my mule." And do you know what happened the next day? Tistet Vedene changed his old yellow jacket for a beautiful lace alb, a camail of violet silk, and buckled shoes; and he entered into the service of the Pope where hitherto nobody had ever been received except the sons of noblemen and the nephews of cardinals.

Nor did he stop there. Once in the palace, the rogue continued the game which had proved so profitable to him. He was insolent to everybody except the mule, upon whom he bestowed all his attentions. He was always to be seen about the courts of the palace with a handful of oats or a bunch of French grass, which he would shake gracefully, looking all the while at the holy father's balcony, as if to say: "Hey! Who is this for?" So well did this trick work, that the good Pope, who felt himself growing old, finally allowed him to watch over his stable, and to take the mule her basin of French wine—all of which did not please the cardinals very much, nor did the mule enjoy it.

At the time for serving the wine she now saw five or six little clerks, with their camails and their laces, thrusting themselves into her stable, and then, in a moment, there was a delicious odour of caramel and spices, and Tistet Vedene appeared bearing the basin of French wine.

From that instant the poor beast's martyrdom began. These cruel profligates brought the perfumed wine, which she loved so much, to her manger, and made her fill her nostrils with its odour, then snatched it away from her and poured it down their own gullets. Nor were they satisfied with stealing her wine, for all these little clerks became so many fiends after they had drunk it. One would pull her ears, another her tail. Quiquet would mount upon her back. Beluguet would try his cap upon her. And not one of the rogues imagined that with a single kick the poor beast could send them all into the polar star.

But no; one is not a Pope's mule, a mule of benedictions and indulgence for nothing. The boys had done their parts well, and she was not angry with them. It was only to Tistet Vedene that she wished any harm. When she felt him behind her, her foot itched for him; and naturally enough, such wicked tricks did he play upon her, and such cruelty did he concoct for her after his drinking. Did he not one day conceive the plan of making her ascend with him in the bell-tower to the very summit of the palace?

I am not telling an idle tale; two hundred thousand people of Provence saw the occurrence. You can imagine the terror of the unhappy mule, when, after having revolved for an hour in a spiral staircase, and climbed I know not how many steps, she suddenly found herself upon the platform, dazzled with light, and looking down one thousand feet, upon a fantastic Avignon, with its market sheds no bigger than hazel nuts, its papal soldiers like red ants, and, stretching across a thread of silver, a little microscopic bridge upon which the people danced!

The poor animal roved disconsolately about the platform, her mind full of Tistet Vedene. "Ah, you ruffian," she thought, "if I escape from here, what a kick you shall have to-morrow morning."

This thought of the kick put a little heart into her legs, and without it she would have dropped. At length the people arrived to bring her down, but it proved a serious affair. It was necessary to lower her with ropes, a jackscrew, and a handbarrow. And think what a humiliation it was for a Pope's mule to find herself dangling from such a height, and working her feet like a May bug on the end of a thread, and all Avignon looking at her!

The unhappy beast could not sleep that night on account of it. It seemed to her all the time as if she were still whirling round on that platform, with the city laughing at her from below. Then, too, she kept thinking of that infamous Tistet Vedene, and of the fine kick which she proposed to send after him the next morning. Ah, my friends, what a kick that was to be! The smoke of it would be visible from Pampeluna.

But while this beautiful reception was being prepared for Tistet in the stable, do you know what he was doing? He was singing and sailing down the Rhone on a papal galley, on his way to the court of Naples with a troop of young nobles, whom the city sent every year to Queen Joan to perfect themselves in diplomacy and good manners. Tistet was not of noble birth, but the Pope wished to reward him for the care which he had given to his beast, and especially for the activity which he had displayed on the day of her rescue from the tower.

So the mule was disappointed the next morning. "Ah! the ruffian! he suspected something," she thought, as she shook her bells with rage. "But no matter; go along, you wicked fellow; you will find your kick on your return. I will keep it for you." And she did keep it for him.

Seven years passed, and then Tistet Vedene returned from the court at Naples. He had not served his full time there, but he had heard that the first mustard-maker to the Pope had just died suddenly at Avignon, and, as the position seemed a good one to him, he had hurried back to apply for it. When this intriguer entered the hall of the palace the good father had trouble in recognising him, so large had he grown.

But, on the other hand, the good Pope had grown old, and could no longer see well without his glasses.

But Tistet, not at all intimidated, said:

"What, holy father, do you not know me? It is I—Tistet Vedene."

"Vedene?"

"Yes; you know me well—he who used to carry the French wine to your mule."

"Ah, yes, yes. I remember! A good little boy, that Tistet Vedene. And what is it that he now desires of us?"

"Oh, holy father, it is only a little thing that I have come to ask of you. By the way, have you your mule still? And is she well? Ah! so much the better. I came to ask you for the position of the first mustard-maker, who has just died."

"First mustard-maker! You! But you are too young. How old are you?"

"Twenty years and two months, illustrious pontiff; just five years older than your mule. Ah! the gallant beast. If you only knew how I loved that mule! How I languished for her in Italy! Would you not let me see her?"

"Yes, my child, you shall see her," said the Pope, greatly overcome; "and since you love her so much, I no longer wish you to live far away from her. From this day I make you my first mustard maker. My cardinals will cry out about it, but so much the worse for them. I am used to it. Come to us to-morrow at the close of vespers, and we will bestow upon you the insignia of your rank in the presence of our chapter, and then—I will take you to see the mule, and you shall go with us to visit the vineyard. Ha! ha!"

I need not tell you with what impatience Tistet awaited the morrow. And yet there was someone in the palace still happier and still more impatient than he, and this was the mule. From the moment of Vedene's return until vespers the next day, the terrible beast did not cease cramming herself with oats and shooting at the wall behind her with her hoofs. She was also preparing herself for the ceremony.

When vespers were over on the following day, Tistet made his entrée into the court of the palace.

He made a gallant salute, then started towards the high steps where the Pope was waiting to bestow on him the insignia of his rank—a spoon of yellow boxwood and a saffron coat. At the bottom of the staircase stood the mule, all harnessed and ready to set out for the vines. As he passed near her Tistet smiled, and stopped to give her two or three friendly pats on the back, looking all the while out of the corner of his eye to see whether the Pope was watching him. The position was auspicious. The mule gave a spring. "Take it! catch it! reprobate! Seven years have I kept it for you!" And she sent after him a kick so terrible that they saw the smoke of it from Pampeluna—a whirlwind of golden smoke in which fluttered a stork's feather—all that was left of the unlucky Tistet of Vedene!

The kicks of mules are not ordinarily so dreadful; but this was a papal mule, and only think how she had kept her kick for seven years! There is not on record a finer example of ecclesiastical spite. A. D.

THE CAVE OF THE DEAD.

FAR up in a rocky defile in the Everlasting Sierras of the land of the Montezumas, and overlooking a valley—the Valley of the Angels—rests the dwelling house attached to the Mines of the Holy Children, so named by the Jesuits far back in the dead past. A row of low, straggling adobe buildings reach up the cañon from the mill to a tiny plaza—a plaza containing a few stunted orange trees, a stone bench or two, and a broken fountain that never flows. Near the plaza stands the rude little chapel, so dilapidated in appearance that only a wooden cross lashed with raw-hide and leaning from the roof, and a cracked and clapperless bell hanging by the door, distinguish it from its surroundings as a house of God.

There is a house roofed with rough, red tiles terraced up on the mountain-side, above the church, and out in its wide portico, one summer afternoon, a young man rested in a hammock, carelessly swaying himself to and fro as his thoughts drifted back into the past. Near by, a girl—one of those creatures of the South through whose veins courses that Latin-Indian blood that turns to flame at a glance—stood gently pouring water from an earthenware jug into a flower-pot that hung suspended from the roof. Her dress was simple—some loose, white garment, exposing her arms and shoulders, with a skirt of red material, that fell only to a little below her knees. Great waves of dark hair fell unconfined down over her shoulders, and her eyes, black and brilliant, rested on the man.

The girl had emptied her jug and had placed it on the floor. She stood leaning against the doorway, slowly braiding her hair, and the man, turning suddenly in his hammock, exclaimed: "Ah! little one—Carmelita mia——come here."

"Si seonr," she answered as she moved towards him. "What is the señor's wish?"

As she reached his side, he threw his arms round her, and drawing her face down to his, pressed a kiss to her lips.

Like a flash she tore herself from him and stood trembling out of his reach, a flame of angry protest darting from the depths of her eyes as she cried: "Caramba! What would you!" Then she struck him with her clenched hand, and bursting into tears, passed into the house.

"The little vixen!" exclaimed the man. "Well, somehow, her lips seemed to say, 'drink me,' and I have kissed her, even if she is only my housekeeper's daughter." Then stretching back in his hammock, Maurice Stanton, superintendent of the Mines of the Holy Children, made himself comfortable for his midday siesta.

As the days sped by, he made his peace with Carmelita, and after a while they would sit out on the portico during the evening, talking, or would wander up the cañon to a shrine, where a rude figure of a Madonna, with the Blessed Babe in her arms, had been carved in the rock by hands crumbled to dust long years ago; there was a little spring there, too, and a stone seat beside it, and there, one evening, he passed his arm gently round her and drew her to him. She did not resist.

"Kiss me, Carmelita," he whispered; "kiss me," and as she complied he felt her tremble in his arms. He released her, and she dashed from him down the pathway, and—he knew that he had won her.

It was during the following month that Señor Don José Sandoval, owner of the Mines of the Holy Children, arrived from the City of Mexico on his semi-annual visit of inspection. Accompanying him were two ladies, his sister, the Señora Gonzales, and his foster-daughter, Señorita Guadalupe Calderon, the sole descendent of an old Castilian family.

It was late in the afternoon of the day of her arrival that Stanton met her. She was leaning against the balustrade of the portico, gazing out over the roofs of the low houses to where a flock of doves rose and fell like a soft, undulating cloud of grey, and long afterwards he remembered her as he saw her then, a tall girl, taller than most, with great brown eyes, and with a wealth of hair which turned almost auburn when touched by the rays of the sinking sun.

During that first evening she brought her guitar and sang for him—sang those soft, sweet songs of the South; and on the following night they had Carmelita come and play while they danced—waltzed—time and again in the portico, lighted only by the beams of the moon.

As the girl played, she watched them with eyes full of anger, and she suffered, suffered as keenly, as dumbly as any creature, wild or tame, to whom there is a soul. Suddenly she stopped, threw down the guitar, and, darting across the portico, left the house.

She hurried up the cañon until she came to the shrine, and then threw herself on the bench sobbing. "Oh, Blessed Mother," she moaned, "I love him so, I love him so! Why has she come! I hate her! Oh, how I hate her! She shall not take him from me, no! I'll kill her first!"

Her breath came short and fast as her bosom rose and fell irregularly. In her anger she sprang to her feet, and, as she paced up and down, the nails of her tightly clenched hands pressed into the flesh until they were damped by the blood that oozed out. But she felt no pain, not in her hands, but—her heart. "Mother of God," she moaned, "Blessed Mother, send him to me to-night, for I love him so. I waited last night so long, so long—and he was with her. Dear God, don't let me think of her! I'll pray—yes, I'll pray to the Virgin a hundred times, and she will hear and send him to me."

And there, still praying, two hours later Stanton found her. She was all unconscious of his presence until he softly called, "Carmelita!"

With a glad cry she sprang to her feet.

"Oh, the Blessed Lady!" she exclaimed beneath her breath, "she has heard my prayers and sent him." And as she stood there, the moonlight fell on her face, and he noticed that her cheeks were stained with tears.

"Why, Carmelita," he said, "you have been crying."

"Yes, señor—a little," she replied.

"But why, dear? Not for me?"

She cast her eyes down, and with a sigh nodded her head, and then burst into tears.

Gently he drew her to a seat on the bench, and, pressing her trembling form close to him, kissed her. "Carmelita, darling," he murmured, "stop crying and tell me what it is."

After awhile she ceased, and, freeing herself from his arms, turned to him and caught his face firmly between her hands. Gazing into his eyes, her own sparkling through her tears, she panted: "You love me, no?—me?—me? Mother of God what am I saying! You love me?—not her. Is it not so? She is nothing to you, no? You danced with her to-night, one—two—so many times. She shall not have you! You are mine, mine! Do you hear?"

He heard, and with something akin to fear, as he realised the intensity of her passion; yet he drew her back to his arms, and there, with her head pillowed on his shoulder, he told her that old, old story, and she—believed.

Whither he himself was drifting he did not know, neither did he care. He liked the charm of that dreamy, languorous life of the South, and his little affair with Carmelita was surely interesting; but what would the end be?—for end it must, and he thought that perhaps afterwards it might prove a dangerous amusement.

At times, even while with her, a vision of a girl with masses of reddish brown hair would come to him, and after awhile he realised that he loved Guadalupe. As the days came and passed away, he knew it for the truth, and knowing, he went to Carmelita, intending to tell her that all between them must end. But at the moment, thinking of the scene that must ensue, his courage failed him.

One evening, as Stanton was coming up from the mill, where he had been detained until late, he met Guadalupe as she came from the little church, and together they ascended the trail to the house. Then, in the portico, he placed her in an easy chair. Standing at its back, he took her hand in his, and she did not withdraw it. Then he told her of his love, and she threw her head back, raising her face to his. He bent and kissed her—and she promised to be his wife.

A low moan came from the shadow of the building, and Carmelita, standing there in the darkness, gazed at them with all the hatred of her wild nature aroused.

How she passed that night, she never knew; but in the morning she wandered, not knowing whither, up the cañon, past the shrine, and on until she came to where a precipitous bluff of rock abutted out from the mountain above. Here she unconsciously left the trail and climbed to its foot, where, turning a projecting ledge, she paused, and a fear came to her, for she stood before the entrance to the Cave of the Dead, an ancient burial-place of the Indians.

She had never been there before, but she had heard strange tales told of that rude sepulchre, and she knew that behind the slab of rock—ingeniously arranged to open as a door, and fastened with a wooden bar that closed the entrance—was a natural vaulted chamber, and she shuddered as she thought of the mummified dead within. She had heard her father tell of how they were placed round the cave, kneeling and sitting as though in prayer, and of how hideous they appeared, with eyeless sockets and shrunken cheeks, their skin dark-brown and parchment-like, filled with wrinkles and drawn back from their glittering teeth, and with their long black hair falling over the rags, once blankets, that covered their forms, as they rested there in the awful stillness of the death that had claimed them for ages.

She descended to the trail again, and walked slowly back until she reached the shrine. There she paused, and gazing long at the Madonna and Babe, made the sign of the cross. Seating herself on the bench, she bowed her head on her hands.

As she sat there, Stanton came up the trail with some miners, and as he passed he requested her to tell them at the house that he would not return until late in the afternoon. She answered not, but her eyes filled with tears as she sat gazing off into space, while she suffered in silence.

An hour passed, and then she became conscious of someone approaching. Rising from her seat and peering down the trail, she saw Guadalupe coming slowly towards her, singing softly to herself. As she watched, she realised how beautiful the girl was, and the hatred in her heart broke into flame, and a thought flashed through her brain that caused her to tremble and grasp at the bench for support.

Then, acting on the spur of the moment, she rushed forward crying: "Señorita! Señorita Guadalupe! Oh, how can I tell you! Señor Stanton——"

The girl turned faint and gasped: "What!—what is it? Where is he?"

Reaching her side, Carmelita panted out: "In the cave up there. He fell and is hurt—he wants you. Come," and turning, she led the way at a rapid pace; and Guadalupe, doubting not, followed in an agony of fear.

Breathlessly the girls sped on. Nearing the cave, Carmelita darted ahead round the ledge that screened the entrance, and opening the door, passed in before Guadalupe came up. Then, reaching out her hands, she cried: "Here, quick! Take my hand and I will help you to enter," and the girl, complying, stood at her side.

Leading her through the gloom away from the door, Carmelita caught her by the shoulders.

"I hate you and your beauty," she cried. "You took him from me, and he was mine, all mine!"

"What mean you!" Guadalupe exclaimed, as she broke away from her in astonishment, and she called, "Maurice! Maurice!" but no answer came, save the echo of her voice.

As she called that name, Carmelita sprang upon her like a tigress, and bore her to the ground.

"Maurice!" she panted; "ah, you shall never see him again. Diabla, while you are buried here in your living grave, I will watch him—suffer!" In vain did Guadalupe struggle to escape from the now furious girl. "After you are dead," she continued, "dead!—do you hear?—dead like those forms round us, I will kill—him!" and she pressed her fingers into Guadalupe's throat until the girl gasped for breath.

Springing up at last, she rushed from the cave, securely fastened the door, and stood listening as the imprisoned girl dashed against it—too late! One scream and all was silent; for Guadalupe lay stretched in a merciful oblivion on the floor amid the dead.

For days the mountains and surrounding country were filled with searchers for the missing girl; but in vain, for not a trace of her could be found.

It was late in the night of the fifth day after her disappearance that Stanton, tired out and weary, yet unable to sleep, entered the little plaza, and, throwing himself on one of the old stone benches, sobbed out in his grief. How long he had remained there in his solitude he did not know; when, instinctively feeling the presence of another, he raised his eyes, and there, with a look of unmistakable scorn covering her face as she gazed down on him, stood Carmelita.

"Carmelita!—you!" he exclaimed.

"Si, Señor, I. You did not expect to see me, and too——" She did not finish, for he had dropped his head with a moan on the back of the bench. Then, as she stood there watching him, the truth came to her, that, after all, the hate she had allowed herself to imagine she felt for him was only a phase of her great love, and she dropped on her knees at his side. Winding her soft arms round him, she tried to draw his face down to hers.

"Carmelita," he said, as he put her gently from him, "all between us must end. I have lied to you, deceived you. I do not love you. To-morrow I will arrange in a way that will always keep you from want. Now, leave me, for I wish to be alone."

While he was speaking she rose to her feet, and stood with rigid limbs and clenched teeth, and as he ceased, she broke forth with a cry of rage:

"It is Guadalupe you love!" she cried, in her anger. "I heard you ask her to be your wife, but—she never will. No! no!" and she broke into a wild laugh, "She is dead by now—dead with the dead in the cave!"

Stanton sprang to his feet. "What, you daughter of Jezebel!" he shouted, and seizing her in his arms he lifted her up and dashed her from him with all his strength.

Don José and Stanton reached the cave just as the sun was rising over the distant mountains across the valley. With trembling hands they threw open the door and entered. At first, in the darkness, they could distinguish nothing, and then, as their eyes grew accustomed to the wan light, they saw—yes, there was Guadalupe standing before them, her dress disordered and torn, and her hair falling in a tangled mass over her face and shoulders. The fingers of one hand were pressed to her lips, and the other extended towards the kneeling forms of the dead. "Hush!" she whispered, "hush, they are praying—the fathers—wait! I will tell them you have come. Maybe they will not mind—they have been praying for so long, so long," and turning and saying: "Father Antonio, some visitors have come," she placed her hand on the shoulder of one of the dead. At the touch it crumbled with a dull rattle into a heap of bones and rags, throwing out a little cloud of stifling dust.

"It is horrible," moaned Don José, "oh, it is horrible—she has lost her mind! Guadalupe," he cried, stepping towards her, "don't you know me?"

She gazed at him for a moment, then slowly pacing the cave and winding her hair about her face, she murmured: "Maurice, my Maurice, is going to take me away. Oh, if he would only come; Guadalupe is so tired of waiting."

"Guadalupe," Stanton sobbed out, "Guadalupe, darling, I am Maurice. Come to me, dear."

She walked towards him, and standing there with her hands clasped across her breast, looked up into his eyes, her face kindling into transcendent beauty as she faintly smiled and slowly shook her head. "No," she said, "you are not Maurice—not my Maurice. I am to be his wife, and he loves me. No!—he is dead, he is hurt—he is in here—oh! I don't know—I can't find him," and dropping her clasped hands and bowing her head, she whispered: "He loves me—he loves me." Then stepping suddenly back, she threw her hands to her head, and, gazing at him with her great tawny eyes, "Maurice!" she screamed; "Maurice! save me!" and, as she tottered forward in a faint, he caught her in his arms.

Tenderly they took her from that place of the dead, and carefully they nursed her; but the shock had been too severe, and as the days passed away she sank lower and lower, until at last the end came.

It was not until then that she became conscious. She knew that she was dying, and bade them all farewell; though she had no fear of death, she wept, for it was so hard to leave that newly-found happiness in which she had lived but a few hours.

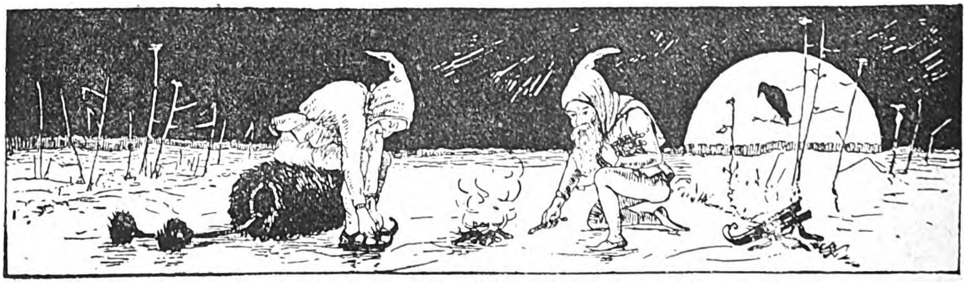
Late in the afternoon, as the last golden rays of the setting sun fell in through the open window and across her bed, she asked Stanton to take her in his arms. He gently raised her to his breast, where she rested quietly for a few minutes, and then whispered: "Maurice, darling, I am dying—kiss me, sweetheart."

He bent and pressed his lips to hers.

"Once again, Maurice, my darling," she said, "kiss me once again—the last—the very last time—for ever—Maurice—in heaven—my husband."

Her head fell back on his arm, and her sweet brown eyes, which never more would look on anything this side of heaven, rested on his face, as she passed to eternal peace down into the Valley of the Shadow.

G. W. Stealey.



"VOX HUMANA."

He had just come off the pier, pausing to light a cigarette on the Metropole steps, where easy wicker chairs stood invitingly.

A woman seated with a book in one of them attracted his attention. She was deep in the hopeless love affair of a young and beautiful heroine.

"What are you looking at?" asked his friend the Doctor.

"That woman—that ugly woman," emphasising the words. "Why, when there is so much beauty in the world, are such people allowed to live?"

That afternoon he was sauntering past the hotel drawing-room, when the sound of a rich clear voice reached him. It stirred his pulses with strange delight, and he stopped, entranced by the wealth of feeling in the tones. The voice swelled out louder and louder, sinking to a breathless whisper as he listened. The singer's expression brought a gasp of wonder to his lips. He dared not enter for fear of disturbing her, forgetting everything but the soul-stirring voice within.

"Fortunate woman," he muttered, "to be blessed with all that is divine in life. A soul for melody, a voice with which to express it, and intelligence to render her songs perfectly."

He was passionately fond of music; his love for it governed his life. Melody was the most powerful agency to rouse his emotions.

The singing ceased. He pictured a girl with angel's eyes, and a halo of golden hair.

He entered. There at the piano sat "the ugly woman"—the same ugly woman of the morning's pity. She wore a brown cloth coat and skirt, over a colourless blouse which had once been heliotrope. A tie of black and yellow stripes, and a sailor hat with a blue veil turned up across her forehead. Her nose was long, her eyes small, her mouth wide, and her figure dumpy. But beneath it lay that great gift of sound, the human voice, which had thrilled her silent listener. He advanced.

"Thank you," he said, simply but heartily. She smiled.

"You overheard my song?"

"Yes. Would you sing again?"

Something in his tone prevented "the ugly woman" being offended.

"If you will sit behind me," she replied abruptly, pointing to a chair. Why that demand? Ah! he thought he guessed. She had fairly nice hair, and a good shaped head, which was rather pretty—when he sat behind her.

That night as he smoked with his friend the Doctor, he said quite seriously:

"If I stay here much longer I shall fall in love."

"In love! With whom?"

"The ugly woman we saw this morning."

Day by day he heard her sing, till the magnetism of the well-loved sound enthralled him, and became part of his life; yet he would never have thought twice of her but for that mysterious organ within. It was the voice alone attracted him, and she knew it. Ah! there was the sting—she knew it!

She accepted him, however, willingly enough when his love was offered. They had parted for a season till the wedding day. She was glad of his absence, since a chill had seized her and affected her throat.

She called on "his friend the Doctor."

"I have lost my voice," she said. "Shall I get it back? That is all I want to know."

"You have neglected your illness," he replied examining her throat, "and I think it is very doubtful if you will ever recover your voice. Even should you be so fortunate in years to come, it can never be quite the same again. You have consumption of the throat and——"

He broke off shortly, for "the ugly woman's" face was transformed, and in its conflicts with emotion became almost beautiful. The small dull eyes expanded, flashing fury, the limp lips set, while her figure towered suddenly to a stately height. She clasped her hands over her forehead, swaying backwards and forwards in a paroxysm of despair.

"You must not take it so to heart," said the Doctor. "The voice is not everything."

"Oh! no," she laughed—"not everything. It is so little to lose—only a voice!" She staggered to the door.

"And yet it is a cruel fate," she continued, still in the same excited manner—"a cruel fate for an ugly woman, who has only her voice to rely on."

She spent the following night in sleepless anxiety, with her lover's image ever before her, knowing in those silent hours that everything which made life worth living had been taken from her grasp.

"I say," he said, when next he met the Doctor, "I hope it is nothing serious about her voice. I hear she hasn't been able to sing for the last three weeks, and—and——"

"You would get rather sick of her companionship without it," his friend replied. "The fact is, you have engaged yourself to a woman years your senior, simply for the sake of a beautiful, soul-stirring voice. Well, that won't last, old man. It may be very well for the time, but it isn't the right thing, depend upon it!"

"I am sure I am not such a cad as to back out of our compact now," he retorted self-righteously, "only I hope she will soon get well. I don't want an invalid wife, you know."

"She won't soon get well. She has consumption of the throat, and——"

"Well——well——"

"You may never hear that voice again."

He started, his selfish nature rebelling against the suggestion.

"You mean it is done for already," he replied angrily,

"As far as I know—yes."

He did not speak for a moment, but seemed to be thinking deeply.

"It is very hard lines on me," he said, "her losing her one redeeming point! But I won't break the engagement, it wouldn't be honourable."

His friend smiled, half pityingly, half cynically.

"I shall just let events shape themselves," he continued. "I'll go abroad for a bit, and—and not write often, you know. Perhaps in time she may grow less fond of me. I should not be surprised if the marriage never takes place now, but I won't break it off—you understand."

"Of course," replied the Doctor, still with the same expression hovering round his lips. "You won't break it off—you are an honourable man!"

Winifred Graham.

Almost a Tragedy.

I WAS spending the evening with my old chum, Harry Falkener, who was just then commencing to make himself known as a rising young barrister. We had dined in his rooms, and now were sitting, smoking comfortably, on the balcony of his house, indulging in a good talk. We had not met for some eighteen months, as I had been knocking about abroad a good bit, so we had plenty to do in exchanging confidences, and talking over our different experiences.

Suddenly he turned to me and said earnestly: "Do you believe in warnings or presentiments, old chap?"

"Certainly I do, to a certain extent," I answered; "but why?"

"Well, I will tell you. You know that I am not a bit nervous, or given to imagining things in the way of presentiments, dreams, second sight, and so on, so what happened to me a short time ago was something quite new.

"I went down to stay with the Burrells at their place in Norfolk for a few days this last June. I could not leave town till quite late in the afternoon, so what with long waits at country junctions, and then a drive of several miles from the station, it was past nine when I arrived at my destination. Dinner was over, so I had a quiet repast by myself, only seeing my host and hostess. The house seemed full of guests, Mrs. Burrell running through a long list of names for my benefit, but the people she mentioned were all strangers to me.

"I excused myself from appearing in the drawing-room that night, and, retiring to my room, commenced writing my diary. While I was thus occupied there came a tap at my door, and a man, quite a stranger to me, walked in. He was well dressed, in evening clothes, and was evidently a gentleman. I wondered what on earth he wanted, and my astonishment was greater still when he informed me that a lady wanted very much to speak to me for a minute, and asked me if I would go to her.

"I told him there must be some mistake, as I knew none of the guests in the house, and I had already seen my hostess. Despite repeated assurances on my part, he so insisted and begged me to come that my curiosity, being aroused, I at length complied with his request, and left my room with him. I followed him along the corridor, then through one or two turnings, till at length we came to a room, the door of which he opened and beckoned to me to come in.

"The room was prettily furnished as a boudoir, and rather dimly lighted, and at first I thought there was no one in it, but on glancing round I saw a girl, quite a stranger to me, lying on a sofa. She was so pretty that if I had ever met her before I should certainly not have forgotten her.

"We had hardly been in the room half a minute, and I was turning to my companion to ask him the meaning of this strange errand on which he had brought me, when to my horror I suddenly saw him spring at the girl, draw a dagger, and stab her. It all happened so quickly before I had time to do anything to avert the horrible deed, or even to realise the murderer's awful intention.

"Suddenly I found myself back in my own room. sitting at the writing-table as I had been when I was disturbed by my strange and unwelcome visitor. Glancing at my diary, which lay open as before on the table, to my astonishment I found the ink was still wet! I rubbed my eyes, and cudgelled my brains, wondering if I had been asleep and could possibly have dreamed such a horrible nightmare in so short a space of time.

"No other solution of the mystery could I find, think as I would. I had written my diary with an ordinary steel pen, which dries at the longest in three or four minutes. That I actually could have had any conversation with the stranger, and followed him to the scene of this horrible deed, seemed positively out of the question.

"I thought and pondered till I was tired, and at last got into bed, though my slumbers were anything but refreshing, and when I woke in the morning everything connected with this ghastly scene was as clear and as fresh in my memory as if I had only just witnessed it.

"I went down to breakfast, and, to my horror and astonishment, amongst the guests I recognised the very girl I had seen in my vision—or whatever it ought to be called—the night before.

"Her name, I found, was Maud Lefroy. She was an only child, and with her mother, who was a widow, was staying the week at the Burrells'.

"I naturally was very interested in them after my strange experience, and before the week was over I was on terms of good friendship with both mother and daughter, and they gave me their address, and pressed me warmly to come and see them in town.

"A day or two after my return to town I was walking along Piccadilly, when my attention became riveted on a man immediately in front of me. There was nothing remarkable in his appearance to justify my thus noticing him and singling him out amongst the crowd, but, despite myself, I kept on watching him, and a strange feeling of excitement came over me.

"At last I could stand it no longer, and was just going to overtake and pass him to see if it was anyone I knew, when he stopped suddenly to hail a hansom, and in doing so turned round, and I saw his face clearly. It was the face of the man in my dream, the man I had seen stab the girl on the sofa!

"For a moment I was almost paralysed; then, recovering myself, I jumped into the nearest hansom, and told the driver to follow carefully the one I had seen the stranger get into.

"This he did, and we found ourselves going down Piccadilly, past Hyde Park Corner, and presently got into Cadogan Square. My excitement increased, for No. 99, Cadogan Square was the address given to me by Mrs. Lefroy.

"The hansom drew up in front of the house, and on seeing the man standing on the door step ringing the bell, I got out and dismissed my cabman.

"By this time he had been admitted, and I walked on to make sure of the number. Yes, 99 was the number of the house he had entered, so I made up my mind at once to pay my long-promised visit to Mrs. Lefroy, and boldly rang the bell. I was admitted, and went upstairs wondering what was to be the upshot of this adventure. In the drawing-room I found both Mrs. Lefroy and her daughter talking to their visitor, who was introduced to me as Maud Lefroy's fiancé.

"Now, old chap, what do you think of my story? Unimaginative and unimpressionable as I am, I cannot forget my dream. It remains as fresh and clear in my memory as on the first day, and I feel certain I have not seen the end of all this. The wedding takes place next month, and I have made it my business to try and find out everything I can about Mr. Rivers, but have learned nothing except what everybody else knows about him—that he is a very good match, is an only son, and his parents are now dead.

"At first, in my horror and surprise on hearing of the engagement, I wondered if it was my duty to tell Mrs. Lefroy of my strange dream, but I could not quite convince myself I had any real right in mixing myself up and coming between two people who are devoted to each other. What do you think?"

"My opinion is that the dream, or vision, or whatever you like to call it, was simply the outcome of an overwrought mind. It is no uncommon thing for a man who exercises his brain to such an extent as you do to fall a victim to those occasional flights of fancy, and you have probably connected these two people with those who took part in this tragedy, because they more closely resemble the children of your imagination than anyone you happen to know."

And soon after that I said good-night and left, wondering if there was indeed anything in this strange story told me by my old friend, or whether overwork and mental excitement were alone responsible for a mere dream.

II.

Towards the end of September Harry Falkener and I found ourselves in the same house, staying with a mutual friend, who owned a moor in Aberdeenshire.

Rivers, whose marriage with Maud Lefroy was now ancient history, owned a moor a few miles away, and we had both promised to go on and spend a few days with them. I had not seen anything of them since the London season had ended, and Falkener informed me that he had not either. The friends we were now staying with only knew them slightly, and we heard very little about them, except that they had not been entertaining at all up in the North, which had been rather a matter of surprise, as Rivers' shooting was the best for miles round in that part of Aberdeenshire.

Somebody told us he had heard Rivers had not been well, and had been obliged to keep quiet.

On the morning of our departure for the Rivers' house, Falkener informed me that that very night he suffered that same experience which had so worried him at the Burrells', and he was sure it must mean that something was going to happen to the Rivers'.

We arrived at Glenaton only just in time to dress for dinner, and were warmly welcomed by Rivers and his wife. The latter, I thought, was looking older, and not as flourishing as when I had last seen her, but Rivers seemed to be perfectly well again, except for a slight irritability of temper, which showed itself now and then; and, indeed, I had never seen him in such good spirits. We found we were to be the only guests till the next day, when some more people were expected.

I went to bed pretty early, as we had had a hard day of it, and we had to be up in good time the next morning to make an early start, and within a minute or two of putting my head on the pillow I was sound asleep.

About midnight I was aroused by feeling myself vigorously shaken, and when I opened my eyes, I was startled by finding Falkener bending over me, his face white, and his eyes glistening.

"Wake up, Hugh," he exclaimed, still vigorously shaking me, and seeing that something really was the matter, I roused myself.

"I believe something is wrong with Rivers," he replied, "so I want you to hurry up and come with me."

While I quickly got into some clothes, he told me what had happened since I had retired. How Rivers had begun to get very excited, talking in the most extraordinary way, and had gone to Falkener's room after the latter had left him. "He wanted me," he continued, "to come with him to his wife's boudoir, saying she would like to see me, and we could all finish up our evening in there. I got rid of him at last, telling him I would follow him in a minute or two, as I determined to come and get hold of you. Coming along the corridor I heard his voice raised, shouting at someone, I expect his wife, so I think we—listen!" and he suddenly stopped. "What was that? Yes, good Heavens! it is. It is a woman's voice."

I listened for a second. Yes; there were sounds of loud voices, then half-stifled shrieks, and needing no further bidding, I dashed out of the room after Falkener, in the direction of the sounds, which seemed to come from a room at the end of the corridor.

A shriek greeted our ears as we rushed in, horrified and appalled at the sight which met our eyes.

On a sofa lay Mrs. Rivers, and bending over her was her husband, talking and gesticulating at her like a madman, while she lay cowering, unable to get away from him. He turned round at the noise of our entrance, and directly he became aware that they were no longer alone, quick as lightning he drew a dagger, and would have plunged it to his wife's heart had not Falkener and I, in the nick of time, seized him and wrested the weapon from him. Assistance was soon forthcoming, and the wretched man was quickly secured and put out of harm's way. Afterwards we learnt what had led to this dreadful scene.

It appeared, for the last two or three months, Rivers had been in a very unsettled state of health, both mentally and bodily. His illness took the form of violent fits of jealousy towards his unfortunate wife, who had never given him the slightest cause for his suspicions; and devoted as she was to him, her life the last few weeks had been a most miserable one.

Unfortunately, that very afternoon Mrs. Rivers had had a long visit from a cousin of hers, whom she had known from his boyhood. He happened to be staying in the neighbourhood, and had come over to see her.

Her husband had always been jealous of this cousin, as his affection for Maud Lefroy was an accepted fact, though on her side it had never been anything more than what she would naturally feel for anyone who had been like a brother to her in her childhood. This visit unluckily aroused all Rivers' sleeping jealousy afresh, and though he succeeded in controlling it before us, it smouldered all the evening, until it broke out in this appalling scene, which we luckily were in time to prevent becoming a tragedy.

W. H.

THE QUEEN OF NIGHT

All rights reserved by Author.

By HEADON HILL,

(Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.)

PROLOGUE.

An octagon room, softly lighted by hanging silver lamps, and carpeted with Eastern pile of such generous woof that footsteps fell noiseless; the incense-like odour of fragrant woods burning in an antique grate; one priceless picture—no more—on each of the eight walls; and a white-draped dining-table bright with the glitter of cut crystal and the dull sparkle of ruby wine. At the table, facing each other, two men in evening dress are seated. Empty coffee cups and the curling wreaths of cigarette smoke mark the close of the repast, and even as we ring up the curtain on this eventful drama one of them—the guest—makes a move preparatory to departure. He is a slim, elderly man, with stooping shoulders and a faded face of the aquiline type usually called, in cant phrase, aristocratic.

He has already half risen from the table, when he appears to remember something, and drawing forth a pocket-book he reseats himself, and poising a pencil sends a curious furtive glance in the direction of his host.

"By the way, Vizard," he says nervously, "I was so interested in what you were saying that I neglected details. Would you give me that address before I go?"

As he waits for the answer his eyes wander to the pictures, to the flower-crowned epergne, to the dishes of hothouse fruit—anywhere but to meet the calm gaze that is watching him from across the table. The fingers that hold the pencil tremble like aspen leaves.

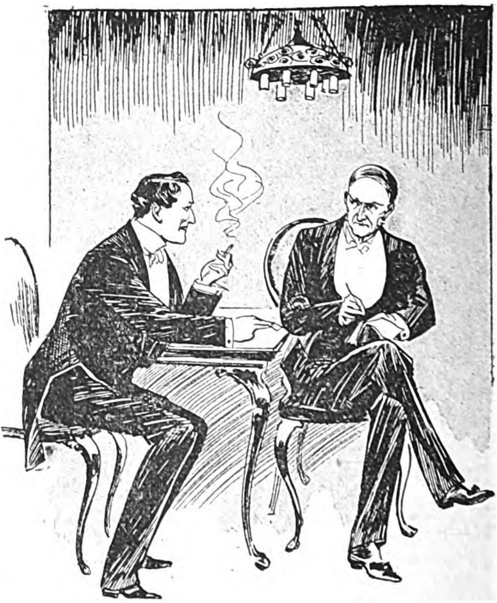
The voice that gives the information is clear-cut and musical. "My dear Sir Simon, of course I will," it says. "The name of the vessel is the Queen of Night, and the agents are Nathan and Co., 315, Harp Alley, Fenchurch Street. They have a West-End branch in Pall Mall, but if you require a special arrangement you would have to do business with Mr. Nathan himself—at the City address."

The host—he who answers the question—is by far the most striking personality in the room. Six feet high and splendidly proportioned, he attracts attention rather by the magnetic power of his well-chiselled face than by his inches and the muscular force revealed in the broad chest and massive shoulders. Clean-shaven, with square jowl and deep-set unfathomable eyes of steely grey, Gaston Vizard, the mystery of four London seasons, is known in the beau monde he frequents as the handsomest man about town.

Yet are there one or two keen observers—women mostly—who avow that they have surprised an expression on those readily-smiling lips that has turned them faint with fear. No one knows his origin, though that matters not nowadays when "dollars maketh man." He is immensely rich, and, in the jargon of society, is "received everywhere," justifying that reception, too, by the perfect breeding of his manners, and by the princely hospitality dispensed by him both here in his Park Lane mansion and at his country house in Hertfordshire. Even his nationality has never been rightly settled. Some say that he is of the old French noblesse, but born in America; others that he led a revolution in Chili and escaped, more fortunate than most of the kind, with his money and his life. For the rest, he might be any age from thirty to forty-five, and anyone meeting him in the street might take him for an officer of cavalry.

The guest writes down the address and again rises with the evident intention of taking his leave. Vizard comes round from his seat at table to accompany him to the hall, but once more he who has been called Sir Simon hesitates, and, with a quick nervous gesture, detains his host from leaving the room. The latter stops short with his hand on the door, and, towering over the shrinking figure, invites further questioning with a mere elevation of the eyebrows.

"It all seems so risky," falters the elder man. "How should I open up negotiations with Nathan—for what you call a special arrangement, I mean—without fear of compromise?"



Poising a pencil, sends a curious furtive glance in the direction of his host.

Vizard takes from his vest pocket a little sheaf of cards, neatly banded together, and, selecting one, hands it to his guest. "Give him that," he says. "Nathan will understand that you mean business, and are properly introduced. You need tell him nothing beyond the name, and do nothing but pay what he asks. The terms are high, but may be regarded in the light of an investment. There will be absolutely nothing in writing. It is the essence of the system to take all risks without possible compromise to clients."

Sir Simon glances at the card. It is blank, save for a red heart pierced by a black arrow. "Good God! how horrible! —a sort of modern lettre de cachet," he says shuddering. "And you are sure, Vizard, that this will be effective—that there will be no hitch! It would be terrible to tempt Fortune in such a way and fail."

There is a touch of amused contempt in Vizard's tone as he replies:

"There are no failures. If Miss Challenor takes the trip under the special arrangement, her health will receive the attention you require for her."

With these words he opens the door as though there is nothing more to be said, and leads his guest downstairs to a splendid entrance hall, where two footmen spring quickly to attention. One comes forward with Sir Simon's hat and Inverness cape, and the other flings open the front door to summon the waiting brougham. A few words of commonplace farewell are exchanged, and the carriage rolls away, leaving Vizard gazing after it from the top step with an inscrutable smile. There is nothing to distinguish the neatly-appointed equipage from the hundreds of similar ones it meets as it turns into Piccadilly; yet it bears the beginning of a train as deadly as any ever laid to mine of gunpowder.

After a minute, Vizard goes slowly upstairs again to the octagon room where he has entertained his guest. Touching a hidden spring in the wall, he reveals a cunningly concealed iron safe, whence he takes a small morocco bound ledger, in which he makes a few rapid entries. What he writes is in cypher, and quite unintelligible to anyone not possessing the key. This done, he replaces the book, relocks it in the safe, adjusts the secret panel, and is glancing at the clock, when, after knocking, a manservant enters to announce:

"Dr. Zavertal."

The subject of the announcement follows quickly into the room, and Vizard advances to greet him with the effusive cordiality of one who is pleased to see a congenial acquaintance. This only lasts, however, till the servant has closed the door and retired. The moment they are alone the show of demonstrative friendship is dropped on both sides for something closer still—for a brevity betokening that their relations are confidential and intimate.

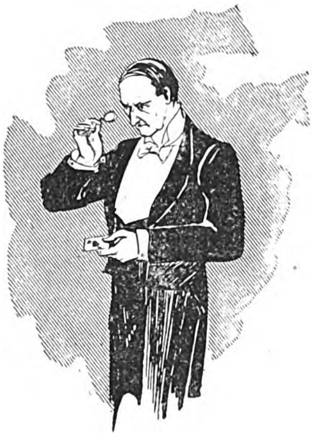
"Everything is in order?" inquires Vizard, not with any anxiety of manner, but as though some importance attached to the answer.

"A most satisfactory cruise," replies the Doctor, rubbing his hands softly together in true professional style, as he seats himself in an arm-chair with the air of being thoroughly at home. He is, in his way, almost as remarkable as his friend—this English-speaking medico with the curious foreign name. Short in stature, he is rotund and stout withal, and wears on his broad weather-browned face a cheerful expression of good fellowship that may well make him a favourite with his patients.

But looking closer, especially now that he has thrown restraint aside, one might see in his blue eyes, smiling though they are, the same steely coldness that has been noticed in Vizard's grey ones. Seen here for the first time in private, and narrowly studied, he would perhaps give the impression of a man who is always playing the part of "a genial soul"; and that the character, though not natural to him, has become so ingrained that he lays it aside with difficulty. Gradually, as he talks to his companion of strange doings on the sea, his face hardens, and the purring smoothness of his voice takes a more metallic ring.

Vizard, evidently knowing the Doctor's habits, mixes a glass of claret and water, and hands it to him without remark, as a matter of course. Then he leans his back against the mantelpiece and pursues his questioning:

"News of three of the 'specials' reached me in ordinary course of post. There was still one unaccounted for when you left Gibraltar?"



"A sort of modern lettre de cachet."

"That was Trefusis, the Tyneside coal-owning millionaire," says Zavertal, sipping his claret, "he died as we were crossing the Bay of Biscay. Hæmorrhage of the liver, with complications, I was able to certify."

The two men look at each other strangely. There is a dash of droll humour in the Doctor's eye, a cynical twist on Vizard's mouth. Then the latter says:

"That was rather leaving things to the last, was it not? The off-chance of having to bring him home for burial, I mean."

"There were circumstances to cause delay. Being in charge on the spot I have often to be guided by such. You can have no idea what trivial things occur to hamper me sometimes. I would rather bring a 'special' home again than take risks," replies the Doctor, with a tinge of remonstrance in his tone. "There was no difficulty whatever," he adds. "I was able to say that the nature of the case demanded immediate disposal of the remains. He was buried the same day at sea."

"Good," says Vizard. "The 'special' department is on a sound footing, then, and will show a handsome balance on the voyage. Is there anything fresh in ordinary administration?"

"Yes; we shall have to find a new skipper for next cruise," replies Zavertal, not, however, as though the information were of unusual importance. "Captain Luck expresses his intention of giving up the command, and I expect his resignation is on its way to Nathan by this time. On parting from me at the Docks this evening he said he had fully decided not to make another trip in the Queen."

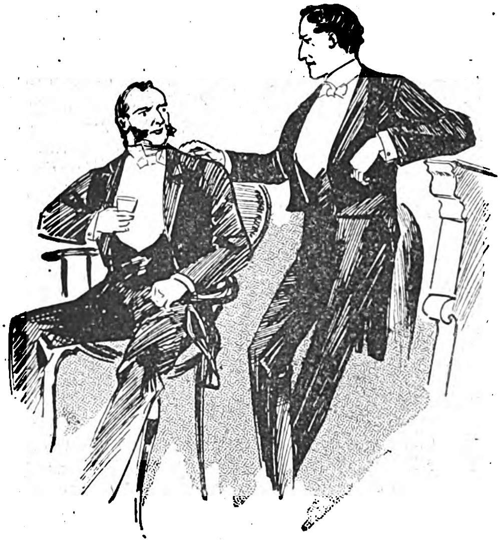
"He does not suspect?" says Vizard impassively.

"Oh, dear, no—nothing of that kind," returns the Doctor. "I flatter myself he would never have left the ship carrying so much as the germ of suspicion with him. He has been promised the command of a steamer in the Australian trade—a regular liner—and he thinks the prospect more certain than on a pleasure cruiser only running part of the year. He has been talking of chucking the berth these several voyages past."

"H'm," reflected Vizard aloud. "Luck combined the three essentials of good seamanship, social charm, and crass stupidity. It will be difficult to find such another all in a hurry, but it must be done. My 'special' arrangements for next cruise are nearly completed, and in a day or two we shall be able to give Nathan the date of sailing."

"Excellent Gaston," says the Doctor approvingly. "And how many 'special' patients do you hand over to me this time?"

"Two are finally settled. The young Earl of Darranmore, a boy of fourteen, fresh from Eton: and Desmond Orlebar, a country gentleman of Hampshire," replies Vizard with the coolness of an auctioneer cataloguing his "lots." "The first goes at the instance of his uncle, Ralph Darran, who is next heir to the title: and the second under the auspices of his wife, who I suppose has some feminine reason for desiring a change. Then to-night I have had Sir Simon Crawshay here. I have been playing the half-hearted coward quite a long while for his ward, the rich Miss Challenor, and he is as good as captured at last. He went away after dinner with the usual introduction to Nathan in his pocket, and you know how that pans out."



"Kennard is in Europe."

"Yes, they never draw back when they have confided in you so far as to extract that gentle missive," assents the Doctor. "We may count on three, then—all told—and quite as many as I care to have on one trip, now that the boat is so popular and crowded with ordinary pleasure seekers. By the way, that new rule, that 'specials' shall not be accompanied by the principals too, or by anyone cognisant of the private arrangement, is eminently satisfactory. When we first began we narrowly missed more than one miscarriage through clients, by being on board, having the chance to relent at the last moment."

"I thought that would strengthen the system and lighten the strain upon you," remarks Vizard with the lazy self-contentment of a man who has fathered a good idea. "And speaking of vigilance reminds me," he adds, stiffening up and taking a step forward to look down impressively into Zavertal's upturned eyes, "I had advices from Cincinnati a week ago that Kennard is in Europe."

The Doctor laughs, quite harshly for a man of such genial temperament, and for the space of two seconds the crowsfeet on his broad face deepen into visible channels. Then he says jauntily: "And what of that? I beat him before and could do it again. They make a little god of him in the States—as the greatest detective of the age—but he doesn't often meet men."

"Quite so," replied Vizard, "and his present journeyings can have no concern with us. But, as he alone knows your record, I thought you should be aware that he is on this side the Atlantic. Of myself he has no knowledge, for which, perhaps, he rather than I should be congratulated."

Doctor Zavertal's only answer is a smile of intense amusement. Then, after a pause, he rises, and, draining his glass, says with apparent irrelevance:

"The Queen of Night sinks all obstructions, eh, Gaston?"

CHAPTER I.

HARD LINES.

"DEUCE take the luck!" That was the phrase which embodied my sentiments as I kicked heels in the outer office of the Flower Steamship Company, while the directors deliberated on my case in the seclusion of the board-room. I was as certain of "the sack" as man could be. I knew it from the proverbial devotion of our board to red-tape; I knew it from the sympathetic glances flung at me by the clerks from behind the great brass-rimmed counters; I knew it from what good old Beatson—kindliest of skippers—prophesied when he promised to "speak a word"; and, above all, I knew it because I am a sailor, and, believing in presentiments, believed in that which told me that my hours as first officer of the Dahlia were numbered.

Directors are fond of letting their jaw-tackle run, so as they are safe for another ten minutes before they have me in for sentence, I may as well spend the interval in overhauling my log of what has thrown me on my beam-ends. My name is Cyril Forrester, at that time thirty years old, five feet ten in my stockings, sound in wind and limb, and holding a master's certificate in the mercantile marine, though never yet in command of a vessel, and under present circumstances, never likely to be. The Flower Line of steamships, as every one knows, plies between London and Calcutta, touching at the chief Mediterranean ports; and the little incident that gave those grim old hunkses in the board-room the chance to get their knives into me occurred on the last voyage out.

We had left London on a Tuesday afternoon, and all went well till the following Thursday morning, when we were steaming a steady fifteen knots across the mouth of the Channel. It was my watch, and except for the quartermaster, who was steering, I was alone upon the bridge, the Captain being at breakfast in the saloon. The weather was thick, with a nasty, choppy sea, and the third officer, who shared my charge of the deck, was forward on the fo'castle seeing that the look-out man didn't go to sleep.

Suddenly, my ears were startled by a scrunching crash from, as far as I could judge, about two hundred yards off on the port beam, followed by screams and shouts, which told me as plain as words could speak that two vessels were in collision close at hand. Almost at the same moment the haze broke a little, and showed me the black hull of a steam-collier slinking away to the westward, and a smart, yawl-rigged yacht cut down to the water's edge, and with scarcely a minute to float.

Except for the quarter-master, who was steering, I was alone upon the bridge.

I altered the Dahlia's course so as to bring her round to the sinking craft, singing out at the same time to the third officer to clear away a boat. As we neared the yacht, I could see that all was confusion on her, and no wonder, her one boat was stove in, and the rascally collier, instead of standing by to help, was already out of sight in the mist. To make matters worse, I caught sight of ladies on the sloping deck, and I knew that unless the yawl floated a few minutes longer they would be in danger, since our ship came round slowly on a jammed helm.

I was keeping one eye on the men engaged in lowering the boat, and the other on the yacht, when she plunged forward, then staggered back and went down stern foremost, leaving her people struggling in the sea. Our boat was still at the davit, the freshly-painted gear working stiffly, and I could see that anyone who was not a strong swimmer might be swept away and drowned before they could be picked up. It was no time to reckon rules and consequences, and almost before I knew what I was going to do my shoes were kicked off, and I had taken a header from the bridge.

Our ship had greatly reduced the distance, and a few strokes brought me to the scene of the disaster, where about half a score of people were keeping themselves afloat in the best way known to them. Luckily the yacht was too small to have sucked them down. An elderly gentleman in flannels, with a life-belt on, was hanging on to a spar, and a man who looked like the sailing-master was supporting a lady who was screaming at the top of her voice some word which I could not make out. The rest, all men, and evidently the crew, were swimming strongly towards the Dahlia.

I was beginning to think that I had been rather too officious, when a draggled wisp of blue serge, rising in the water between me and the gentleman on the spar, caused me to change my mind and feel glad that I had come. It was the insensible form of a woman, floating limply to the surface for the first time after immersion, and on the point of sinking again when I managed to grab her by the arm. I noticed no more than that she was young and lay quite a featherweight in my embrace, for my chief concern was now with the arrival of the boat. Looking round I was glad to see it coming towards us fast, while the Dahlia herself was standing on at quarter speed lest she should run down the yacht's crew who were already reaching her side. Seeing how I was hampered, the third officer steered his boat straight for us, and, after picking us up, went on for the sailing-master and his burden, last of all taking in the man on the spar.

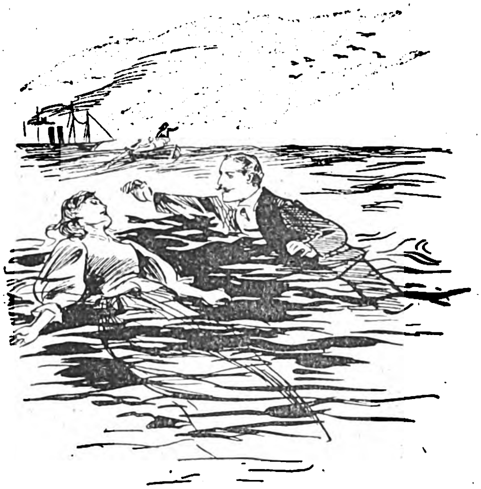
Five minutes later we were all safe on board the Dahlia, and the two ladies, who were alone the worse for the accident, were handed over to our surgeon and stewardess. The passengers, who had come up from the saloon to witness the rescue, crowded round me with the usual fuss of congratulation and curiosity, so that another ten minutes passed before I could slip into dry clothes and join the Captain on the bridge. He shook hands with me warmly, but he was looking as solemn as a church.

"This is going to end badly, Forrester, I am afraid," he said. "You only did what any decent chap would have done, but you know as well as I do that it was dead against the rules. To leave the bridge with no one in charge is a heinous crime with the wiseacres of Leadenhall Street, and I am bound to log the incident."

"I never gave the rule a thought," I said, "and I don't believe it would have made any difference if I had."

There having been no loss of life the excitement soon calmed down, and we stood on our course southward. It was ascertained that the sunken yacht Norah had been chartered for a channel cruise by Sir Simon Crawshay, the elderly man who had saved himself by clinging to a spar, and that the ladies were respectively his sister, Mrs. Beauchamp, and his ward, Miss Aline Challenor, the latter being the girl whom I had managed to pick up. In the course of the morning I heard that Miss Challenor had revived quickly under the surgeon's treatment, and that Sir Simon had decided to go on in the Dahlia to Naples, whence he would be able to take his party home overland more expeditiously than from Gibraltar.

I saw no more of the ladies that day, but during the afternoon, being off duty, I was talking to some of our own passengers on deck when Captain Beatson passed in conversation with Sir Simon. The latter had been fitted with dry clothes by some passenger, and he appeared to be none the worse for his dip. I cannot say that I took much of a liking for the man. I saw by the furtive way he kept his eyes askance that he had recognised me, and one would have thought that under the circumstances he would have wished to say something civil. But they passed and repassed several times on their promenade, Sir Simon always at that moment finding an object of interest at the other side of the deck, and Captain Beatson too busy with his discussion to notice surroundings. At about the fifth turn, however, the skipper's eyes chanced my way, and he at once brought his companion to a halt, introducing me as the officer who had got Miss Challenor into the boat.



It was the insensible form of a woman.

* * * * * *

It was not till the next morning that Aline Challenor appeared on deck, and I formed the acquaintance that was destined to lead to such wonderful things. I can see her now, as she came forward with both hands outstretched—a dainty fairy of a girl, with a clear fresh complexion and real violet eyes that could be frank without being forward. Her own simple blue serge yachting dress had been dried and put to rights for her, and I should never have recognised in the smart little figure the poor, pale, half-drowned creature whom I had held in my arms the day before. As she thanked me in a few frank words for my help I thought I had never seen such a pretty girl before, and—there! as the whole of the story hinges on it there is no need for secrecy—I fell over heels in love with her there and then.

"I am very glad to have been of use," I said, trying not to show my admiration in my face. "But there is really no reason why you especially should thank me. You see I just 'went it blind,' and it was as likely to have been one of the others I chanced upon as you. I am glad it wasn't, though."

"You shall not rob me of my gratitude," she replied. "At any rate it didn't happen to be one of the others, and it did happen to be me, and—and I shall never forget it."

From that beginning our friendship grew rapidly, as it only can on shipboard, and by the time the Dahlia's bows were turned eastward through the Straits, it had brightened into that later phase of friendship, in which, without awkwardness, there can be long silences. Sir Simon's demeanour towards me continued curt and distant—that of his sister, Mrs. Beauchamp, equally so—but he could not very well forbid his ward to speak to the man who had saved her life; and though it was plain that he viewed our increasing intimacy with dislike, he probably counted on the coming separation at Naples to put an end to it.

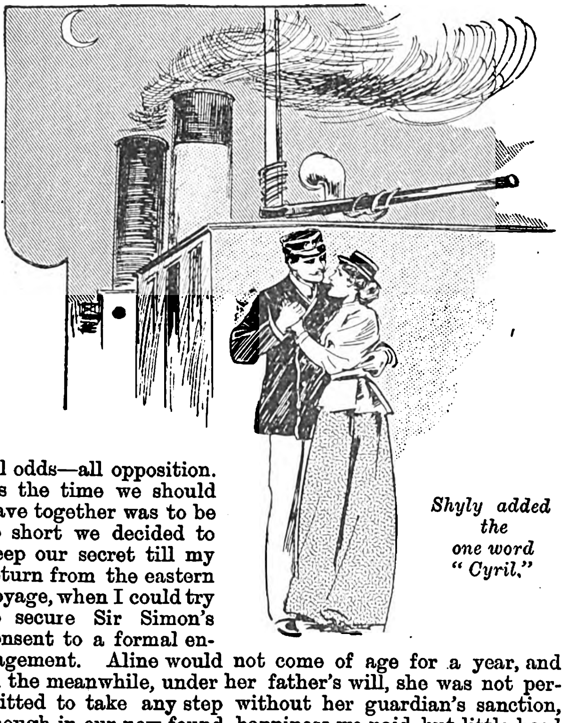
If so, he was out of his reckoning by about thirty hours. We were that time distant from our port of call, and I remember, as if it were yesterday, what a beautiful Mediterranean evening it was, when Aline and I shook off the chrysalis shell of friendship for the golden butterfly of love. I found her behind the aft wheelhouse—that time-honoured tryst of sea-going lovers—and for several minutes we watched the white streak eddying from the screw. Then I said:

"Aline, are you sorry that your voyage on the Dahlia is so nearly at an end?"

It was the first time I had called her by her Christian name, a fact of which the significance will be appreciated by those who have "been there" themselves. Her answer came, faltering a little, but prompt enough for me:

"You know I shall," and then after a pause was shyly added the one word—"Cyril."

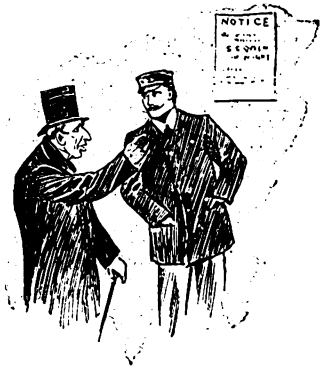
This is no love story—there is sterner work ahead—and I have not space, even if I had the will, to write down here the words in which my sweet girl and I plighted our troth. All I can say is, that though I had seen thirty years without any sweethearting, it came natural enough at last, and that when we left the shelter of the wheelhouse we were bound by every promise to be faithful to each other against all odds—all opposition. As the time we should have together was to be so short we decided to keep our secret till my return from the eastern voyage, when I could try to secure Sir Simon's consent to a formal engagement. Aline would not come of age for a year, and in the meanwhile, under her father's will, she was not permitted to take any step without her guardian's sanction, though in our new-found happiness we paid but little heed to possible opposition from that quarter. At the worst there would be but nine months from the date of my return to wait before she would be her own mistress.



Shyly added the one word "Cyril."

So we parted, full of hope and mutual trust, in the bright sunshine of Naples Bay, and here I was on the day after the Dahlia's return waiting to be carpeted for the "grave dereliction of duty" which had given Aline back her life. Even as I came to the end of my reverie a bell rang, and a clerk invited me to step into the board-room, where one glance at the faces of my censors told me my fate at once. The chairman, an old fellow whiskered all round his face like a cat, and having a fierce eye, rose at once—rose, too, as if he liked the job.

"We have fully considered your case, Mr. Forrester," he said. "While quite recognising the gallantry of your act, we cannot pass over the breach of the company's rule which forbids an officer to leave the bridge till another officer has come up to take his place. As a practical sailor you must see that the ship, and—ahem—the lives of the passengers, might be endangered by such an irregularity. We regret it exceedingly on many grounds, but your employment by the company must terminate with the voyage just concluded."



A little shrivelled old Jew.

On the whole I managed to keep my temper, but I said a few polite things about their rules which made the old gentlemen look very thoughtful before I bowed myself out and stepped down into the street, a cast-off servant. My first impulse was to charter a hansom and drive to the address in Grosvenor Square, at which Aline had said I should find her, but then there rushed over me the sudden remembrance that the situation had altered. For the present I was a broken man, and though I did not despair of getting another berth, a feeling of pride urged me to take some steps to that end before presenting myself to Sir Simon. I knew not then that my girl was a great heiress, and that a first mate's proposal for her hand would be nearly as presumptuous as that of a penniless pavement-trotter.

I knew a restaurant near Fenchurch Street Station, where the shipping newspapers were taken, and thither I made my way to see if the advertisement columns had anything in store for me. As I entered my eye was caught by a written notice stuck on the wall. It ran as follows:—

"The owners of the screw steamship the Queen of Night, 7,000 tons, used as a pleasure cruiser or ocean yacht, require a commander having the necessary certificates. In addition to the usual qualifications as to seamanship, etc., he must be of good social address and able to act as host to the passengers on terms of equality. Apply to Nathan and Co., 315, Harp Alley, Fenchurch Street."

As I finished reading, and before I had digested the words, a lean hand was laid upon my shoulder, while a garlic-flavoured voice croaked in my ear:

"The notish is to your liking, my young captain, I hope?"

Turning quickly on my heel I saw that he who had accosted me was a little shrivelled old Jew, or, rather, the quintessence of about fifty Jews boiled into one, so pronounced were the national characteristics of fleshy lip, hooked nose, and shining protuberant eyes that looked up at me with a cunning leer.

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE MISERY OF CORPULENCY.

A copy has come to hand of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (246 pages), the clever little volume which, more than anything else, has brought a revolution in the treatment of obesity. That the still larger circulation implied by the issue of the new edition of this popular work is necessary is proved by such a paragraph as the following. It appears among the answers to correspondents in the "Dress and Fashion" column of a Sunday newspaper with a large circulation: "MISERABLE.—A young girl of 18 ought not to have such a large stomach that no dress looks well. Perhaps you require exercise and dieting." The helpless vagueness of this reply to a young girl who is naturally "miserable" on account of her unseemly obesity is a sufficient evidence that Mr. Russell does well in seeking to make known, even more widely than they are at present, the simplicity, the efficiency, the rapidity, and the delightful surroundings of his treatment for the reduction of superabundant fat. The young girl in question, who might exercise and diet herself for months without any appreciable improvement, may easily learn to imitate the example of thousands of ladies of all ages, who, by the use of Mr. Russell's pure vegetable preparation, have reduced their weight at the rate of pounds per week, and sometimes (but only when necessary, for the working of the cure is virtually automatic, stopping its effects when the normal limit is reached) stones per month. She may acquire this open secret—for the author makes no mystery about the ingredients of his recipe, by sending six penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., when a copy of the book will be sent post free. If she follows his instructions, "Miserable," without any fasting regimen, and without excessive exercise, will find herself being quickly reduced to shapely proportions, with an improved appetite, and full liberty to gratify it.

LONGEVITY AND CORPULENCY.

We have received a copy of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). This issue is in itself indicative of the widespread influence which the author now exercises as a successful expert in the treatment of obesity, while the additions to the evidence which, as a statistician, he is in the habit of collecting on the subject are suggestive of some curious reflections. It is evident that Mr. Russell is annually treating thousands of cases of excessive fat with a success which, in the rapidity and the permanence of its manifestation is truly marvellous. That the enormous popularity of his system is likely to increase in the future is most probable, because it is free from all the drawbacks which have rendered the Banting and other methods of reducing corpulence unacceptable to the majority of the sufferers, who have regarded these cures as rather worse than the complaint. By attacking the causes rather than the symptoms of obesity, he strengthens the digestive organs, thus actually increasing, instead of decreasing, the appetite, while the surplus weight is being reduced at a wonderfully rapid rate, amounting to pounds per week, and often stones per month. Add to this that there is no mystery about the nature of the absolutely innoculous preparation, the recipe for which Mr. Russell supplies in his capital little volume (256 pages), which may be obtained post free by sending six penny stamps to the author's offices, at the address given above. It seems certain, therefore, that, as a result of the happy revolution which the patient research of this specialist, with the aid of a distinguished physician as a collaborateur, has effected, the average of longevity will, before long, be appreciably raised. Obesity is, indeed, one of the few antagonistic influences remaining which, especially among the more prosperous classes, prevent the great majority of people of both sexes becoming centenarians. With advanced ideas in regard to wholesome food, clothing, and sanitary arrangements, it only remains to get rid of clogging fat to live an ideally hygienic, and therefore, a very prolonged life.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL AND STEEL PILLS
FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps from THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent. Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS

FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for SPECIAL TREATISE and PRICE LIST of SURGICAL APPLIANCES. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, GRAHAM ROAD, LONDON, N.E. Please name this paper.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

32 PAGES. TWO GRAND NEW SERIALS JUST STARTED. 32 PAGES.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 351. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 21ST, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well.

APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY,
HANLEY.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S
CAMOMILE
PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S, Limited. 21, Spital Square, London, E.

NORTON'S
Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

THREE GREAT BOONS

1 RISING SUN STOVE POLISH
EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

Risin' Sun
METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

3 MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS GLOSS. BORAX. GUM. WAX. & &c

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

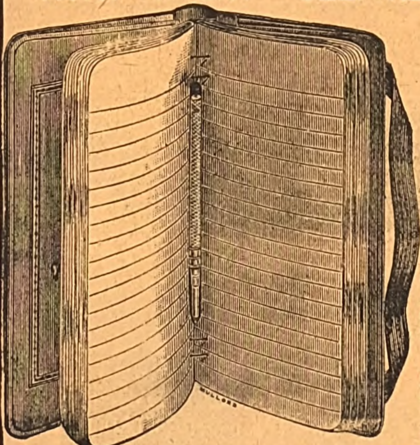
Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.



COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."

THE HANDIEST
AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST
AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

Chronic Indigestion.
(The Early Symptoms.)

The approach of this obstinate complaint may be clearly recognised by Pain, Fulness, and General Uneasiness after Food, Loss of Appetite (especially for Breakfast), Foul Tongue, Nausea, Sleepiness, Flushings of the Face, Redness about the Nose, Sick-Headache, and Giddiness. By bracing up the Mucous Membrane of the Stomach, increasing the quantity and improving the quality of the Gastric Juice, Guy's Tonic acts in a most wonderful way on every form of indigestion.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Will you allow me to add my testimony to the great value of Guy's Tonic? It restored my Appetite, cleared the Tongue, and acted most beneficially on the Liver and Nerves. It also gave me Refreshing Sleep, Freedom from Dreams, and a Pleasant Waking. The Distressing Symptoms of Melancholia and Despondency have never returned since I took the first bottle of Guy's Tonic."

Note Carefully!

It is particularly in cases of Indigestion and Nervousness that the remarkable strengthening and restoring properties of Guy's Tonic are most conspicuous. Its action upon the digestive and assimilative organs—and through these upon the entire frame—is little short of the miraculous.

Guy's Tonic is a pure vegetable preparation, recommended by the Faculty as being the purest and safest strengthening remedy we possess. Simple directions are contained in the pamphlet on "Digestion" that accompanies each bottle.

Guy's Tonic may be procured of all Chemists and Medicine Vendors throughout the world. It is prepared under the direct supervision of a qualified Pharmacist, from the purest materials that money can purchase and the most careful selection ensure.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S
PILLS
FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
SUCH AS
Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ROMANCE
LOVE
ADVENTURE
WAR HUMOUR
PATHOS

SHORT STORIES

No. 351.] [One Penny.

Edited by

C. Arthur Pearson.

For the Week ending Sept. 21st, 1895.

Danforth's Dilemma.

Mr. HOWARD DANFORTH, alias John Detch, alias Mortimer Ritter, alias H. L. Davis—by which last name he was now registered in the office below—this gentleman of many appellations sat in his room on the third floor, before a roaring fire, toasting his shins and cogitating on his fortunes.

Looked at in one light, these were at the very ebb. If payment had been demanded he could not have found the money for the fire before which he was comforting himself, much less for the delectable dinner he had eaten some hours before. But payment was not demanded. Being a specious gentleman of good address, with a fine, open countenance and a large and stylish portmanteau, he was welcomed to the privileges of the accommodating hostelry without question.

Besides this outward show, which was always a large part of his stock-in-trade, his entire capital consisted of two shillings, a lucky farthing he kept to toss with, and an unlimited amount of nerve. Upon this latter Mr. Danforth relied, both to take him through certain tight places, and to replenish his funds when that became absolutely necessary. It had become necessary now, and he was only waiting until the proper time to take prompt and effective action.

The goddess Fortune, his only acknowledged mistress, had placed in his hands the opportunity for the replenishment of his purse. That opportunity took the shape of a bridal couple who had arrived that morning with an atmosphere of love and three trunks.

The groom was a slight, pale young fellow, with a downy moustache; the bride, a willowy girl, so enveloped in furs that one could not see her face, but with a deliciously small ankle, and a charming turn of the wrist when holding up her skirts.

These things Mr. Danforth admired as became a man of taste, but most of all was his attention attracted by the sparkling earrings that twinkled from under her veil. He was an amateur in diamonds, and knew a good thing when he saw it as well as Grubb, the pawnbroker—who, by the way, could be counted on to discount those same diamonds if luck turned that way. An examination of the visitors' book, and a little casual conversation with the clerk, showed these young people to be Francis Drummond and wife, and that they were established in a suite of rooms on the third floor front.

And so Mr. Danforth sat and meditated on these things, and waited for the clock in the church tower round the corner to strike three, which was his hour for business. This rule of action was based on a great deal of practical investigation as to the precise time when people sleep soundest. As every keen observer knows, two o'clock in the morning is the hour when the world turns over for good reasons, three o'clock is the time when it is again sleeping soundly.

By way of preparation, Mr. Danforth carefully removed his pointed patent leather shoes. Then he opened his bag, and extracted therefrom a pair of heavy felt slippers, which fastened about the ankle with elastic. He also took out a silver-mounted revolver. It was not loaded, and was only intended to display to persons who happened to be wakeful, and who were disposed to express surprise at the presence of an unknown and unbidden guest.

All rights reserved.]

In all his experience, which extended over some five years of fortune-hunting in two hemispheres, he had met with but one man who cared to look into the muzzle of the revolver and at the same time make a disturbance. This man had compelled Mr. Danforth to hit him between the eyes with his left, and "upper cut" him with his right, before the intruder's exit was undisputed. He now adjusted the slippers, placed the ornamental firearm in his right hand coat pocket, and resumed his attitude of shin toasting.

Half an hour later, when the clock struck three, he was at the door of the suite on the third floor front. How he got through the door it is not necessary to state, but to a man of his experience a lock or a bolt was as little binding as a spider's thread, and to give away the secret of unbolting a door from the outside would be a poor bit of policy. He found himself in a dressing-room. With a match that had neither splutter nor smell he lighted the gas. In the bedroom beyond a tiny night-light was burning, and he paused for an instant at the door to make sure of the regular breathing of the sleepers. Then he turned to the toilet-table which stood between the windows. It was overspread with a most elaborate and tempting display. There were silver-backed brushes of all sizes and kinds, mirrors, cut glass perfume bottles, knives and scissors, and dainty powder boxes.

Mr. Danforth looked at all these with a loving eye; he could appreciate fine things, even though they belonged to another. He even touched his cheek with perfume, and smoothed his hair a little, as he looked into the mirror. He was really a good-looking fellow.

But other matters pressed. Opening the top drawer he fumbled through it. There was a profusion of neckties, collars, and cuffs, underclothing and fine linen. There were also links for the cuffs, studs of fine gold, and pins of precious stones, but Mr. Danforth put them aside. He opened the next drawer. The linen was finer. It was fluffed and ribboned. There was a suspiciously large pile of handkerchiefs in one corner. He lifted them and disclosed a jewel box of soft leather. His eyes sparkled, and he snapped up the lid. The diamonds within sparkled back at him—two as prettily set stones as he had ever seen, in earrings; a brooch of diamonds and rubies; a splendid tortoiseshell comb topped with rare diamonds. Then there were some rings of various sorts, a pretty little pearl necklace, and a bracelet.

He selected a large silk handkerchief and wrapped the jewels in it carefully, making a neat bundle, which he put into his left hand coat pocket. He closed the box and replaced it. He even laid back the linen, and smoothed it into place, for he liked order. Then, having put things as he found them, something possessed him to go into the further room where the sleepers were.

He walked quickly to the door, and after listening a minute, entered. The nightlight cast a dull glow over the objects in the room. The light fell on the face of the sleeping woman, and warmed into a pleasing colour the hair that lay on the pillow. She was lying on her side, with her arm thrown out, and her lips just parted in the effort of respiration. Mr. Danforth went a step nearer. She turned a little, and the yellow ruffle of her gown fell away from her throat. He could see her face clearly. He stopped, grasped nervously at the bedpost, and put his hand to his eyes; then it went involuntarily to his left pocket.

He leant farther over and peered hard into the girl's face. His lips smiled, but there was no smile in his eyes. "Louise!" he muttered, and the room with the little dot of light faded away.

In its place he saw a long stretch of white beach with the waves coming in, lap, lap. He saw a white umbrella, and under it a girl sketching, while at her feet lay a man reading aloud from a magazine. Once he caught up her hand and kissed it. The face of the girl was the same that lay on the pillow, and the man was Howard Danforth.

He thought of a good many things that had happened that summer, and he thought of them a little sadly. Things turned out queerly, very queerly. If it had not been for—but he smiled grimly, and put the thought from him.

The room seemed to be getting very hot. Perhaps he was nervous; yet there were few things, no matter how startling, that could upset his coolness. But what was all that rumble from the street below, and what—— He raised his head and sniffed at the air. Just then a cry floated up to him from below, a boy's shrill voice, and it said—"Fire!"

He went into the outer room. It was hotter than the other, and his nostrils smarted. He jerked open the door and went into the hall. The smoke rolled heavily along it. What was to be done must be done quickly. Catching up a white gown of flannel from a chair, he bounded back into the sleeping-room. He laid his hot hand on the forehead of the man. The presence wakened him, and he sat up wonderingly.

"Get up," said Danforth. "The place is on fire! Don't stop to dress, but tell your wife to throw on this gown. Hurry!"

"What is it?" said the girl, startled suddenly into consciousness. "What is it, Frank? Who was that?"

But Mr. Danforth was already in the outer room. He stepped to the window and looked down. The street was full of men. He felt for a rope that hung coiled on a hook by the window.

"We will try the staircase first," he said, as the Drummonds joined him. The husband had hurriedly donned his trousers, and was struggling with his coat.

"Howard, is it you?" exclaimed Mrs. Drummond. "How did you come to be here? And can I take nothing?" she added despairingly, as they ran into the hall.

"Nothing," he replied, ignoring the first question. He recalled afterwards how beautiful she looked in her loose white gown, with her hair fluffed about, and fright in her eyes.

They went to the staircase. A cloud of black smoke and red flame charged up at them.

"There's a staircase at the other end of the hall," said Drummond; "perhaps we could go by that."

"No use," panted Danforth, and he pointed to the flame that was already licking the corner at the far end. "We'll have to go by the window of your room."

They got into the room and shut the door. Danforth began to uncoil the big rope. "It's not very dangerous, if the fire doesn't get here before we get away. You must go first, Mrs. Drummond. Better put something under your arms so that the rope won't cut you. So;" and he slipped the loop over her shoulder and drew it tight. "Now, if you are ready, get out on the sill and let yourself over. We'll hold you perfectly secure, and it won't take a minute."

She hesitated for the shadow of a second. Her face grew white. Then she turned and kissed her husband, and stepped quickly upon the window-sill. She swung off, bumped against the wall, and cried out. The men lowered her rapidly, but for all that it seemed as if she would never reach the ground. It was getting hotter, and the little waves of smoke were oozing in by the door.

At last the rope slackened. They could see her lifted in the arms of the men, a white dot in the blackness. The rope swung free, and Danforth pulled it back with great jerks.

"No! No!" interposed Drummond. "I can slide down it. It will take too long to lower me, and you mustn't take any risks. Wait till I get my wife's jewels; I can save them." He made a dive for the drawer, and took out the jewel case, which he slipped into his pocket. The glass in the mirror cracked, and the flames peered in and lit up the room.

"Did you ever climb down a rope?" asked Danforth, as he looked at the young man's hands.

"No, but I can try. If I fall——" But the other cut him short, and flung the noose round his head, almost roughly.

"Now you're off," he urged, and the young fellow went over the sill. He was not heavy, but Danforth was out of training. His muscles strained, and his joints cracked as the rope paid out slowly. His eyes smarted, and once he had to take a hitch round the hook, and lean out for breath. Then he shut his eyes and lowered away, but his breath came fast and his head was dizzy.

Again the rope slackened. With a gasp Danforth sprang upon the sill and let himself over. He twisted his leg into the rope and swung off. He breathed more freely after he got away from the window, but the hemp grew hot under his hands, and he thought he must let go. But again his mind helped his muscles, and he still went down; down, past the second storey window, out of which the flames were darting; down, until he reached the arms that were reached up to him. There was a cheer from the sympathetic crowd that had gathered in the street.

Young Drummond caught him by the hand. "You have saved our lives," he said simply, "and I thank you. You are an old friend of my wife, I believe."

"Yes," put in Mrs. Drummond; "this is Mr. Danforth—and this is my husband, Mr. Francis Drummond; but how did you happen to come to us?"

Danforth rested for a moment to gain his senses.

"Easy enough to explain if one were to explain it," he said with an attempt at a laugh. "But you mustn't stand here. There's an hotel a little way round the corner; you had better go there. We can do no good for this place. It's done for. It isn't pleasant to lose one's clothes, but such things have to be borne."

Mrs. Drummond placed herself between the men, and took an arm of each. Thus they walked through the crowd of people, stopping now and then to look back at the burning building.

At the hotel steps Danforth paused. "I shall have to go back," he explained. "I have some things to look after. You had better go straight to bed. You can do nothing till morning. Then you can get another outfit. It's too bad—and a wedding journey, too!"

"But you will be here in the morning, will you not?" asked Drummond.

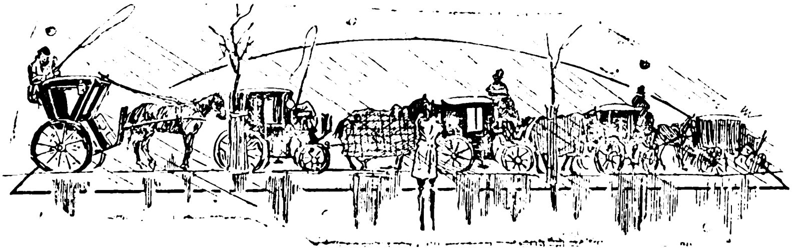
"Yes; we shall want to hear the whole story," said Mrs. Drummond. "Good-night," and she put out her hand. "I will thank you more in the morning," she added, as he touched it.

As they turned to go up the steps, Drummond felt a touch on his arm.

"I beg your pardon," said Danforth, handing him a small packet made up in a handkerchief; "I beg your pardon, but I think your wife must have forgotten her diamonds."

Then, before Drummond could speak, he turned and went back into the crowd.

F. M. Smith.



GOLDEN ✱ STAR.

- - A Romance - -

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

The prologue tells of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, in the Sanctuary of the Sun in Cuzco, on the eve of the Spanish invasion and the fall of the Inca empire. It has been prophesied that when the sceptre of the Incas shall be grasped by the hand of one who has been dead, and is alive again, the ancient glories of their empire shall be restored. Golden Star, one of the sacred Virgins of the Sun, kneels at the foot of the altar and offers herself as the bride of him who will fulfil the prophecy. Vilcaroya swears for love of her to dare the ordeal. On the night of their bridal they are carried away to their secret resting place, and at the same time immense treasures are taken out of Cuzco, and hidden against the time of their awakening. Professor Martin Lamson brings back to England a unique mummy which he has found in a walled-in cave in a remote valley among the Cordilleras of the Peruvian Andes. A friend of his, Dr. Laurens Djama, a very clever physiologist, is present while he is unpacking it. He shows it to be entirely different from all other specimens of Inca embalming, and expresses the conviction that it might be possible to restore it to animation. The Professor consents to the experiment being made, and the mummy is removed to Djama's laboratory. In a week he sends for him and shows him his mummy alive and sleeping quietly in bed. The professor is so overcome by the sight that he falls fainting by the bedside.

BOOK I.

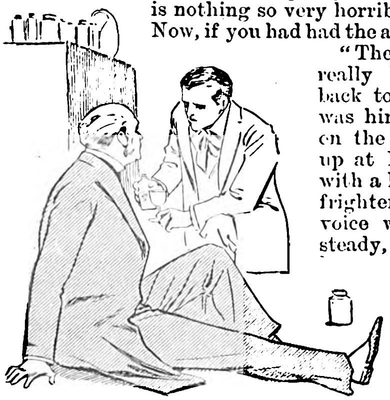
CHAPTER III.

The Waking of Vilcaroya.

When the Professor came to himself he was lying on the floor of the laboratory out of sight of the bed behind a great cupboard, glass doored and filled with bottles. Djama was kneeling beside him. A strong smell of ammonia dominated the other smells peculiar to a laboratory, and his brow was wet with the spirit that Djama was gently rubbing on it with his hand.

"What have I been doing?" he said, as with the other's assistance he got up into a sitting position and looked stupidly about him. "It isn't true, is it, that I really saw—Good God, no, it can't be; it's too horrible, I must have dreamt it."

"Nonsense, my dear fellow, nonsense. I should have thought you would have had better nerves than that. Come, take a nip of this, and pull yourself together. There is nothing so very horrible about it for you. Now, if you had had the actual work to do—"

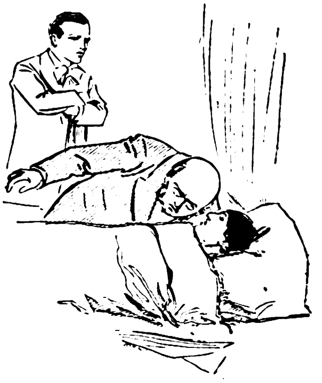


"I should have thought you would have had better nerves than that."

"Then it is true! You really have brought him back to life again. That was him that I saw lying on the bed." He looked up at Djama as he spoke with a half inquiring, half-frightened glance. His voice was weak and unsteady, like the voice of a man who has been stunned by some terrible shock, and is still dazed with the fear and wonder of it.

"Yes, of course it was," said Djama, "but I can tell you I should have hesitated before I had introduced you so suddenly if I hadn't thought that the nerves of an old traveller like you would have been a good deal stronger than they seem to be. It's a very good job that his Highness was only about half conscious himself when you collapsed, or you might have given him a shock that would have killed him again."

"Again?" said the Professor, echoing the last word as he got up slowly to his feet. "That sounds queer, doesn't it, to talk of killing a man again? I am more sorry than I can say, old man, that I was weak enough to let my feelings overcome me in such a ridiculous fashion. However, I am all right now. Give me another drain of that brandy of yours, and then let us talk. Is he still awake?"



Then the Inca's lips moved again.

"No, he dozed off again almost immediately, and you have been here about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. Do you think you can stand another look at him?"

"Oh, certainly," said the Professor, who, as a matter of fact, felt a trifle ashamed of himself and his weakness, and was anxious to do something that would restore his credit. He followed the Doctor out into the laboratory again, and stood with him for some moments without speaking by the Inca's bedside. He was sleeping very quietly, and his breathing seemed to be stronger and deeper than it had been. He had slightly shifted his position, and was lying now half turned on his right side, with his right cheek on the pillow.

"You see he has moved," whispered Djama. "That shows that muscular control has been re-established. We shall have him walking about in a day or so. Ah! he is dreaming, and of something pleasant, too. Look at his lips moving into a smile. Poor fellow, just fancy a man dreaming of things that happened three hundred years ago and waking up to find himself in another world. I'll be bound he is dreaming about his wife or sweetheart, and we shall have to tell him, or rather you will, that she has been a mummy for three centuries. Look now, his lips are moving; I believe he is going to say something. See if you can hear what it is."

The Professor stooped down and held his ear so close that he could feel on his cheek the gentle fanning of the breath that had been still for three centuries. Then the Inca's lips moved again, and a soft sighing sound came from them, and in the midst of it he caught the words:

"Cori-Coyllur Nustallipa, Nusta mi!"

Then there came a long, gentle sigh. The Inca's lips became still again, shaped into a very sweet and almost womanly smile, as though his vision had passed and left him in a happy dreamless slumber.

"What did he say?" whispered Djama. "Were you able to understand it?"

"Yes," said the Professor, "yes, and you were right about the subject of his dream. Come away, in case we wake him, and I will tell you."

They went to the other end of the laboratory, and the Professor went on, still speaking in a low half-whisper:

"Poor fellow, I am afraid we have incurred a terribly heavy debt to him. What he said meant, 'Golden Star, my princess, my darling,' so you see you were right, but poor Golden Star has been dead three hundred years and more, that is, at least, if his Golden Star is the same as the heroine of the tradition."

"What tradition?" asked Djama.

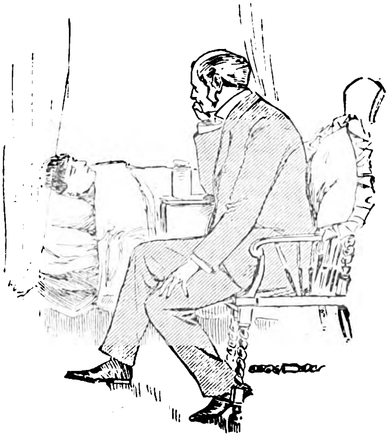
"It's too long a story to tell you now, but if she is the same, then our Inca's name is Vilcaroya, and he is the hero of the strangest story, and, thanks to you, the strangest fate, that the wildest romancer could imagine. However, the story must keep, for I wouldn't spoil it by cutting it short. The principal question now is, what are we going to do with him? We can't keep him here, of course?"

"No, certainly not," replied Djama, with knitted brows and faintly smiling lips. "His Highness must be cared for in accordance with his rank and our expectations. I shall have him taken into the house and properly nursed."

"But what about your sister; you will frighten her to death if you take in a living patient that has been dead for three hundred years?"

"Not if we manage it properly; there will be no need to tell Ruth the story yet, at any rate. I'll tell her that I am going to receive a patient who is suffering from a mysterious disease unknown to medical science. I'll say I picked him up in the Oriental Home in Whitechapel, and have brought him here to study him, and you and I must smuggle him into the house and put him to bed sometime when she is out of the way. Then I'll instal her as nurse; in fact, she will do that for herself; and as there is no chance of her learning anything from him, we can break the truth to her by degrees, and when His Highness is well enough to travel we'll all be off to Peru and come back millionaires, if you can only persuade him to tell you the secret of his treasure houses."

That night the Doctor and the Professor took turns in watching by the bedside of their strange patient, whose slumber became lighter and lighter until towards midnight he got so restless and apparently uneasy that Djama considered that the time had come to wake him and see if he was able to take any nourishment. So he set the Professor to work, warming some chicken broth over a spirit lamp, and mixing a little champagne and soda-water in one glass and brandy and water in another. Meanwhile he filled a hypodermic syringe with colourless fluid out of a little stoppered bottle, and then turned the sheet down and injected the contents of the syringe under the smooth bronze skin of the Inca's shoulder. He moved slightly at the prick of the needle, then he drew two or three deep breaths, and suddenly sat up in bed and stared about him with wide open eyes, full, as they well might be, of inquiring wonder.

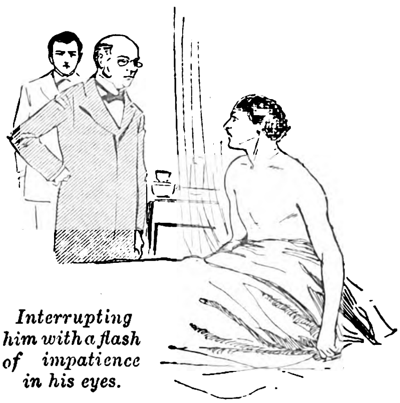


Took turns in watching by the bedside.

The Professor, who had turned at the sound of the hurried breathing, saw him as he raised himself, and heard him say in the clear and somewhat high-pitched tone of a dweller among the mountains:

"Has the morning dawned again for the Children of the Sun? Am I truly awake, or am I only dreaming that the death-sleep is over? Where is Golden Star, and where am I? Tell me, you who have doubtless brought me back to the life we forsook together — was it last night, or how many nights or moons ago?"

The words came slowly at first, like those of a man still on the borderland between sleep and waking; but each one was spoken more clearly and decisively than the one before it, and the last sentence was uttered in the strong, steady tones of a man in full possession of his faculties.



Interrupting him with a flash of impatience in his eyes.

"Come here, Lamson," said Djama a trifle nervously. "Bring the soup with you, and some brandy, though I don't think he needs it. Do you understand what he said?"

"Yes," replied the Professor, coming to the bedside with a cup of soup in one hand and a glass of brandy and water in the other. Both hands trembled as he set the cup and the glass down on a little table. He looked at the Inca like a man looking at a re-embodied spirit, and said to him in Quichua:

"I am not he who has brought you back to life, but my friend here, who is a great and skilled physician, and master of the arts of life and death. You are in his house, and safe, for we are friends, and have nursed you back to health and waking life after your long sleep."

"But Golden Star," said the Inca, interrupting him with a flash of impatiencein his eyes. "Where is she—my bride who went with me into the shades of death? Have you not brought her, too, back to life?"

The Professor stared in silence at the strange speaker of these strange words, which told him so plainly that the old legend of the death-bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star was now no legend at all, but a true story which had come down almost unchanged from generation to generation. Then an infinite pity filled his heart for this lonely wanderer from another age, whose friends and kindred had been dead and forgotten for centuries, and whose very nation was now only a name on a half-forgotten page of history.

"What does he say?" said Djama, breaking in upon his reverie. "I suppose he wants to know where he is, and what has become of that sweetheart of his he was dreaming about?"

"Yes," replied the Professor; "but you won't understand properly until I have told you the story. Poor fellow! I suppose we shall have to tell him the ghastly truth. Good Heavens! fancy telling a man that his wife has been dead for three hundred years or more! Look here, Djama, this business can't stop here, you know. What a fool I was, after all, not to see if there wasn't another chamber beside the one I found him in! Of course, there must be, and I have no doubt she is lying there at this present moment. We shall have to go and find her, and you must restore her as you have done him. Phew! where is it all going to end, I wonder!"

"And suppose we can't find her, or suppose I fail, even if I can bring myself to undertake that horrible work all over again," said Djama, looking almost fearfully at the Inca who was still sitting up in the bed glancing mutely from one to the other as though waiting for an answer to his question. Then, keeping his voice as steady as he could, the Professor told him the story of his resuscitation, addressing him by his own name and ending by asking him if he remembered when he and Golden Star had devoted themselves to die together, as the tradition said they had done.

"Yes, I remember," said Vilcaroya, with brightening eyes and faintly flushing cheeks. "How could I forget it? It was when the bearded strangers from the north had come and taken the usurper Atahuallpa prisoner in the midst of his conquering host at Cajamarca. It was after the Inca Huascar had been slain by stealth with a traitor's knife, it was on the night of the feast of Raymi when our Father the Sun had left the Sacred Fleece unkindled, and when was fulfilled the prophecy that the night should fall over the land of the Children of the Sun. Now, tell me, you who speak the language of my people, how long have I been sleeping?"

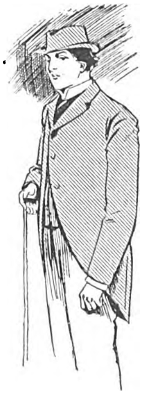
Instead of replying directly, he offered the Inca the cup of broth, and asked him first to take the nourishment that he must need so greatly after his long fast, telling him that it was needful to prevent him losing his new-found strength again. When he had eaten and drunk a little, then he would tell him what he could.

He took the broth and a little bread obediently, and while he was eating and drinking, the Professor translated what he had said to the Doctor. When he had finished, Djama looked at the Inca sitting there taking food and drink like any other human being, and with evident relish, too, and said:

"That happened in 1532, three hundred and sixty-three years ago! It sounds utterly incredible, doesn't it, and yet there he is, eating and drinking and talking with us just like any other man. I can hardly believe the work of my own hands, and I am beginning to half wish I had never begun it. Just imagine the awful loneliness to which we shall have condemned this poor fellow, supposing we can't find his Golden Star and restore her to him! Well, I suppose you had better tell him the truth at once. I think he can stand it. He has been a long time coming round, but I don't think there is much the matter with him now."

Then the Professor told Vilcaroya the, to him, so terrible truth that of all men in the world he was the most lonely, separated, as he was, from all that he had known and loved by an impassable gulf of nearly four long centuries—that his well-loved Golden Star was but a memory known to few, a name in a vague tradition; that the resting-place, even of her mummy, was unknown, and that all that the darkest prophecy could have foretold had in very truth fallen upon the land of the Incas and the Children of the Sun. Vilcaroya heard him to the end in silence, then, raising his hands to his forehead, he bowed his head and said:

"It is the will of our Father, foretold by the lips of his priests, but other things were foretold which shall be fulfilled as well as these. Golden Star is not dead, she only sleeps as I did. If I have awakened, why shall not she? I know where she lies; where Anda-Huillac swore to me they would lay her. Come, let us go, I will take you to the place, and you shall restore her to me warm and living and loving as she was when I kissed her good-bye in the Sanctuary of the Sun, and I will give you treasures of gold and silver and jewels such as you have never dreamed of in exchange for her."

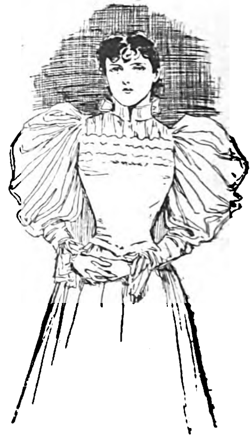


Dressed in English clothing.

CHAPTER IV.

In a New World.

Nearly four months had passed since the reanimation of the Inca Vilcaroya had been accomplished, and he was now installed as a regular patient in the house of the man to whom he owed his second life. It would, however, be more correct to speak of him as a guest rather than as a patient, for in all physical respects he was in perfect health. Mentally, too, his faculties seemed to have suffered little, if anything, from their long stagnation. He had, in fact, shown a quickness of intellect, and a strength and swiftness of observation and comprehension, and a degree of mental discipline, which astonished even the Professor himself, familiar and all as he was with all that there was to be known of the high intellectual development and complicated civilisation of the lost race to which he belonged.



The Doctor's sister, Ruth.

He had already made no small progress, not only in colloquial English under the Professor's guidance, but also in the meaning and use of the strange written and printed signs of which the people of this new world in which he had awakened made such wonderful use. Like a visitant from another world, he was surrounded by all the thickly crowding marvels of a civilisation as utterly different from his own as the possible civilisation of another planet might have been, and of these marvels he was never tired of hearing, listening with a grave interest blended with an almost child-like wonder to all that his new friends and teachers could tell him of the past that had gone by since the far-off night of his death-bridal with Golden Star, and of the wondrous present into which he had returned from the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

There he was, a man full grown, and, in a sense, highly educated, and even cultured, dressed in English clothing, and looking but little different from many of the thousands of the foreign citizens of London, and yet his life-memories were those of an Inca prince of the sixteenth century. He had stepped out of a highly developed and complex state of society which had ceased to exist for some three hundred years, and after a single stride, unconsciously taken, he was standing in the midst of that of the latter end of the nineteenth century.

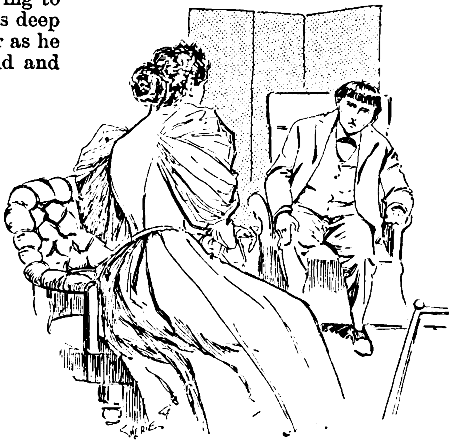
Only the wisdom and the jealous care of those who had undertaken the shaping of this new life of his saved him from the insanity which must almost inevitably have befallen the victim of so strange a caprice of fate under any other circumstances. Little by little they allowed him to become familiar with the marvels of his new world. First came description and then experience; walks in the less-frequented streets, and then in the busier ones; after that carriage drives in and about London.

He had, of course, never seen a horse or a dog, and his wonder at seeing a mounted rider for the first time was as great as that of his long dead fellow-countrymen when they saw Pizarro's troup of horse manœuvring in the great square of Cajamarca. Like them he believed horse and rider to be one animal until Djama had his own horse out and explained by demonstration the mysteries of horsemanship. Then, after due preparation, he was shown a railway train, a sight which tried his almost stoical self-control to the utmost. Then came a short journey, then a longer one, and after that he was shown the marvels of the Thames, with its shipping and steamers. Later on they took him on a steamboat voyage to Gravesend, and, lastly, on one across the Channel from London Bridge to Boulogne.

In all these excursions his constant companions were the Professor and the Doctor's sister, Ruth, who had gradually learned the marvellous story of their strange guest with a fearlessness that had not a little surprised both her brother and his friend.

She was a girl of but a little over twenty, slightly and yet gracefully shaped, with the active lissom grace of the Oriental subdued and yet strengthened by the strength she had inherited from her English mother. She had all her brother's dark Eastern beauty, yet softened and refined by the womanly grace whose perfection belongs only to the daughters of the Anglo-Saxon race.

A dreamer of strange dreams from her childhood, she had perhaps seen less of marvel in the coming of this lonely visitant from the past than either her brother or the Professor; and when she had been told, as she was one autumn night around the fire in the drawing-room, the story of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, all her woman's heart went out to the strangely joined and strangely parted pair of lovers, one of whom was sitting by the fire beside her in that comfortable English drawing-room, listening as though he was striving to read the story with eager glances of his deep brown eyes on the lips of the Professor as he told it, while the other was lying cold and still in her death-sleep in a lonely cave among the wild mountains of Peru.



She assumed the rôle of his instructor.

And then Vilcaroya, in the slow and halting sentences of his new tongue, began to talk of the ancient glories of his dead race and the splendours of the vanished empire that he had seen in the height of its power, and foretold, in a voice that sounded strangely like prophecy, how he would some day restore those splendours, and reign with Golden Star on the throne of his ancestors.

As for him, he looked upon her with something that was very like worship. To him she seemed to belong to some superior order of beings, born and living in another world than his. When first he had heard her laugh he had listened like one who hears some divine music for the first time, and, like a child seeking a dearly-sought favour, he asked her to do it again, which, of course, provoked merrier music than before, and then he named her Cusi-Coyllur, or Joyful Star, after the royal maiden of his own people, daughter of the Inca Pachacutic, who loved the handsome rebel Ollantay, and waited for him in the Convent of the Virgins of the Sun until he came in triumph to claim her.

She accepted his silent homage with a gentle dignity that made the giving of it grow daily sweeter for him, and watched over him in all his comings and goings in the new world that was so strange to him, almost as a mother might have watched over the early efforts of her child's awakening intellect. And soon, when his fast growing command of English made conversation possible between them, she quietly and by common assent assumed the rôle of his instructor both at home and abroad. She taught him to read and write, showed him maps and tried to make him understand how the world had grown since his last lifetime, and told him the names of trees and flowers and all the familiar objects in the world that were so new to him. Then she took him shopping with her and showed him the use of money, and told him, perhaps not altogether wisely, of the tremendous power that belonged to men and women who could wield at will the golden sceptre to which nearly all men and women bowed down with willing homage.

And yet, despite all this intimacy and confidence, he never spoke of the lost treasures of the Incas, to which he alone of all living men possessed the key, save with an ever-guarded reserve which gave no clue to their hiding place. Ruth scrupulously abstained from any attempt to trespass on what she soon divined to be a secret sacred, at any rate, for the present, but once the Professor yielded to Djama's persuasion, and asked him point blank whether the treasures really existed, and, if so, where they were hidden. This was when he had been about a fortnight in the house. He looked him straight and steadily in the eyes, and said, with a smile that meant far more than his words:

"You and your friend the Great Magician have wakened me out of the death-sleep because you wished to do so. I am thankful to you, for you have, perchance, given me the power to fulfil the oath that I swore to our father, the Sun, and I have promised you that when Golden Star comes back to me from her grave I will give you gold and silver and jewels in plenty; but the key to our hidden treasures is in the tomb of Golden Star, and from her hand I must take it before I may give it to you. Tell your friend the Great Magician that, since he is the only one who has the power to do to her as he has done to me, and loosen the bond of death that binds her to the grave."

When the Professor told Djama of this he laughed, not altogether pleasantly, and said:

"I see, the English of that is that his Highness proposes to make a bargain with us—the price of a share of his treasures is the restoration of his Golden Star to life. Well, I suppose it is natural on his part, and after all it is perfectly fair, for in the nature of the case we couldn't ask him whether he wanted to be brought back into the world, and so, I suppose, it will have to be attempted, though I confess that after my experience with him, nothing but the hope of a very big fee would tempt me to do such work again.

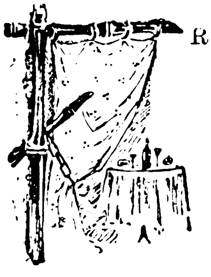
"And then—suppose I make the attempt and fail! As I said before, I shall have to do the work on the spot, and he'll have us there in the middle of that awful wilderness of mountains, and we may find that the Inca ideas of justice and fair play are not quite ours, and things may take an awkward turn. However, we must hope for the best. I'll do all I can, you may depend upon it, for there must be millions in the business if it can only be carried through."

Vilcaroya pursued the even tenor of his new life with wonderful patience and docility for nearly six months in London while preparations for the momentous journey were being made. He saw clearly the immense advantage that lay in learning everything that he could of the new world into which he had come before he entered upon the work of his new life; so he stifled his longing, and set himself untiringly to the study of his new conditions, grasping fresh ideas with wonderful quickness, and holding them with a tenacity that knew no forgetfulness, and so matters went on till at last all the arrangements were completed.

Djama had handed over his practice to a brother of the craft for a year, the Professor cancelled all his engagements, and postponed the writing of his great work on the Civilisation of the Incas till he possessed more reliable data. Ruth had with quiet persistence overcome every objection that had been raised against her making one of the party, and so at last the berths in the West Indian mail steamer were taken, and the day of departure finally fixed.

(To be continued.)

An Unexpected Reunion.



FRANK MILES sat in his bachelor chambers in Piccadilly, pretending to read; the examination which he was about to go up for was getting dangerously near, and he confessed to himself he had not latterly done so much reading as he ought to.

And even now, although his eyes mechanically rested on the words in the dry volume propped up before him, his thoughts were elsewhere, and after awhile he closed the book with a bang, and, puffing meditatively at his briar pipe, gave way to the pleasure of looking back.

Young men of twenty are not, as a rule, much given to retrospection; theirs is rather the pleasure of anticipation. The whole panorama of life, with its vast possibilities, lies before them, and they long to encounter them, rather than pass in reviewing the necessarily few boyish escapades through which they have already passed. Not that Frank Miles' retrospective reverie extended very far into his past; no more, in fact, than a brief two months; as it was exactly that period to a day since he had first seen the woman who was to exercise such an influence, although in a way he had little dreamed of at the time, on his future life.

There had been nothing romantic about the affair so far; it had simply been the infatuation of a young boy—or man perhaps would be more correct, in these go-ahead days when youngsters become men a good many years before their proper time as a rule.

His introduction to her had been quite in the ordinary course of events at a garden-party at Richmond, the hostess being a lady he had known from the time he had worn short frocks; and she had said in a matter of fact way: "Oh there's somebody here I want to introduce you to Frank, a Mrs. Lyle; her husband is in India and is coming home sometime this year, but as the climate did not suit his wife he sent her back in the spring. She is a most charming woman, and I am sure you will get on capitally together; ah, here she comes," as a stylishly dressed woman of about eight-and-twenty came towards them.

"I was just talking of you, my dear. This is my especial favourite, Frank Miles, who is supposed to be reading law, but I am afraid he is not so diligent as he ought to be."

The usual formal introduction followed, and as shyness was not one of Frank Miles' characteristics, in an incredibly short space of time he and Mrs. Lyle were on quite a friendly footing.

"Do you know," he said, "there's a jolly punt lying off the lawn? Do you care to go on the river?"

"It's the very thing I have been longing for all the afternoon; I should just love it."

Now, I am not prepared to say which is absolutely the very best place in the world for two young people to get on well with each other, but a Thames punt is not by any means the worst, and by the time they had finished their aquatic excursion Mrs. Lyle and Frank Miles had become sworn friends.

There was something irresistibly fresh and attractive to her about the good-looking, happy dispositioned lad, who was, on his part, evidently impressed with her good looks, and the result was they ran across each other pretty frequently during the next few weeks.

The lady was installed in a charming little flat in the West-end, and by virtue of her position as a married woman she was in a position herself to play the part of hostess to him, and this she had not scrupled to do.

The reverie in which he was indulging at the time this story opens was suddenly interrupted by the advent of a visitor in the shape of an extremely well-dressed young man, who came into the room without troubling to be announced, and threw himself down into an easy chair with the air of an intimate acquaintance.

"Day-dreaming again, you lazy beggar. I don't suppose you have touched a book this morning."

"Then you're altogether wrong for once; I was reading hard up to ten minutes ago."

"Well, then, you don't want to do any more to-day. Will you come with me to the Lyric to-night? I've got a box."

"To-night; let me see—yes, I've got nothing on."

"That's right, and we ought to have a jolly evening. By the way, Frank, you won't mind what I'm going to say, old man?"

"Not a bit; fire away."

"Well, do you know people are beginning to talk about you and the grass widow? I was at the club just now, and——"

"It really does not interest me what they say at the club, and I prefer not to discuss the matter further, if you don't mind."

"Right you are. I shall come here to-night and pick you up. Good-bye till then," and Charlie Sinclair took his departure.

"Now, then, for one or two hours' sound work," said Frank Miles with determination, as he settled down to the table and again propped the book in front of him. But the fates were against him; a knock at the door brought another interruption.

"A messenger boy has just brought this letter, and wants to know if there is an answer, sir."

The book got knocked over somehow, and he opened the envelope with a pleasant smile on his face. The letter it contained was brief but to the point: "My Dear Boy. What have I done to be so neglected? I haven't seen anything of you for three whole days; come and see me this evening; I have something very startling to tell you, so don't say you are engaged.—Very sincerely yours, Helen Lyle."

The gentleman's reply was equally laconic: "Dear Mrs. Lyle, I have been awfully busy reading, but I have a spare evening to-day, and will most certainly come, Yours very sincerely, F. Miles."

A few hours after a hansom deposited him at the door of the Empress Mansions, where, judging by the friendly, albeit respectful salutation of the doorkeeper, his face was not altogether unknown.

"Mrs. Lyle will be with you in a minute or two, sir," said the trim parlour-maid, ushering him into the well-known drawing-room, and closing the door as she spoke.

He looked round, as if half-expecting to see some change in the surroundings; but everything was as usual—as he knew it, in fact. And it was an undeniably pretty room, fit to contain, he thought to himself, her to whom it belonged, as he took a casual glance in the mirror to see that his tie was straight.

"Vanity, thy name is——"

"Woman, my dear Mrs. Lyle," he hastily interposed, coming forward to meet her, and, having secured her hand, holding it somewhat longer than was absolutely necessary, perhaps.

"Do you know you are looking awfully pretty to-night?"

"Thank you kindly, sir," she said, making him a demure courtesy; "and now please tell me why you haven't been to see poor me for three whole days."

"I have been awfully busy—reading, you know—and—and——"

"And what, pray?" with a mischievous smile.

"Well, I am afraid, you know, I am getting too fond of being in your society; they say people are beginning to talk."

"Talk, indeed, and what have they to talk about? I am older, ever so much older, than you, you know."

"Oh, Helen."

"Yes, I am, quite five years, and I am married, you know"—with dignity—"and that's why I wanted to see you to-night. My husband," the boy winced perceptibly, but she did not appear to notice it, and continued, "is coming home almost directly; he may be here to-morrow, even."

"To-morrow," he gasped out, "then this must be our last evening together."

"You silly boy, what difference can it make. I shall introduce you to my husband, and you will be the best of friends, I hope. But I must give up calling you Frank, for his name is Frank, too."

"And I suppose I must drop the Helen;" with a sigh.

"Well, the name perhaps, but not the personality. Do you know you promised me one of your photos, and you have never given me one—you must have some taken at once. No! no! not now; I don't mean that," as he half got up.

"I had some taken the other day, and I have them in my pocket now, I think," going towards his overcoat.

"And did you get all those done for me, or for who?" she asked mischievously.

"Well, partly for you, and partly for someone else."

"And who is she?"

"It is not a she at all; it is for my father."

"Your father! Bless the boy, I didn't know you had one; you never mentioned him. Is he here in town?"

"No, but he soon will be; and, do you know, I have never seen him?"

"Never seen your father! What do you mean?"

"Well, the fact is, my mother died when I was quite a baby; and my father went away, nobody knew where, and a sister of my mother's brought me up—and in her own name, too: so that until two months ago I didn't even know my own name. I have always been Frank Miles, and Frank Miles I shall continue," he said defiantly.

"How truly romantic; but has your father written to you, and explained his long silence?"

"No, he hasn't; but it seems he has been making me a handsome allowance all the time; and now he has written to his lawyers, who in turn have written to me, for a photo of myself, to send him through them, and I sent them one to-day; and now I am waiting to be claimed—identified, in fact, like they do the Johnnies at Scotland Yard."

"And you don't know——"

"I don't know anything more than I have told you."

"My poor boy, I am sorry for you!"

"Oh, Helen, it isn't that I mind; it is the losing you. I didn't know until to-night how much you were to me, and now it must all come to an end! If you had only been free!"

"But, you see, I am not, dear; and now do you know I have a story to tell you?

"When I married my husband, three years ago now, out in India, he told me that there was a secret connected with his life which he ought to have told me before we were married; but he put it off, and put it off, until I was just sailing for England, and then he said he would tell me when he came home for good, to settle down in the old country for the rest of his life. And now he is really coming, I feel a dread of what it may be. Oh, Frank, Frank, if ever you get married, and I hope you may some day, to some really nice girl, don't ever keep anything from her—promise me, promise me."

"I would promise you anything, dearest, and seal it too, if only I dared!"

Their two heads were remarkably close to each other, and it is impossible to say what might not have happened, had not the door suddenly opened and a man hastily entered.

"Well, little woman, here I am at last."

With a half hysterical cry, Mrs. Lyle rushed frantically forward, and fell into the arms of a tall, bearded man.

"Is it really you, dear? I didn't expect you till to-morrow."

"Well, here I am, pet; the boat got in earlier than I expected, and I only just stopped to call at my lawyer's before I came on; what a miserable light this is," turning up the lamp. "Hallo! I didn't see you weren't alone."

"This is a very dear young friend of mine—Mr. Frank Miles; this is my husband, Frank, you have so often heard me talk about."

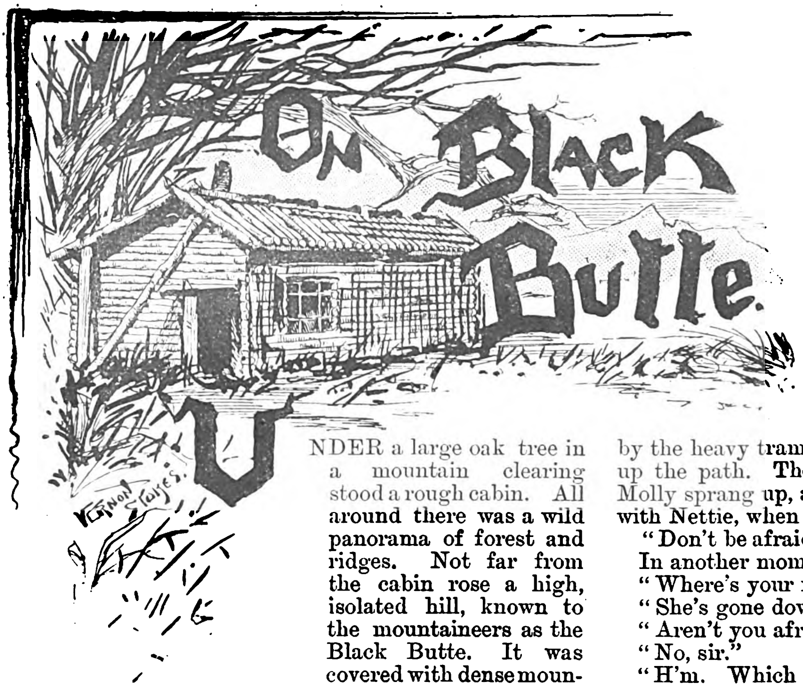
The young man came forward with a somewhat flushed face, prepared to make the usual conventional greeting.

"Good Heavens! why it must be"—taking a photograph from his pocket—and then, to Frank Miles' intense surprise, kissing him fervently on the cheek.

"You know, Helen, I always told you I had something to confess. Well, this is it"—looking proudly at the dumfounded boy—"and nothing to be ashamed of either."

Explanations followed, and in the excitement of parental affection the elderly man fortunately failed to note the discomfiture of the other two personages in the little domestic comedy—or tragedy—which was it?

S. J. F. Newbery.



UNDER a large oak tree in a mountain clearing stood a rough cabin. All around there was a wild panorama of forest and ridges. Not far from the cabin rose a high, isolated hill, known to the mountaineers as the Black Butte. It was covered with dense mountain grass, out of which cropped many ledges of sandstone-like islands.

In this rude dwelling lived Mrs. Dargan and her two children. Molly, twelve years of age, and Nettie, a very pretty child of five, with big blue eyes and long white curls. She was the idol of her mother and sister.

There was a son also, a fine lad of sixteen, but he was working manfully in the sawmill down in the cañon, whose dull drone could be heard when the wind was right, and whose shrill whistle marked the time for the little family on the mountain.

Mr. Dargan, who was a turbulent, dissipated man, had abandoned his family, and nothing had been heard of him for three or four years. It was better for them, the mountain people said.

Mrs. Dargan held the quarter-section of Government land that her husband had staked out as his claim during a "gold rush," and she and her two elder children were working hard to accumulate money enough to pay the few shillings per acre required by the Government, and secure their patent or title. In pursuance of this object, Mrs. Dargan often left Molly and little Nettie at home while she went down to the mill-village to do washing for people there.

The summer had opened very hot. The sandstone ridges seemed to quiver under the blazing sun. The grass dried up; the open hills turned brown. From behind McLaughlin's Ridge, which loomed like a wall against the sky, rolled dense volumes of smoke from forest fires. This settled into the cañon, making everything hazy and indistinct.

One morning Molly and Nettie went out and picked a pailful of wild blackberries, returning to the cool shelter of the cabin when the sun became hot. A portion of the fruit they ate for their lunch, with a spare allowance of sugar, and plenty of cream furnished by faithful Peggy, the cow, who found her living on the neighbouring hills.

Mrs. Dargan intended going to the mill the next day, and, which was unusual, remaining over night, as she had two days' work promised her. So she made a pie with the remaining berries, and set it away in a little cool safe, which was fastened on the shady side of the big oak tree, in order that the children might have a rare dainty to console them during her absence.

Early next morning she set out for the mill, three miles distant. Molly busied herself about the house, and talked to Nettie with an important and motherly air. She felt no fear at being left in charge in the daytime, but her heart sank a little as she thought of the coming night.

About noon she was sitting in the little porch while Nettie played with her doll, when she was startled by the heavy tramp of horses. Four men came riding up the path. They carried rifles across their saddles. Molly sprang up, and was about to retreat into the cabin with Nettie, when the leader called out:

"Don't be afraid, sis. We won't hurt you."

In another moment they drew up before the door.

"Where's your mother?" asked the leader.

"She's gone down to the mill, sir," replied Molly.

"Aren't you afraid to stay here alone?"

"No, sir."

"H'm. Which way did the man go who passed here this morning?"

"I didn't see anyone pass this morning."

"Have you seen a strange man about here lately—a lame man with a long black beard?"

"No, sir."

The men consulted together in low tones. Then the leader turned to Molly with a pleasant smile, and said:

"Well, sis, keep a sharp look-out for that fellow. He's a bad man, and the officers want him. He was shot in the leg when he escaped, and you'll know him by his limp. Catch him for us, and we'll pay you a handsome reward. Good-bye."

The men laughed and rode away, leaving Molly greatly alarmed at their startling words. The thought of a desperate criminal at large in her vicinity was terrifying. She hurried into the house with Nettie and bolted the door.

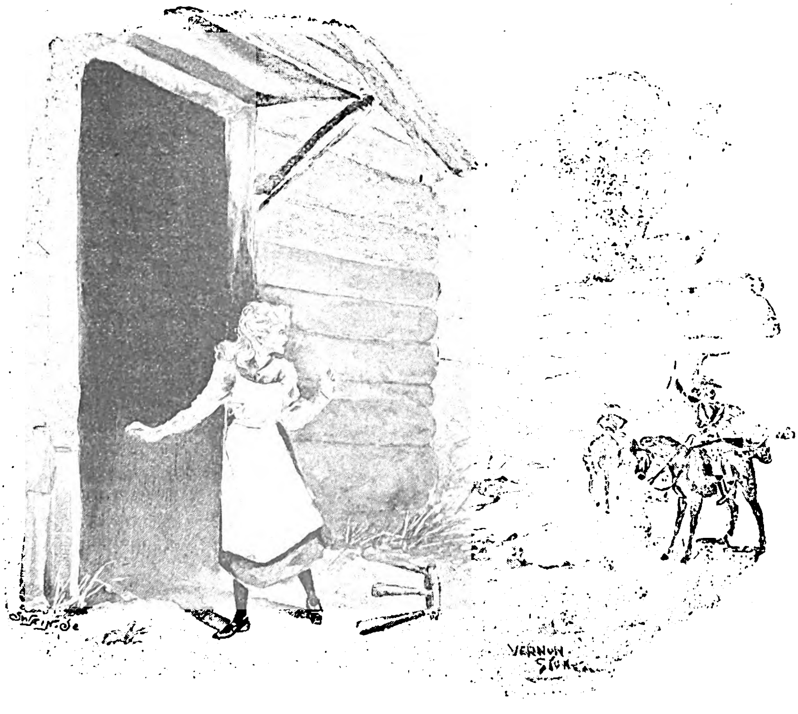
Towards evening she ventured out, fearfully, when a gentle lowing told her that Peggy had come up to be milked and receive her usual handful of bran. With frightened eyes she glanced at the darkening woods and hills, but saw nothing to justify her alarm; yet she breathed more freely when she was again safely behind her bolted door. In her apprehension she even forgot the blackberry pie.

She built a fire in the fireplace, for the Californian nights are cool, even in midsummer, and spent the evening singing to Nettie and telling her stories. There was no light in the cabin except the fire, for oil was expensive.

In the middle of a story Molly was startled by a strange flash of light, which swiftly traversed the opposite wall and vanished. For a moment her heart seemed to leap into her throat, and she was overcome by fear. Then she realised that the light came from the outside, and had flashed through the window. Swiftly, without noise, she placed Nettie in a corner, warning her to keep still because someone was coming; then she scattered the brands in the fireplace, and threw ashes on them.

She crept to the window and looked out. A strange beam of light cut athwart the darkness and flashed weirdly over trees and bushes, then wheeled and darted through the window again with a blinding glare. Molly dropped to the floor and listened.

She heard slow, cautious footsteps approaching. They were irregular, like the steps of a man who limps. They came nearer and reached the porch. A gleam of light poured through the crack under the door, and as suddenly vanished. The strange visitor evidently carried a dark lantern. Then there was a heavy knock. Molly did not answer, and presently the latch rattled and the door creaked under a heavy pressure.



Molly sprang up.

"Who's there?" called Molly, in a tone of fright.

"Is your mother at home?" growled a hoarse voice.

"What do you want?" gasped Molly, still more frightened. Nettie began to cry, and Molly hastened to her corner and tried to sooth her.

"Who's that crying?" asked the gruff voice.

"It's my little sister. You've frightened her half to death. Please go away," replied Molly, with a bravery that surprised herself.

"Open the door and give me something to eat. Don't be afraid. I won't hurt you," said the man a little less fiercely.

"I can't open the door," faltered Molly. Then a happy thought came to her. "There's a pie in the safe by the oak tree," she cried. "You can take that. It's the best we've got."

The man hesitated a little and muttered to himself, and then she heard him limp away towards the safe. For a few minutes there were indistinct sounds, and an occasional ghostly flash of light. Then everything was still.

Molly sat all night holding the sleeping Nettie and watching in darkness and profound silence; and she murmured a heartfelt thanksgiving when the first light of dawn brightened the window.

She waited till the sun was high before venturing out. She judged that the man would be hidden in some secure place during the day. But she had not recovered from her fright. She resolved to drive up Peggy and milk her, and then take Nettie and go down to the mill. She noticed that the safe was open and the pie was gone.

Nettie seemed to have forgotten her fright of the previous evening, and was in high spirits. Molly gave her Rosy, the doll, to play with, and bade her sit in the porch while she went after the cow.

With flying feet Molly traversed the path across the bushy ravine, and hastened breathlessly up the grassy ridge. She soon found Peggy, and drove her home at a speed that astonished the worthy cow. She then hurried to the cabin for the milk-pail, and there a terrible discovery burst upon her. The doll lay in the porch, and Nettie was gone. She rushed frantically hither and thither, shouting Nettie's name, but the child had vanished as if the earth had swallowed her up. For some time she continued the search, crying bitterly, and wildly calling, but without avail.

Then an idea occurred to her. Perhaps Nettie, eager to see her mother, had started along down the path to the mill. Inspired with new hope, she hurried in pursuit; but as turn after turn in the path was passed, and no bright head with white curls appeared, hope drooped in her heart and a horrible fear took its place. It now seemed certain to her that Nettie had been stolen away by their dreadful visitor of the previous night. So she flew on in search of help.

Soon after Molly left the cabin, the four horsemen with rifles came slowly round the base of the Black Butte. They were evidently following the trail.

"He was here last night or this morning, sure," said the sheriff. "I think he's hid on the Black Butte somewhere."

"If he's hid on the Black Butte we won't get him in a hurry," grumbled one of the men. "It's the thickest place in the county."

They followed the trail to the cabin, which they found deserted. The men looked uneasy, and examined the entire place eagerly and keenly.

"I hope he hasn't hurt the kids," muttered the grumbler. "We most orter took 'em down to the mill yesterday."

They soon took up the path again, which led along the base of the Butte, and finally disappeared in the dense thickets that covered the hill.

"He's hid on Black Butte, boys," declared the sheriff, "and we've got him."

"Ain't you a little too fast?" expostulated the grumbler. "He's got us just as much as we've got him. He won't come out, and it's no good to crawl into that brush after him."

"We'll make him come out," remarked the sheriff coolly, as he dismounted and stirred with his foot the thick carpet of dead leaves that covered the ground. "You and Tom ride round to the other side of the Butte and take positions where you can put him up when he leaves cover. Then Jack and I will set fire along the edge of the brush half-way around. The wind is right, and it'll take the fire over the hill in half an hour, and it won't do much damage beyond."

The two men rode away, and after some time had elapsed, a rifle shot announced that they had reached their stations. The sheriff and his companion then lit torches and began setting fire to the bushes along the bottom hill.

The flames caught the dry leaves like tinder, and spread swiftly and fiercely; then they leapt into the brush and flared up with a sharp and startling sound. Then the wind sprang up, and fiery red serpents darted roaring up the hill, their breath turning everything to flame. The bushes were transfigured for an instant, then they shrivelled up and vanished in the hot whirlwind.

The two men stood together and gazed upon the monster they had unchained. Suddenly the sheriff started and cried out:

"Did you hear anything, Jack?"

"No; what was it?"

"I thought I heard a child crying up there on the hill," gasped the sheriff, as pale as death.

"Oh, no; 'twas only the hissing of the green bush in the fire, I guess," replied Jack, a little startled.

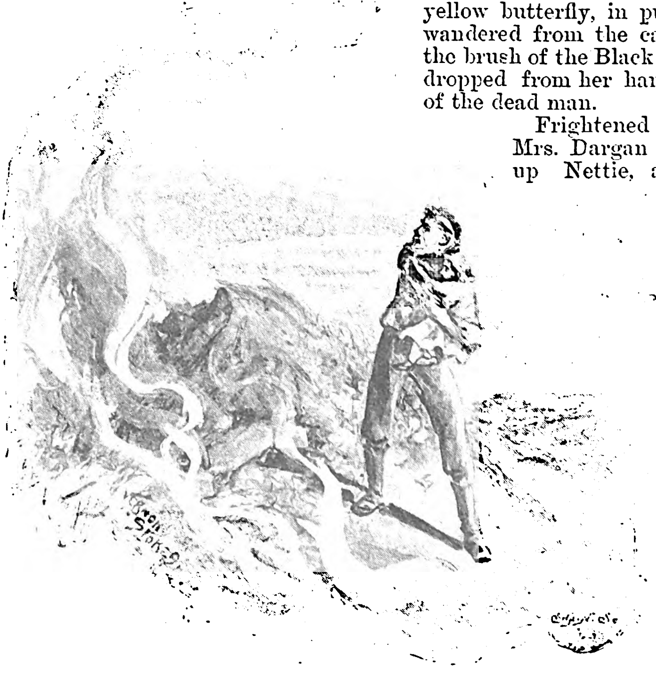
The lower portion of the Butte was now a roaring mass of flames, darting, soaring, and licking up everything with terrific energy. A low redwood tree stood on the hill. The fire seized it, and went leaping zig-zag to the top, like a red and yellow acrobat, howling in triumph and flinging out banners of flame from the topmost boughs.

The sheriff was still nervous and only half reassured.

"I wouldn't have started it if I'd known 'twould burn so fierce," he muttered.

Suddenly Jack uttered a yell and pointed upward. A tall, black-bearded man was hastily limping across a rocky opening on the side of the hill. He turned as he heard the shout, and shook his fist at the two men with a gesture of rage and defiance. Then he halted, came back a few steps, and remained a moment gazing earnestly down the hill.

And then the sheriff and Jack saw a terrible sight. On a ledge of sandrock, which rose up only a little in advance of the fire, stood a pretty little child, with long, white curls flying in the heated wind. Sometimes the smoke hid her. She was gazing at the frightful scene before her and screaming with terror.



The fire was lapping the rock.

"Oh, God," cried the sheriff in a tone of intense agony.

The officers were brave men. They ran along the edge of the fire, through beds of glowing coals and amongst the blazing grass, seeking for a place to rush through and save the child. Their boots shrivelled up and scorched their feet, their clothes smoked and burnt, and they recoiled half suffocated. They saw that though they might charge through the flames and reach the child, it would only be to die with her. They could never return.

They turned their despairing eyes once more towards the poor babe. The smoke rolled away, and both uttered a frantic shout of joy. The black-bearded fugitive stood on the rock beside the child. He was stripping off his outer garments and carefully wrapping her in them. Then he lifted her in his arms and stood for a moment calmly choosing his way of escape.

The fire was lapping the rock. It was sweeping by on both sides and rushing up the steep hillside. The man saw that it would be impossible to escape in that direction. He would be overtaken and destroyed. He sprang down from the ledge and disappeared.

The merciless flames swept on. In a moment the two men below saw him rushing down from the fiery ring, his precious burden clutched closely to his breast, his face pressed against her, running, stumbling, falling, crawling, rising again and staggering on. With one impulse they dashed in to help him. As he drew near, reeling dizzily, they seized him, and half led, half dragged him out of that fierce furnace to the cool ground beyond, where he dropped and fell lifeless.

They extinguished his burning clothing, and tore the blazing wrappings from the child whose life he had saved. They brought water and tried to revive him, but he had inhaled the flames, and never breathed again.

As they lifted the crying child they saw that she still held in her fingers a large black-and-yellow butterfly, in pursuit of which she had wandered from the cabin and become lost in the brush of the Black Butte. The gaudy insect dropped from her hand and fell on the breast of the dead man.

Frightened voices were heard, and Mrs. Dargan rushed forward, caught up Nettie, and hugged her close, kissing and soothing her.

"Where did you find her?" she panted. "How thankful I am."

"Do not thank us," he said solemnly. "There lies the man who lost his life in saving her."

Mrs. Dargan looked and started forward. Then she turned to the sheriff with a pale look of touching dignity, and said:

"He is my husband."

She turned to the dead again, and put her hand to her eyes. They saw tears trickling through her fingers.

C. E. B.

A LION'S FEAST

WE had our camp at the big bend of the Zonga River, where it approaches nearest the great desert of the Hottentot country, and one morning word was brought in that we had captured a very large lion in a pit which had been dug for that purpose. Among the natives who went out in advance of us were two fellows who had been threatening each other with personal violence ever since we left the Vaal River. Both were tall, strong men, and each had his following, as is always the case, even in civilised communities.

They had been restrained only by threats of the Colonel to turn them out of camp. They met at the lion pit, and by accident or otherwise one jostled the other. It was the spark leading to an explosion. Tom-Tom, as we had nicknamed one of them, seized the other, whose title was Joe-Joe, and with a twist and a wrench threw him into the pit upon the lion. It was a terrible thing to do, and neither the Colonel nor I believed that Tom-Tom really meant to do it, though he would not have hesitated to use hatchet or knife.

We met the natives coming back with the murderer in custody, and they demanded that his life should pay the forfeit. The pair of us ran on to the pit in hopes to save Joe-Joe, but we were too late. The lion was not hungry, but in a terrible temper over his capture, and he had killed the man as soon as he could get to him. Had the victim lost his life in a fair fight, nothing would have been done. Had he been stabbed to death in camp, the murderer would have to give his widow, or other relatives, about half-a-crown's worth of beads. As it was, the men would hear of no punishment short of death.

About ten o'clock in the forenoon, having exhausted every effort, and the men beginning to threaten loudly, we turned Tom-Tom over to them. He had been very quiet all the morning, and when told that he must die he exhibited no emotion. He was in his prime, and had a wife and three children at home, but he was too brave and proud-spirited to break down. He had a choice of death—that is, they would strip him and leave him bound hand and foot on an ant hill, or he should be flung to the lion, who had, by that time, eaten the last morsel of poor Joe-Joe. He would rather have been shot or clubbed, but they thought that would be getting off too easily. After thinking it over for a while, he said to us:

"I have seen men left to the ants, and it was sometimes a whole day before they died. If I am thrown into the pit the lion will kill me within a minute, and there will be no suffering. And, too, the man who is killed by the lion dies a proud death, and his wife and children need not be ashamed to say how he died. Yes, I will die that way. The lion will not be hungry again before to-morrow, but I wish the men to annoy him until he raves with anger. Then he will finish me at once, and you can get the cage and secure him."

Tom-Tom talked the matter over as calmly as if speaking of an ox gone astray. We saddled up and rode away. What followed was told to us on our return. A portion of the natives armed themselves with long poles and sticks and stones and angered the lion until he was positively furious. Tom-Tom was then led forward. All agreed that he was the least excited of the crowd. Two strong fellows had been appointed to fling him into the pit, but when he was brought forward he said:

"I am to die for causing the death of a man who thirsted for my life. I do not complain of that, but I wish to die like a man. Unbind me and stand back. I know what a lion can do. He can kill an ox with a blow of his paw, and he can crush the largest bone at one bite. He will kill me before you can count twenty, but he would afterwards be ashamed that he had killed a man who was helpless. Jab him with your poles and make him furious. That's the way! Hear his cries of rage! See how he leaps up in hopes to get out! You are now going to see a brave man die. Look sharply, for you will never see the like again. When you return home you will tell everybody that I threw Joe-Joe to the lion, but you will also say that I was killed by the same beast. Now I'm going; good-bye all."

He stepped to the edge of the pit, which was about twelve feet deep, and dived head first down upon the lion, who was standing on his hind feet. There was a fierce roar, muffled growls, a struggle lasting a few seconds, and the men looked down and knew that Tom-Tom was dead.

The lion was so thoroughly aroused that it was not until the next day we could make a move to cage him, and it took us over half a day to bring him out of the pit and make him a secure prisoner. After he was out of the pit I looked into it, but there was very little to be found to tell of the double tragedy. Then I closely inspected the caged beast, but he had licked himself clean, and was hungry for another victim.

E. C. Waggener.

* * *

THE WOMAN OF THE WINDMILL.

It was a pretty little windmill, with its big round tower capped by a weather vane, its long arms or blades which rattled in the west wind like the sails of a boat in stays, and its little round windows looking over the hills of Anjou like the telescopes of an astronomer—such was the windmill of Bernardeau; and when it was working, all the windmills of the neighbourhood looked like white seagulls pursued by a bird of prey.

It was situated on the slope of the Guigne, at the end of a little crooked pathway hardly wide enough for the mill donkey, and in which one might search in vain for traces of human footprints, because it was so dark under its vault of shrubbery, so muddy and rugged, that the woman of the mill always took to the vines when on her way to Ancenis on foot.

And a handsome woman, too, was this lady of the mill. She was twenty-five years old, and with a well rounded form, a little hand, flashing dark eyes, and lips as red as wild cherries. She was smart in her attire, and there was little in her appearance to reveal the fact that she was a widow. When she came into the village, mounted upon the donkey that carried her bags of flour, all the young fellows came out to admire her fine figure and the beautiful ankles which appeared below her short skirt.

Even the donkey himself seemed proud of his mistress. He travelled along at an easy gait, tossing his head and cocking his ears, as if to say to everybody: "Here she is, you have only to look at her; this is La Meunière du Bernardeau. There isn't another woman like her in all the country!"

And that was the truth. But she was the subject of a great deal of gossip. How the tongues did wag on her account. It was said that since the death of her husband, a poor goose of a fellow who had taken her without a penny from a farm and left her all his property, she frequently tossed her cap over the blades of her windmill. Whether this was true or not, the blades certainly never told; but one thing is certain, and that is that she did hang up her cap there publicly on one occasion, and it cost her her life. Here is her story:

The first thing the Vendéens did when they rose in revolt against the Republic was to make use of the windmills. Nothing could be better suited for signalling or more troublesome for the enemy. Where the Blues could only see white wings turning round in a melancholy fashion, the Chouans possessed a perfect telegraphic system, which told them of the movements of the Republican army.

The windmill of Bernardeau was one of the principal vedettes on the Loire. Three days before the attack upon Nantes, Cathelineau came to the mill of Bernardeau and asked for shelter. It was the 22nd of June, 1793: Bonchamp had been at Athens since the 17th awaiting the main body of the army. The weather was magnificent, and the Vendéens camped in the open air. When Cathelineau at the end of a little road found himself face to face with the beautiful woman of the mill, he asked her if she was a Royalist.

"One might easily become a Royalist to serve under so handsome an officer as you," said she.

"Good enough! Then let me have shelter here to-night."

La Meunière cheerfully welcomed him, and Cathelineau slept that night in the mill. The next morning, when he was leaving, she sent to him from the threshold of the mill a perfect volley of kisses, after which she went up to the highest window in the mill and waved her little white handkerchief.

Eight days afterwards Cathelineau, mortally wounded, was coming from Ancenis in a carriage, and as he passed by the mill he cast a long and sad look at it. According to the order, its blades were arranged so as to announce the approach of the soldiers of Canclaux.

From the 17th of October to the 17th of December, during the sixty days which separated the two retreats of the Vendéen army on the Loire, the mill of Bernardeau continued its signals of intelligence with those of La Vendée. But the 17th of December was its last day.

Harassed by the Mayençais, that crushed them at the Battle of Mans, the Vendéens reached Ancenis and endeavoured to cross the Loire; but for want of sufficient rafts, a considerable number of them were obliged to abandon the effort and to advance through the country, in the hope of escaping the enemy.

At sight of this old mill, which they immediately recognised as an ally, about twenty men took refuge in it just at the moment when Westermann came to the heights of Bel Air.

Suddenly a puff of blue smoke rolled from one of the upper windows of the mill. La Meunière herself commenced the fight.

"Good shot!" she said; "there is one less now."

Westermann ordered a company of hussars to surround the old mill. He was in too great a hurry to finish with La Rochejacquelin to bother himself with windmills. The hussars had hardly arrived at the mill before his flying artillery began to cannonade the few rafts of the Chouans who were endeavouring to cross the Loire. The officer who was in command of the company summoned the occupants of the mill to surrender.

La Meunière opened a little window, fastened her lace cap on the point of one of the blades, and shouted out:

"Come and get it, you ill-shaped puppy!"

A volley from the hussars was the only answer to these insolent words. The window-panes were broken to fragments. The Vendéens inside returned the fire, and dropped five of the horsemen. The company then dismounted, and rushed against the door of the mill, which they broke with the butts of their guns.

"Surrender, you scoundrels, or in a few moments you'll all be dead!" shouted the officer.

"You are the scoundrels!" yelled the woman of the mill. "Let me see if you are able to get my cap."

The hussars entered the lower storey, but the ladder was removed by the Vendéens, who now fired upon them from the storey above, and made terrible ravages in their ranks.

The woman of the mill busied herself with the work of loading the guns, a task which she performed with astonishing rapidity. The Chouans, sheltered behind the flour sacks, cared little for the fire of the Blues.

"Take good aim!" cried La Meunière; "don't let a single one escape."

The officer, seeing his men falling all round him, ordered them to come out and take the place by storm, scaling the arms of the mill. It was a magnificent assault. Twenty hussars clambered up the blades. With their carbines thrown across their backs, they clambered up like sailors to the storey above, and from there fell either killed or wounded under the balls or the bayonet thrusts of the Vendéens. One brigadier managed to get up to the roof by making a rampart of the bodies of his comrades, who held on to the arms like drowning men to planks.

"We are all right, my friends!" cried he. "Guard well the entrance of the mill!" After planting the colours of the company on the weather-vane, be bored a hole in the roof to admit the barrel of his gun. Three times he fired, and mortally wounded three men. This threw the besieged into a panic; resistance was becoming impossible, and the Vendéens were already raising the butts of their guns in the air, when La Meunière pushed down the ladder and cut off their retreat. "Now die like men!" she shouted. Then there commenced a perfect massacre. Attacked above and below, the Vendéens fought like imprisoned lions. When the ammunition was exhausted, they threw down the sacks of corn and flour, and, clubbing their muskets, jumped down among the Blues, who received them on the points of their bayonets. It was a horrible spectacle.

"Where is La Meunière?" shouted the hussars.

"Here she is, citizens," said she, as she let herself slip along the shaft of the mill. "I have given you no quarter, and I don't want any mercy from fellows like you."

"All right," said the officer. "We'll settle your account in short order. Place yourself against that wall."

There was something singularly graceful and proud in her bearing, and a glance of withering contempt in her eye as she advanced towards the wall. Her splendid black hair was now floating in disorder upon her shoulders. She gathered it modestly around her breast. Then she stood against the wall.

"Now, scum of the earth, fire!" said she.

This piece of feminine boldness made the officer hesitate. "How old are you?" he asked.

"Twenty-five."

"Your name?"

"I am La Meunière du Bernardeau."

"Do you want to live?"

"No, I'd rather die than receive mercy from you."

"Come now, simply shout 'Long live the Republic,' and I'll let you go free."

"Long live the King!" she cried in a vibrating voice.

A moment afterwards there was the rolling sound of a volley. That was the last of La Meunière du Bernardeau.

"She was a plucky piece of flesh, all the same," said the soldiers.

Westermann's hussars lost in that attack twenty-two men and eight wounded.

Since then the mill has remained abandoned as if it were cursed. Open to all the winds of heaven, without a roof, without arms, it stands. Occasionally a tramp passing through the country takes shelter there, and sleeps with the swallows and the bats. Following its well-known habit, the ivy, which seems to be in love with ruins, gradually entwined itself round it, and from a distance the uncrowned tower has the aspect of a ruined fortress.

J. P. L.

AN INCIDENT OF THE MUTINY.

SERGEANT DONALD MACFARLANE was one of the soldiers to whom it had been vouchsafed, whether happily or unhappily, to hew their way into Cawnpore under Havelock, and thereby secure a view of the results of Nana Sahib's work in and around that now historic well.

With torn and tattered uniform, bleeding from a prodigious cut in the head, and thoroughly begrimed with powder from the roots of his red hair to the soles of his feet, the tall Scotchman presented a singularly dramatic figure. It was after a swift look into the face of a dead woman, about whose neck were coiled the slender arms of a four-year-old boy, also dead, that the big non-commissioned officer uttered the awful, indescribable scream that had so shocked and awed his comrades, and which so many had since supposed had marked the at least partial dethronement of his reason.

Not that many men similarly situated would not have cried out. Five years before, this slip of a woman—she looked very slender and girlish as she lay there, so still, on the top of that woeful heap—had been a bonny, merry-hearted milkmaid, dancing over the heather of her father's tiny farm beyond Dundee. And the little chap with the yellow curls and the great, saucy blue eyes, who clung so closely to his mother's neck despite the cruel bayonet thrust through his little body—had he not been the life and soul of the barracks, the pet of the officers and the idol of the men? Yes; considering the days and nights of anguish, the hoping against hope, the bitter suspense and then this grievous ending to it all, Sergeant Donald Macfarlane had good excuse for crying out. Many a strong man has done so on even less provocation.

While his frenzied comrades rushed madly away to the slaughter and the sack, the Scottish sergeant knelt, in perfect silence, after that one cry, beside his dead. He straightened out the form of his wife and arranged her disordered garments decently. Then he loosened the clasp of the little arms and took his boy into his own mighty ones.

After the fighting was over they found him there, kissing the white cheeks and crooning lullabies to the little fellow in his quaint, North Country dialect. When they led him away he laughed, and kicked playfully at the head of a dead Sepoy that lay in his path.

* * * * * *

All through the long, hot siege of Delhi Sergeant Donald Macfarlane performed his duties as became a man and a soldier. And yet there was something queer about him. He would stand for a half hour at a time gazing stolidly up at the scorching Indian sky, gnawing and tugging nervously at the straggly red beard about which his comrades had been in the habit of joking him so mercilessly in happier times. He even forgot to salute his officers at times, but was never reproved for it. There was a tacit recognition of his condition throughout the regiment. Behind his back he was pityingly spoken of as "Poor daft Donald!" The nickname explained it all. Sergeant Macfarlane was evidently not himself mentally. Whether or not his fighting qualities were unimpaired could only remain a matter of conjecture.

And so the burning days dragged themselves along until August came, and with it Nicholson, with reinforcements from the Punjaub. And then, more waiting, until the middle of September, when the immortal assault was decided upon.

It was the night before that prodigious scene of storm and tumult in which the intrepid Nicholson fell. In the British camp there was silence, but in one of the white tents Sergeant Donald Macfarlane and some eight or ten of his company were seated at a long, rough table, drinking and discussing in undertones the probable events of the morrow. Outside, the quiet stars were shining as gently and placidly as if the coming daylight were not to witness one of the direst scenes of carnage in history.

Under the influence possibly of the great joy of the anticipated combat, Sergeant Macfarlane had seemed more like himself during the day. He had thawed out to some of his comrades, and was even now drumming gently on the table with his big horny fingers, as a burly private, with a pronounced Cockney accent, trolled out, in a voice by no means unmusical, some popular Whitechapel lay.

The minstrel was in the very middle of a stanza, when, to the utter astonishment of everyone present, Sergeant Macfarlane leapt to his feet with a look in his face that no one present had ever seen there before. His small, blue eyes were blazing, and there was a thin line of foam on his white, twitching lips.

He hurled his glass of brandy to the floor, and banged on the table with his great fist, as he shouted: "Dinna-r-r sing, mon! Dinna-r-r sing!"

The manner in which he rolled out the r's would have stopped any song. It certainly stopped this one. Some of the men looked annoyed; others questioning and pitying.

It was the interrupted singer himself that presently spoke: "Wot hails yer, Donald, me lad?" he asked wonderingly.

The big Scotchman was staring over their heads. "Hist, ye loons!" he cried hoarsely. "D'ye remember Cawnpore?"

Instantly every figure grew tense and every face hard.

"Aye!" went on "daft Donald," his voice rising from a roar to a sort of shriek, "ye mind it weel, I hae nae doot. Weel—I hae mindit it. An' it's puir business ye're in, lads, singin' an' shoutin' the nicht, when it's down on yer knees afore the Lord ye should be, praisin' Him for the chance to smite the black fiends, heep an' thigh, on the morrow! Listen, lads! Ye are a' brave an' honest an' true. Nae better men e'er wore the Queen's scarlet. Wull ye tak an oath wi' me the nicht?"

The fury of battle had leaped into every eye at the man's words. As he finished there was a roaring bass chorus: "Aye, Donald; we will!"

"Then," went on Sergeant Macfarlane, in tones that evidenced the deadliness of his intent, "be the memory o' ma deed Jess—be the memory o' ma little eennocent Donald—be the memory o' a' te ither butchert anes, I sweer lads, that on the morrow I'll spare neither mon, wumman, nor chiel that fa's intil these hans be slain. Come, sweer wi' me!"

He stretched out his great hands, and they were grasped in turn by the other men. The oath was taken. Whereupon, Sergeant Donald Macfarlane, weakly enough, sank into his seat, bowed his shaggy red head across his arms on the table, and sobbed like a child. His comrades, who were quite unused to this sort of thing, sneaked one by one out of the tent.

* * * * *

No soldier of the storming party fought as the red-headed Scottish giant fought that day. After four hours of tumult and butchery—butchery that brought the keenest delight to his now utterly savage soul—he found himself without a scratch, and, truth to tell, a little weary. The streets were thick with dead and wounded, and from many a glittering column and pinnacle streams of flame were pouring.

Begrimed with powder and blood, and choking with thirst, the sergeant stood leaning against the bamboo doorpost of an unpretentious dwelling in a side street, watching a miniature battle going on between a dozen Sepoys and redcoats fifty feet away. He looked up wearily as a burly private, with bloodstained pugaree tied round his forehead, and minus his helmet, staggered up to him with outstretched hand. It was Bill Smith, the Whitechapel minstrel of the previous evening.

"Well, ole chap," he shouted, "hain't this bloomin' glorious? An' 'ave yer been pyin' hoff old scores, hay?"

The Scotchman glanced at the weapon in his hand. He had thrown away his musket and picked up a beautiful curved sword with a hilt of gold studded with jewels. The red blade told its own story. "Daft Donald" smiled grimly as he answered, "I hae kept ma vow."

Bill looked at him and noted the calm look in the blue eyes. The battle and the slaughter seemed to have brought back the man's reason.

At the private's suggestion they entered the building in search of water. It seemed to be deserted. Passing through a dim passage they came into a long, light room, with a low white ceiling. As they entered, a Hindoo woman, half clad, and her black hair streaming over her shoulders, sprang from a crouching attitude on the floor, and stood with her back against the wall, dumb with terror. At her side, and holding her by the hand, stood a little brown urchin, with inky hair and big, wondering eyes.

"Daft Donald" gave a scream of delight and sprang forward with sword upraised. His companion clutched him by the arm, crying hoarsely: "Sergeant—for the love o' God!"

Macfarlane turned upon him sternly. "Hoot mon!" he exclaimed contemptuously, "dost mind thy oath?"

The Cockney private's face flushed through the powder stains. "Aye," he answered simply.

"Then," roared the Scotchman, "do thy share. Bayonet the mother—I'll do for the brat!"

The other threw his weapon to the floor with a crash. "I'll see yer dead furst," he said. The little Indian boy jumped forward and began to play delightedly with the bright bayonet.

But now the light of madness flashed into the Scotchman's eyes once more. With a howl of fury he sprang at the woman and tore from her neck a slender gold chain to which a small gold locket was attached. "Look, mon!" he screamed to Private Smith, "ma Jessie's locket—ma weddin' gift. Wha gae it her? The hounds that slew her an' him! Wuman"—turning to the trembling mother—"thy time has come!"

He had poised himself for the thrust, but was spared the necessity of making it. There was a volley of musketry in the street, and some of the bullets tore through the windows. One of them ended for ever the career of brave Bill Smith, and sent a Whitechapel house into mourning. Another laid the Indian mother low and lifeless, and even "Daft Donald" was touched in the head in a manner that made him spin round like a top, though he did not lose his footing.

There was a queer, numb feeling in his brain. He knelt down beside the woman (who seemed very young and very pretty for her race), and saw she was quite dead. He was interrupted by the child, who looked quite funny in the white cotton shirt that left the little brown legs and feet exposed. The child came crawling over on his hands and knees, and, whimpering strangely, began to poke his pudgy fists into his mother's cheeks and throat.

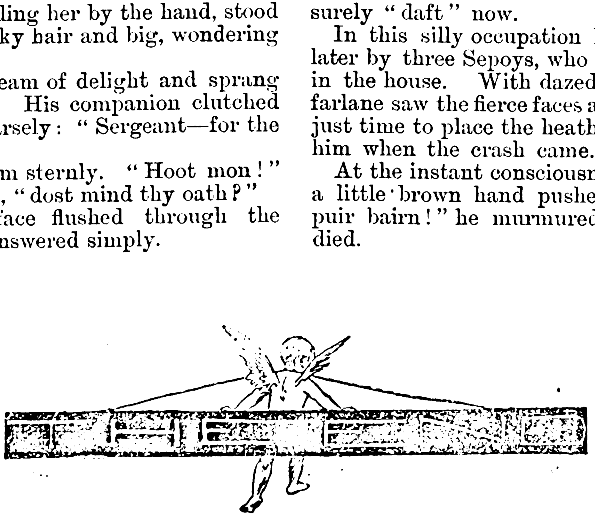
Sergeant Macfarlane reached out stealthily and grasped his sword. He pointed it at the baby breast. The little fellow laughed gaily and patted its shining side in glee. The brown eyes looked curiously into the executioner's blue ones.

Then, methinks, "Daft Donald's" reason must have given way utterly, for he cast the sword far from him, and, grasping the little heathen to his broad breast, began to weep over him hysterically. Then, after this singular proceeding, he began to play peek-a-boo with him over his mother's body. Yes, old Donald was surely "daft" now.

In this silly occupation he was discovered an hour later by three Sepoys, who were seeking a hiding-place in the house. With dazed eyes Sergeant Donald Macfarlane saw the fierce faces and muskets levelled, and had just time to place the heathen baby protectingly behind him when the crash came.

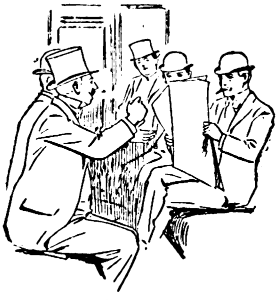
At the instant consciousness was leaving him he felt a little brown hand pushed into his. "Puir bairn! puir bairn!" he murmured, pressing it gently, and so died.

F. H.



A STUDY IN CHALK.

A MIDDLE-AGED gentleman—either a lunatic or on the point of insanity. After a moment's consideration I decided on the former. His violent gestures, his white passionate face, and the torrent of abuse which poured from his lips were attracting general attention. A small crowd had collected round him on the platform. Neither before nor since, in man or woman, have I witnessed such an incontrollable fit of anger. To make matters worse he had a thousand words to say, and the train was actually gliding out of the station. He shouted, he stormed, he raved. The inspector, suave, polite, imperturbable, accustomed no doubt to the vituperation of frenzied passengers, remained admirably calm under the ordeal, and at the last moment lifted him bodily into our compartment. He was still talking as he made his meteor-like entrance through the doorway.



"Confounded idiot!" he repeated.

"You may say what you like," he shouted, "but I don't believe you and I never shall. You took it by the string. I tell you I saw you. You carried it by the string, and, of course, it broke. You confounded idiot!"

One could see the throat vibrating, the hands clenched, the angry knots standing out on his forehead.

"Confounded idiot!" he repeated, glaring round on his fellow passengers, who were watching him from behind their newspapers aghast at the bitterness of his tone. "He says that he never touched the string. P'r'aps he thinks that it came to pieces by itself just for the fun of the thing. P'r'aps—and now it's spoilt—ruined—the best thing that I ever did—a beautiful drawing—worth £50 at the least—the very least!" and he broke off with a sort of moan.

I looked round the compartment. Everyone was smiling. There is something irresistibly droll about the misfortunes of other people. Something ludicrous about the hopeless condition of a man who has lost his temper and finds no one to vent his ill humour upon. I alone succeeded in maintaining some appearance of gravity.

"It is very annoying," I said stupidly. It seems so unsympathetic to remain silent, although commonplaces sting an injured man like salt in an open wound.

"Annoying!" he shouted, turning round on me. "It's maddening, sir, maddening! What am I do? It was beautiful, although I say it who have no right to—beautiful. I might try for weeks, for ever, and never catch the expression again."

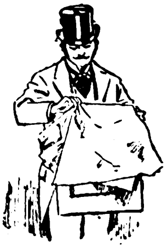
His voice broke. He was evidently unstrung. But it was inexcusable forcing his private affairs on half-a-dozen strangers. And to make matters worse, he was unmistakably English—his light hair, his blue eyes, the strong jaw, with its regular well-shaped teeth, all singled him out as a fellow-countryman. Had he been alone at that moment, however, no doubt he would have taken the windows, and seats, and racks into his confidence.

"The picture was from a sitting, sir—a special sitting," he went on, speaking fast, and still boiling over with rage. "What will the lady say when I arrive? Imagine what a fool I shall look. It is ignominious—horrible. My ticket is so much money thrown away."

His gesture of despair, his pathetic tone, the whole situation was too much for the man opposite. There was an audible laugh, and then someone else gave a guffaw.

I felt angry. My lunatic had perhaps brought it on himself. The louder a child cries the less his nurse pities him. It is silence which betokens a serious injury. So with grief. But there are exceptions. There are certain excitable dispositions which cannot be judged by the ordinary standard. That my lunatic was in genuine distress I was perfectly convinced, and I could have kicked the man opposite with the utmost satisfaction for that ill-timed, ill-mannered laugh. The old gentleman was stung to the quick. He realised for the first time that he was making himself a laughing stock.

"There is a comical side to the affair, of course," he said, with a sudden calm in the angry tempest of his voice. He was perfectly collected now, and the flush which lingered in his cheek was as much of shame as of anger. "I have had a good fit of temper, but it is over now. Heigh ho! And I was so pleased with the picture, too."



Lifting the tissue paper.

As he said, there was a comical side to the adventure, and the comic element was his own rage. One felt instinctively that the ruined portrait was his masterpiece—a portrait of some woman for whose opinion he cared in no ordinary degree. The inspector had taken it by the string, and the string had broken. A drawing in chalk is easily injured, and the sight of his precious work lying face downwards on the dusty platform had for the moment transformed a respectable middle-aged gentleman into a fiend. No trace of his ungovernable fury was now discernible on the placid face.

My lunatic had taken up his Pall Mall Gazette, and was reading it upside down! Every now and then he gave a sharp drawn breath. Once he threw down his paper on the floor and picked it up again. I knew exactly how he felt when I saw this little display. At the first station he jumped out, went to the guard's van, and brought back his precious picture.

"I am not going to inconvenience you, gentlemen," he said in a pleasant voice, "but if I may put it on the seat I shall feel happy."

My lunatic was standing in the middle of the carriage fumbling over a knot in the broken string, and tearing back the paper. All of a sudden a tear fell with a solemn little splash on the back of his hand. I felt a lump rising in my throat, and turned my head away and looked out of the window.

When I glanced round again the knot had come undone; he was tenderly lifting the tissue paper. We all leant forward.

The portrait was that of a lovely fair-haired girl. Just the head and the pretty rounded shoulders drawn with consummate art and skill. For the first moment, however, I saw nothing but the eyes. They thrilled me then; they haunt the galleries of memory now. There was a wondering wistful look in their soft brown lustre, a far away light of spiritual immersement in some ethereal dreamland.

We all looked at it spell-bound, and then one by one my fellow passengers went back to their reading. After all, the damage done by the fall was not great. But the work was ruined to an artist's eye. The colours had been shaken from their places, and here and there a smudge marred the perfection of the outline. On the whole I think my lunatic was relieved. The picture had suffered less than he supposed. It was not ruined. When I alighted a few minutes later he was actually smiling, and pointing out the beauties of a sunset to his fellow passengers.

"We never see these glorious skies with their blood-shot gold and rose and purple in London," he said. "I love the country."

He seemed perfectly happy.

For weeks this little scene lingered in my thoughts. It was one of those trivial incidents in life which make a deep impression on our minds. A story begun and broken off like a novel opened and closed before the finish.

Nearly a year later I was dining with my friend Sclater, journalist, plagiarist, and writer of stories. His rooms in Piccadilly were handsomely furnished with a number of great easy chairs and comfortable lounges, and scores of silver frames and expensive knick-knacks scattered about in every part, and curiosities gathered from the four quarters of the globe.

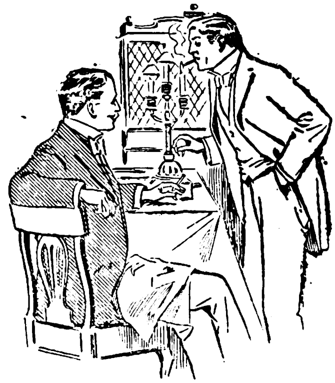
Dessert was finished. The conversation had drifted into "shop," for Sclater could talk about his profession for hours, and never grow uninteresting.

"Anyone who takes the trouble can learn to write," he observed, in his silvery tones. "Fortunately, this is a fact not generally known, or the world would be so busy writing, that no one would have any time to read." He got up, removed a rose-coloured shade from one of the candles, and bent forward to light a cigarette.

"Observation is of far more value than imagination," he went on, pushing the port across the table, and seating himself again. "My stories which sell best are all lifted bodily from real life!"

"The commonplace is often uncommon," I replied; and my mind went back to that little scene in the railway carriage. When I told Sclater the story, he laughed.

"Would you like to hear the sequel?" he asked, leaning back in his chair and playing with a tiny vase of geraniums with his long, slender fingers.



Bent forward to light a cigarette.

I nodded.

Sclater rose from his seat and crossed over to the other end of the room. He brought back a photograph in either hand and laid them down on the table in front of me.

"Do you recognise either of those?" he asked.

"Certainly; my lunatic and the girl whose portrait he showed us."

"Your lunatic is my father," Sclater observed, very quietly indeed.

"You're joking," I cried.

"Not a bit of it," he replied. "No, don't apologise, please. Not a word. I want to tell you the rest of your story."

He wheeled two chairs round to the fire, pushed back the table a little, and rang the bell for coffee. I sat with one of the photographs on each knee, staring at them, and wondering what was coming next.

"My father has always been as poor as a church mouse," Sclater began in his matter-of-fact way, striking a match on his boot and handing it to me. "He calls himself an artist, but he only once drew anything artistic, and that was the picture you saw. One day a friend came into his studio.

"'Sclater,' he said, 'Do you want a job?'

"'What kind?' said my father. He would have been glad to hold horses if any one had offered him the post.

"'To draw the portrait of a lady. She will give you two sittings and pay your own price.'

"'Her name?'

"'Violet Lyndhurst.'

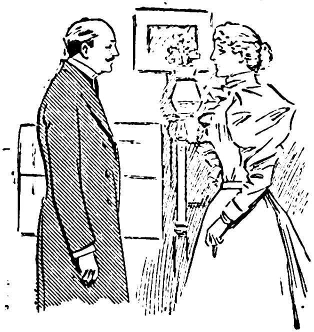
"Well, my father accepted the commission. An appointment was made, and in due time he went down with his chalks and things to Eastbourne, where the lady lived. She was, as you know from her portrait, and, as you can see from that photograph, young and extremely beautiful. From the first moment that he set eyes upon her he knew that he had met his fate. I think the face reminded him a little of my dear mother's, who died when I was born. It was this fact, perhaps, which inspired his pencil. As he worked he found that a wonderful speaking likeness was springing up at his touch. It is not difficult to imagine the pleasure which this discovery must have been to him. It was this which he had waited and prayed for all his life—a masterpiece at last. A drawing which would hand his name down to fame.

"The thought of the pleasure which this exquisite crayon would give to his beautiful patron transported him into a seventh heaven of delight. What easier way of winning her good graces?

"At the end of the first sitting Miss Lyndhurst thanked him graciously, but to his surprise she did not ask to see his drawing or show any curiosity about the progress of his work except to ask:

"'Do you think it is like me?'

"He said 'Yes,' and went away a little disappointed at her coldness, but glad on the whole to think that she would not see the picture until it was finished and perfect. His success delighted him. He carried the precious drawing away to work at it in his studio. A week later he set out again."



"Do you think it is like me?"

Sclater stopped to break open a new box of cigars. His servant had brought in the coffee, and he poured out mine and handed it to me.

"Go on," I said breathlessly.

"You know what happened next," he replied, with a little laugh. "This is where you first make the acquaintance of your lunatic. He goes to the station, treading on air. He actually whistles, he feels so gay and happy. There is some mistake about his luggage, and he intrusts the picture for a moment to an inspector. The string comes undone, it slips out of its wrapper on to the platform.

"I am not surprised that you should have mistaken him for a lunatic then. I think even a man of your phlegmatic disposition would have been for a moment off your guard. He had taken such pride in his work, he had been looking forward with such eagerness to receiving his divinity's praise. No doubt he had pictured to himself the moment when she would throw up her hands in delight; he could see her standing over his work, pleased, happy, delighted, and, best of all, grateful to him. A word of praise from her, a smile, a look of pleasure would have been the sweetest thing in the world that he could have.

"And now it was all over. The picture lay on its face in the dust. This was the end of all his hopes and his dreams. He had looked forward in a vague and uncertain way to her surprise and enjoyment of his wonderful work. One can imagine the bitterness of his disappointment, and what a blow it must have been to his ambition."

Sclater stopped to light his cigar afresh.

"Never mind your cigar," I almost shouted; "get on with the story."

He leant forward, poking the fire into a blaze.

"The poor old governor!" he said to himself. "It is a curious story," he continued reflectively; "a very strange story. You can imagine how furious he was. Of course, he might have begun over again; but the chances were, as he told you, that he would never succeed so well a second time. Sometimes one does in five minutes what a year would not be long enough to do again."

"But the picture was not really spoilt?"

"It was not so much damaged as he supposed. By degrees he regained his spirits. It was still possible to make the portrait beautiful. He found Miss Lyndhurst already in her chair when he arrived.

"'Good-morning,' she said, looking up with a bright smile as he entered; 'I have been looking forward to your visit. Do you think it will be beautiful? Tell me.'

"'I hope so,' he answered simply.

"Then he set to work, and all the time he was thinking:

"'Will she be pleased with it? Will she think it beautiful?'

"A sort of fever came over him. He felt his cheeks burning, and sometimes his hands trembled so with excitement that he could hardly hold the colours.

"'Will she think it beautiful?'

"'Suppose, after all, she was not pleased—suppose——'

"He would not listen to such thoughts.

"Minutes flew by, and hours, and still he worked on.

"How sweet the permission seemed to stand there, drinking in her beauty. By now he knew every line of the beautiful face by heart. On, on, in frantic haste.

"'What will she think of it?' he kept on saying to himself. He wanted to stop and show it to her. But, no. He must wait until it was finished.

"At last he threw down his pencil.

"Now the time came he felt as if the strain was more than is good for a man to bear. He could hear his heart beating, and the perspiration stood out on his forehead. He lifted it from the easel and brought it round to where his model was sitting. A beautiful smile shone in her face.

"'What do you think of it?' he asked. His voice sounded odd and husky. 'I have done my best;' and he bowed his head a little.

"He felt her hand laid on his arm.

"'Do you not know, sir,' she said, in a calm silvery voice. 'Did they not tell you that I am blind?'"

* * * * * *

Sclater pushed back his chair. I, too, rose to my feet. He took one of the photographs from my hands and kissed it.

"I am proud of my little step-mother," he said. "You must come and dine with my people some day and meet her yourself."

W. A. W.

A Woman of To-Morrow.

To ascend Duncombe Hill, even at a slow pace, requires the exercise of a certain amount of energy, and Miss Lilian Kennedy had gained the summit—starting from the little footbridge which spanned the small stream in the valley beneath—in less than half an hour, which would have been considered good walking for many a man.

No wonder then that she was somewhat heated with her exertions, and turning round, so as to let the cooling wind play upon her face, she took off her hat and drank in with evident delight the bracing air for which the well-known eminence is so justly famed.

Far away as the eye could reach was a tract of wild, desolate moorland, with here and there in the valley beneath and the sides of the hill she had just mounted cosy-looking farmhouses, some with a few hundred acres of cultivated land attached; others with merely a few fields, and then tracts of common, on which the gorse bloomed luxuriantly. It was, in fact, what is called in England a poor farming district, where everyone was poor and the hardest work meant only the meanest living.

Had her thoughts been bared for inspection it would have been found that they ran on the utter hopelessness of existing under such conditions, and it was the impossibility of so doing that was at the moment exercising the mind of Lilian Kennedy.

Standing there in all the pride of her young womanhood, it seemed to her impossible that any human being in his or her senses could voluntarily bury themselves in such obscurity, and yet a year or two ago she would have thought very differently. Then, indeed, to have lived in the peaceful valley beneath, caring nought for the doings of the big world beyond, but happy and content in the Arcadian existence of the fields and woods, would have been sufficient for her; but the last two years had wrought a wonderful change.

A course of education at a woman's college, at which she had become imbued with other ideas than the mere acquirement of knowledge, and had been led away by the desire for emancipation from the thraldom pertaining to her sex, had transformed her from a lovable girl into an ambitious woman, anxious to take her place in the race of life; to strive for, and happily to obtain, eminence in one or other of the learned professions, and to work out a career for herself. In fact, to be a woman of the future rather than a nonentity of the present, only fit to be made love to, courted, and married; to sink her identity and her very name in that of the man who should make her his wife.

And now at length her dream of ambition was about to be fulfilled, for she had worked hard at college, and come out high up in the list of honours. For a time she had been undecided as to what profession to enter; then she had settled on going in for medicine. At college she had spared no time or pains to do well in her final examination, and to-day, less than two hours ago, the announcement had come that she had passed—and passed well, too—and that, henceforth, she was entitled to style herself:

LILIAN KENNEDY, M.D.

The mystic letters had an irresistible attraction for her. They spoke of hard work, of ambition, and of prejudice triumphantly trodden under foot.

Woman's mission in life, she had been heard to declare, was to alleviate suffering, and how could she do this more successfully than by practising as a doctor?

Standing there against the sky-line, with her erect figure and her head thrown proudly back, the idea filled her with satisfaction. A great responsibility had fallen upon her, and she would do her best to act up to it.

She turned and her glance wandered away down the hillside until it rested upon the gabled roof of a picturesque old house, a farmhouse apparently, but of a better stamp than others in the vicinity.

This was Fairfax Place, and Lilian knew it well; many a time had she spent pleasant evenings there in her unambitious days, and the house and its inmates were alike well known to her.

Of the latter there were three—Mrs. Fairfax, her daughter, and a son.

Idly Lilian watched the thin line of smoke curling lazily along the hillside.

She knew whose hands had lighted that fire. Gentle, ladylike hands they were—white and ringless, with delicate wrinkles where the dimples had been once.

They were young hands, too. Hannah Fairfax was not more than thirty; but her youth and dimples had waned long ago. There had been much work and few servants at any time, and now the household had been still further reduced, so the gentle, lady-like hands had had to do their share. True, there had been a liberal application of mutton suet, and gloves had been drawn on—but the work was none the less light because it was done in gloves; perhaps the heavier.

There was something about Hannah Fairfax that repelled Lilian. Perhaps the timidity of her manner, perhaps the weakness and whiteness of her hands, that seemed half-ashamed of their honest labour, as if anyone need be ashamed of honest toil!

She was a pretty creature, with tired brown eyes and a fringe of carefully curled hair above her forehead.

Lilian wondered why she took the trouble to curl it—why she didn't brush it back and forget to put the frilling of lace in her collar. If she would only forget it once Lilian might forgive her. But the hopeless air of dressiness baffled the younger woman.

Once, indeed, she had met her by chance coming from the well with a water-bucket in her hand. Then she had worn a faded cotton wrapper, and her hands were in gloves, but the curls were there, and a dainty covering of powder protected her skin from the sun.

At sight of Lilian she had started and fallen back, a deep flush showing beneath the powder on her face, her tired eyes growing hurt and appealing.

"One of our servants is ill to-day," she had said deprecatingly, and Lilian had been stung by the polite lie. In one moment she had loved and hated the woman before her—loved her for her strength to labour and her beautiful pride—hated her for the appealing blush and the shame-faced little lie.

Why should she be ashamed of the truth—she, living in the twentieth century—when honest labour is more than a luxury, and strong hands above white ones?

Then, from thinking of the sister, Lilian passed to thinking of the brother.

She could fancy him returning from the fields, where he had been doing his share of work, his broad shoulders erect, his eyes glowing beneath his harvest hat.

She knew his story, as everyone about the place knew it. He had been to college, and was starting out into the world, when his mother had called him home. In response to a selfish whim of the gentle old lady he had come. "You must stay by me," she had said, "and by the old place; it's the only way to save it."

And he had stayed.

"Ah!" cried Lilian bitterly. She flung out her hands with a gesture almost of despair, a hot red blush mantling her face. "It is not just! It is not just! He might have done so much—so much—and now."

Suddenly she straightened herself and stood up, her black skirt clinging closely about her, her arms hanging loosely at her sides. From the open collar of her dress her white throat showed its sensitive lines. Her hat was still in her hand, and the heavy coil of hair had slipped low on her splendid head. She was thrilled with life—a superb specimen of health and strength, capable of passion and of action. She turned and descended the winding path which she had but lately come up.

At the end of the path, just where it passed into the roadway, ran a small sluggish stream. A wooden bridge ran across it. Lilian paused, her face showing white in the grey dusk.

She leant over the stream, seeing in its shallow water a faint caricature of her sensitive face.

Then she drew back.

"Lilian!"

Someone came from out of the dusty turnpike and faced her, standing upon the further end of the bridge. With a sudden tremor she recognised him. His eyes glowed beneath the brim of his straw hat, his strong hand was outstretched. There was a sudden stirring in her pulses, a vague sense of exaltation.

She gave him her hand. Then, with a sudden gesture, she threw back her head and looked into his eyes.

"I was thinking of you," she said.

"Of me?"

"Yes. I was thinking of the shame of it—of the pity of it. Have you no ambition? Are you utterly without manhood that you are content to waste your life like this?—that you let the world go by without a care, preferring to spend your youth upon a worn-out farm, tilling a worn-out soil? Ah, the shame of it!"

Her hot, reproachful eyes flashed over him. Beneath the fire of her words he wavered and trembled. The glow died from his face. It looked white and set through the grey gloom.

"Don't you see," he said appealingly, "it is a question of duty? My post is here; I cannot desert it. I owe it to my family—to my mother. Don't you see, if the old place were sold it would kill her?"

But she turned away with a little hopeless gesture.

"I don't see," she said coldly. "I could never see! It is absurd! It is a remnant of that old chivalry—so-called—of which the world is well rid."

Then her mood melted. She turned to him with sweet, prayerful eyes, stretching out appealing hands.

"Oh, go away!" she cried. "Go out into the world. You owe it to yourself. Success is so dear—so dear. Why shouldn't you know it?"

He took her hands, his warm, rapt gaze still bent upon her. "I love you," he said. "You know that I love you—love you well enough to sacrifice everything for you—everything! Love you so that the hardest life with you would be heaven!"

The girl did not tremble, did not run away. She looked at him steadily, her proud lips slightly apart.

"Well enough to leave this place for me—to come away and work and earn success for me—well enough for that?" Her voice was almost mocking in its earnestness.

"Can't you understand?" he cried. "Can you never understand? My mother needs me. I am her only son. It is duty—plain, practical duty. Will you yield nothing to that?" Then he grew yearningly tender.

"Ah, my love! my love!" he said. "Am I nothing to you? Is your love so weak? Can you not sacrifice something for me? Come to me here—here for a while—perhaps ten, perhaps twenty years. I am bound hand and foot, but you—you are free. Be a woman, Lilian; give yourself to me. It will not be hard; and there is love. What is the world? what is anything to love?"

Then she wavered.

"Not hard!" she cried passionately. "Not hard! Ah, it is a hard, hard thing to be a woman!"

With a desperate movement she broke from him, and fled along the road.

Once in her room the sense of oppression became unbearable. She went over to the window and, kneeling beside it, laid her hot cheek against the sill. All was dark and quiet, save for a faint stir in the room below, and a little stream of light cast from an open window upon the gravel path. To her right the big hill-top stood like a phantom sentinel guarding futurity.

"I cannot bear it!" cried Lilian; "I cannot bear it!"

Then the question rose and faced her blankly. It was a moment of supreme indecision. On one side all the womanhood within her asserted itself; on the other, a man's ambitions struggled to survive. It was the new woman warring against the old—the twentieth century rebelling against the nineteenth.

"Love is not for you," said Reason. But Reason was checkmated. Her womanly nature pinned it down.

"I love him! I love him!" she cried, "and I must have him!"

Yes; she would come to him, as he had said. She would become a woman for his sake, suffer as other women suffer, be patient as other women were patient. She would merge her identity into his, and, letting the world go by, think only of him and his child, as it lay upon her breast. She would give up her profession, she would let ambition go. She would—yes, she would, if necessary, do the housework in gloves, like Hannah Fairfax, and churn the butter. She saw herself growing old and wrinkled, saw the faded calico wrapper, and all the rest.

"Ah!" cried she suddenly, "what a life! what a life!"

She rested her head upon her arm, still kneeling beside the window. A luxuriant wisteria vine, that grew without, peeped shyly in at her, its purple blossoms just brushing her cheek. She looked across the hill far into the distance. The freshness of twilight came stealing in upon her, mingling with the faint odour of purple wisteria.

In the road beneath a well set-up man was moving along. She raised her head and leant far out, straining her eyes to catch the last outlines of his straight figure as it vanished beyond the stile.

"Ah!" said Lilian again, and left the window.

That night Lilian wrote a letter.

"You have asked me to decide," it said, "but I cannot. Love is stronger than I, but is love as strong as ambition? I do not know. Time will decide. I am going away. Do not follow me, do not seek to find me. You say you love me; then you must bear with me. Love will last. If I want you I will come back to you; if not—my life must be lived, and as yet my life means my work.

"You may not understand, for the women of to-day are different from the women you know—the women you have read of. In the nineteenth century a woman would have stayed; in the twentieth she must go."

And the next morning at daybreak she was driven to the little station. As she passed Fairfax Place her eyes sought eagerly for some trace of life. The house was dark and still. The shutters were tightly closed.

Then, as she looked, a figure appeared in the narrow path leading from the pasture—a figure in a faded cotton gown, with a milk pail in her small hand.

"Ah, what a life!" cried Lilian breathlessly.

Then the vehicle jogged along, and the figure was lost in the foggy distance.

* * * * *

Ten years later a woman sat alone in her consulting room—a tall woman with a beautiful dark head.

She was sitting before a small desk, upon which some loose papers were scattered, in her hand she held The Lancet, in which was a powerful essay of her own.

The woman leant her head upon her hand and looked thoughtfully through the open window.

Along the street people were passing hurriedly.

In the next street a hand-organ was grinding out a discordant air, the tune of an old-fashioned polka. She breathed quickly, pushing the hair from her brow as she did so with a firm, white hand. A letter lay upon the floor at her feet. Suddenly her eyes lowered, meeting the written lines.

"Your name has been suggested," it said, "in connection with the presidency of——"

She frowned and placed her foot upon it with a half-displeased gesture.

"So I may become the head of one of our greatest institutions," she said. "And—I am tired."

For a moment she was silent. People still passed hurriedly in the street. The hand-organ was moving farther away; its air grew fainter. Suddenly a baby's cry sounded fitfully without. Her gaze reached the window. A beggar woman had stopped, her shawl blown in the wind, and upon her breast a child.

The woman on the inside leant forward. A little cry escaped her; all the wonderful instinct of motherhood, which is strong in proportion to the weakness of women, swelled within her. There was a passionate leaping of her pulses. She longed to tear the child from the woman's breast—to feel its soft lips against her own. The letter lay trampled underfoot. Suddenly she spoke:

"My God!" she said, "what have I missed?"

The firm, flexible mouth softened.

"Oh, to know what it means," she cried. "To have one word, ever so little, only to know what his life had been—his life and mine—and mine. I would not change it," she cried. "I would not change it. And yet—and yet——"

She rose suddenly, some loose sheets of paper fluttering to the ground. She stretched out her arms with a wide, free movement.

"I will go to the old place to-day," she said.

As the sun was setting she stepped from the train at the little station, and walked rapidly across the field. She felt strangely restless. Now that the journey was ended, the vague impulse that had prompted her to undertake it seemed to fail her. By the act she seemed to have put the ten long years aside—to have come back to her girlhood—to Nature in its free, primitive state.

Once again she paused upon the hillside, resting her arms upon the bridge—an iron structure had taken the place of the old one—her gaze sweeping the fields and resting upon the gabled roof of a house above her. A warm colour had risen to her cheeks, and her eyes had dimmed and softened.

For a moment she wavered; then, with a firm step, she followed the winding path.

The house was quiet. From the kitchen chimney smoke was rising.

Then a man came quickly from the garden and stood in the gravelled path. In one moment the past came back to her. At first she saw only the aggressive manliness—all the straight length of him. Her womanhood had asserted itself after ten years of sexless suppression.

She went towards him, one hand outstretched, a heightened colour tinging her cheeks.

Then, as she neared him, her eyes cleared. Looking upon him, she saw that the years had passed him as they had passed the old place. She saw that his bronzed face had reddened and roughened, that the glow had left his eyes—saw that they were dull and content, as he was content. The direction in which she had progressed he did not know; he had taken no step forward for ten long years.

With a little gasp she met his outstretched hand, looking into his face—looking for something which she had not found, and could not find—something which was not and had never been.

"Lilian!" There was a pathetic awkwardness in his speech. "Lilian—I—I never thought that you would come back."

Then suddenly their hands fell apart and they stood silent, for a woman had come from behind the house and neared them—a small, tired woman in a soiled gown, with a child upon her breast—a woman who had borne many burdens, and whose strength had not been sufficient unto her need.

The man wavered.

"I—I never thought that you would come back," he repeated, "and—and this is my wife."

* * * * *

A while later, and Lilian walked rapidly away. She no longer felt a stirring of her pulse. The warm red had faded from her face. It looked white and set.

At the top of the hill she halted and looked about her, drawing a long, quiet breath. She saw with clear eyes the landscape. She saw the wild, rough land. She saw the distant moor. She saw the sun, a fiery ball, setting beyond their summits, flooding the hollow below with a roseate glow. The grey fog had not risen, softening the prospect. She saw it as it was, ragged and barren. And looking inward, she saw her own life, with its strong, bold lines unaltered. The old romance had fallen from her like a shadow, melting from her feet and passing to take its place among the many shadows that stood flanked within the past.

The woman held her head erect; not a muscle quivered. She stretched out her arms with a gesture of thankfulness.

"Oh, thank God!" she said, "thank God!"

Then the great head fell upon her arms, and she burst into tears.

And the sun went down.

Peter Parr.

The Prisoner at the Bar.

MANSLAUGHTER is an ugly crime, and of such a crime the prisoner at the bar—he gave his name as Saul Wray—was accused. An unfortunate countryman had been found dead by the roadside, bearing unmistakable marks of rough handling. Saul Wray had been last seen in his company, both men drinking heavily and quarrelling at frequent intervals. Late at night the two boon companions staggered from the tavern along the road, where one of them was found killed the next morning.

The other was afterwards discovered sleeping under a haystack, his hands covered with blood, his face cut and bruised, his jacket torn down the front. The gaol soon had him within its walls, charged with the committal of the crime; and the good folks of the village were on the tip-toe of excitement until the day of the trial arrived. The murdered man was a dissolute, idle character, well-known in the place, and there was but scant sympathy for his untimely end. Wray was a stranger to the place, and was apparently a tramp.

In due course the Assizes came on, and Saul Wray stood arraigned before a jury of his countrymen.

Judge Grayson, who was trying the case, was a well-known jurist of considerable eminence, and had a reputation for strict impartiality. The court was crowded when the case began, and many eyes were directed on the prisoner, who, it was noticed by some particularly observant individuals, seemed considerably startled on seeing Judge Grayson take his seat on the bench. A strange gleam come into his eyes, while an unearthly pallor crept over his swarthy countenance.

In a low tone he pleaded "Not Guilty!"

Of course, the evidence was purely circumstantial, but, nevertheless, sufficiently weighty to remove any doubts which might have existed regarding the prisoner's guilt.

There was a solemn hush in the court as the Crown Prosecutor rose to his feet and prepared to address the jury.

The prisoner leant over the rail in front of the dock, still with his eyes fixed, not on the speaker, but on the Judge, who leant back in his seat, and with his hands loosely clasped in his lap, his eyes half closed, listened attentively to counsel's speech. Occasionally his lordship opened and closed his fingers or toyed with his thumbs abstractedly, but the prisoner at the bar did not move a muscle or alter his keen, curious gaze.

He was an uncouth-looking individual.

Tall and loosely built, there was a certain slouch in his attitude that bespoke the genus "loafer." He had a swarthy sunburnt face, the lower portion of which was entirely concealed by rough tufts of tawny beard and whiskers, shaggy and unkempt; his high massive forehead was crowned with iron-grey hair, which looked as if a comb were altogether a stranger to it.

His teeth were firmly clenched; he breathed heavily; his eyes glowed with a weird light as they remained fastened on the face of the Judge, who evidently did not notice the fixity of their gaze. One hand of the prisoner was tightly grasping the rail in front of him, the other was thrust into the breast of his coat.

It was easy to forecast the verdict when the Crown Prosecutor sat down after speaking for just half an hour. The jury had their minds made up.

When Judge Grayson directed them to retire and consider their verdict, the foreman got up hurriedly and intimated that they had already arrived at a decision.

"We find the prisoner guilty, me lord."

All eyes now centred on the prisoner, who drew a long breath as the Judge turned towards him, and, in clear tones, asked if he desired to say anything before judgment was pronounced.

Paul Wray started, his eyes gleaming with living intensity; he drew himself up to his full height, crossing his arms on his breast. There was a breathless pause, and then there came but one word from the clenched teeth of the prisoner at the bar:

"Brother!"

Judge Grayson started violently, opening his keen grey eyes full on the speaker, his face paling, his hands tightly clasping the arms of his chair.

"Brother William!"

Judge Grayson half rose to his feet, with an exclamation of mingled horror and surprise, then sank back in his seat, trembling visibly.

In deep tones the prisoner at the bar spoke to him:

"You do not recognise me, Brother William, and I do not wonder, for it would be hard indeed to know me now, so changed am I from that brother who left you years ago to seek his fortune in Australia. Yes, William Grayson, I am your brother Paul. I went to the bad long ago. I am at the end of my tether now. I do not ask your sympathy. I do not deserve it. Do with me as you will."

There was a low, indefinite murmur in the crowded court as he stopped and bowed his head, as if evoking judgment.

Pitying eyes turned on the judge, who appeared crushed by the shock of the revelation, and the Crown Prosecutor started up himself as if about to speak.

Judge Grayson motioned him to desist, and rose to his feet, leaning heavily on the table in front of him. His face was white, his features drawn; his lips moved several times before speech came from them.

"Prisoner at the bar——"

He stopped short, and drew his hand sharply across his eyes, then went on abruptly:

"You have been tried and found guilty of a most grave crime. The evidence against you has fully convinced me of your guilt. The jury, by their verdict, have endorsed that evidence and strengthened my conviction. I have, therefore, no course open to me but to sentence you to penal servitude for the natural term of your life."

Paul Grayson lifted his head with a start of incredulity.

Judge William Grayson met his questioning glance with a look of intense pain, and murmured in an almost inaudible tone:

"Brother, forgive me!"

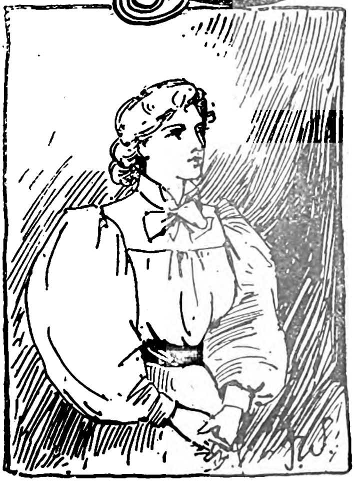
He drew himself up with an effort, and motioned to the constables to remove the condemned man.

Just one moment of deep silence in court; then there was a heavy thud on the raised daïs, and a horrified cry from the breathless crowd as the prisoner was removed from the dock.

Judge Grayson had fallen senseless.

ANNIE DAVIS.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE



I.

Mr. Langham, of Grindelthorpe, sat alone in his snuggery and listened to the wind. It raged furiously in the chimney-stacks; it shrieked, it wailed, it drove the snow into drifts in the surrounding meadows and on the high road. He listened to it with a certain pleasure, for it reminded him of days long gone by, when he was young, and the world looked brighter than it did now.

Langham sat in a large cushioned chair, his feet resting on the skin of a grizzly bear, with the head and claws attached, and the divan in the corner was covered with deerskins; there were innumerable curiosities and trophies of arrows, and a scalping knife, an old rifle, looking as if it had seen much service, a portentous bowie knife, an array of stock whips (Langham had made his money on a cattle ranche in America), and coiled around the Indian trophies on the wall, and making a sort of frame for them, a black snake whip, its long shiny thong bearing some resemblance to the reptile after which it was called.

Langham gazed meditatively into the fire. He was a tall, broad-shouldered man, with grizzled hair and beard, hard-featured and weather-beaten, with a square, determined jaw, very keen eyes, and imperturbable manner; he held a pipe in his hand, which he had apparently taken to refill and had forgotten. He was alone in the world, and through no fault of his own; his daughter Amy had been the apple of his eye.

Two years and a half ago she had married clandestinely, and, worse still, she had married a scamp, and for two years he had heard nothing of her. Her husband, by name Jack Kelly, was the son of a wealthy tradesman in the neighbouring town. She was nineteen when she married him, and he near twenty-four; handsome enough to please the eye of most girls, but "handsome is that handsome does," and Kelly's doings were unhandsome. He was deeply in debt, he was a gambler, and he not infrequently drank; he promised amendment to Amy, and for six months after the marriage he kept his word. At the end of six months, however, Kelly fell in with some boon companions after the horse fair, got drunk, was mixed up in a street row, knocked down a policeman, and was locked up for the night. He was fined, of course, with the option of fourteen days' imprisonment; his father paid the fine, which was the heaviest that could be imposed, and turned him then and there out of his house. He had paid Jack's debts twice, he was now past his patience; he altered his will, and when he died three months later his money went almost entirely to local charities, and his son did not even receive the proverbial shilling.

Amy no sooner heard the news of her husband's conduct than she wrote bidding Kelly claim her at once, and take her with him when he left the place to seek his fortune. She informed her father of her marriage. It was a heavy blow to Langham. He said little, however. He saw Kelly, and told him that he would never receive him as a son-in-law. If he chose to go away and never molest his wife in any way, he would forgive Amy her deception.

"Mr. Langham," Kelly had said, "that's for Amy to decide. If she chooses to forbid me to see her I shan't claim her against her will. I may not be a very creditable member of society, but I'm not the man to drag a woman away with me against her will because the law gives me power to do it."

Langham turned inquiringly to his daughter. Amy was a slender little creature, with a soft, fair face, and tender brown eyes. She had a peculiarly quiet, gentle manner.

"Father," she had said, "you are right to be vexed with me. I've been very wrong, ungrateful, and deceitful to you, but I hoped it would turn out differently." She held out her hand to her husband. "You broke your word to me, Jack," she said; "you promised you wouldn't do so again; but, unless I'm a burden to you, I promised to stand by you till one or other of us die; I love you, and I'll go with you." So Amy and Jack Kelly left Grindelthorpe, and Langham had heard nothing of them since.

II.

Langham rose with a sigh, and began to refill the empty pipe, when a knock—a sharp, decided knock—came to the door opening into the room. He laid down the pipe, drew aside the curtains, shot back the bolts, and opened the door; the wind burst in with a shriek, blowing with it a cloud of snow; in the doorway stood the figure of a man, carrying in his arms the form of an insensible woman.

"Mr. Langham," said the voice of Kelly, "will you let me speak to you?"

"No," said Langham shortly, "I won't; it's like your impudence to come here. You and Amy have chosen your own road; take it, and leave me to go mine."

"For mercy's sake, hear me," said the other, "unless you want to see your daughter's dead body lying on your threshold to-morrow. I don't come here to plead for myself."

"I'll hear you," said Langham very quietly, "if you'll be brief."

"Let me come in," said Kelly panting.

"Come in," said Langham, and Kelly entered. His eyes were hollow, he looked poor and shabbily dressed, his hat had been blown away by the raging wind, the snow lay on his hair and melted there. Amy, totally unconscious, lay in his arms; her little figure looked slenderer than ever, she was very poorly and thinly clad, her face was wan and shrunken; her pretty soft hair, loosened by the wind, streamed over her husband's shoulder; he put her gently in the chair by the fire.

Langham resolutely averted his eyes from his daughter. "Now, Mr. Kelly," said he, as he closed the door, "you promised to be brief."

"I've come to ask you," said Kelly, "to forgive Amy and take her home; I told her we would plead to you for both of us, but I only ask you to be good to her. I can't stand seeing her suffer—the best, the bravest, the truest little wife that ever a man had; she's never reproached me once, Mr. Langham. I haven't touched anything stronger than water since I left here, and I haven't touched a card—upon my soul I haven't. We did all right for the first year—I got work in a factory, and we were happy, and we saved, or she did, but she was very ill when—when the child was born, and it died, and she fretted terribly; and then I broke my arm and couldn't work, and our money went, and trade was bad, and they discharged a lot of the hands, and we've been going down hill ever since. Take her home, and I'll go away, and I won't trouble her again unless I'm in a position to keep her in comfort."

"You're tired of her, I fancy," said Langham, "that's about it; how do I know you've really turned over a new leaf. You've married my girl, and you must abide by your bargain."

"You won't forgive her?" said Kelly.

"No," said Langham, "I won't."

"Great Heaven," cried the other, "what shall I do?"

Langham opened the door. "Why," said he, "I think you'd better continue your journey."

"She'll die," cried Kelly, "before I can get her to shelter."

"The workhouse is three miles ahead," said Langham drily.

"The workhouse?" cried the other. "Great Heavens, man, she'll die before I can get her there, in the dark and in this wind, and the drifts up to one's waist. Look at her, the poor little girl, as frail and slender as a child. It's murder; give her shelter for to-night. Save her life; I'll walk on. I'll claim her to-morrow; if I don't, turn her out. Keep her here to-night, for pity's sake."

"You're wasting your breath," said Langham carelessly.

"Then shame upon you," cried Kelly angrily. "Poor Amy's crime is only that she loved a blackguard too well to turn her back on him when everyone else did. She kept her marriage from you for a time, true, but is that a sin to deserve death? I tell you, you'll kill her as surely as if you stabbed her to the heart. It's certain death. She's nearly dead now, my poor little wife. God help us both. What can I do? Heaven knows, I'd be cut to pieces if that would save her. But I am helpless, and you'll not stir hand or foot to save the life of your own child."

Langham looked at him and became meditative. "You've an uncommonly fluent tongue, young man," he said, quietly and reflectively. "It's easy to say you'd do that or you'd do this. You'd change your tune if you were put to the test. I'll try you. Will you save your wife's life? Will you pay for her night's shelter?"

"You're mocking me," said Kelly, "you know I've not a cent in the world, or I shouldn't be here to-night."

"Who said you had?" retorted Langham. "I said, would you pay. I didn't name the price."

"What do you mean?" said Kelly.

Langham turned and drew the thong of the black snake from the wall, and flung it on the table.

"That's what I mean," said he, "do you love your wife well enough to take fifty lashes from that, if I give her food and shelter for the night?"

Kelly started, the blood rushed to his face, and faded, leaving him deadly white.

"Do you mean it?" he asked.

"I do," said Langham; "those are my terms; that's the price you must pay for Amy's life."

"What possible motive can you have?" said the other.

"Perhaps I want to make her a widow," said Langham. "I think I could finish you with that, once I started; no one knows you're here; I might shovel you out of the way before morning and tell the girl you've deserted her. Perhaps I hate you and want to pay you out; my motives don't concern you, and I shan't give them; it's a pure matter of business. I tell you my terms for saving Amy's life—take them or leave them."

He spoke with perfect coolness as though proposing the most ordinary business transaction in the world.

Kelly hesitated. He took a step forward and looked at Amy's white, shrunken little face; he looked at the long shiny thong on the table; he looked at Langham's impassive face; he was silent.

"You funk it," said Langham; "I don't blame you; most people would shrink from certain tortures and possible or probable death, only you see you talked so mighty big about being cut to pieces to save your wife's life, I thought I'd see just about how much all that tall talk amounted to."

"Stop," said Kelly. "If I accept your terms, of course your motive is to kill me and get rid of me, though why you shouldn't choose a more merciful way of setting about it is more than I can say; however, if I accept and am killed, what about Amy? Am I to pay for one night's lodging with my life, or will you be kind to her and provide for her?"

"I will," answered Langham in the most matter-of-fact tones, "if you're killed; but I fancy you won't be; you look pretty strong. I'll look after her if you can't, anyhow."

"Then," said Kelly slowly, "I accept your terms."

"Don't run into this with your eyes shut," said Langham, "this won't be called child's play: you'll not walk three miles after I've done with you, nor yet three yards, nor half a yard."

"You'll find a snowdrift to throw me into somewhere handy, I don't doubt," said Kelly bitterly. "I don't suppose I shall feel the cold much or anything else when you've done with me, as you call it; you'll take care of that. The snow will do till the ground gets soft enough to dig. Be kind to Amy, that's all—you'll owe me that, I think, whatever I've done or left undone."

"A bargain?" said Langham unmoved.

"A bargain," was the answer; "do your share and I'll not shrink from mine." Kelly spoke firmly, but could not quite emulate the other's coolness; the muscles of his mouth twitched.

Langham walked to the door and opened it. "Here," he called, "Hannah!"

A girl came along the passage. "Did you call, sir?" said she.

"Yes," said Langham, lifting Amy from the chair, and speaking very slowly and distinctly:

"This lady is my daughter; take care of her—every possible care—d'you hear? Light a fire upstairs, put her to bed, get her all she wants; when she comes to tell her she's perfectly safe and at home; if she asks for her husband say he's with me, and I'll see her presently."

"Stop," said Kelly huskily, "let me kiss her." He kissed her twice, and drew one of her soft tresses through his hand; then Langham gave her to the girl and closed the door.

"Ready?" he said.

"Quite," said Kelly.

III.

Langham threw the yard door wide open, he took the black snake from the table and curled it round his arm; he stepped into the yard, Kelly followed; the wind raged, the drifting snow flew in their faces in blinding masses. Langham opened the barn door, closed it against the bitter blast, struck a match, and kindled a stable lantern. Kelly leant against the closed door: his eyes were perfectly clear and fearless, but his lips were blue. Langham picked up a rope and fastened it to a beam just above their heads; then he turned to the other:

"Sure you don't want to be off your bargain?" he said; "it's not too late yet; you'd better see what these things can do where a man knows how to use them." He sent the long, lithe black line whirling round his head, and brought it against the side of the barn; the barn was rather old, and the wood a little soft, and the splinters of wood flew in Kelly's face.

He bit his lip and gave a faint laugh; his voice was quite steady, but in his eye was despair: "It strikes me," said he, "you'll have Amy on your hands for life; I suppose you wish that, and you probably reconcile the murder of a black sheep like myself to your conscience. Never mind, I'll forgive you, so long as you're good to my little wife—God bless her, and may He so deal with you as you deal with her."

Langham calmly hung the lantern on a nail. "If you're ready, I am," he said.

"One minute," said the other. "I don't know in the least how much endurance I have, or whether I shall funk this or not when it comes to the point; but look here, whatever I say after you've tied me up there don't you turn Amy out. I—I mean, if I do funk and ask you to take me down, don't listen to me. I seal this bargain now, you see, while I know what I'm about; don't take any notice of what I say afterwards."

Langham looked at him with a curious expression in his keen eyes. "Well, I'll be hanged," he said to himself. "Right you are."

Kelly threw off his coat, and unfastened the throat of his shirt.

Langham caught his arm. "You may have lied about having turned over a new leaf, but you've got grit," said he. "What you say about the last two years may be true, or it mayn't; but if a fellow who's as plucky and as unselfish as you are, and who loves his wife as you do my girl, hasn't got some good about him, I'll be shot—it's worth looking for, anyway. I only did this to try you."

"I thought you meant it," faltered Kelly; "didn't you?"

"Of course not," said the other, grinning sardonically; "do you take me for a murderer, you silly fellow?"

Kelly reeled, and dropped like a stone—fainting. When he recovered he found himself lying on the hay, and Langham kneeling by his side dashing the melted snow in his face to revive him.

"Forgive me, Kelly," he said kindly. "I know it was rather a brutal trick to play you; my heart smote me once or twice, and that's the truth, and I nearly laughed now and again, you were in such deadly earnest, but I wanted to see if you really would face a horrible death to save Amy's life."

Kelly laughed rather unsteadily. He had suffered so intensely during the past half-hour he could not treat the thing as coolly as did Langham.

"You are a great actor, Mr. Langham," said he; "I could have sworn you meant it. Will you keep Amy here to-night? Thank you. I'll go on now; is it straight ahead?"

"What I'll do for one I'll do for the other," said Langham; "come along. What an infernal wind." He slipped his arm through the young man's and led him to the house. He called the girl.

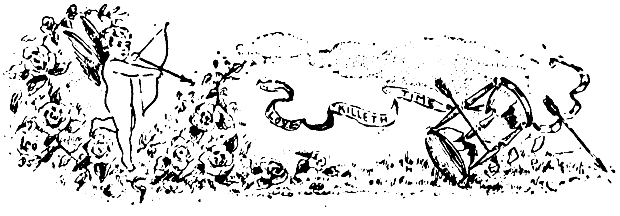
"How's my daughter now?" said he.

"She's better, sir," said the girl; "she's in bed, sir; and she's come to ask for where the gentleman was, sir. I've made her some arrowroot, and she's taking it."

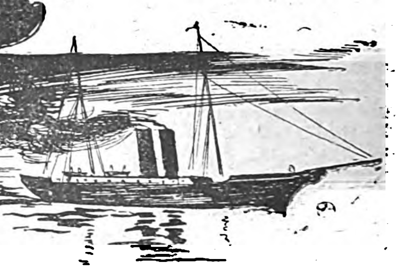
"All right," said Langham. "Tell Jane to look sharp with supper, and lay a plate for Mr. Kelly."

Kelly had sat down by the fire; he seemed half dazed, and leant his head on his hand. Langham silently handed him a pipe—his own panacea for every earthly ill—and tossed his tobacco pouch to his son-in-law. Neither spoke till supper was announced.

"I suppose I must forgive the pair of you," said Langham, rising "and find you something to do at the mills. If you get up to your old games, it's only giving you the sack; but I fancy you won't—anyhow, we'll try. Come to supper, Jack. Shake hands; we're friends, thanks to the Black Snake." Mary Bryan.



THE QUEEN OF NIGHT



All rights reserved by Author.

By HEADON HILL,

(Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.)

SUMMARY.

Gaston Vizard gives Sir Simon Crawshay an introduction to the agent of the vessel Queen of Night, in order that he may make a "special arrangement" with regard to the trip of his wealthy ward, Miss Challenor.

Dr. Zavertal calls on Vizard, and reports on the latest trip of the Queen of Night, during which the lives of three passengers, who were taken on board with a "special arrangement," had been lost. He also informs Vizard that a new captain will be wanted before the next cruise.

In Chapter I. Cyril Forrester receives his dismissal from the Flower Steamship Company for breaking the regulations while saving the life of Miss Aline Challenor. He applies to Nathan and Co., of Fenchurch Street, for the vacant command of the ocean yacht, Queen of Night.

CHAPTER II.

A NEW BERTH.

RESENTING the Jew's intrusive familiarity, I shook his hand off smartly. "The notice is all right," I began, "but I don't quite see——"

"What bithneth it is of mine," he interrupted, with a chuckle that was meant to be conciliatory. "Quite right, my dear sir; how should you see it? But perhaps you will understand better when you hear that I am Lemuel Nathan, of 315, Harp Alley, and the author of that little invitation. May I ask if it has any special interest for you?"

The fact of his being "Nathan and Co." certainly furnished a sufficient excuse for his having addressed me, for my clothes would have shown him that I was a ship's officer, and he might therefore have supposed me to be a possible applicant. Moreover, I had now had time to perceive in the written notice what I had missed in the newspaper advertisements—a chance of getting good employment, and I hastened to make amends for my curtness.

"Of course, that gives you every right to inquire," I said. "Yes, I hadn't had time to make up my mind when you spoke, but I think I was about forming the intention to come and see you about it."

"And so you shall, my dear young friend; you shall come over to my little offish at once," he replied. "It is close by, and we can talk in my private room more quietly than in a restaurant. Come, shall we strike while the iron is hot?"

He had taken instant advantage of my change of tone to slip his hand back to my coat-sleeve, and he was clutching it as if skippers for pleasure cruisers were so scarce that he was afraid of losing a valuable capture. His attitude, and the wheedling expression he tried to impart to his cunning old face were so ludicrous that I laughed as I said:

"Certainly, I will come—at once, if you like. I am probably a good bit more anxious to see if the billet will suit than you are, Mr. Nathan."

Still keeping his hand on my arm, he led me into the street, talking all the while, and I could not help thinking of the Jew crimps early in the century, so pleased did he seem with himself for having discovered me. This seemed so strange in face of the fact that trade was dull, and unemployed steamer captains as thick as blackberries, that I ventured to remark upon it as I went along.

"Ah, yes, my son; there are plenty of captains," he chuckled, "but not the right sort for the Queen of Night. I can read faces, and you are the only man I have seen in a fortnight likely to fill the bill. We want one with a dash and a style about him, to make the ship a little paradithe to the pathengers."

"You would have had more to choose from if you had advertised instead of sticking up a notice which only a few will see," I said.

"That is so my friend, but there are reasons," he replied. "The Queen of Night is now become very popular, and her late captain was a favourite. It might affect receipts if it were known that there had been a change."

We had now turned out of Fenchurch Street into a narrow thoroughfare with gloomy old-fashioned houses on either side—once the abodes of thriving citizens, but now let out in suites of offices from cellar to garret. Half-way down the alley my conductor stopped at a door on which among several others was fixed a brass plate bearing the inscription:

Ocean Steam-Yacht Queen of Night.
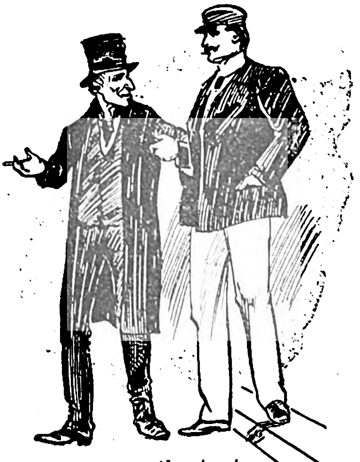
Nathan and Co., Agents.
(And at 420, Pall Mall.)

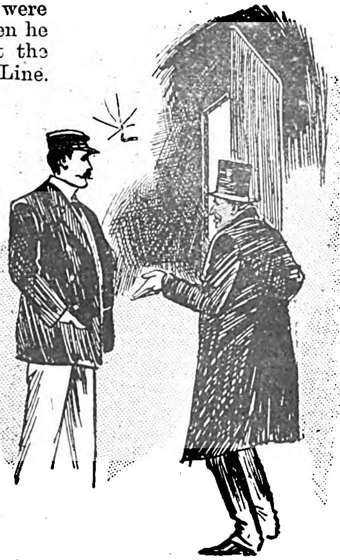
"This is only where the management of the ship is carried on; the passenger-booking is done at the West-end branch," Mr. Nathan explained, as he dived into the dark, musty-smelling entry, and proceeded to lead the way up a worm-eaten oak staircase to the first floor. Producing a key, he unlocked a door on the landing and invited me to enter. The room wherein I found myself was only some fifteen feet square, furnished with an ink-splashed table and three or four common chairs, and it had the appearance of being but an outer office, for there was a second door at the far end, leading, I presume, to an inner room of the same suite. The distempered walls were dirty and quite bare, except where a few tattered maps and charts were hanging.



He led me into the street.

My new acquaintance set a chair for me, and seating himself at the table, took a sheet of paper on which he jotted down notes of the answers I gave to his questions. My name, and the dates of my master's certificate and previous employments were duly recorded, and then he asked me why I left the service of the Flower Line.

"Because I broke a rule—left the bridge without being relieved," I replied, not caring to go into particulars unless he pressed for them. Somehow, I was averse from mixing up Aline in such a sordid matter as my discharge. I little knew then how much depended on his ignorance or knowledge of the episode of the rescue.



Invited me to enter.

My answer seemed to satisfy him; at any rate, he showed no curiosity about details. "Breach of regulashuns, eh?" he croaked. "Nothing very serious in that. Can you get me a letter from the company saying that, barring that, you have been an efficient officer and assiduous in your duties?"

I replied that I had no doubt I could. In fact, the directors had told me that they would do all in their power to aid my endeavours to obtain employment by testifying to my general capacity.

"Very well, Captain," he said, "I think it will be all serene, but I must consult with my partners. I am not alone in this business of entertaining the public on the briny waves. Wait here about half an hour, while I run out, and p'raps when I come back I shall have some news for you."

He handed me a Daily Telegraph to pass the time, and soon the sound of his shuffling footsteps died away on the stairs, leaving the room very still. You can be sure I didn't trouble that newspaper much. I was far too busy congratulating myself on the sudden turn my affairs seemed to have taken; and, eager as I was to see Aline, I rejoiced that my reluctance to go to her in the character of a cast-off had turned my step eastward in search of work before seeking her. Now, if this curious old Jew's "partners" proved complacent, I should be able to go to her full-blown "Captain Forrester," in command of a seven-thousand ton steamer, and with pockets in a fair way to be well lined.

Nothing as yet had been said about rate of pay, but I knew that these pleasure-cruiser people gave good wages. I began to have visions of Sir Simon Crawshay receiving me with open arms and giving his consent to our immediate union; and it was pleasant to think that indirectly I owed my promotion to Aline. Truly, I thought, the "little cherub that sits up aloft" had shifted the wind into the right quarter for me at last.

Thus busy was I with pleasant anticipations, when the sound of a slight cough caused me to start and look towards the door which Mr. Nathan had only partially closed. Standing there, half inside the room, a man was regarding me with an amused expression in a pair of the shrewdest eyes I have seen. He was spare of build, with close-cropped hair turning to iron-grey; but for all his slightness and years he gave me the impression that he would be an ugly customer if called on to take care of himself. His frame was wiry, and the hand that held open the door looked as hard as steel. There was something about the man to inspire trust and reliance even before he opened his mouth.

"Are you in charge of this office?" he asked when he had attracted my attention. He had a scarcely perceptible American accent, which would have escaped general notice.

I explained that I held no position there, but that Mr. Nathan, for whom I was myself waiting, would shortly return.

"Ah, it is not important," he said, coming a few paces into the room. "I was under the impression that the Queen of Night offices were in the West-end, and chancing to see the name on the door here as I passed, I thought I would get to the bottom of my error."

"You made no error; they have a branch in Pall Mall for booking purposes," I said. "This is where they do the victualling, buying stores, engaging officers, and all that sort of thing."

"I see; well, as my business, if any, has to do with the booking department, it is of no use to wait here," he said carelessly. "I haven't decided yet, but it's on the cards I may take a trip in this boat. I've just finished a big bit of work, and I am over here to recreate."

"You hail from the States?" I said.

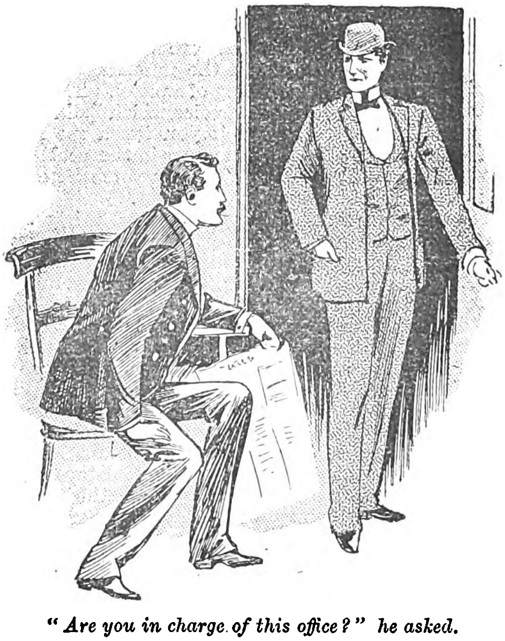
"So you've spotted the twang," he laughed pleasantly. "That is a sad blow, for I rather pride myself on not being branded too visibly with the Yankee trade mark. But then you have had a good deal of experience of Americans I should surmise, if you'll allow me to draw a deduction from your attire. Been in an Atlantic liner, eh?"

"I served in the Cunard some years ago," I said. Then, fearing that I had been rude, I added: "There is very little twang about a Southerner, and I should take you for one."

"Yes, I am from the Southern States," he replied. "My name is Kennard—Franklin Kennard. Possibly you have heard of it?"

I was obliged to confess that I had not.

"Oh, your knowledge of America and the Americans is not very deep-rooted after all," he said, with a curious smile. "Am I right in supposing that you are an officer of the Queen of Night? I ask because in that case we may have the pleasure of improving our acquaintance."

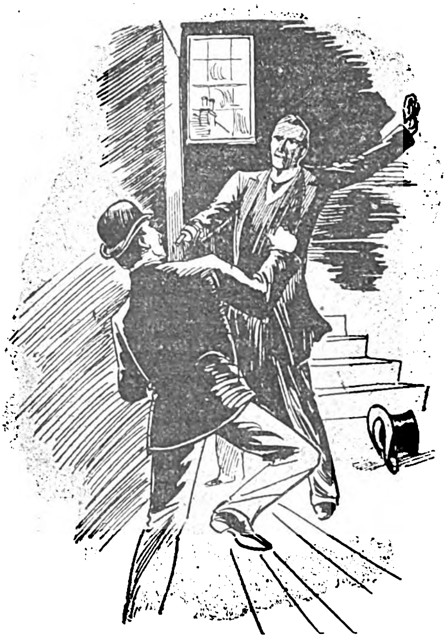


"Are you in charge of this office?" he asked.

"Not at present, though I may be. I am a candidate for the command of the vessel, and hope to get it," I replied.

"Well, then, good luck to you, and au revoir," he said, nodding farewell. "If I decide on the trip I will book at the West-end office, and shall hope to meet you on board."

He went out, leaving the door as he had found it—shut to, but not fastened—and the next moment I heard his footsteps briskly descending the stairs. He must have got some way down, to a place where there was a turn, when there reached me in quick succession a hurried cry of surprise, a smothered oath, and the unmistakable clicking sound that is made by the cocking of a pistol. The footsteps had ceased suddenly, and then a voice which I did not know said: "I've got you covered; if you touch me I shoot." To this there came the prompt answer in the cool tones of the American's voice: "You are alarming yourself needlessly; I am not concerned with you—at present."



"I've got you covered; if you touch me I shoot."

There followed silence for the space of thirty seconds, and then the footsteps went on again, only multiplied now by others ascending, while those going down, presumably those of the American, grew fainter and fainter, and finally died away. The episode had all passed so quickly that I had had no time for interference, or even to decide whether I ought to interfere; but now that it was over I was seized with curiosity as to the other party to that strange meeting on the stairs. It was not Nathan, for I should have recognised the voice. Was Kennard's interlocutor bound for the office in which I was seated, I wondered, or for one of the other suites on that or the higher floors.

I was not kept long in doubt. The footsteps passed by the door and came to an end further along the landing. I had started forward in my chair ready for emergencies, but finding that the gentleman who was so handy with his pistol was not coming my way I settled down again to wait for Nathan's return. Five minutes passed, and I was beginning to be impatient, when suddenly I experienced the sensation that some unseen person was watching me. Without vanity I may safely say that I do not know what "nerves" are, and I certainly was not alarmed by the feeling; but there it was all the same—the feeling that I was an object of interest to human eyes.

I got up and opened the door wide, but there was no one to be seen on the landing. Coming back into the room I saw that it was clearly impossible for anyone to have been looking at me through the window, which opened with a clear drop of twenty feet into the court below. The office itself obviously had no other tenant than myself. The instinct, however, remained strong upon me, and I gazed round the room vaguely in quest of its origin, till some strange attraction drew my eyes to a map that was hanging on the wall between the office and the inner room.

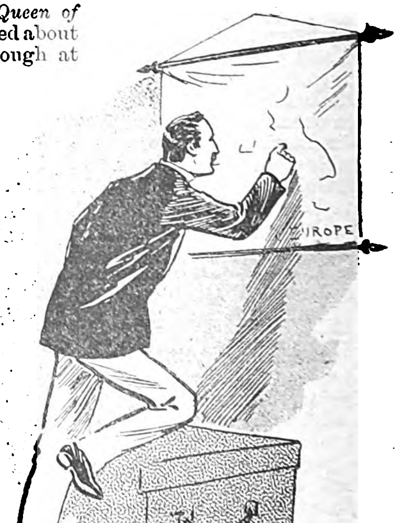
In the map I found, or thought I had found, the cause. Regarding me with a stony glare from two slits in the coloured portion of the canvas, I seemed to see a pair of steel-blue eyes which, as they met mine, were instantly withdrawn. I sprang forward and examined the map, which was a large scale one of Southern Europe. There were the slits right enough—fair and square in the middle of the Black Sea—but there were no eyes, and no place where they could have been. I poked my finger through the slits and came in contact with nothing but the plastered wall, which was smooth and solid, and apparently without a break.

I was about to lift the map to explore further, when my attention was arrested by the voice of Mr. Nathan from the doorway.

"Ah, Captain," he said, with the throaty chuckle that was one of his peculiarities, as he came in and seated himself at his desk: "Can't you keep from hankering after the tools of your trade, eh? Well, I think that you may take it as settled that you have the ship—provided the Flower people speak for you. If you'll call here to-morrow morning at ten I'll have the appointment all ship-shape and in order, and you won't have cause to quarrel with our terms."

My good luck drove all thought of those peeping eyes from my head, and I had already begun to believe myself mistaken. Away, too, flew all remembrance for the time of the American, Kennard; all that my mind was capable of holding just then was an intense desire to get away to the West-end so that Aline could share my joy. So profuse was I in my acknowledgments that the little Jew shook his yellow wrinkled hand at me in a sort of fantastic deprecation.

"Keep your pretty speeches for the pathengers, my boy," he wheezed. "We want all our stock of sweets for the pathengers of the Queen of Night." And he rolled about and laughed as though at some huge joke visible only to himself.



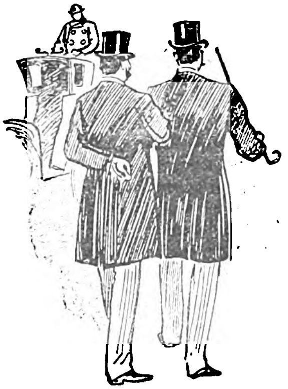
I sprang forward and examined the map.

CHAPTER III.

SIR SIMON'S NEWS.

On leaving Mr. Nathan's office in Harp Alley I went straight back to the more palatial domicile of the Flower Line, in Leadenhall Street, and had a brief but satisfactory interview with the General Manager. Instructions had been given by the board that I was to be treated liberally in the matter of references, and when I left I was in possession of a letter which vouched for my competency in such glowing terms that I put away all further doubt about getting the berth. I was as good as captain of the Queen of Night.

Passing out into the street through the great swing-doors, I felt, in homely phrase, as though I trod on air; but as I was looking around for a smart hansom to take me westward, a trivial incident—at least, I thought it trivial then—served to bring me down to earth. Two well-dressed men were standing on the kerb some few paces away, and one of them—the shorter—turned and looked at me. I instantly experienced the same kind of sensation that I had felt in Nathan's office, and, strangely enough, I saw that the man's eyes were the exact counterpart of those which I had seen, or thought I had seen, gazing at me from the slit in the map. Their owner looked away again immediately, and, hooking his arm in that of his tall companion, walked away towards Cornhill.



Walked away towards Cornhill.

In another minute I was bowling along in a hansom in the same direction, and soon passed the pair strolling leisurely, and engaged in earnest conversation. If there had been any budding idea in my mind of a real connection between the incident at Nathan's and the incident in the street, it was quickly dismissed by the men's demeanour. They evinced no interest in surroundings, and, on looking back after the cab had passed, I saw that, even if the eyes had been identical, they were not sufficiently interested in me to follow. The two gentlemen were continuing their walk, and, as I looked, turned into a well-known bank.

"I am a bit jumpy to-day," I said to myself. "If I didn't know to the contrary I should think I had taken the proverbial drop too much last night. The interview with those board-room bogies and the process of getting the sack must have upset me more than I thought."

Pulling myself together, I once more dismissed the incident of the eyes as too ridiculous for serious consideration. As the cab sped along the Embankment I gave myself up to pleasant anticipations of the coming meeting, and by the time it drew up in Grosvenor Square I had forgotten everything but Aline—Aline, the sweetheart whom I had wrested from the sea. But when I had paid my fare and stood before the house my spirits received something of a damper, and I realised for the first time that even unprejudiced persons might see presumption, or what was worse, self-interest, in my courtship. That stately mansion, with its lordly frontage and imposing air of wealth, was hardly the sort of abode in which merchant captains were wont to woo their brides.

However, "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," and I wasn't going to turn tail and run away from brown stucco and grand brass door fittings. I mounted the steps and rang the bell, hardly decided till the door was opened and a pompous butler stood before me whether to ask for Aline or her guardian. Then I went full steam ahead, and inquired plump and straight whether Miss Challenor was at home.

The reply was a disappointment: "Miss Challenor is at Brighton, sir, and does not return till early next week. After that, I believe, she goes abroad for some time."

"Is Sir Simon in?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, will you please to step this way."

He showed me into a small room on the ground floor, and went to take my card to the baronet. While he was gone I tried to come to a conclusion as to what I should do, and I decided to be guided by circumstances. If Sir Simon was friendly I would broach the subject of my love for Aline; if the reverse, I would wait and consult with Aline herself before taking a course which would compromise her and cause unpleasantness between her and her guardian.

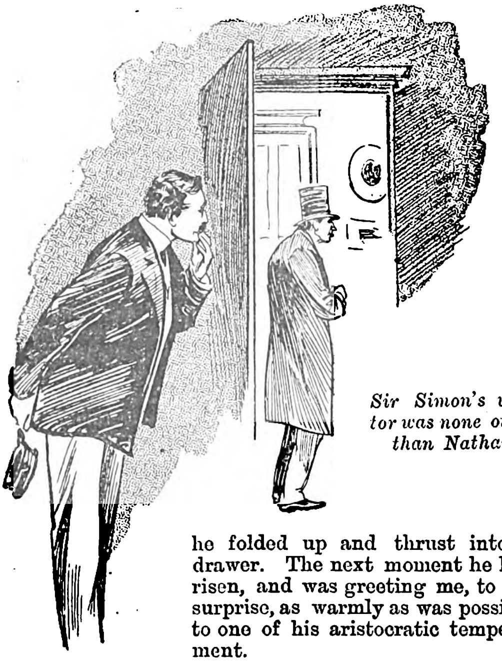
The butler had not closed the door, and from where I stood I could see part of the hall and the foot of the grand staircase. In about two minutes I heard people coming down the stairs, and soon the butler came into view, apparently escorting some previous caller whom he was about to show to the front door at the conclusion of a visit. I was so placed that I could only see passers-by as they traversed the last two steps of the stairs, and the butler was out of my vision in a second. Without feeling any special interest in the visitor—except that I suppose in a vague sort of way a lover's jealousy made me curious about all visitors to that house—I waited for him to go by. There must have been an interval of half-a-dozen steps between the two, for the second descender of the stairs came with the shambling gait of age, and when he did appear was longer in my sight than the manservant. Hence there was no shadow of doubt this time as to the reality of the coincidence that startled me.

Sir Simon's visitor was none other than Nathan, the Jew owner of the "Queen of Night," my new employer.

I hurried to the room door and looked after the retreating figure as it passed out of the house. He had his back to me now, but what I saw only confirmed my recognition of the leering, wizened face. He wore on his head a regular three-decker of a top hat—a piece of head-gear which, from the peculiarity of its construction, had specially attracted my attention in the city.

There was no time for conjecture or surmise as to the nature of his business with Sir Simon. The butler approached me with a request to follow him to his master's presence, and, leading me up the broad staircase, he ushered me into a snug apartment, half smoking-room and half library.

Sir Simon was sitting at an escritoire, occupied in blotting a counterfoil in his cheque-book, which, upon my entrance, he folded up and thrust into a drawer. The next moment he had risen, and was greeting me, to my surprise, as warmly as was possible to one of his aristocratic temperament.

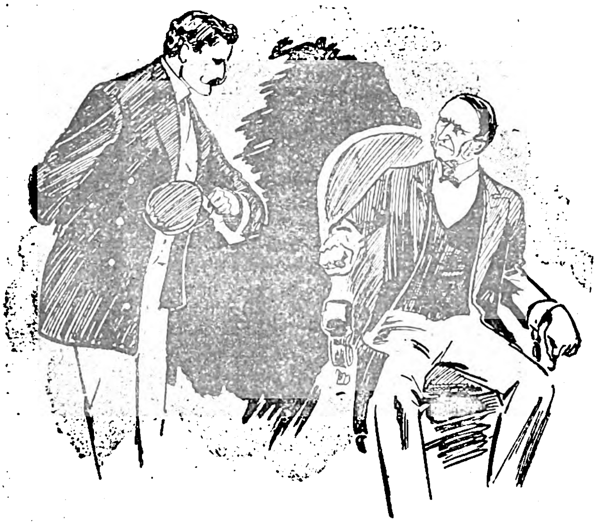


Sir Simon's visitor was none other than Nathan.

"Quite a pleasure, I am sure, Mr. Forrest—or Forrester, was it?" he said, shaking me by the hand, and showing his false teeth in one of his made-to-order smiles. "Sit down and take one of these cigars. Have you been fishing any more young ladies out of the sea lately?"

I responded as well as I could to his intended civility, and then asked after Aline's health without telling him that I knew of her absence from town. As there was no chance of my seeing her then he might as well take my visit as meant for himself, I thought.

"My poor ward is very far from well, I regret to say," was the disquieting reply that set my heart beating. "She has never really got over the shock of her sudden immersion. I have sent her down to Brighton in the hope that the change might benefit her, but it has had the contrary effect. My sister, Mrs. Beauchamp, who is with her, reports that she is in a very low state indeed."



"She has promised to be my wife."

This was grievous news, and I was at a loss to understand it. Though Aline had lost consciousness in the water, she was to all appearances perfectly well the next day, and during the remainder of her stay on the Dahlia she had continued the picture of radiant health. I expressed my deep concern, and asked for her Brighton address so that I might run down and pay my respects in person.

The request was no sooner made than I perceived the real reason of the baronet's affability in his knowledge that Aline was inaccessible to me. He promptly refused to give the address, and there was an ugly sneer in his tone as he did so.

"That, I fear, is quite out of the question, seeing that you are the very last person she ought to see," he said. "Why, the sight of you would recall the occurrence which is the cause of her nervous prostration, and which it is desirable that she should forget."

"She won't do that," I answered sharply, for his latest demeanour nettled me. "And look here, Sir Simon," I added, stung to a premature declaration by the evil smile with which he received my answer, "I can give you a very good reason why Miss Challoner will not be so forgetful. You may as well know it first as last; she has promised to be my wife."

I believe, and always shall believe, that this was the first intimation he had had that there was anything between Aline and myself, though others think that he had suspected it, and had adopted the measures presently to be disclosed because of that suspicion. From his point of view there was cause enough without that, and at least his manner was that of a man completely taken by surprise. Sir Simon Crawshay was as wicked a scoundrel as any who will appear in these pages, but he had not the professional subtlety of some whom we are about to meet. He started forward, flushing deeply, then sank back in his chair, laughing outright.

"My dear sir," he sniggered at length, "it is a pity you are not in the Royal Navy instead of in the Merchant Service. You would be just the man to lead forlorn hopes and cutting-out expeditions. Do you know that my ward is an heiress, entitled to something like a quarter of a million on attaining her majority?"

I confess I was staggered, but I replied boldly: "I did not know it. If I had been aware of Miss Challenor's great fortune I should never have courted her. As it is, the knowledge comes too late to make any difference, for we have plighted our troth."

"And you are willing to take the quarter of a million thrown in, just as a trifling extra detail," he sneered, implying that I knew of Aline's wealth all along. "Come, Mr. Forrester, you must see that I can never give my consent to such an engagement. I should fail in my duty as Miss Challenor's guardian if I listened for one moment to your proposal. I——"

"Wait a minute," I interrupted; "I have had promotion since we met on the Dahlia. I am now captain, and——"

"It makes no difference; pray spare me the interesting particulars," he interposed in turn. "No promotion in your rather obscure branch of a precarious profession would entitle you to aspire to my ward's hand. When do you go to sea again?"

Wondering at the abrupt question, I named the 15th of the month, which was the day Nathan had mentioned as the probable date of sailing.

"The 15th," he repeated, "Well, then, there'll be no harm in my telling you Miss Challenor's future movements; it may save you a lot of trouble in hanging about here. She remains at Brighton till the 14th, and on the following day—the date of your sailing, remember—she leaves England for six weeks. There can thus be no chance of your meeting, although you may perhaps see her through a telescope as you go down Channel. On the 15th my ward starts on a pleasure cruise for the benefit of her health, in the ocean yacht Queen of Night."

(To be continued.)

YOUR LADY FRIEND WOULD LIKE A COPY OF EACH OF THESE.

(1.) Home Notes. One penny, every Thursday. The most popular ladies' paper ever produced.

(2.) Isobel's Dressmaking at Home. } 1½d. monthly.
(3,) Isobel's Fashion's for Children.

Nowhere can you find such charming and up-to-date fashion designs.

READ "GUILTY GOLD,"

Headon Hill's grand story, now running in Pearson's Weekly.

1d. Every Saturday.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

CAMBRIC

	Bordered. per doz.	Hem-stitched. per doz.
Children's	1/3
Ladies',	2/3	2/9
Gents',	3/3	3/11

Direct from the Manufacturers POCKET "The Irish Cambrics of Messrs. ROBINSON & CLEAVER have a world-wide fame." The Queen.

Samples and Price Lists Post Free. HANDKERCHIEFS

LINEN Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, 3/6 per doz.
Gents' 4-fold, 4/11 per doz.
Cuffs for Ladies or Gentlemen from 5/11 per doz.

COLLARS, CUFFS,

Shirts, Best quality Long Cloth, with 4-fold Linen Fronts, 35/6 per ½ doz. (to measure 2/- extra).

"Exquisite quality, most moderate in price."—Myra's Journal. AND SHIRTS.

(By Special Appointments to the Queen and Empress Frederick of Germany.)

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street,
Liverpool.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. Howell, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.

ONE BOX

OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin,. use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
5, DENMAN STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, S.E.
Beware of injurious imitations.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS

FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. Herbal Institute, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS
FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.
Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

HAIR DESTROYED.

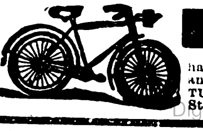
Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.
Please mention this paper.



AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST OVER 4,000 New and Second-hand. EASY TERMS—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 pages) and Testimonials post free. BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A VERY SPECIAL OFFER TO OUR READERS.

"Beautifully finished productions, and artistic in every sense of the word."—The Lady.
"Quite equal to those for which from one to two guineas is usually charged."—Pick-Me-Up.
"Their portraits are soft and delicate, and resemble rich engravings."—Society.
"They are noted for their beautiful enlargements."—The Million.
"All highly finished specimens of photographic skill."—Christian Leader.
"Quite the best we have seen."—Review of Reviews.

SEND US YOUR PHOTOGRAPH,

or that of any Friend or Relative whose memory you cherish, and we will produce a very beautiful and

HIGHLY-FINISHED PERMANENT ENLARGEMENT

EQUALLING A RICH STEEL-PLATE ENGRAVING,

in Monochrome for 5/6 Finished in Black and White.

Measuring 18 by 14½ inches, and sent CAREFULLY PACKED and CARRIAGE PAID to any Address in the United Kingdom for 6d. extra.

USUAL PRICE, ONE GUINEA.

Original Photographs returned uninjured.

Kindly call, if possible, and inspect specimens.

SPECIALLY NOTE. ☞

An Absolute Guarantee.—If any of our patrons can reasonably complain of the fidelity of a likeness, or the quality and finish of our productions, we will either do the work over again, FREE OF CHARGE, or return the money, without any deduction.

IMPORTANT.—A specimen of these beautiful Enlargements will be sent for inspection, on receipt of 6d. in stamps to defray postage, and an undertaking to return it within three days from receipt.

LETTERS WORTH READING.

"THINKS IT MOST EXCELLENT."

Brandon Park, Suffolk, Feb. 16th, 1895.
"Baroness de Barreto writes to say the Monochrome enlargement arrived safely, and she thinks it most excellent."

"VERY PLEASED WITH THEM."

The Rectory, North Berwick, Jan. 10th, 1895.
Rev. F. L. M. Anderson writes: "The enlargements arrived quite safely. We are very pleased with them indeed. Two professionals have seen them, and think them first-class."

"CONSIDERS BOTH EXCELLENT LIKENESSES."

"Seamount," Preston Road, Brighton, Feb. 19th, 1895.
"Colonel Alexander received the two enlargements this morning, and is very much pleased with them, and considers both excellent likenesses."

"MUCH PLEASED WITH THE RESULT."

Thomas Belk, Esq., Solicitor, Middlesborough, writes: "I duly received the enlargements ordered from you, and am much pleased with the result. I also received the originals in perfect order."

"DESERVING OF THE HIGHEST PRAISE."

Jan. 17th, 1895.
Viscountess Southwell has safely received the enlargements, which are most satisfactory, and all who have seen them are highly pleased with them. The likeness has been carefully preserved, and the entire finish and work is deserving of the highest praise.—Rostrevor House, Ramsgate.

"SURPRISINGLY GOOD."

Rev. E. Potts, Hoole Road, Chester, writes: "Dec. 22nd, 1894. The enlargement arrived safely to-day. I feel it only right to say that it is surprisingly good. Please accept my thanks."

"SO MUCH PLEASED WITH ALL FORMER PHOTOGRAPHS."

Lady Thüller wishes to have another enlargement of a photograph done, having been so much pleased with all the former photographs which have been enlarged.—Tudor House, Richmond, Dec. 6th, 1894.

"VERY PLEASED WITH THE PICTURE."

Admiral Singh is very pleased with the picture enlarged for him by the Artistic Photographic Co., and would be glad of another done from the enclosed photograph. Postal Orders enclosed.—"Bonmere," Emsworth, Hants, Jan. 14th, 1895.

"DELIGHTED WITH THE ENLARGEMENT."

The Rev. H. A. Tracy, The Vicarage, Dartmouth, writes: "I am very pleased with the enlargement you sent me, taken from a group. Can you send me another copy without the original, or must I send it up again? Had I known what a success it would be, I would have ordered the two at once."

"AN ACCURATE AND BEAUTIFUL PICTURE."

Boys' Industrial School, Sunderland, Dec. 3rd, 1894.
Gentlemen,—The photo arrived this morning. It is an accurate and beautiful picture. If you have any enquiries from clients in this neighbourhood, I will gladly show them both the original and the enlargement.
Yours faithfully, G. W. Davison.

Address all Orders, accompanied by a Photograph and Postal Order, to

THE ARTISTIC PHOTOGRAPHIC CO., 72, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

TO VISITORS.—Our Studios and Showrooms are situated Four Doors West from Messrs. Parkins and Gotto.

STUDIOS OPEN DAILY, 10 till 6. WEDNESDAYS, 10 till 10. SATURDAYS, 10 till 4.

32 PAGES. TWO GRAND NEW SERIALS JUST STARTED 32 PAGES.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 352. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 28TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well.

APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY,
HANLEY.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lbs., 3s. 9d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

. . CURATIVE . .

Vogeler's Compound

A WOMAN'S FACE.

EVERY one of the principal diseases and weaknesses to which women are subject, fade out the face, waste the figure, and make her in reality old before her time. Perfect health makes comely features, soft skin, and rosy cheeks. This can be accomplished by taking VOGELER'S CURATIVE COMPOUND, made from the formula of one of the most eminent living members of the medical profession, who has made a life-long study of the subject of purifying, cleansing, and enriching the blood. It regulates, promotes, and improves digestion, removes melancholia, nervousness, faintness, and dizziness, brings refreshing sleep and rest, restores health and strength, imparting vigour to the entire system. It acts directly on the liver, stomach, kidneys, and cleanses the blood from all impurities.

Every woman can have a clear complexion, steady nerves, a perfect digestion, abundant strength and vitality, and general good health, by taking Vogeler's Curative Compound.

IT IS THE QUEEN OF MEDICINES.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores, at 1/1½ & 2/6; or sent on receipt of 14 or 30 penny stamps.

A Picture of Health

Sole Proprietors,
THE CHARLES A. VOGELER CO.,
45, Farringdon Rd.,
LONDON.

Vogeler's Cures

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

THE JOHN NOBLE

HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

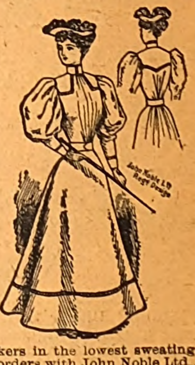
Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, at less than Half Ordinary Prices.

Over 1,000 Well-Paid Workers employed in John Noble's own Factories, under the strictest conditions of Sanitation and cleanliness.

Highest Diploma & Gold Medal Awarded British & Colonial Industrial Exhibition.

These Costumes are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge (the same quality worn by Miss Böcker at the time of her rescue from the disastrous Wreck of the "Elbe," and sold at 7/6 the Dress Length). They are trimmed bold silk cord, and supplied complete for the ridiculous price of 10/6 each, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Ordinary stock sizes fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms; larger sizes 1/6 extra.

10/6



The JOHN NOBLE MODEL COSTUMES have secured beyond a doubt

THE ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD.

They are far and away ahead of all other Costumes on the market for style, cut, make, finish and quality; the skirts are wider and the sleeves fuller than in the slop-made "skimpy" looking garments generally sold at low prices and often produced by ill-paid workers in the lowest sweating dens, therefore ladies can with confidence place their orders with John Noble Ltd., The Warehouse, Manchester.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at the following low prices: From 1/6 each.

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33 ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6 ea.

Lengths	36	39	42	45 ins.
Prices	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6 ea.

Postage 4½d. extra.

NOBLE'S NOVELTIES
IN DRESS FABRICS.
From 4½d. to 4/6 per yard.

Large Box containing over 1,000 Patterns post free on approval.

Every purchaser delighted. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

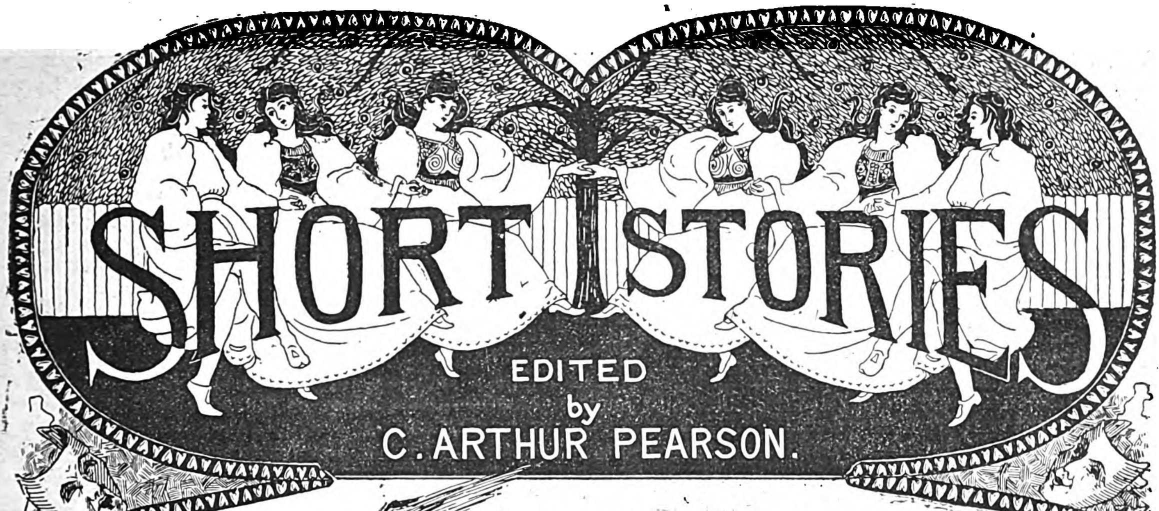
COLOURS: The above garment can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Tan, Grey, or Drab.

PATTERNS, also "THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," and FASHION SHEETS of up-to-date Costumes, Blouses, Mantles, etc., sent Post Free on application.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS, which are always inferior, and remember that John Noble Ltd. have no agents, no travellers, or branch shops, and the genuine goods can only be obtained direct from their Manchester establishments.

Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., The Warehouse, MANCHESTER.



SHORT STORIES

EDITED by
C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 352.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending September 28th, 1895.

ROMANCE
LOVE
WAR
ADVENTURE
HUMOUR
PATHOS

ACCIDENT OR DESIGN?

TWICE a year I visit France as buyer for a large importing house in London. In Marseilles I stop at a rather unpretentious hotel off La Cannebière. Jacques, the head waiter, when he was a garçon in a Paris café, once helped me out of a scrape; but that is not what I want to narrate now.

Early one evening, a soft twilight following a day of rain and clouds, I seated myself in a quiet corner of the upper balcony. I had had a busy, tiresome day, and was glad to be alone. My business at Marseilles was completed, and it was a relief to be free from the Oriental merchants with their oppressive salaams and calm mendacity. Thank Heaven, to-morrow I could set my face towards the land where human nature even was not inlaid and carved and veneered out of all semblance to itself.

I was gazing at the cosmopolitan, picturesquely dressed people coming into our quiet little street from the gay Cannebière. One by one the lights began to twinkle, and the moon rose with its face so solemnly white and expressive of eternal silence framed in the mystery of space, yet breaking into soft smiles and dimples as it glanced into the rippling waters of the old harbour beyond.

Suddenly the gas was lighted in a room behind me. A party of three entered, and seated themselves round the table. There were two men, both fine-looking fellows, and a pretty woman. In the careless glance of an indifferent stranger I saw this, and looked away while they studied the menu or chatted.

But my attention was again called to the room, when the slight dark man of the party rose and threw up the window a few inches. The other took advantage of his companion's absence, it would seem, to throw a glance full of love at his pretty vis-à-vis.

The dark man turned with a nervous rapidity to the table, and must have seen the look that still burnt in the blue eyes of the big blonde fellow. But, though he glanced carelessly at the two faces before him, his expression did not change. The pretty woman, I fancied, turned pale and trembled a little.

Somehow I was fascinated by this group, and my whole nervous system being relaxed after the strain of the past few days, I fell into an imaginative mood unusual to me. "Here is love," thought I, "trying to draw this fine handsome fellow and this pretty little woman together, while this dark Mephistopheles sneers at their love or jealousy stalks a tragedy to their happiness."

But these people looked very matter-of-fact, in spite of my imaginings, as they ate the supper before them. They chatted quietly, eating and sipping their wine with leisurely comfort. The dark man finished first, and pushed his chair back from the table.

"Parbleu! Mignonne, I think it would be well for me to get shaved before we go to the play. I have had no time to think of it, even to-day. What sayest thou?" and he playfully seized her hand and drew it over his cheek.

All rights reserved.]

"It is not very rough; it looks very well," answered the little woman.

"Ah, but it will be rough and unpleasant by to-morrow, and then I shall have no time. It is strange," said he, turning to the other man with a peculiar glitter in his eyes, "that of late I cannot handle a razor myself without wishing to cut my throat, or someone else's," and he laughed maliciously, as his companions, especially the little woman, looked uncomfortable.

"I shall return by the time you and madame have finished supper. I beg that you will not hurry," he continued, with what seemed to me mocking politeness.

"You will not mind waiting here with Monsieur Steinert, Mignonne?" he asked, turning to the little woman with that same mocking tone. "Perhaps you would like to sit outside on the galérie; but no, the wind blows damp from the sea there. Dost feel it, Mignonne? Ah, thou art in a draught, my little one." And though the pretty woman protested, in a rather subdued way, I thought, that she was very comfortable, he rose, and, with a strange smile on his face, closed the thick wooden shutters with a bang.

This brought me to my senses. I realised that I had been unconsciously playing the part of an eavesdropper. I took my chair, and, going round the corner of the house, seated myself on the other side.

In a few moments I became aware of stealthy footsteps stealing along the silent piazza. A chill crept through my blood, and with it a horrible suspicion. Only a few days before a stranger had been murdered by a mysterious assassin who stole on his victims in the dark. An Englishman and a German had so far been the choice of this silent murderer.

Scarcely daring to breath, I peered round the corner. I saw a man now, motionless before the closed shutters of the room. The moon was scurrying along behind a pile of black clouds. It was quite dark, and at first I could barely see his figure. But in another instant a small ray of light fell across his face. I know not whether the expression it revealed was real or the grotesque painting of light and shade, but I saw what seemed like the grinning features of an enraged demon. Only for a moment he stood there; and then, with muttered words, he replaced something in the blind and stole softly away.

As he passed through the door at the far end of the piazza it shut with a loud bang. Something fell with a gentle noise to the piazza, and rolled near my corner. The moon passed out from its grim curtain, and I could just see the small something; I picked it up. By the light of a match I saw that it was a knot of wood, painted green on both ends. I rose, and, walking to the shutters of the little supper-room in which I had been so interested, I saw a small hole in the upper part of one of them. The knot just fitted it. As I was about to replace it I saw into the room. The fair man was holding the woman's hand; as he relinquished it he kissed it passionately. They both looked very sad.

I turned away from the window, filled with a strange sympathy for this pair. I did not care to sit longer on the piazza. I felt oppressed and chilled. As I stepped into the hall I met the trio of my thoughts. They were going out—to the theatre, I suppose—and the dark man seemed the easiest and was assuredly the most talkative of the three.

"Ah, Jacques," said I, as I encountered the head waiter at the door of the café, "who are those three people passing into the street from the private entrance?"

Jacques glanced into the hall as the three passed out.

"That is Monsieur Malhomme and his wife. Do you not know them? They are pensionnaires here. But you are here so little, monsieur, that I suppose you have not seen them. Besides, they do not eat in the café; they have one of the little rooms above. It is more private for madame, who does not like to be stared at so much—so monsieur her husband says to me."

"And the fair gentleman—who is he?" I asked again, with persistent curiosity.

"Oh, that is Monsieur Steinert, a German scientist—an inventor. Monsieur Malhomme is the greatest aeronaut of the day, and madame the most daring parachute jumper of the whole world," said Jacques magnificently, glancing round the tiny room and sweeping his hand in a graceful curve.

I knew Jacques well, and saw that this was an interesting subject. Questions were superfluous, for Jacques could not now be stopped from telling all he knew. He would tell no more—Jacques was that rare being of a higher life, a conscientious gossip.

"Yes," he continued, "Monsieur Malhomme is the greatest of aeronauts, and madame is incomprehensible, superb; her courage is of the most marvellous. Monsieur Steinert has made some improvement on the parachute, that makes it absolument parfaite," said the magnificent Jacques, with another of his sweeping gestures. "It is safe—there is no danger with this parachute. It cannot fail to open and bring madame safely to the ground."

I was now eating my horse-steak—or whatever it might be—but which Jacques politely called "bifstec," and listened comfortably to my talkative Gaul.

"Madame gives another exhibition with this parachute the most perfect, to-morrow. It will be the last in France. Monsieur must go and see it. It would not do to miss a sight so wonderful. All Marseilles will go."

Jacques now masked his smiles in a Jovian frown, as he strode with measured steps and imposing grandeur towards another guest seeking a seat in the well-filled café.

"Does not monsieur think madame very beautiful?" he inquired, returning to my table, where he could keep his eye turned in all directions. "She has all her life been an acrobat, but she is very modest and very good."

Jacques sighed and shrugged his shoulders. "Monsieur is jealous, they say; but it is not madame's fault if she is pretty, and Monsieur Steinert makes eyes at her—as I have myself seen." He looked mysterious. "I see many things, monsieur; but I am a philosopher, and take no notice of these little affairs, except to sympathise always with the heart." Here Jacques had to leave me again, and for once I was spared the polite but rather elaborate description of his philosophy.

The next day rose like a flushed nymph out of a bath of dew. It was delightfully sunny and warm, with a fresh exhilarating air. I drew a long breath as I stepped briskly along La Cannebière. I was following the crowd, and that meant all Marseilles. Its rather motley population was bent on seeing the balloon-ascent and the parachute-jumper.

The trains were crowded; and I felt as joyous and ready to run as a lot of wild youths who had been confined in the close apartment with me, when we alighted at St. Louis. This was the suburb of Marseilles where the ascent was to take place.

We were too early; and, as I had never visited St. Louis before, I spent the time in walking about its busy streets. I had not gone very far before I encountered Jacques; I was glad, as the most lonely place in the world to me is in the midst of thousands of my own kind, if I am a stranger and friendless.

Jacques was always more talkative than a barber, and more lissome than a contortionist, and to-day he was—Jacques. His eyebrows talked, his nostrils talked, and the tips of his ears talked; his legs, feet, arms, hands talked. I enjoyed my cigar all the more from the fact that I was not obliged to listen attentively to Jacques' monologue. He enjoyed his little speeches, and fancied himself, I often thought, declaiming to a large audience instead of one quiet middle-aged individual.

"Ah!" cried Jacques, drawing a long breath, "there is madame!" and he pointed to a lady seated in a carriage before a small house. It was the parachute jumper. She looked bright and flushed, and eagerly kissed an old man who came forth to greet her.

"It is her father," said Jacques. "She lived here once. See the old father, how proud! He, too, was an acrobat."

The old man entered the carriage. As he opened the door we passed before it and saw that, besides madame, there was another occupant. It was the German scientist—Monsieur Steinert. Jacques shook his head as the carriage crove off.

"That is very indiscreet," he said.

We followed the miserable shambling horse attached to the carriage, as it meandered down a widened road. We soon found ourselves in a wide open field among thousands of curiosity-feeders like ourselves.

The great balloon was inflated, and tugging at its moorings as though the breath within animated it with a savage restlessness.

The scene which followed was characteristically French. The aeronaut made a little speech. He described the parachute and the improvements invented by Monsieur Steinert, who thereupon had to make his bow and was duly applauded. Then madame was presented, and they cheered till the crowd of yelling Frenchmen looked like a Paris mob of mad communists. Even her aged father had to be brought forward, and he bowed his old stage bows proudly, as he held his daughter's hand.

"How can he smile?" I said to Jacques, "when his daughter is about to risk meeting a horrible death?"

My philosopher shrugged his shoulders, turned his elbows inward and the upturned palms of his hands outward, arched his eyebrows into inverted V's, and said: "But she is brave and beautiful; he is proud—her father. But oh! see! there she goes, la brave madame!" And Jacques nearly dislocated every joint in his body as he threw kisses at the parachute jumper fast rising into the clouds.

The balloon ascended very rapidly, and, it seemed to me, in almost a straight line. Even after it had reached a great height, it scarcely appeared to drift at all.

We watched it with that keen relish which always makes a real danger horribly delightful when our own gods are not threatened. Gradually the waving handkerchiefs of the balloonists became mere specks, then passed out of our vision.

I don't know whether the feeling of solemnity which stole over me oppressed any other breast with its uncanny weight; possibly it did, for the wild cheering ceased, and a strange stillness eloquent of expectation followed. With a unity of sentiments that was like the stringing of several notes into a sympathetic chord, we watched for the event of the day. At last it occurred.

A long-drawn intense "Ah!" announced that madame had jumped from the balloon.

Like a bit of vivid scarlet in the clear sunshine, she sped towards us with indescribable rapidity. The parachute had not yet opened.

Our nerves were strained to a dry fierce tension as we watched the shooting figure dart downward. Would the parachute never open?

My heart thumped as madly with excitement as must that in the bosom of the woman flashing like a meteorite through the air.

"But," I inwardly panted, "the parachute will soon open and relieve the horrible feeling of being hurled through space at that tremendous rate! She will soon steady into a comparatively floating motion—a gradual descent!"

But alas! seconds shot by, and the parachute was still closed.

Great Heavens! would it never open? A chill of horror swept over us; we craned our necks, we held our breaths, our pulses throbbed, our hearts knocked loudly, our lips grew dry, and yet the parachute had not opened! Was it hours, minutes, or seconds that we watched? The clock could not measure the time; only the mental dial which writes his hours in furrows and grey hairs marked it on our souls.

A deep groan distracted us for an instant. It came from Monsieur Steinert, who, with pallid face and wildly staring eyes, was gazing fixedly at the figure above us.

Ah, madame's old father! I had forgotten him till I saw him fall on his knees, his blue and trembling lips moving in prayer. His tear-dimmed eyes gazed terror-stricken upwards—only a little way now, only a little way, and yet the parachute had not opened.

With a savage bound, the German inventor sprang past me towards the spot where she must——

But I turned away, cold in my blood, faint and dizzy.

Then a cry of horror rose from the crowd now surging towards——! but I could not look, and staggered rather than walked to the station.

As a frightful shriek rent my ears, I looked backwards and saw the maddened German dash himself forward on something scarlet that was stretched on the ground, while the old father, dazed and half paralysed, still knelt and mumbled his prayers. Then the crowd closed round that bit of scarlet raiment, and I saw no more.

Had the aeronaut—my dark Mephistopheles of the night before—tampered with the parachute? Had he taken this means to revenge himself on his wife and her lover? Who can tell? I never could, though my suspicions do not sleep.

Therèse M. Randall.

GOLDEN STAR

. . A ROMANCE . .

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

The prologue tells of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, in the Sanctuary of the Sun in Cuzco, on the eve of the Spanish invasion and the fall of the Inca empire. It has been prophesied that when the sceptre of the Incas shall be grasped by the hand of one who has been dead, and is alive again, the ancient glories of their empire shall be restored. Golden Star, one of the sacred Virgins of the Sun, kneels at the foot of the alter and offers herself as the bride of him who will fulfil the prophecy. Vilcaroya swears for love of her to dare the ordeal. On the night of their bridal they are carried away to their secret resting-place, and at the same time immense treasures are taken out of Cuzco, and hidden against the time of their awakening. Professor Martin Lamson brings back to England an unique mummy which he has found in a walled-in cave in a remote valley among the Cordilleras of the Peruvian Andes. A friend of his, Dr. Laurens Djama, a very clever physiologist, is present while he is unpacking it. He shows it to be entirely different from all other specimens of Inca embalming, and expresses the conviction that it might be possible to restore it to animation. The Professor consents to the experiment being made, and the mummy is removed to Djama's laboratory. In a week he sends for him and shows him his mummy alive and sleeping quietly in bed. The Professor is so overcome by the sight that he falls fainting by the bedside. After his recovery they watch by turns till the Inca wakes. The Professor learns that he is the Vilcaroya of the legend. He asks for Golden Star, and they have to tell him that she has been dead for over three hundred years. He promises them that if they will restore her, too, to life he will give them treasures such as they have never dreamed of. He rapidly regains health and strength, and learns the marvels of the new world in which he has awakened, chiefly under the guidance of Ruth, the Doctor's sister, and six months later all preparations have been made, and the party, including Ruth, embark for Peru.

BOOK I.

CHAPTER V.

Captain Hartness.

The voyage from Southampton to Colon in the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company's Ship Orinoco was a revelation of never-ceasing marvels to the ever-wondering eyes of Vilcaroya. The illimitable expanses of sky and ocean that opened out when the land had faded from sight, the ever-changing face of the sea, the ever-present miracle of the great ship ploughing its way with invisible and resistless force through the parting waves that swirled along her sides hour after hour and day and night without rest or pause, all these and a hundred other details which his ever-observant eyes discovered were to him a series of miracles wrought by some new power that had come into the world since his eyes had closed upon it.

The green, English-looking shores and slopes of Barbadoes, the rock-bound coast and forest-clad mountains of Hayti, and the verdant hills and valleys of Jamaica were all so many wonderlands to him, yet so strong was the habit of self-control which he had by this time acquired, that none of the fellow-passengers whom he met daily and hourly on the quarter-deck and in the saloon could have guessed, however remotely, at the fearful secret hidden behind the impassive mask of his comely, high-bred features, or ever felt the slightest suspicion that a re-incarnate ghost from the grave was so unobtrusively living their easy, idle, steamboat life with them.

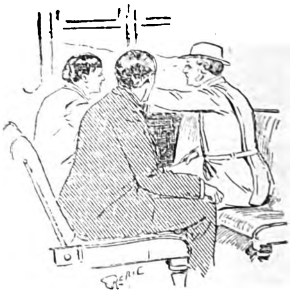
So Colon was reached and the Isthmus was crossed. While they were going over in the train the Professor pointed out the wilderness of ruin that lay on both sides of the land, and told him briefly the history and inception and failure of the great canal scheme. Vilcaroya was silent for a few moments, then he looked up and said in a low tone:

"I will give you the gold to finish it with, if you like, when you have given Golden Star back to me."

It was the first time he had alluded to his hidden treasures since the Professor had asked him about them some five months before. Djama, who was sitting by, heard what he said. He looked at the Professor with raised eyebrows, and murmured:

"That would be a great deal of gold even for you to give. Don't you think so, Lamson?"

"However much it is I will give it," said Vilcaroya, in the same tone. "No price will be too great for me to pay for that I wish for."



The Professor pointed out the wilderness of ruin.

"It will be a matter of millions," said Djama that night to the Professor, as they were smoking their cigars under the electric light in the plaza in front of the Grand Hotel in Panama. Vilcaroya had gone to bed early, as he always did, in accordance with the ancient habits that he had not yet thrown off. Ruth was walking between them, listening with feelings that were not altogether pleasurable to their discussion of the prospective wealth which they expected to receive from the hands of the Inca. Her interest in him was an entirely human one, tinged strongly with romance, but completely free from the slightest admixture of cupidity, while theirs seemed to become more and more purely mercenary the nearer they got to the scene on which they believed their hopes would be realised.

"Don't you think, Laurens," she said, after a little pause, "that there is really something more than a mere mercenary interest in this? You never seem to me to realise all that it means to poor Vilcaroya himself.

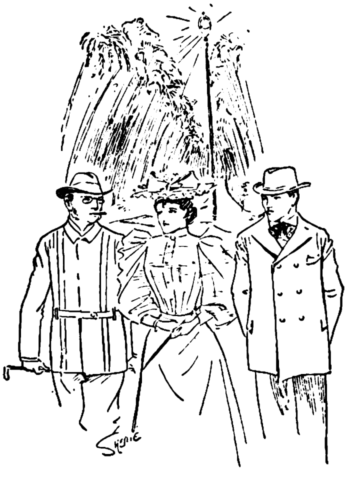
What a marvellous fate has befallen him; what hopes and fears must lie before him; and what great projects must be revolving themselves in his mind although he says so little about them. Surely the deliverance of these poor fellow-countrymen of his from the degradation that the Spaniards and their descendants have thrown them into, and even that dream of his of the restoration of the throne of his ancestors, is of vastly greater importance than any benefit that you and Professor Lamson may derive from it. Of course, I know this is very important to you, and it ought to be, but surely——"

"My dear Ruth," said her brother, taking hold of her hand and pulling it through his arm, "I am very glad you have just said what you have done, because it gives me an opportunity of saying something else that I have been wanting to say for some time. I am afraid you have been allowing yourself to drift into an interest in our friend that might lead to somewhat awkward complications. Of course, I don't mean to imply for a moment that you have any intention of falling in love with him, or anything of that sort; that would be something altogether too absurd, even for imagination; but what I mean is that this man is going into Peru with credentials, so to speak, which the descendants of his people will be perfectly prepared to recognise as supernatural.

"The power that he will wield over them when he once gets into communication with them will be simply illimitable. It will be the power of a God rather than of a man. They will go to death for him at a word, and if he is really capable of unearthing the lost treasures and rediscovering the gold and emerald mines, he will command a money-power that will enable him to carry fire and sword not only through Peru but perhaps the whole of South America. You know that more than seventy-five per cent. of the so-called armies of the South American Republics are almost wholly of Indian blood. They hate the white men, and they have never forgotten what the Spaniards did to their ancestors two or three hundred years ago. As a matter of fact, we are taking a firebrand into South America, and the result may be a blaze-up of the whole continent.

"Now, we want nothing to do in all this. We are not going to start revolutions and run the hazard of battle for the sake of restoring the throne of the Incas. Our business is simply to get as respectable a share as we can of the treasures that we shall have enabled him to recover, and then to get ourselves and our gold back to England with as little trouble and risk as possible. Don't you think that is a fair statement of the case, Lamson?"

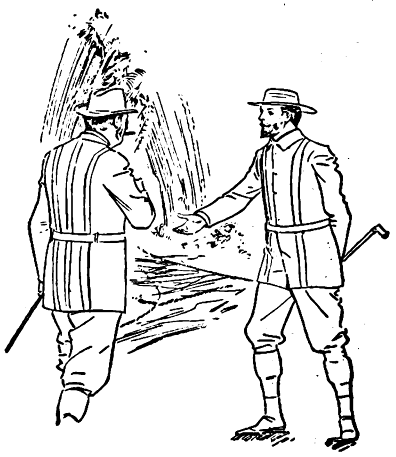
"Yes, certainly I do," said the Professor, "granted also that I can pick up the material I want for my own reconstruction of the lost Inca civilisation; and that I have every hope of being able to do before the catastrophe occurs. After that, well, of course, the somewhat lurid picture you have painted will illustrate a most interesting page in contemporary history, but I really can't see that we shall be justified in figuring it."



Smoking their cigars under the electric light in the plaza.

"Well," said Ruth, a trifle sharply, "I suppose I must admit the worldly wisdom of what you say, but that's not my view of the case. If I may speak plainly, you have brought this man back out of the grave for your own purposes, perfectly fair and laudable in themselves, I admit; but still, I think there is something more than that to be considered. You have made yourselves responsible, not only to him, but, as I believe, to God and the whole world, for the life that you, Laurens, have recreated in some mysterious way, in defiance of all the known laws of nature. If he, as you say, proves to have the power of setting a whole continent in a blaze, and perhaps sacrificing thousands and thousands of lives, remember that, even if you have not made the torch, you have given him the power to make it and light it.

"You know there is something more than the convenience of two or three private individuals to be considered when one deliberately interferes with the order of nature. If it had not been for you this man would have been dead, or perhaps I should rather have said, he would have remained dead. You will probably restore this wife of his to life as well. You know, because you and Professor Lamson have told me yourselves, that the Indians of Peru still believe that a descendant of the Incas is ruling somewhere among the unknown valleys of the interior. They have never given up the hope of a restoration of their empire, and here you are bringing back to them one of the old Incas themselves, and you have just said they will receive him almost as a God, as a king sent to them straight from the Mansions of the Sun, and yet you talk as lightly about setting a whole continent on fire as you would about restoring a lost heir to his estates."



Came striding across a brightly lit patch.

Her brother was saved from the possibly difficult task of making a satisfactory reply to this little lecture by a diversion as unexpected as it was in some respects unwelcome. A tall, well-set-up figure, dressed in a Norfolk jacket suit of khaki and wearing a Terai hat, came striding across a brightly-lit patch on the asphalt with a hand outstretched. It stopped in front of the Professor, who was a pace or two in front of the others.

"Hullo, Lamson! what on earth are you doing in Panama again? I thought you had gone home to spend at least three years sorting out your treasures and writing another of those big books of yours about them. Where are you off to—down the Coast? Oh, I beg your pardon, I thought you were alone."

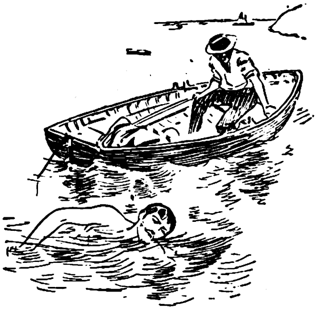
At this moment Ruth and her brother stopped about a yard from the Professor. An introduction was, of course, inevitable.

"Captain Hartness—Miss Ruth Djama, Dr. Laurens Djama, two friends of mine who are going with me—ah—yes—down the Coast."

As Ruth bowed and acknowledged the introduction she looked up under her eyelashes and caught a glimpse of a strong manly face with a rather fair moustache and close-clipped beard, a straight rather delicately-shaped nose, a pair of keen blue eyes under somewhat heavy eyebrows, a good deal darker than the moustache and beard. Later on, when she had an opportunity of revising her first impressions, she came to the conclusion that Captain Francis Hartness, late of Her Majesty's Light Dragoons, later still of His Highness the Khedive's forces, and presently unattached wanderer over the face of the earth, was about the manliest man she had ever seen.

"And what might you be doing here?" said the Professor, when the orthodox greetings had been got over. "I thought you were off lion hunting in Central Africa by this time."

"Well, I did think of going there, as I told you last time I saw you, but I've heard on the best authority that there's going to be a frightful row in Peru before long, and like the soldier of fortune that you know I am just now, I'm going down to see if there's a respectable opening for a free lance. If not, I am thinking of going on into Chile, for the Chilians are bound to be at loggerheads with the Argentines over this frontier question before long, and I may find something to do down there. At any rate, as the Irishman said, 'I'm spoiling for a fight,' and just now South America seems to be the only promising field. I suppose you're going down by the Imperial to-morrow. In that case I shall have the pleasure of being a fellow-traveller."



A swim in the cool of the morning.

"Yes," said the Professor, "we are. I suppose you'll be going ashore at Callao. We are going on to Mollendo, and up to the Lake. Possibly into Bolivia after that."

"I don't know," said the Captain. "It depends on what I hear at Callao. I may stop there or go on to Valparaiso. Are you alone, or have you any other friends in your party?"

"Er—no," replied the Professor, as Ruth thought, a trifle nervously. "We have, a—well, a friend with us who is rather an invalid. Indeed, I may say he is travelling under the medical care of the doctor here. The fact is, he is a wealthy Peruvian, mine-owner and that sort of thing, you know, who has been some time in Europe and is just recovering from a long and dangerous illness. He is going back to try the effect of the air of his native mountains. He belongs to one of the old pre-Spanish families. In fact, I believe he claims lineal descent from the Incas themselves. I suppose we shall meet to-morrow at breakfast, and then I shall be able to introduce you."

"Only, unfortunately," broke in Djama, who for the last few minutes had been longing to gag the Professor. "Our friend, my patient, I mean, speaks very little English and—ah—between ourselves, Captain Hartness, I may say that his malady to a certain extent is a mental one. He suffers from illusions, you know, and that sort of thing. He is a great deal better than he was, but still his faculties are not quite on the proper balance yet. He is very deeply interested in the past history of Peru, and sometimes mixes himself up with the old Incas. A curious delusion but perfectly harmless, but still I thought it better to tell you this at once because you see——"

"Oh, yes, I see perfectly," said the Captain. "Thanks, of course, as we shall be fellow-travellers for some days it is as well to know that. Curious things these delusions, aren't they? I knew a poor fellow in Egypt who got sunstroke and went home under the firm impression that he was the Mahdi, and was being sent to England to be tried for his life. By the way, Professor, talking about Incas, how is that wonderful mummy you found somewhere up country? You know, the one you showed me when I met you in Arequipa."

"Oh, ah—perfectly well," he half stammered; "that is to say, of course, I mean as right as a mummy can be. Wonderful specimen, wasn't it? I never was so proud of a find in all my life."

"Now, I suppose you are going out to find some more like it if you can," said the Captain, holding out his hand again. "Well, good-night, it doesn't do to keep late hours in the tropics, and we shall have to be off early in the morning. Hullo, where's Miss Djama? I hope I haven't frightened her away by my sudden intrusion."

"My sister is a bit nervous of the bad character she has heard of the night air in Panama," said the Doctor, who was no less surprised than the Professor at his sister's disappearance; but he didn't show it. "Well, good-night Captain, I suppose we shall meet at breakfast. Confound the fellow," he muttered, as soon as Hartness was out of earshot. "I wonder what unlucky fate brought him here just now? Look here, Lamson, can this friend of yours speak Spanish?"

"Yes," said the Professor, "like a native. Why do you ask?"

"Great Heavens, man, can't you see? Why, he'll knock the bottom out of that story of yours before he has known his Highness ten minutes. You've told him that Vilcaroya is a Peruvian mine-owner, and that sort of thing, and he doesn't know two words of Spanish. Phew—I shall have to think of a way out of this fix before breakfast, or we shall have somewhat of a scene."

When they got back to the hotel they found that Ruth had gone to bed without saying her customary good-night to either of them.

CHAPTER VI.

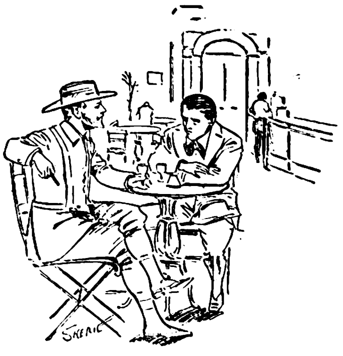
MORNING REFLECTIONS.

The next morning Captain Hartness was up before daybreak, and took a boat out into the bay for a swim in the cool of the morning. Not everyone would have run so great an apparent risk, but he was familiar enough with tropical waters to know that sharks usually give a good swimmer a wide berth, and very seldom attack anyone who is not in distress. He got back to the hotel about nine, and the first person he met was the Doctor, who was evidently on the look out for him. He came out of the entrance hall and shook hands with much more cordiality than he had shown the night before, and said:

"Ah, Captain Hartness, well met! To tell you the truth, I have been waiting for you. Of course you have heard that the Imperial is not going to sail until twelve, so we have plenty of time for a half-past nine breakfast, which I've ordered for the four of us, and then to go on board comfortably. Now, come and have a cocktail. I have something to tell you which ought to be told before breakfast."

"Bueno!" said the Captain, little knowing how the Spanish word jarred on his companion's ears. "I'm just your man, for a cocktail is the very thing I was thinking about."

They went and sat down at an isolated table in the big bar-room, which opens out into the plaza, and as soon as the waiter had brought the cocktails and left them Djama lifted his glass with the usual "salud!" drained it, and put it down again. The Captain followed suit, and then Djama put his elbows on the table and said in a low, confidential tone:



Sat down at an isolated table in the big bar-room.

"I want to tell you something about my patient which I forgot to tell you last night. It is due both to yourself and him, and that you should know it before you meet him, as you will do in half an hour or so, at breakfast, for it may save some awkwardness and possible unpleasantness. I told you last night that he has been a great invalid, and that his malady is party mental. He's perfectly harmless and quite rational, saving only as regards that curious illusion of his about the Incas, but, in addition to this, during his illness he has utterly forgotten his native language, and with it, in fact, his own identity. The result has been that since his partial recovery he has picked up a little English, just as a child might. Like many people who are partially insane, he is intellectually very active, and he is learning English fast. Of course, when he gets back home he will begin to pick up Spanish again; but neither Lamson nor myself speak Spanish with sufficient fluency to feel justified in letting him acquire a corrupt accent from us, so we invariably speak to him in English. You speak Spanish quite fluently, I believe?"

"Yes, pretty well; but like most Englishmen, you know, I prefer to speak my own language. In fact, I never speak any other unless I am obliged to; so, of course, what I have to say to your patient I shall say in English, and you may rely upon me, Doctor, to have every respect for his unfortunate infirmities. By the way, as regards his illusion, I suppose you have to humour it a little in the usual way?"

"Oh, yes; you know, nothing is more dangerous in these cases than irritation, and nothing irritates anyone suffering under an illusion more than displaying any incredulity. In fact, we go so far as to converse with him, privately, of course, as though the illusion were actually true. You see, it doesn't really matter; the great thing is to get his physical health perfectly restored first, and then trust to healthy, natural surroundings to gradually destroy the illusions. When others are present we never mention it; but as you are a friend of Lamson's, and will probably be with us a good deal, I thought it only due to you to put you au fait with the circumstances."

"Thanks very much. I am exceedingly obliged to you, for I have no doubt you have saved me from making some howling mistake which might have had serious consequences. Have another? No? Well I suppose you are right. You know what they say out here? One cocktail's just enough, two are too many, and three are not half enough. It's an insidious drink, and that's the way it takes you. Ah, here's Lamson and your sister, and—eh! Good God, no, of course, it couldn't be. What a fool I am!"

"What's the matter?" said Djama, slipping his hand under his arm as if to stop him.

"Oh, nothing; I—ah; oh, of course, I suppose that's your patient, is it? The man with the bronze skin and Inca eatures. I thought I had seen him before, that's all."

As he spoke the Captain walked off, followed by Djama, who had turned a trifle paler than his wont, towards the archway through which he had seen Ruth, the Professor, and Vilcaroya, standing in the vestibule. As the Professor introduced him to the Inca, and he shook hands with him, he gave him a quick, keen glance which only Ruth noticed, and said half to him and half to her:

"I am more than honoured to make the acquaintance of one who bears so ancient and honourable a name, and who, as far as appearance goes, might be the very Vilcaroya of the legend, saving only the dress, if the lapse of the centuries didn't make that impossible."

Vilcaroya shot an inquiring glance at the Professor, and said in Quichua, before Djama could do anything to stop him:

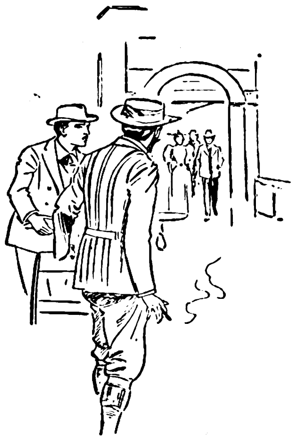
"Have you told the stranger my story?"

"No," replied the Professor, in the same tongue. "I should not do that unless you first consented."

"It is good," replied the Inca. "I will think."

Whether or not the Captain saw anything peculiar in this little dialogue, or whether he recognised the language in which it was conducted, he was too well bred to show it. He had got into conversation with Ruth, and she saw something like a passing flash of surprise or recognition come into his eyes and vanish again in a moment. The conversation then, as at breakfast, was strictly confined to generalities, and Vilcaroya took a very limited share of it, yet using his still rather scanty vocabulary with wonderful judgment and correctness.

Meanwhile, under the surface of the conversation, several hidden under-currents of thought were running in different directions. Ruth was thinking, with a vexed apprehension, of the terrible prospect which the conversation in the Plaza had called up. She was wondering, too, what part this newly-arrived friend of the Professor was going to take in the work in hand. Her instinct told her that he would inevitably play some part, and that possibly a very conspicuous one; for she had already recognised that his was one of those quiet, strong, masterful spirits which enter deliberately upon great enterprises, risking everything to attain their object with quiet calculation, which takes the extremest dangers as the necessary and inevitable risks of the game.



"I thought I had seen him before, that's all."

He was a soldier by profession and a soldier of fortune by choice. Her womanly intuition instantly connected him with the Inca's dream of a restored empire. He was, no doubt, well versed in all the arts of modern war. He was brave, daring, and ambitious; the Professor had already told her that during a long chat before breakfast. What if he were to gain Vilcaroya's confidence, as he well might? The Inca was a perfectly free agent, and could choose what friends or allies he pleased. The one tie between him and the Professor and her brother was the finding and restoration of Golden Star. That accomplished, he would no doubt fulfil his promise as to the hidden treasures in whose existence she implicitly believed, and there would be an end to their connection.

Beyond this point her thoughts somehow refused to run; they were checked by a strange unwillingness to pursue the subject any farther.

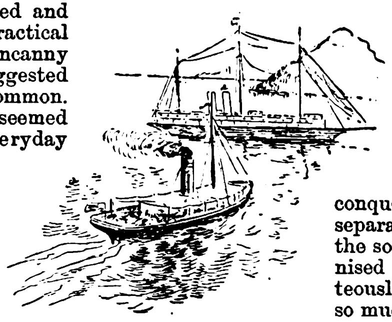
Meanwhile her brother was fuming inwardly, and wondering what he could do to prevent any confidential intercourse between Vilcaroya and this most unwelcome intruder, as he perhaps naturally considered the soldier to be, for he, too, saw just as quickly as his sister had done how far-reaching might be the consequences of an understanding between them.

Francis Hartness was avowedly going out to South America to find work as profitable as possible for his sword. To Djama he was an adventurer pure and simple, and what more profitable work could such a man find than that which he knew perfectly well Vilcaroya was contemplating?

This work involved a racial war which might spread from end to end of the continent, and which would certainly cost enormous sums of money—an expenditure which by no means chimed in with the bargain that he had made with the Professor, who at that moment was trying to satisfy himself as to the wisdom of admitting Hartness into the secret, and the possibility or otherwise of keeping it from him.

As for the Captain, his mind, accustomed to prompt and independent action, was swiftly analysing the characters of his new acquaintances, and weighing the possibilities of the truth or falsehood, whole or partial, of the undoubtedly strange story that had been told to him; but under this lay another stratum of thought, which he was reserving for future and more deliberate consideration, of which the subjects would be Ruth and Vilcaroya.

Ruth he was already prepared to like and trust, if need be, as much as he instinctively disliked and distrusted her brother. To his clear, practical vision there was something occult and uncanny about this man—something that suggested knowledge and power far out of the common. Those dark mesmeric eyes of his always seemed to be looking over the boundaries of everyday things, and his conversation always seemed to suggest the idea that, while he was talking on one subject, he was thinking of something very different.



The "Imperial."

Then there was this curious patient of his with the physiognomy, half-Phœnician, half-Indian, that he had seen among the natives of the Cuzco district, and yet infinitely more refined and intellectual. Where had he got the light bronze of his skin, the high-bred delicacy of his features, the soft, glossy brown of his hair and that unmistakable light of a strong intellect which shone in his eyes, and where, above all, had he got that marvellous resemblance to the lifeless, long-dead mummy that the Professor had shown to him in Arequipa?

These were the points over which he had already promised himself some hours of quiet reflection as the Imperial was going southwards over the smooth, sunny waters of the Pacific, and the result of those reflections might probably make a considerable difference, not only in his immediately future course of action, but in the whole work of his life. He didn't just then know how or why, but his instinct told him that it might be so.

As for Vilcaroya himself, as he did least of the talking, he probably did most of the thinking. Like all of his caste, he had been trained to war from his boyhood, and had led many a troop in the armies of the great Inca to victory and conquest, and, in spite of the centuries that separated their two ages and their two worlds, the soldier spirit within him had already recognised its kinship with this strong and courteously spoken soldier who had seen war made so much more terrible by those strange flame-and-thunder weapons of which he had heard much since his awakening, and which he all too vividly remembered as one of the causes of the sudden downfall of the empire of his ancestors.

Such then were the various states of mind in which the momentous little party embarked at noon that day on board the Imperial, which an hour later left her anchorage off the island of El Morro and started on her southward voyage with a cargo of possibilities of which her captain and crew had very little idea.

(To be continued.)

IN THE REDWOODS.

THERE were three of us sitting in one of the luxurious corridors of the Bath Hotel, Bournemouth. I was the only Englishman of the party. The girl opposite me was an American; her companion came from Southern Africa, and the three continents were represented. I had finished my story, and the miner had fallen to and capped it with ease. Then we both looked at the American. She shook her head and laughed. "I don't know one," she said. "I don't know how to begin."

"It was——" I suggested.

"It was the night of November 25th, 1880. The moon, half spent, rose over the long unbroken range of mountains that extends along the Northern coast of California from Bodega Inlet to Humbolt Bay—How's that for a beginning?"

"Capital!" we said together. "Go on." She resumed:

"Perhaps an hour before midnight, a young girl stood in the doorway of a deserted cabin, far up in the Russian River cañon, watching the east grow light, and waiting for the moon to rise. A trail, half obliterated by the growth of underbrush and fallen trees, ran a few yards in front of the cabin, and led on down the cañon to the camp. By the light of the moon this trail would be plainly visible at a place a quarter of a mile higher up the mountain where it crossed a clearing in the redwoods; and towards this spot the girl's face was turned.

"She was alone, and seemed impatient for the coming light, which lingered so long among the tall trees on the summit of the range. A cloak, black and long, and from its shape evidently a 'gentleman's,' was thrown over her shoulders, and its hood covered her head. No sound stirred the deep stillness of the forest, save, now and then, the cry of some mountain cat. She had played with mountain cats; why should they frighten her? Yet she shuddered at the cry. It was so near. Even the creaking of a board, as she stepped back a little into the cabin, startled her.

"Then she drew the cloak closer about her and stepped out.

"The moon had risen. It looked like a great fire among the redwoods before it came up from their midst, but now all the cañon was flooded with its light. The trail which Mal had been straining her eyes to see through the darkness now showed clearly where it came from a thick growth of chaparral, and she watched its stretch across the clearing more earnestly than ever. She had not long to wait, for soon the man for whom she was looking issued from the brush. He was on horseback, and a riderless horse followed him. At the centre of the clearing he stopped and discharged a small revolver.

"Mal's heart leaped. 'All is right,' she said slowly to herself; but her conscience told her all was wrong, and she burst into sobs.

"'Poor dad, he'll never take me back—an' Ben, an' Jim. Oh, I know he'll never do it! But if he don't,' she said, between her teeth, 'I've seen folks die, an'—an'——' But a pair of strong arms were round her, and that voice which had led her so far was calling her his Mal, his sweet Mal, his little Mal, and asking her if tears were all she had for him.

"Her arms sought his neck, and she begged him not to be angry. 'I won't cry no more,' she said imploringly. 'Promise never to be angry with me again.'

"'And now, Mal,' he said, 'we must be getting out of here. We'll cross the river and stop at Jim's.'

"'No, no, no,' she begged, 'not at Jim's. Jim would know something was wrong, an'—an', he might kill you,' she whispered.

"'Well, if you can stand it, we'll cross the range and stop in one of the old logging camps to-night. To-morrow we'll go on to Sonoma.'

"'Oh, I can stand it,' she said. 'I've been there with dad lots o' times; only please don't stop at Jim's.'

"Her lover was looking at her attentively. 'Do you know, Mal, you look divine in that coat of mine? I shall have to will it to you,' he said, with a little laugh. It was a forced laugh, but it was just as sweet to Mal, and when he lifted her into the saddle she clung to his neck until he had kissed her many times, and called her over and over again by all those sweet names that love makes up for its ornaments. Then he threw himself upon his own horse, and in single file, he leading, down into the depths of the cañon they departed.

"The trail which they followed had once been used as a log-way. On each side rose the giant redwoods, towering high and dark. In the dense part of the forest, where the moon only shone on the higher branches of the trees, they looked like grey crested phantoms. Stirred by the light wind, they seemed to breathe a sigh as Mal passed beneath them; and Mal answered them with a sigh from her own heart.

"Among these trees had been her home. Their every sound and look, in pleasant and fearful weather, she knew; and now she was leaving them—was it for ever?

"Shortly they came to the old camp, where she had spent so many happy hours watching the huge logs thin themselves out into timber, and seeing the great saw spin round and round. Perhaps some of that very timber which she had seen cut had gone to the city to help build his house, the house which he had told her was to be hers. Thus she thought on, until leaving the camp they descended into the creek bed, and followed on down towards the river. They could hear it rippling over the stones at the crossing.

"Then they passed Jim's. It was so strange, she thought, to go by Jim's without stopping; Jim, who had rescued her from drowning when she had attempted to cross to his cabin during the rising of the river, the fall before; Jim, who was almost as dear as her own father, and so much gentler; Jim who loved her so.

"'Jim!' she called aloud.

"Her lover halted, startled at the sudden cry, and came to her.

"'I didn't mean to do that,' she said. 'It came out —I couldn't help it. I was thinking so much of him, and wishing I might just say good-bye to him, that it slipped out all of a sudden.'

"A mile beyond Jim's, they came into the trail again, just where it commenced its upward climb into the redwoods of the coast range. An hour later, at the edge of the woods of El Diablo, they reached the cabin where they were to spend the night. Here they dismounted, and Mal's lover led the horses into the brush, while she, not the least afraid, pushed open the door of the dark and vacant hut.

"There was a close and stifling odour within, from the old and musty straw scattered over the bunk in the corner. A wild cat jumped out through the window. Mal gave a little start. She sat down on the edge of the brush, where she could see her lover loosening the saddle girths. Once more she thought of her home, far back at the head of the Russian river. That dear old river—how it pained her to leave its soft ripple, and its blue, clear waters, and her 'dad,' and Jim, and her brothers. Thoughts of them all came surging up from her heart. She hid her face in her hands and burst into sobs. So long as he was with her she was happy; but alone, how troubled she grew!

"Some strips had been torn from the roof of the cabin, and through the opening a little moonlight fell upon her. When she raised her face it was very white. The hood had partially fallen from her head, and one of her locks of ruddy hair had shaken itself loose from the knot into which it had been tied, and had slipped down upon her shoulder. Her lover kissed her when he came. Then all was changed, and her heart leapt with joy.

"'You are not sorry, my sweet one, you came, are you?' he said to her tenderly.

"She looked up at him. 'Why do you always think I'm sorry? I ain't sorry; only dad—dad'll miss me, and I know he'll never take me back,' she said; 'an' Jim —Jim'll miss me too.'

"'I'm afraid you're getting tired of my love,' he said.

"'No, no, I'm not. I won't speak of them again. I won't, I won't,' she cried, clinging closer to him and trying to stop the heavy sobs which would come, even when he had told her, all over again, how much she was to him. 'An' you'll marry me when we get to the city, won't you?' she asked.

"But he turned his head away, and she could not see the look that came into his face.

"'My dear Mal, why do you cry so? You know I love you. Rest your head here and go to sleep. I will wake you when it's light.'

"So, with a sigh, her head dropped upon his shoulder, and Mal went to sleep.

"The moon had risen a little higher. It shone full upon Mal's face, and her lover kissed her. 'One would almost take her for a man in this coat of mine,' he said to himself, 'but how sweet her face is,' and another caress told him how sweet, indeed, it was."

The girl left off and laughed a little consciously. She had been carried away by the interest of the story. We begged her to continue. We were enthralled by her simple, weird style. She began again:

"A cool breeze had sprung up from the coast, and was bringing a heavy fog with it. For some time Mal's lover watched it through a break in the trees, as it came rolling in over the range and settled down in a cloud over the Russian river valley. Then he must have fallen asleep, but only for a moment. He awoke with a little start, and under the impression that he had heard voices. He listened. The wind was stirring the dead leaves and moaning among the trees. Was it only the wind he had heard? Gently he laid Mal down upon the bunk, and drew the hood around her face. He stepped to the window and listened again.

"Still there was only the sound of the wind. Yet he was sure he had heard other voices than those of the forest. Yes, he was right. Presently there came to him the sound of crackling brush. Some one was coming. Yes, now he caught a glimpse of some half dozen horsemen on the trail.

"'Heavens! Her father's horse and Jim's,' he breathed. 'They're after me; they'll lynch me if they catch me!'

"He glanced hastily at Mal, kissed her softly—it must be his last, he knew—then out through the door, into the long grass, upon his horse, and away.

"The men coming up the trail heard him crash through the brush in the distance, but thought it some deer, startled at their approach.

"A little distance from the cabin the men halted and dismounted. Their leader was Mal's father. He went softly to the window and looked in. The figure in the black coat caught his eye. Fury seized him at the thought that it was the abductor of his child. It was all he cared for, to have his vengeance upon him. He did not look to see if Mal was there too. He did not think of her. His passion for revenge had mastered him.

"He beckoned to the men. There were six of them. They crept stealthily through the open door, Jim and Mal's father a little in advance of the rest. For one moment they hesitated, then threw a heavy sack about the sleeping figure, and drew it tight round the feet and neck with ropes. It was quickly done. There was a half smothered cry, a brief struggle, and the men bore their burden away in the redwoods.

"The moon hid itself behind some dark clouds. The foggy winds ceased sobbing among the trees, and all the voices of the deep forests were hushed. By the sound of a distant whistle they knew it was near morning.

"A few yards from the trail they stopped. A rope was run up over the projecting limb of a huge tree, and its noose passed to Jim to fasten. The others knelt upon the struggling, prostrate figure to quiet it. With a quick jerk Jim loosened the cords that had held the sack close about the shoulders and neck, and slipped the noose over in their stead.

"'A'ready,' he breathed. The men got off the body. There was a sound as of rope running over hard bark, and Jim and Mal's father lifted the figure to a standing posture.

"A moment the men hesitated. For an instant the noose slackened its grip. Life and sense and thought rushed back to Mal with that breath, and the stillness of the redwoods awoke to the skriek of her voice calling: 'Jim! Jim! Jim!'

"The figure in the sack fell heavily to the ground. The terror of the woman's voice came over the men. They stood speechless. Again Mal called. But it was only a moan—'Jim, Jim!'

"Now they bestirred themselves. They tore open the sack, and freed Mal from the cloak and the smothering hood. Jim knelt to hold her.

"'And he, where is he? He, your man?' they shouted.

"Mal shook her head.

"One of the men spoke up excitedly: 'The crackling brush we heard! He saw us, he was off. We can——'

"But without the words the fact had communicated itself to them. They were mounted in a moment, and off down the trail, Jim alone remaining with Mal.

"The two listened to the mad clatter of hoofs over the stony trail, until they died away in the distance. Jim was still kneeling by the girl's side. He put his hand on her shoulder.

"'Do yo' love him so, girl?' he said.

"But Mal only gripped his arm tightly and leant forward to listen more intently.

"'He may get away, girl, he may. Do yo' hope he will?'

"Mal looked at the man.

"'Jim,' she said firmly, 'they must get him; they must kill him. I hate him—he ran away!'

"But even now Mal's lover lay in the road a mile down the trail—dead! though not by the vengeance of those who sought to kill him. Fast to his boot were a stirrup and a broken strap; the saddle he had had no time to tighten had turned in his mad race for life, and he had been dragged over the rocks of El Diablo. The men found him as morning broke, grey and dull, through the white, damp fog that was coming in thicker and thicker among the redwoods. Like a shroud for the dead came the fleecy clouds, and wrapping their mantles of white about the great trees, obliterated all before them."

The girl stopped. We both looked at one another, and said, "Thank you," in the same breath. It was beautiful.

JEROME BULL.

The Picture and the Conscience.

Some three or four years ago the scientific and social world of Paris was astonished and shocked by the news that Doctor Emile Paul, the famous specialist on mental diseases, had died by his own hand.

At the same time it was announced that Madame Revallon, the widow of the well-known magistrate, had retired to a convent with the intention of taking the veil.

Society connected the two paragraphs mysteriously, for Emile Paul was an old friend of the late magistrate, and strange rumours floated about for the traditional nine days. Then new sensations cropped up and the matter was forgotten.

* * * * *

I was lately exploring that part of Paris where Jew dealers and picture brokers most do congregate, and amongst other curiosities I observed a frameless portrait of a red-robed magistrate; but, strange to say, the robe was slashed and torn, as by reckless stabs of a knife, and, stranger still, the eyes had been cut out neatly, leaving two round holes in a smooth, grinning face.

The effect was hideous—so much so that I hardly dared to look at the thing a second time; but my curiosity was awakened.

I was about to enter the shop in order to make inquiries concerning the canvas, when an old friend and fellow student laid his hand on my shoulder, and said:

"I saw you looking at that thing. Is it not hideous? The history of that portrait will interest you, a student of the human passions. Come to my room. I have three letters which tell the whole story. You shall read them."

I accompanied him to his rooms. He opened an old-fashioned desk, and produced the three following letters:

First Letter.

"Monday, August 20th.

"My dear Verdon,—How fruitful of sad events the last three months have been. My mother gone, my brother maimed and disabled for life, and now poor Revallon gone! Helen in mourning—and how pretty she looks! She weeps continually. Poor Helen! She sees no visitor except myself, but there is no whisper of scandal. Why should there be? Am I not one of her late husband's oldest friends? She receives me in the little blue room as of old—there hangs the portrait of her husband in his magisterial robes. You know the portrait—the likeness is excellent—it has caught his expression to perfection. You know that clean-shaven face, with those mocking, cruel, cold steel-grey eyes, those cynical, sneering lips. But the eyes, the eyes, they have in them that strange yellow light which I so well remember and so hated while he lived. How I longed to see them closed for ever! How I longed to finish that hateful, piercing stare! But he is gone! Dead! Buried! Yet that terrible portrait, with the piercing, yellow rayed eyes, haunts us, tortures us, freezes the very kisses on our lips. I hate them! I hate them!

"At night Helen locks her bedroom door, for she imagines that he will leave the canvas and come to seek her. When he was alive we had no fear of discovery; now that he is dead he pursues us with horrible persistency.

"He seems to have waited so that his vengeance might be the more awful. We have obtained the freedom for which we longed, but it is worse than discovery itself.

"In six months we shall be married; we shall then realise the dream of the fevered days when he lived—— But no! no! that dream is unrealisable, because the ghost of the past rises up between us, real and living, with steel-grey eyes.—Emile."

Second Letter.

"Friday, August 30th.

"My dear Friend,—Thanks for your letter. Yes, I know, it is nerves, all nerves! But, Verdon, the dead have their revenge. Every day I take the train to Bas Meudon, not to see Helen, but—to see him, the dead husband whom I loathed in life, because he lived, and whom I loath in death, because he has not died. I go there because I must; I am drawn thither—I know not why—but—go I must.

"In the little room where we sit with our eyes fixed on the same object, for we gaze always on the staring portrait in spite of ourselves, it hypnotises us with its evil smile, and we cannot escape it; many a weary hour passes. We rise and move to another part of the room, but the eyes follow us, haunt us, look into our very souls.

"Then I cry out, 'Who accuses me?' and I falter, 'It was a mistake—a mistake!' Poisons form a dangerous part of medical science. I did not—I do not believe I poisoned him. I know he did die of poison—but it was an error. I did not want him to die.

"Oh! those eyes, those eyes which I hate and which I go to see every day, without even speaking to Helen, who, pale with terror, implores me to calm myself, to have pity on her sufferings. She sees a new light in my eyes—a new light which frightens myself, when, by chance, some glass reflects my fevered countenance.

"That portrait—I have asked Helen to remove it, but she replied:

"'Impossible! What would people say? And, if I did—it would be useless. He would come—all the same.'

"She is right. Sleeping or waking, he haunts me. I cannot escape from him.—Your unhappy Emile."

Third Letter.

"September 5th.

"My dear Friend,—All is over. I have cut out those two eyes with my scalpel. The steely, serpent-like orbs are gone, and in their place there are two empty holes. At last, at last! I held them in my hands and crushed them. Crushed them until I buried my nails deep in my own flesh. Ah! they would leer no more; they were finished now; the hideous yellow light was extinguished for ever. Now could I rest, for I had annihilated the sneer—the penetrating, insolent, prying sneer which maddened me. But was it so? I looked once more on the red-robed portrait, and then, oh, merciful heavens! I saw—I saw that the empty holes still glared with a strange unholy light; and I shrieked aloud like a wild beast, and fell upon the picture, slashing at it and cutting at it with my scalpel. I was mad—mad with the most terrible madness—that which reasons.

"This is my last letter. Before you receive it I shall be dead—dead before the empty and accusing sockets which arraign and find me guilty of foul murder.—Your miserable Emile."

H. B.

THE BACHELOR BROTHERS

Or, BLOOD WILL TELL.

"From John Ernest Moncton, Havre, to James Cyril Moncton, London:

"Sail to-morrow. Have Tom Lander and his little girl in tow. Will visit us."

James Moncton read and re-read the cablegram. He was pleased, very pleased, indeed, at the prospect of seeing his brother fully a month earlier than he had expected to enjoy that pleasure. But Lander—poor old Tom Lander! What a host of queer memories the mere mention of that well-remembered name served to conjure up.

Both he and his brother knew him well; the scapegrace at school, though by all odds the best fighter in it; the wild young man-about-town scattering a none too generous fortune to the winds; the shiftless ne'er-do-well, as the more censorious of his friends were apt to term him; and lastly, the Quixotic idiot who had quite estranged himself from society by a chivalrous marriage to a girl of obscure birth.

But that was many years ago, and the scapegrace's old schoolfellow pushed the grey hair abstractedly back from his temples as he wondered how the scapegrace would look after his long sojourn abroad, and whether he had quite recovered from the loss of the wife who had caused his social downfall in his youth, but whom, as John Moncton very well knew, poor old Tom had idolised as the very apple of his eye.

After a long period of pleasant thought, this handsome and warm-hearted old bachelor rang for the smug-faced but wholly correct gentleman that served himself and his brother as a valet. "Benson," he said briskly, "Mr. John will be home to-morrow. Get his rooms ready, and also prepare rooms for a friend of mine and his little girl who are to visit us. Tell the housekeeper they must be made as comfortable as possible."

The house that the brothers occupied in Russell Square was big enough to have accommodated a trio of Tom Landers, with a following of half-a-dozen "little girls" apiece. There was no fear that the visitors would not be made comfortable.

James Moncton felt as fit as a two-year-old colt as he drove down to the station to meet the train. It was a lovely spring day, and he really longed to see his brother, for between these two there existed a great and enduring affection.

But his countenance fell as he espied his travellers descending on to the platform. Tom Lander leant heavily on his brother's arm and smiled in an aimless and unrecognising sort of way as he shook hands with the waiting James. There was that in his face that one instantly recognises as the look of a poor beggar whose earthly race is pretty nearly run.

James exchanged meaning glances with his brother, and led the way to the carriage. Then for the first time he recognised "the little girl" who followed, demurely enough, behind.

The face was that of a child of, perhaps, fifteen, but the figure, which was the very perfection of grace, that of an almost fully-developed woman. Her eyes and hair were deepest black, and her mouth as red and full as a ripe cherry. When they had entered the vehicle she leant her head on her father's shoulder. He, poor fellow, gazed vacantly out of the window at the stirring scenes of the streets and muttered softly to himself now and then.

Arrived at the house, Tom and his daughter were shown to their rooms by Benson, whose parchment visage almost lost its habitually dead expression at the sight of this exquisite child. Then the brothers had their talk.

"How long has Tom been like that?" asked James, with a suspicious tremble in his voice.

"He's been getting worse ever since she died," answered John. "You know—although you must never let him know we either of us know it—she went to the bad two years before the end."

"How are his affairs?"

"He has none. He's absolutely without a penny. I thought"— and Mr. John Ernest Moncton looked lightly self-conscious—"that we'd give him a bed here till—till the end, you know. Poor Tom! It won't be very long."

"I agree with you," acquiesced his brother, "but what are you going to do with the young woman?"

"Young woman!" exclaimed John, amazed, "why she's only a child."

James eyed his brother with the suspicion of a twinkle in his kind eye. "Study her a little more closely, old man," he advised. "I fancy she is about as old as she looks."

The doctor gave Tom Lander a month to live. While half unconscious of his surroundings most of the time, he had comparatively lucid intervals, at which time he would play poker with his two faithful old friends for enormous sums, that he fancied were being added to his bank account as soon as won. The end came very suddenly and very peaceably at one of these card parties. Tom laid his hand carefully on the table and leant back in his chair, closing his eyes. Then he opened those poor tired orbs, and the brothers saw there were tears in them. He was sensible at last. "Boys," he said, very gently, "take care of the little one. She's of bad stock, perhaps, but—Marie!" His slender, nervous hand went suddenly to his throat, and his eyes closed again and didn't open.

The girl's grief was heartrending. After the funeral she kept her rooms for days, and had to be almost forced to take nourishment. Then, one bright morning, John coaxed her into his dog-cart, and when they returned her white cheeks had a little pink spot in each of them. The same week James took her to a matinée, and she began to recover her spirits.

These two lonely bachelors now had something to live for. They could not have lavished more kindness upon her if she had been a princess, instead of being the daughter of a dead gambler. Her wardrobe was replenished handsomely, and a corps of teachers was engaged for her. In the evenings she would sit on a footstool on the hearthrug between them and chatter away like a linnet, or sing some funny little French songs that sometimes, alas, were not so proper as they should have been. Though, as neither of these two old chaps knew the language very well, it did not matter much.

Only Benson, who used to appear with the decanters just before the young lady's hour for retiring, used sometimes to allow his face to break into a smile after leaving the library. Benson had once been in the service of the Baron Chevriac, in Paris, you see.

It was perhaps worthy of notice that these quiet evenings were the only occasions on which the three remained together. It was generally John that took Estelle—that was her name—to drive in the afternoon, and James that escorted her to theatres or concerts in the evenings. And while it could hardly be said as yet that there was any jealousy between the brothers, when either of them happened to come home with a pet plan in his kind old head for her pleasure, it was annoying to find her out somewhere with the other.

As for Estelle, she soon became as gay and light-hearted as a bird. She sang and romped about the house with her dogs and kittens, poked fun at the leather-faced Benson, and played all manner of funny pranks on the venerable housekeeper, which dear old soul, of course, adored her to distraction. She was like a perpetual sunbeam, and both her old guardians began to wonder how they could ever have existed without her.

But one day James came to John with a troubled look on his face. "Brother," said he earnestly, "I think it's about time we were sending Estelle away somewhere."

The other stared. "What on earth for?" he ejaculated.

"She's growing very fast, you know," said James, "and if you must know, people are talking."

"Then let the beasts talk!" exclaimed his brother angrily. "Don't worry, James, we both love the child. In Heaven's name, let's keep her with us as long as we can."

Perhaps James was secretly glad of his brother's state of mind. He had made his protest, and his conscience was at last clear. But, as evil fortune would have it, he returned home late that evening, and just in time to catch sight of a tableau that made him draw a long breath of envy.

It was nearly dark in the library, and Estelle was kneeling on the hearthrug at John's side. Moreover, as James entered, his brother was in the act of imprinting a kiss on the white forehead.

He stood stock still until Estelle, peeping out from beneath her tangle of black curls like a squirrel, espied him with a little shriek of dismay, rose and fled past him, and went flying upstairs. John rose, shame-faced and red, and, man-like, proceeded to try to brazen a bad thing out.

"Spying, eh?" he snapped.

"I did not think," said James rather brokenly, "that my brother could so far forget his duty to his dead friend."

"Who's forgotten his duty? Why, man, I won't let even you, my brother, insinuate——"

"Oh, of course not," sneered James, growing angry in his turn. Quite irrespective of the torture caused him by his brother's conduct, there was another sort of pain tugging at his brave old heart. You see, "the little girl" had been very just and impartial in her reception of the devotion of the two brothers. "I suppose, then," he went on, after a pause, "that you intend marrying her?"

"And suppose I do?" jerked out John; "whose affair is it?"

"In that case," answered James, with great gravity —"well, in that case, good-night, John!"

One brother sat for hours smoking by the light of the tall library lamp. The other took a long, long walk. He asked himself a score of times if it were really honest and moral indignation that he felt, or was it simply commonplace, wretched envy. He gave it up at length, and went to the club to sleep. And thus had the "little girl" succeeded in effecting the first break in a friendship of forty years.

* * * * *

Both brothers were extremely miserable for four days, though neither would have admitted it to the other under pressure of the rack and thumbscrew. Perhaps of the two James was the more thoroughly wretched, inasmuch as it was he that had declared war, and made a reconciliation, unless under the conditions imposed by himself, impossible.

On the morning of the fifth day he was rather surprised to receive an urgent request from his brother to meet him at the club. He was a little in doubt as to whether to go or not, but finally decided to do so. He found John seated at a table daintily set for two. There was a moment's embarrassed silence.

John spoke first. "Sit down, old man," said he, with a decidedly sheepish look, "and have some luncheon."

"Not yet," answered his brother very stiffly; "explain first, if you please."

These two foolish old fellows looked at each other wistfully for a moment, and then John said, looking more sheepish than ever: "Don't be an idiot, Jim; you can afford to sit down. The cause of the quarrel has disappeared." And he laughed nervously.

"What's that you say?" stammered James, growing rather white.

For answer his brother handed him a note written in Estelle's extremely regular hand.

"You dear old humbugs," it ran, "you'll feel it, but I am really not to blame. You see, I'm a Paris girl, and you are really slow, although you are both such sweet old gentlemen. I've taken Benson with me, because he amuses me. I know you won't mind the little I took with me. You'd have both of you given me much more for a wedding present. Please don't chase Benson. He got the money for me, and he's not a bad fellow. Good-bye. Come and see us in Paris."

"What on earth does she mean?" gasped James, as he laid down the letter.

"Only that I'm £5,000 poorer," answered John, with a blush. "You see, I was proud of her beautiful writing, and helped her to improve it."

"Ah!" sighed James, "it's in the blood, I suppose. Shall you follow them?"

"Not if you'll call it even," answered John, with a look of great affection across the table. "Really, after all, you know, I saw her first. But the luncheon's ready."

And they managed to make it a royal one.

Mary Bryan.

LO-TO-KAH & THE WITCH

ONE hot summer day, after leisurely exploring a quaint old Indian pueblo in New Mexico, I was resting in the shade of an adobe wall when I caught sight of a horseman riding towards the pueblo. Before he was near enough for me to discern his features I could see by his costume that he was no pueblo Indian, and as he rode through the narrow streets and came into the bare little plaza I recognised in him my friend Lo-To-Kah. He was very old, but he sat as erect on his horse as any warrior in the prime of life. When he saw me he rode to my side and called out:

"Ho, friend, vagrant Merikotch that you are, I come upon you in all places. I am glad to fall in with you this day, for I have ridden alone over many weary miles of the desert, and the face of a friend is a welcome sight to lonesome eyes. With whom do you abide in this place?"

I led the way to the house of Ho-leka, and Lo-To-Kah, who was well-known there, was received as a welcome and honoured guest. Food was spread, after which tobacco and corn leaves were brought, and then our old host and his family clustered about the room, and listened to the talk of the old wanderer until far into the night. Then, one by one, they went to their couches, until all were gone but Lo-To-Kah and myself. When we were left alone the old man sat in silence for a long time, and then he said:

"Now, friend of mine, will I tell you of Raymeya, the witch, as I promised to you when last we met.

"I am just come from Moqui—the land once known to the whites by the name af Tusayan—where I went to assist in the dread dance of the snakes. Although not a Moquino, I am a priest of the Antelope Order, and I was versed in the mysteries of the snake worship before thirty summers had come into my life.

"The spirits of birth gave me a wandering foot, and many times have I been absent from the snake dance because I was journeying in the far places of the world. But I went to the dance this year because it is likely to be the last one I shall ever see. My hold on life is now so feeble that when I close my eyes in sleep I know not whether I shall wake in this world of trouble or in the bright land of peace that lies beyond the grave.

"At the snake dance this year I saw Raymeya, the witch, and I say to you that she seemed as young and wondrously fair as she did at a time that is now more than fifty years in the past—a time when she came to me in the forest and besought me to love her. Ah, she is fair! Fairer than any woman that walks upon the earth to-day!

"You are to me a friend, and I believe I have a warm place in your heart. When I am gone from the earth I desire that you will remember me as a man who knew no fear, and as a man who spoke ever in true words.

"After I returned from the great raid against the Navajos I was treated with much honour by my people. War songs were sung about me, the children gazed upon me in awe, and my words were held in high esteem in the councils. I loved the honour and the praise, but more than all things else I loved Zeetah, my wife, and I would leave the councils and the dances and the games of the men to spend the time apart with her. Ah, amigo mio, never does a man know the fulness of life till he knows such love as I have known!

"One day in council the old chief of the clan to which I belonged arose in his place and said that he was old, and the days of his life were almost gone, and that before he was gone he desired to surrender his office to a man who was young and strong, and just and fearless, so that the years to come would be good years for his people. Then, while the warriors and the old men held their very breath in silence, he placed his hand upon my head, and asked me to be chief in his stead.

"I was but a youth then, señor; an honour had come to me that many aged men had sought through their lives without finding; but, instead of being pleased, I was so grieved that I almost wept. While I sat in silence, with my eyes cast down, the people began shouting:

"'Lo-To-Kah, the chief! Lo-To-Kah, the chief! We are the warriors of Lo-To-Kah, of the oaken heart, and no people can stand before us!'

"I embraced the old chief and thanked him, and I thanked the warriors who were willing to have me for chief; and then I told them that not yet would I consent to be their chief, but that in six days I would give them an answer. And then I left the council and went to Zeetah.

"We decided that I should go alone into the forest, away from her and away from my people, and there should meditate until I should be guided aright. And I took blankets and a bow and arrows, and I went alone into the depths of the forest.

"I went many miles, and when night came I built a fire and lay down by it to sleep. But I was so lonesome, and longed so much for my wife, that I was minded to go back in the night and tell the people I would not be their chief. But I did not go, and I slept till the sun came up, and then I killed game and cooked it, and sat down to meditate again.

"In this way the days and nights passed, until the sun had risen and set four times, and I had made no choice. Then the night came on again, and I sat by my fire and brooded. It was a night of moonlight, and multitudes of stars shone in the sky above me. Away in the far distance I saw the white-topped mountains that the Spanish people call the Mountains of Silver. Far behind me lay the peaceful valley where my people were encamped, and all about me were the numberless trees of the forest.

"While I sat there musing and gazing away at the mountains, I heard a soft step in the leaves behind me, and before I could fit an arrow to my bow, there stood before me as fair a woman as ever breathed the breath of life. She was a white-skinned woman, and she was clad in finer garments than had ever been seen in the lands of the Indians. Her dress was of white, clinging silk; a black reboso was over her head, and on her white neck, and round her arms, and on her fingers, were jewels of such wonderful brightness that scarce could I look upon them. The woman smiled as she gazed upon me, and she said:

"'You are Lo-To-Kah, and you are such a man as I had hoped you would be. I have journeyed great distances to meet you. I have arrayed myself so that I may seem fair in your eyes. Look upon me! Am I not more beautiful than any woman you ever saw?'

"I answered: 'You are arrayed in garments of greater beauty than any I ever saw. You wear stones in which are imprisoned the light of the sun and the splendours of the rainbow. You are fairer than any woman known to me, except Zeetah, my wife. What do you desire of me?'

"The face of the woman became somewhat sad when I spoke with such reverence of my wife, and she gazed upon me for a time in silence. Then she said:

"'Lo-To-Kah, I am the fairest woman upon the earth; and even time and the passing of years cannot mar my beauty. I am wise—wiser even than all of the oldest and wisest men of your tribe, or of all the Indian tribes under the sun. I am rich—so rich that all the wealth of your people would be but a bauble to me. I am great—so great that chiefs are my subjects. What think you of me now?'

"I gave answer that I thought the great Manitou had blessed her beyond all women, and again I asked what she desired of me, and she said:

"'But one thing do I lack, O, Lo-To-Kah, and that thing I seek from you. I am known to many of the greatest men in the world, and they seek me for lover or wife; but I care not for them, for they are proud, or vain, or false, or have the hearts of cowards. I long for a man in whose heart fear is not; a man who stakes his life upon his promise; a man who is so great that he can rule even me, who am a ruler.

"'Among tribes far from here I heard of you—for the fame of your deeds has travelled far—and I came to this land to seek you. I came disguised as a woman of your own nation, and when the people of your kind, who dwell in the North, came to this land to dance, I was with them. I have watched you since then; I have come to believe that you are the man of men, and now I seek from you the only thing my life needs to make it complete. The thing I seek from you is love.'

"Remember, señor, that at that time I had never journeyed among the white people; I knew not of their ways, and I thought of women in the way my people thought of them. Among my people a man is much greater than a woman, and, too, a man often has many wives. Many of the women of my nation had sought to be my wife, and the offer of the white woman did not then seem to me so great a thing as I now know it to have been. I answered her, and said:

"'In the encampment of my tribe there stands a can-nee, made of the hides of buffalo, that is larger than any of the other can-nees. In it dwells a woman who is fairer and dearer than any other woman of my nation. The can-nee is mine, and the woman is my wife. The woman is so dear to me that I have promised her, and have promised myself, to have no other wife than she. Many men in my tribe have more wives than one; and among our men are many who will be glad to take you. Go to them.'

"The woman gazed upon me with a strange look upon her face. She folded her arms, and stood for a time in silence, and then she said:

"'You are but a simple Indian, and you know not what you say. I would not live an instant in a can-nee with a man who had another wife. Who loves me must love me—only.'

"I answered: 'I love only Zeetah, my wife. No lips but hers have ever pressed my lips in love, and so it shall be till the day of my death.'

"Then was the woman angered, and she said: 'Fool. you know not what you say. I have untold wealth, great knowledge, great power. I can fulfil your every hope. Why am I not better for you than a wild Indian woman? I can take you to the ends of the earth; with me you can live in a palace and be attended by slaves. But if you care not for such things, I, too, will live with you as an Indian woman, if you will but cast off this Zeetah, and take me for your wife.'

"I answered the woman not at all; and then she seated herself by my side and told me she would always be young and fair. That failed; and then she told me a strange tale of the Sierra Madre Mountains, a city of wise Indians who had great houses and heaps of gold, and great wealth in such jewels as she wore.

"She said that she was the queen of that people, and if I would go with her I might be their king. Then she told me many tales of the far countries of the world, and of the great oceans, and of the mighty ships, and of the cities whose size is so great that they stretch away farther than the sight of a man can carry. She said she had seen all those places and lands and wonders, and would take me to them if I would go. But I still refused, and I would have refused if she had offered me the world and all it contains. The woman again became angered, and she said:

"'What, then, if this precious Zeetah of yours should die? Would you then refuse me?'

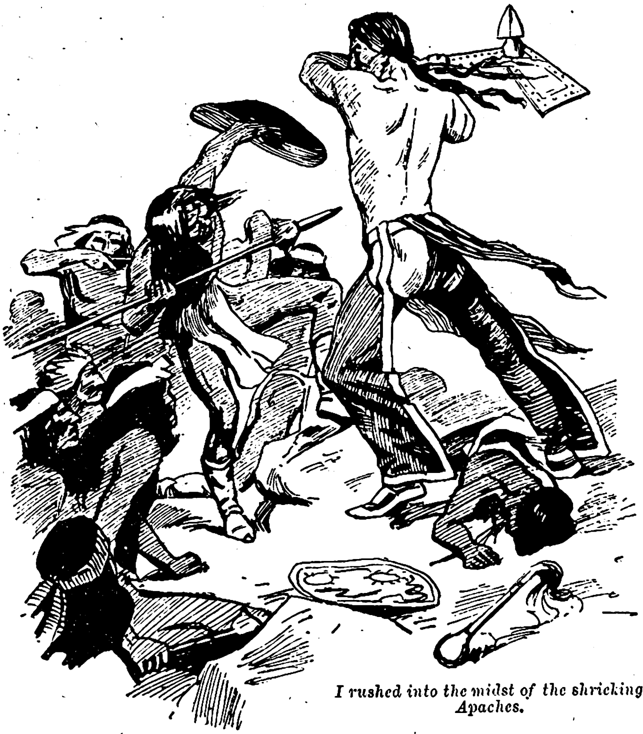
"My heart was filled with trouble, for I feared the woman might work harm upon my wife; and I told her that if as much as one hair upon my Zeetah's head was harmed, I would know it to be her work, and that I would seek her till I found her, and would kill her.

"The woman smiled, and told me I could not kill her. Then she became sad, and she gazed upon me a long, long time, and she spoke no word. But in time she roused herself, and said:

"'I have journeyed over the world seeking the man of men, and until I met you I had not found him. And now that I have found you, I learn in bitterness that you are not for me. Fear not for your Zeetah; I will do her no evil. See; I have here a charm that is revered among all Indians. If your Zeetah is ever in trouble I will lend her this, and thus show you that I hold your happiness even above my own.'

"From a fold in her robe the woman drew forth the dried dead body of a two-headed rattlesnake, a charm that is sacred among all Indians, no matter of what tribe they are. It is the holiest emblem we know, and fortunate is the man whose privilege it is to see it. A two-headed snake is born but once in a hundred years, and it is sent to earth by Chah-Now-Woof, the Great Spirit himself. While it lives it is devoutly worshipped, and when it is dead, its dried body is so potent a token that no Indian will harm any man or woman who has it. With such an emblem, amigo, you could journey to the uttermost ends of the lands that the Indians know, and all men would do you homage.

"With such an emblem I could journey through the heart of a land of foes, every warrior of which might be thirsting for my blood, and no harm would be done me. I asked the woman to allow me to touch the snake, for one had never been seen by any man of my tribe. And because I touched it is one of the reasons that life has gone so well with me.



I rushed into the midst of the shrieking Apaches.

"Then I asked the white woman her name, and when she told me I gazed upon her in awe and wonder, for the name she gave me was the name of the Great Witch of the South, whose fame is known to every Indian man of magic that dwells upon the earth. She said her name was Raymeya! When she spoke her name I cast down my eyes in reverence. And when I looked again the woman was gone. It seemed as though she had melted into the air. I did not see her again until more than five and twenty years had gone into the past.

"After the woman was gone I again meditated as to becoming chief, but six days passed and I had not made a decision. I returned to the encampment of my people, and before I had been there long, the question was decided for me. I found my people in great uproar, for a runner had come to the camp, bearing the tidings that a band of Apaches was coming down upon us, wearing their war paint, and saying they would wipe our warriors from the face of the earth, steal our horses, and take our women for slaves.

"I had not been in my can-nce an hour, when the warriors of my tribe came and called me, and told me I must be their chief, for the old chief was ill in his tent, and unless I guided them they would all be killed. Thus was the matter decided for me; my duty became greater than my desire, and I told the people I would be their chief.

"Then sacred po-o-kante was made by our men of medicine, war paint was donned, the feathers of eagles were fastened in our hair, and we danced the war dance and sang the old war songs of our people while we awaited the coming of the Apaches. It was not long till they came, but they came like snakes and not like men. They tried to deceive us, and cause us to follow a few of them in one direction, while the others stole upon us from behind our backs to kill us.

"I had fought battles with the Apaches before, and when a few of them fired arrows upon us from the south, I directed my men to stand firm and not to follow them. The numbers of the Apaches were very many, and soon they ceased trying to decoy us and charged down upon us, thinking we would flee before their great numbers and leave our women behind; but we stood side by side, as the white soldiers do when they fight, and we all shot our arrows at once.

"My men were brave, and they stood by me till many an Apache fiend had bit the dust; but soon the Apache fiends crowded upon us in such great numbers that my men were forced backwards step by step. Soon we had gone backward so far that we found we could not go farther without exposing our women and children to danger, and at that place I told my men to halt and fight till they were killed.

"Then we fought such a battle as was never before known even to the oldest men of my tribe. The Apaches are like reptiles, and they like not to stand on their feet and fight like men; but we killed so many of them that they went mad with anger, and they crowded upon us like hordes of demons.

"When the fight began I had with me a hundred young men. Soon ten of them were dead, then ten more, and then they fell dead about me as the trees fall in the face of a mountain storm. It seemed to me that soon we should all be killed, and I thought of the Apaches bearing away our women to make slaves of them.

"I thought of my Zeetah being forced to dwell with some Apache brute, and the thought made me so wild that I forgot all danger; I shouted the terrible war-cry of my people, and I rushed into the midst of the shrieking Apaches, swinging my giant club as I went. I smote the Apaches to the right, and a man fell dead. I smote them to the left, and another of them bit the dust. I smote them on all sides, and as I smote they fell before me. But all the time they crowded upon me closer and closer, and it seemed that my life could not last as long as it takes a man to breathe. All about me was a sea of writhing, up-turned faces, and a multitude of arms reaching out to deal me the blow of death.

"In my youth I had learned the whirling dance, a dance in which one whirls upon his heel, going round so swiftly that scarcely can an onlooker see his face. When I was sorely pressed by the Apaches I thought of my skill in that dance, and I resolved to make it serve me, I whirled my club so fast that soon I had an open space about me, and then I spun upon my heel, and as I spun I swung my club. I went so fast that my club sped through the air, making a noise like the rushing of many waters. The Apaches had never seen such a sight, and as they saw their warriors fall dead before my terrible club they became afraid, and they shouted:

"'This man cannot be killed! This man bears a charmed life! He must be Chah-Now-Woof, and we cannot harm him. Let us flee, or he will kill us all!'

"I knew not where my own men were, for I had gone into the midst of the Apaches. And as the Apaches turned and fled I pursued them, and I dealt a blow of death at every step. The hot blood from gaping wounds spurted into my face, but I heeded not. The shrieks of a score of dying men rent my ears, but I heeded not. Writhing men who were dying upon the ground rose up and struck at me with their clubs, but I heeded not.

"And making the war cry of my nation sound wildly through the forest, I sped on after the fleeing Apaches, and when they were all gone from before me I was a great distance from the encampment of my people. I was bleeding from a dozen wounds, a hundred arrows had pierced my flesh, but so great had been my rage that I had not felt the stings of my wounds until I stopped to rest.

"I made my way back to the place where the camp of my people had been, and as I went my path was strewn with the dead and dying Apaches whom I had slain. One dying man raised himself upon his elbow, and tried to send an arrow through me, but I jeered at him and went on. And when I came to the place where the homes of my tribe had been, I saw a sadder sight than my eyes had ever looked upon.

"The can-nees of my people had been burned to the ground; the dead bodies of little children were burning in the fires of the tents, and the bravest and best warriors of my nation were strewn over the place, cold and stark in the grasp of death.

"And as I went towards the place that had been my home, I came upon the body of my young brother—a brave boy whom I had loved next to my wife, and as I saw him lying cold and still in death, I broke down and wept as weeps a babe.

"I lifted his stiff body in my arms and caressed him, and then I took a vow to kill half a hundred Apache fiends to avenge his death. Then in sorrow I went on, and when I reached my can-nee, I found it half burnt to the ground, and when I looked within I found it empty."

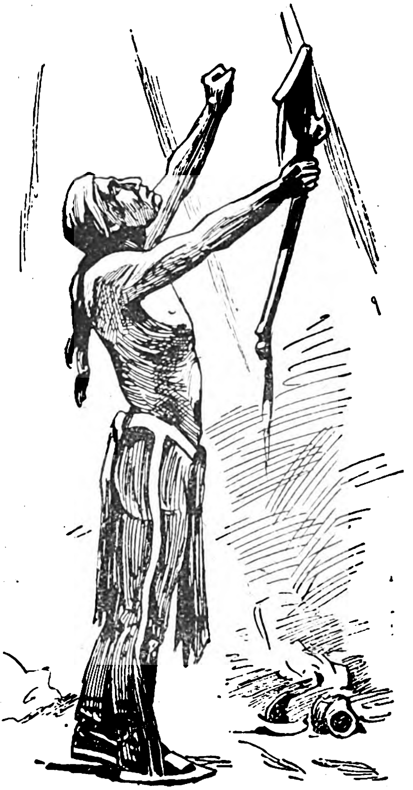
When the old man reached this place in his tale, a sigh burst from his lips, his wrinkled old face went down into his palms, and for many minutes he did not speak. But the sad spell soon left him, and he continued:

"I went within the ruined remnant of my home, and in the ground that was the floor I found little furrows that I knew had been made by the feet of my wife as she was dragged resisting from her home by the naked fiends who had stolen her. And then I turned my face to the sky, and I vowed to Chah-Now-Woof himself that I would spend my life in avenging the wrong done to my wife.

"I found that part of the Apache band had crept away from the ones I fought, and had gone round our camp and set fire to our can-nees, and killed some women and children; and that they were preparing to steal all our women, when my men had turned upon them, and forced them to fly for life. But before they were forced to fly they had stolen my Zeetah, and she was the only one of our women they had taken.

"I found that many of our bravest and best warriors had been killed. I found that the old man who had been chief for many years was gone. But the troubles of my people did not rest so heavily upon me as did the sorrow of losing my wife.

"The women cut their hair and wailed in sorrow, and the men sang the song of death, and gathered our dead friends together to prepare them for the journey to the Happy Hunting Grounds. And while the rites of death were going on, I donned fresh paint, I filled my quiver with fresh arrows, I packed some dried meat in my pouch, and I started away in the track of the Apaches who had stolen all that the world held that was dear to me.



I turned my face to the sky.

"At first the trail was clear, but after a day's journey I found that I must contend with the cunning of the Apaches, who are more cunning than serpents; for the trails seemed to divide and go in all directions. Then the trails seemed to disappear and to fade from the ground. But I had tracked Apaches when I was but a boy, and I followed them as surely as though the way was an open road before me.

"They had gone with the speed of the wind, and I followed them over the mountains and across the deserts for many, many weary days.

"I went by day and by night, and, at last, in the dead time of a moonless night, I came within sight of the rancheria of the Apaches. O, Chah-Now-Woof, sweet is revenge! When I saw the Apache encampment I forgot that I was weary, and was again a strong man and a chief. I crawled upon my hands and feet, gliding as silently as a serpent glides, and soon I was among the miserable tents of my foes. I went from one tent to another, listening, for I thought I would know my Zeetah even by her soft breath as she slept. At last I came to a tent larger than any of the others, and there I heard a sound that sent my heart into my mouth. It was the voice of Zeetah, who talked as she slept. I listened, and heard her say:

"'Lo-To-Kah, dear one, I have had an evil dream. I dreamt I was stolen from your side. Oh, Lo-To-Kah, take me closer in your arms!'

"Then my eyes were wet with tears. I scratched upon the wall of the tent to awaken her, and soon I knew she was awake, for she spoke in fright. I whispered to her, telling her I was Lo-To-Kah, and asking her to steal out to me if she were not bound. Soon she came, silently creeping to me, and I took her in my arms and kissed her as a mother might kiss a loved child who had come back to her from the grave. And then, as she was weak from so much fear and excitement, I took her in my arms and bore her away into the depths of the forest; and as I bore her I saw that she held some strange object in her hands.

"When we reached a safe place in the forest Zeetah showed me the dried body of the two-headed snake, and told me that while the battle had raged hottest a strange woman with a white skin had crept into our can-nee and given her the emblem, and then faded as though she had gone up in smoke.

"Zeetah knew of the snake emblem, and she had carried it with her, and because she had borne it she had not been harmed even though she was among the brute Apaches.

"Then Zeetah and I crept back to the camp of the Apaches, and we went to the tent where she had been a prisoner, which was the tent of the head chief. We crept inside, making no noise, and we found the chief still sleeping. Before he awoke a gag was in his mouth, and I threw him across my shoulder and bore him away into the forest, Zeetah following after me.

"It would have been no wrong thing to have killed him as one would kill a serpent; but when we were in the forest I unbound him. I placed his battle-club in his hands, and I told him to fight for his life, as he and I would never both go forth alive. The battle was fierce, but it was short, and when it was done, the Apaches lacked a chief.

"I knew it was Raymeya, the witch, who had come to my can-nee, and given the charm to my wife; but I told my wife nothing of her. And one day after that I came home from a hunt, and found my wife looking as though she was in trouble, and when I asked the cause, she said that the strange white woman had come again, and had taken away with her the dried snake. Zeetah asked me if the woman were a mortal or a spirit, and I replied that I did not know. And I do not know unto this day.

"From that time on I did not see the witch again for many long years. My wife died, I tired of this land, and as I have told you before, I learnt the speech of the white-skinned people, and journeyed among them with a show. I went to many cities and many places, and in time our show crossed the ocean and went to the land called Europe.

"Never in my life was I so lonely as I was on the day when we sailed away on the big ship, and set out into the the heart of the ocean.

"We journeyed through the land of France, and through the lands of Italy and Germany, and then we went to England. There the people went wild over us, and multitudes of them came every day to see the Indians.

"Deerfoot, the Seneca, was with us—he who was in his time the mightiest and fleetest runner in the world.

"The English people numbered among them one who was a mighty runner, and he desired to try his speed with that of Deerfoot. The race was arranged to take place in a great arena, and on the appointed day a vast concourse of people assembled. The white man was a fleet runner, going with the speed of an antelope; but he was no match for Deerfoot, who sped away like the wind. Away they went, ten times round the great race course; and Deerfoot won as easily as a coyote would win against a mongrel dog.

"The race set my blood to boiling, and I yearned to do something myself to show the white people that we children of the forests and plains were not their inferiors. I mounted the stand of the judges, and I challenged any white man there to wrestle with me for a stake of a thousand English pounds.

"The English people are famed for athletic skill, and in that audience of people were the famed boxers, and runners, and wrestlers of the nation. My offer was taken at once, and soon there stepped into the arena a man who seemed to be stronger than the strongest horse. The people shouted, and I said the match should take place at once, and I stripped off my outer garments and stepped to the side of the man. He shook my hand according to the custom of the white nations, and at once we began the battle.

"Before I was aware the man had grasped me, and he strove to throw me over his head and make short work of the match; but I am an Indian, and while he was striving with all his might I slipped through his iron hands and stood free upon the ground. Then, while he was gaping in wonder, I grasped him in such a way that he could scarcely move either hand or foot, I raised him high above my head, I bore him half round the arena, and then I pitched him away from me and he fell twenty feet from where I stood.

"The people went almost wild with excitement; they pressed about me and shook my hand till I thought they would wring it loose from my arm, for I had thrown the greatest and strongest wrestler that had ever been known in England. Then a man who was a prince came to me, and he invited Deerfoot and me to go to his palace to a banquet that he would give in our honour.

"I cared little to go to the banquet of the great man, for such things are little to my taste. But my companions urged me, and I went. There were ladies at the banquet, many of them attired in rich robes, and with their white necks gleaming like ivory.

"Deerfoot and I donned the full dress of the white men, and when the night was growing old I was called upon to make a speech. I stood up and talked to the white people, and much applause was bestowed upon me.

"But while I was speaking I glanced along the table and my speech stopped short, because I saw the two brightest eyes in the world gazing into mine. I knew the eyes were those of the witch Raymeya, and I spoke no more, although the guests wondered much. And when I knew she was there the minutes seemed like days, and as soon as I could I hastened away.

"The next day the witch came to see me. She seemed as young as she did that day so long before, when she surprised me in the forest, but she seemed sadder and more gentle. She took my hand and held it to her lips and kissed it, and then she asked me how life had gone with me since my wife had died, and asked if I were happy. I told her that life was good, but that it no longer seemed so sweet to me as in those older days when I was chief among my own people in the mountains, and that most of the joy of my life had gone out with the breath of my wife. And then she said, almost in a whisper:

"'And you have not changed your mind concerning the matter of which I spoke to you in the forest?'

"I told her no, and for a long time she gazed mutely upon the ground. As she gazed upon the ground I regarded her, and never have the eyes of men looked upon a fairer being. In Europe I saw fine pictures of angels, and her features were like unto the features in the pictures. I was saddened, too, to think that such a creature was doomed to go childless and loveless through life, and in sorrow for her tears came to my eyes. I turned my head away, and when I turned again the woman was gone. She had vanished, seemingly into thin air, just as she had done before.

"From that time on the witch was much in my mind, and many times in the night I woke to find that I had been dreaming of her. It seemed to me that in my sleep she came and stood by my couch and gazed on me, with her great bright eyes all filled with love; and she seemed to point to the west, as though bidding me to go again to the land of my own people.

"In time I went again to the land of my own people. I forsook the cities and the ways of the white-skinned races, I donned again the garments of my tribe, and I said to myself that with the people of my own blood I would spend the sundown of my life. I hunted with the young men of my tribe, I went to Moqui to the dance of the snakes, I journeyed among the tribes whose lands lie round about the lands of my own tribe.

"In time the life of my people palled upon me. On every hand were the forts that held the white-skinned soldiers; no more rode our young men forth to battle, and when I was surfeited with weariness I chose a strong horse and set out alone to journey to the hidden valleys that lie locked fast in the Sierra Madres, whereof the great Witch of the South was queen.

"And in time I came to lands that I had not seen since the days of my earliest manhood. Soon I was in an unknown land, and was journeying in the lands that belong to the fierce Yaquis.

"Then I came to the region where snow lies for ever on the rocks; and then I was in a region of snow and hail and storms, a desolate region never before trodden by the foot of man or beast. My horse died in that place, and I was almost minded to lie down and die. Yet hope was with me, and I struggled on and on, sometimes falling into a chasm of snow, sometimes stopping to rub my frozen feet and hands, and then going onward, and always up.

"At last, while stones of hail were almost knocking the breath from my body, I came suddenly to a wall of masonry rising out of the snow sheer before me.

"I followed it for many miles, going on long after the storm had ceased; and just as my strength was gone, and I could go no farther, I came to a place where a ladder of raw hide was hanging to the wall. I grasped the ladder, and, with my strength leaving me at every step, I painfully climbed to the top of the wall.

"Friend, the people of your kind believe in a land of Paradise, a land of joy where milk and honey flow, and every grace is known. And I say to you that your land of Paradise can be no fairer than was the land that opened to my astonished view when I had reached the summit of that cruel wall.

"And as I sat and gazed into the valley I knew it to be the land whose people called Raymeya queen, and I felt that the end of my journey was reached. That was the land of which I might have been king; those golden cities might have been mine, and my life might have been lived out in that wondrously beautiful valley, if it had not been for the love I bore for Zeetah.

"Then I climbed off the wall, into the roadway of stone, and started down into the valley. Soon I was stopped by a bronze warrior, who carried a silver spear. In a tongue that I did not know he said words to me, and when I answered him in the Spanish speech he shook his head in perplexity, and gazed on me in wonder. But he answered me in the same tongue, and he lowered his spear and walked by my side, and together we went down the winding roadway that led into the valley.

"When we came to the level land we met men and women and children, and they all stopped and gazed on me, and asked questions of my guide. I was truly in a sorry state; my clothes were worn out, my hands and feet were frozen and swollen, and my face and body were covered with scratches and bruises. And thus, hungry, naked, penniless, and ill, I was led into that golden city of which I might have been the ruler.

"I was being led to a prison that was kept for such wandering Indians as found their way into the valley; but as we were passing a palace of marble I saw the eyes of Raymeya gaze out from a window. At first she did not see me, but soon her eyes fell upon me, and then she called to the officer who was guiding me, telling him to stop. He stopped, and stood mutely by my side; and soon another officer came, and ordered that I should be taken before the queen.

"I led was through the palace grounds, into the apartment of the queen, and she rose from her place and ordered that I be left alone with her. When we were alone, the queen knelt at my side; she took my hand in hers, and her eyes were aflame with joy. She said:

"'And have you come to me at last, O, Lo-To-Kah? The time has been long, the years have passed on leaden feet; but I endured, because I believed that in time you would come.'

"I said to her: 'Raymeya, he who stands before you is an old man, whose days to live are few. I came to this place because I am tired of the land of my own people; but I came to seek no bride. I have a bride who waits for me in a land as fair as is this land of yours.'

"Raymeya rose and looked upon me in sorrow; and she was not one day older than when she came to me in the depths of the forest, or when I saw her in the greatest city of the world. The years had gone on, changing babes to men, and men back to earth; but the hand of time had not fallen on the fair face or form of the witch who was ever young.

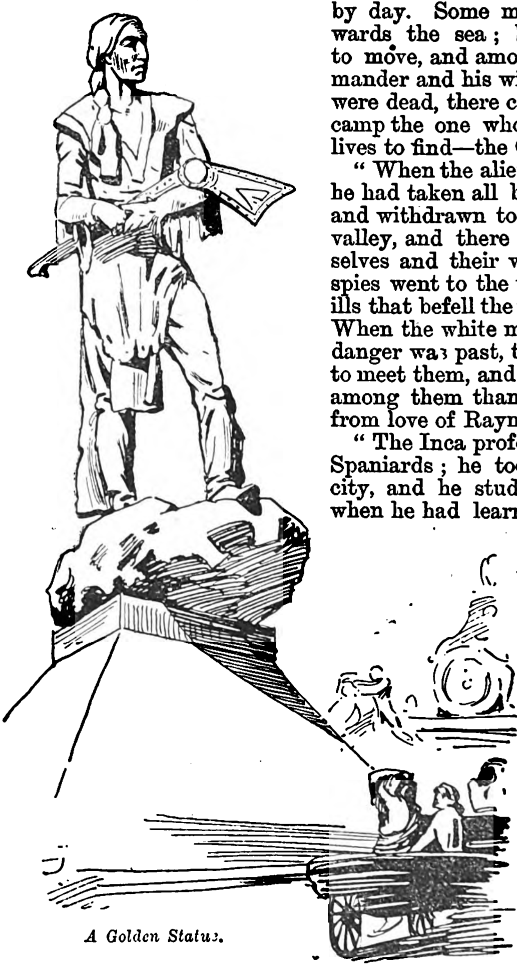
"We seated ourselves, and drank wine; and we talked for many hours, and when we had finished, Raymeya was my friend, and she no longer craved my love. I told her all the tale of my journey through life. I told her that never could I love any woman but the one who had been my wife; and she said it was well, and that she would speak to me no more of love. Then she gazed into my face for a long time, her eyes filled with tears; and then she rose and walked up and down the room, moaning to herself. But soon she became quiet; she smiled, and laid her hand on my shoulder, and called me friend. And from that time forth she spoke no more of love.

"I was tired and hungry, and the queen ordered attendants to bathe me, and to give me food and garments; and when I was dressed, and had eaten, I lay down and slept for many hours.

"The next day I walked with the queen through the streets of her city, and wherever we went the people bowed in reverence. Soon we were tired, and as the queen waved her hand a chariot, drawn by four horses, came to our side. We entered the chariot, and the queen ordered the driver to go to the Plaza of the Statues.

"The Plaza of the Statues was a circular place, hemmed in with palaces of marble, and in the place golden statues were scattered about, intermingled with statues carved in the purest white. In the centre was a golden statue, towering above the others. It was of beaten gold, and when I gazed upon it I almost fainted with wonder, for the statue was of myself as I was when a young man. The habiliments were those of my people, and a mighty club was in the hands.

"'That,' said the queen, pointing to the golden statue of myself, 'is the image of the king of this land, the king who never came to claim his own.'



A Golden Statue.

"The eyes of the queen filled with tears, and we drove in silence away from that place. The matter of the statue troubled me, and from the time I had seen it I yearned to leave that fair city and go again to live out the remnant of my life in the rude land of my own people.

"And on the next day I said to the queen: 'O, Raymeya, tell me now the tale of your life, the tale you promised me so long ago in the forests that cover the mountains of the La Platas. Let me know the truth of the mystery of your life, and your endless youth, and your changeless beauty; and then let me go out of your land and out of your life, and let me go back to the land where I was born. I am but a wild man, and I am out of place among the splendours of your royal city. You have a warm place in my heart; you seem at once my daughter and my friend, but it is best that I abide not here with you.'

"And the queen told me the tale of her life. She said that she was born in Spain, before the time when Columbus sought the Western world. She was the daughter of a pirate, and in her early life she felt great remorse for the life that was lived by herself and her people, and she entered a convent as a nun. There she fell in love with a priest, and in order not to lay herself open to reproach, she stole away at night and fled from the convent.

"At that time South America was the haven for all men of adventurous spirits, and at the time she fled from the convent a fleet was fitting out to sail to that land to seek for a land of gold, whose fame had reached earlier explorers. She went to the admiral of the fleet and begged that he would take her with him, and the admiral became enamoured of her beauty, and begged her to go as his wife. They were married before they sailed, and she landed on the western shores as a wife.

"In America the pioneers were wild over the tales of El Dorado, the Gilded Chief of the land of Cundinamarca, a man who was said to have so much gold that his house was built of it, and his body was powdered afresh each day with gold dust. Raymeya's husband set out to find that land, and his wife went with him. And after months of hardship they came to the plain of Cundinamarca, and they found only a village of seemingly wild Indians, who had no gold, and who fought like demons. And the Indians said there was no Gilded Chief.

"The land of Cundinamarca seemed to be full of curses for the Spaniards, and fevers and pestilence came upon them, and death abode in their camps by night and by day. Some made their way back towards the sea; but many were too ill to move, and among those were the commander and his wife. When all but a few were dead, there came to their miserable camp the one whom they had sold their lives to find—the Golden King himself.

"When the aliens had entered his land, he had taken all but a few of his people, and withdrawn to an almost inaccessible valley, and there they had hidden themselves and their wealth. But every day spies went to the valley, and told of the ills that befell the white-skinned invaders. When the white men were so few that all danger was past, the king had gone forth to meet them, and no sooner had he come among them than his heart caught fire from love of Raymeya.

"The Inca professed great love for the Spaniards; he took them to his hidden city, and he studied their speech. And when he had learned to talk with them, he sought to win Raymeya for his bride.

"At first she refused, but he showed her his vast stores of gold and precious gems, and she sold her honour for a price. The warriors of the Inca then fell upon the Spaniards and killed all but the commander; and with her own hands Raymeya slew her husband that she might be free from him, and free to wed the Golden Chief.

"Raymeya told me that in the grey dawn of the next morning after she had killed her husband while she was lying with staring, sleepless eyes by the side of the sleeping Inca, the miracle took place that in South America is still remembered, and is called the miracle of Our Lady of the Wilderness. The apparition of an angel formed before the eyes of Raymeya, the angel's hands were pointed at her, and then these words were said:

"'O sinner, viler than the work of a fiend has been your deed this night. To gain wealth and place you have taken human life, and the souls of your victims are now in Purgatory. Until the last one of those souls is freed you shall not grow old, and the passing of time shall harm you not; but you shall be denied the blessing of death. And you shall wander over the earth, seeking something you shall not find, and bearing the memory of this time with you for ever!'

"Thus it is that Raymeya is ever young and ever fair, thus it is that she wanders over the earth, seeking love and finding it not; thus it is that she is the most unhappy woman who breaths the sweet air that the Great Spirits have given to the children of men.

"In time the Inca died. During the long, almost countless years that have been from then till now, Raymeya gained wisdom and the wealth that is now hers. Long ago she found the hidden valley in the Sierra Madres, occupied then by a tribe as wild as the Yaquis.

"Because they could not kill her they made her their queen, and she wrought with them and their children, and the children of their children's children, until the result is that her people are a wise and learned people, who dwell in a golden city in the fairest valley on the earth. She has taught her people all things except knowledge of the world; but she never allows them to journey beyond the mountains that shut in their valley.

"She herself wanders up and down the earth, appearing sometimes in a wild camp, disguised as an Indian woman, then going as a great lady in the courts of kings, and sometimes going as a nun to nurse the dying when the great wars are raging. But all the time she bears in her bosom a heart that is on fire, and joy is a thing that is not known to her."

Lo-To-Kah abruptly ceased speaking; he rolled a cigarette and lighted it, and then he walked up and down the room and smoked, his head low in thought. When he had finished smoking he sat down again and began talking. He said:

"Friend, when you think of all the blessings the Great Spirits have given to us of earth, remember that the greatest of all is death. It is the end of trouble, the ceasing for ever of evil doing. It will come to me soon, and may come to you also at any time, for a man's life is but as a breath of air. My mind now is often filled with thoughts of a fair land that I shall soon journey in, a land as fair as the land where Raymeya rules, but a land where no-one's heart is like a stinging adder."

The old man spread his blanket on the floor, and it was not long till I also slept, for the night was almost gone.

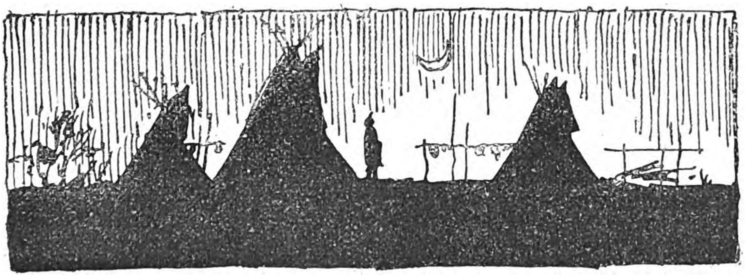
In the morning I studied the old Indian with new interest. He had travelled so far and wide, and he was so much wiser than the men of his race, and it seemed strange that he should believe such strange, weird tales as the one he had told me the night before.

I hoped he would speak further about the witch, but he did not mention her, and seemed to forget that he had spoken of her, or that such a person lived. He told me old tales of the long ago; he described the "outfits" that used to journey down the trail to Santa Fé before the railways were built, and he discussed the various army officers who had fought in the West.

The day was hot, and I slept an hour after noon. When I awoke and went outside I found the old chief on his pony, waiting to bid me farewell. He said:

"Being in this place has brought to my memory other places where the Pueblo peoples dwell, and has made me long to see the great rock of Acoma once more before I die. I am going there now. May health and joy be with you. Adios!"

V. Z. Reed.



A QUEEN OF THE SAWDUST.

It was early in June when Ivan Romanyi, the lion tamer, came to me for leave to go to his uncle, who was dying, and who had sent for him. It was quite a journey north, but I think Romanyi expected some sort of a legacy, and wanted to be on hand. Our season was just beginning, and we expected a new lion from Hamburg, so that it was most inconvenient to let him go, and I gave my consent unwillingly.

The only thing that surprised me was that he should leave Rose, even for so short a time; for since the day she came to us he had been her shadow. I have seen a good many strange things in my life, but nothing stranger than this union of Rose Lynch and Ivan Romanyi. It is true Romanyi was a handsome, black-eyed fellow, with a magnificent physique, and a warm, generous heart; but he had a fearful temper, and was as jealous as a fiend. He would have fits of sullen rage that made even the roughest women amongst us fight shy of him, for when he was angry he would rave and storm, and woe betide anyone that came in his way.

Rose Lynch was marvellously pretty. She was English by birth, and had the fair skin and colouring of her country, and a mass of reddish-gold hair that looked like bits of molten fire. Her slight, pliant figure was grace itself, and her manner quiet and well-bred. Despite her rough knockabout existence, no one would ever have believed her to be a circus rider. Romanyi loved her with that insane passion that brooks no denial. How he won her we never knew, but she accepted his fierce caresses quietly, and even in his worst moods she had no fear of him, for he was never rough to her. At the mere sound of her voice his frowns and scowls would disappear, and instead of the surly, brutal lion-tamer, he would be a passionate-eyed Hungarian lover.

He left Rose unwillingly enough. I think the night he bade us good-bye it must have almost broken his heart; his face was grey, and his eyes blazed like small fires under his black brows. Rose was as quiet and indifferent as usual, and did not seem to be sorry or rejoice at his going. He had quite a journey before him, and during his absence Fritz, the under tamer, took charge of the lions.

Rose was our première rider, and she was a universal favourite, and was always received with wild applause wherever we went.

I have never seen a woman ride as she did, or dare the feats that seemed mere child's play to her. As I said, she was a very beautiful woman at any time, but when she came into the ring in her soft gauze skirts, her exquisite arms and neck bare, her glorious hair over her shoulders, she was a vision no man that has ever seen her will forget. I had been very busy, and had not been back in the tent for a week, when one night, Martin, the ringmaster, beckoned to me before the performance. "What's up with Rose?" he said cautiously. I looked at him inquiringly.

"Haven't you seen her new outfit?" he asked. I shook my head, and just then the bell sounded and he left me. I walked back to the dressing tent, and crossed over to Rosie's corner and called her. She pushed the curtains aside and came out to me, and I saw what Martin meant. She had discarded her gauze skirts, and was dressed simply, but superbly, in a blue cloth habit, with a jacket that fitted her body closely, and the orthodox English tile on her blonde head. Her small hands and feet were perfectly gloved and booted, and she swung a riding crop in her hand. She had never looked more beautiful; her sweet face and slim throat rose like a flower out of its dark setting.

"What a stunning get-up, Rosie," I said.

She smiled uneasily, and then she said softly:

"Dick"—we were great friends, Rosie and I—"Dick, don't I look better so? More, more"—she hesitated—"like other women?"

She looked at me anxiously.

"You couldn't look like other women, my girl," I said lightly, and then, before she had time to answer, a young fellow walked towards her who had come through the side entrance, and, despite my orders to admit no one, here he was in the dressing-tent. He looked a boy about twenty, from his dress and manners evidently one of the upper ten, and as clean and as handsome a chap as you would wish to see. His hair was as fair as Rosie's own, and he was straight-limbed and broad-shouldered and tall, a splendid specimen of our young Englishmen. As he took off his hat to Rose her face flushed scarlet from brow to chin. It startled me so that I stared at her like a fool. She introduced me to him after a moment.

"Dick, this is Mr. Langdon, a friend of mine. Our manager, Mr. Bradley, Mr. Langdon."

And that was the first inkling I had of it. And then she came close to me, and said: "Be nice to him, Dick, for my sake, and, remember, he knows nothing."

I presume I gaped like an idiot. I couldn't believe it was Rose—Rose whom we called cold and indifferent—Rose whom no man ever seemed to have any effect upon—and here was this slip of a boy. When she came into the ring Langdon and I stood and watched her. For a moment the crowd did not know her in her new dress, and then they thundered applause at her. She never rode more madly, more superbly. Langdon's eyes shone; his face was flushed with pleasure.

"Isn't she wonderful?" he demanded of me. He was oblivious to anything or anybody, and after that one question waited breathlessly until she came back to us. She stood with him a little apart from me, waiting for her second entrance, and I heard him say to her: "Darling, how good of you to get this dress to please me. Now I know you love me."

To say that I felt stunned will not express it—I was ready to believe myself drunk or insane. It seemed incredible. But there stood Rose, looking eagerly into that boy's face, her lips and cheeks radiant as I had never seen them before, her voice indistinctly soft. I thought of Romanyi, and shuddered at the thought.

The new lion arrived, as ill-luck would have it, just at this time, and a viciously ugly brute he was, too. Fritz seemed quite unable to manage him, and I wished Ivan back a hundred times.

Langdon came each day, and Rose was uneasy and restless until she saw him. It was a boy's first love, and he gloried in the fact that we all knew it. Martin told me it was causing no end of talk, and small wonder, to anyone who knew Rose and Romanyi.

But one night as I was sitting alone at my desk, Rose swung the curtain aside and came in. She still had on her riding habit, and her long hair was uncovered, and she looked as white as marble.

Before I realised what she was doing, she threw herself down beside my chair, and, leaning her head against my knee, sobbed wildly. "Why, Rose," I said soothingly, "what is it, my girl?"

"Dick," she said, "this is killing me. What shall I do? You tell me, Dick. You have always been good to me, and I can trust you. You know (shuddering) Ivan will soon return. What shall I do then, Dick? What am I to say to him, I, whom he loves more than anything in the world? I thought I could break it off any time, and yet now I seem bound hand and foot.

"And Horace Langdon has shown me how I can love! He thinks I am the best and purest of women. He wouldn't believe an angel from heaven against me, Dick, and I love him better than my life! Horace loves me, and asks me to be his wife. Me! Rose Lynch—Ivan's sweetheart! Aren't you sorry for me, Dick? What shall I do?" She swayed to and fro.

"Are you afraid of Ivan?" I asked. She shook her head.

"Ivan wouldn't hurt me," she said; "he would tell me to go and be happy. If it killed him he'd tell me. It isn't of Ivan I'm thinking, it's of Horace, I can't wreck his life, and he won't take no for an answer; he thinks I am so good and true to him. Help me, Dick!"

Poor Rose. It made my heart ache to look at her. I took her back to her tent, and quieted her sobs as best I could, and the next day she was dry-eyed, but white as the dead. Langdon came as usual, during the afternoon performance, and had a long talk with her. When he left, Rose looked as if she would faint. Her eyes had great dark circles round. When I told her I had had a telegram from Romanyi, and that he would reach us for the evening, a red spot burnt in each cheek, but she did not answer me.

When night came and the big tent was crowded, I walked back to see how Rose was. Langdon was waiting for her also. When she came towards us I saw that for the first time since he had asked her not to wear them she had put on her short gauze skirts and tights again. His eyes contracted suddenly.

"What does this mean, Rose?" he asked.

She went over to him. We were quite alone in the small entry between the ring and the dressing-tent, and screened by the draught curtains. They had forgotten that I was there. As Rose reached him he put out his arms and closed them round her suddenly.

"Are you doing it to try me, dear?" he said. "Have you forgotten your promise?"

She shook her head.

"Tell me you will let me take you away from it all, Rose," he said. "I will make life so happy for you; you are not meant to stay here, dear; you are meant for me—to make me happy, and to live with me always." She lay in his arms, silently, the world forgotten. Langdon's lips met hers. "My wife," he whispered. But at that word Rose pushed him away from her.

"Not that, not that," she said unsteadily. "I had forgotten. Do you know Ivan Romanyi, the lion tamer, returns to-night?"

Langdon stared at her blankly.

"Well, what of that?" he asked.

She raised her head and looked him full in the face. I stepped forward to prevent her, but she motioned me back impatiently.

"He is my lover," she said; "he has been for three years."

Langdon gave a faint cry, but then he smiled at her. "You are playing with me, dear," he said; "it cannot be true!"

She turned to me.

"It is true; ask Dick. Dick, tell him; tell him."

Langdon's eyes, heavy with dread, turned towards me. I could not speak to the poor lad. I looked at Rose, but she pointed at me unflinchingly. Then I bowed my head silently for assent. Langdon will not be whiter when he is dead. But he made no sound; he turned and left us. Then I heard Ivan's voice.

Rose gasped for breath wildly.

"Don't let him come near me," she said, and fainted in my arms.

Romanyi came in, his face eager, full of happiness, calling: "Rose, Rose." When he saw her he dropped on his knees and gathered her into his arms silently. When Rose opened her eyes she saw him. His face lighted up with joy and relief. "Rose, my girl," he said passionately, "I will not go again," and, stooping, he kissed her hotly. At the touch of his lips she shuddered and sprang to her feet.

"Do not touch me," she said faintly. He looked at her bewilderedly. Then his face grew dark.

"You do not love me now?" he asked.

He leant against one of the tent supports breathing heavily.

"No, I do not love you any longer," she said slowly.

The colour faded from Romanyi's face, and left it set and grey, like flint. His dark eyes seemed covered with a film, his straight red lips grew blue and pinched. Just then the new lion set up a terrible roaring. It seemed to rouse Ivan.

"It is the new one," he said, his quick ear distinguishing a strange voice among his pets.

"Yes, and an ugly beast he is, too," I said.

Rose turned and left us without another word. Walking into the ring Romanyi threw back his head fiercely. "I will go and look at that lion," he said.

I followed him. The beast paced to and fro furious at his imprisonment. The other lions, seeing Ivan, whinnied and howled after him. He turned to me quietly.

"The little Rose has found another to care for," he said, in a curious low tone.

"She has been quite true to you," I replied. His white lips parted over his gleaming teeth, and into his eyes crept that look before which even the lions tremble.

"And for me," he said softly, "for me there is left—what? What is life but Rose? What is love but Rose? Do you think I will let her go from me?"

And then he burst into a storm of silent sobs, which shook his body violently. The lions growled ominously. They were unused to weakness from Romanyi. The new lion roared sullenly. Romanyi took a piece of meat and started towards its cage. I thought he was going to feed it, and stood watching him. He opened the cage door, and stood, his long prod in his hand. The beast crouched, lashing the floor of his cage with his tail.

Romanyi stood erect. As the lion made its leap towards him he turned, and then, to my horror, threw the long prod away from him, and stood waiting. It was all over in a second, and the trainers, who ran in at my cries, covered up his body decently, and threw fresh sand in the cage.

And out in the arena Rose in her pink skirts was riding for the people.

F. Chase.

CONSULTING A FORTUNE-TELLER.

BUSINESS in the printing trade in the otherwise thriving town of Mayneborough was anything but satisfactory. "There are too many of us, I'm thinking," was the comment of Amos Parsons, as, having opened his morning letters, he did not find a single order amongst them, and was wondering how on earth he was going to keep his machines running if things didn't improve.

Just at this moment a smart, well-dressed man entered, and handing over some papers, asked how soon he could have twenty-five thousand circulars announcing a sale of a bankrupt draper's stock.

"When do you want them?" was the reply.

"As quickly as ever you can do them. I want to get them out by to-night's post if possible."

"All right; you shall have them. How's business generally? Things are bad enough in our line, I know."

"Well, I can't grumble; you see, Sellers and Co. are always on the look out for anything likely to attract the public. Now, between you and me, this bankrupt stock I'm advertising is in reality nothing of the kind, but only some odds and ends I happen to have over from last spring; only it tickles the public taste to announce a sale—Alarming Sacrifice! Bankrupt Stock! or Great Fire! Salvage to be sold at an immense reduction—Anything to draw 'em in the place, that's my motto. And now, then, about price for these circulars? I was offered them at eight shillings a thousand. Can you do it a bit finer than that?"

"Eight shillings a thousand! Gad, things must be bad; why, that's almost down to cost."

"Well, here it is, you can see for yourself," handing him an estimate.

"All right; I will do the twenty-five thousand at £9 10s.; anything to keep the machines going; the price can't matter so very much, for if things go on as they're going, I shall have to clear out, that's all about it."

"I say, old man, I'm sorry they're so bad as all that; it seemed to me, judging from the number of people I see come in here of a day, you were doing a roaring trade."

"Agents, sir, agents, every one of them; first it's one thing, then it's another; but these insurance fellows are the worst; I had no less than three of them in here yesterday—two fire, and one life."

"You are insured, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes; I had the sense to do that when I came in first, and a pretty penny they charged me for premium."

"And yet yours isn't such a risky business as mine. By Jove! how my stuff would blaze," he added meditatively.

"I don't know about that; you see, there is a lot of oil and cotton waste about; it's wonderful what a lot of the stuff the engines take; it seems as if they must eat it sometimes."

"What do you value your stock at?"

"Oh, I don't know; I insured for two thousand pounds, but I can't see it now," ruefully.

"Don't be down in the dumps over it, things will take a turn before long; why don't you give yourself a holiday for a day or two? Tell you what; when I get this sale well under weigh, I'm going to run up to London for a couple of days; what do you say, will you come?"

"Well, in the present state of business I can't press forward the excuse that I'm too busy! I'll let you know this afternoon, when I deliver these things."

"All right. You come; a bit of a change will do you good."

After considering the matter, Amos Parsons decided to go, being careful to instruct his foreman before going to wire him at once should anything turn up.

Once in London, Mr. Parsons to a certain extent forgot his business troubles, and determined to have a good time of it, as he said.

On the evening of their arrival, his companion made the somewhat sparkling remark that he was going to have his fortune told.

"I thought you had more sense," was the reply.

"Well, I don't know so much about that. The oracle I consult, and I generally give her a look in once or twice a year, has a wonderful knack, or gift, or whatever you like to call it, of foreseeing things—in business, I mean—and only last year she was the means of putting a very comfortable sum to my credit, by advising me to make a big purchase in a particular line, which I did; and it came off trumps, too."

"Well, I hope she will be equally successful this time, that's all."

"Ah! you may laugh, but I know."

An hour or two after Mr. Sellers returned, his face wearing a more than usually satisfied expression.

"Well, what says the oracle this time?"

"Never you mind. I believe she's struck oil; anyway, I'm going to wire my manager to do as she suggests. Why don't you have a try yourself? I mentioned your name to her, and said things had been going bad with you."

"And what did she say?—that there was a bright future in store for me?"

"No," meditatively, "she did not; but she said she was sorry to hear any friend of mine was in low water, and that if you would give her a call she would advise you as to whether it was worth while holding on or not."

"How on earth can she tell? Why, it is simply absurd."

"Absurd or not, when I consulted her first, four years ago, she said: 'Do you know Mayneborough?'

"I said I did."

"Well, what of that?"

"Just this; she said: 'That place is on the move upwards. You go there and set up; don't be afraid of advertising; spend your last shilling if necessary, or your last but one.' She is a cautious woman. But you take my advice and go."

"And what did she know of Mayneborough?"

"Goodness knows; I don't. But I went, and I have never had occasion to regret it, and she has done me two or three good turns since. You take my advice; I'm not joking. You call on her to-morrow; it can't do any harm, and it may be the means of turning your luck."

"Oh, I don't believe in that sort of thing. My luck is dead out, I know; but going to see a fortune-teller won't alter it, that I can see."

"Very well, have your own way, then; but don't say I didn't tell you. And now let's go to the theatre."

Nothing more was said between them, but somehow the idea of having his fortune told grew upon Mr. Parsons. He couldn't divest himself of it entirely, do what he would, and in the morning he said: "Do you know, I am half inclined to give it a trial."

"Give what a trial?"

"Why, this sorceress of yours. By the way, what's her fee—that's a consideration these times, as you know."

"Ha, ha! so you've come round, have you? Well, Madame L'Anson has a strange way of doing business. If you go to her as a stranger she charges you so much for a consultation; but if you are introduced by one of her regular clients, like myself, she is content to abide by results. No result, no pay. Fair enough, isn't it?"

"Most satisfactory to the consulting party, I should say."

"Well, here you are," writing down a name and address on a small piece of paper; "there are your credentials; I wish you luck."

As Amos Parsons entered a 'bus going in the direction stated, he had an inward feeling he was making an ass of himself. "After all, it is only a joke," he kept on repeating, "and there's nothing to pay, that's a comfort."

The 'bus put him down within ten minutes' walk of his destination, which, having been accurately described to him by his friend, he had not much difficulty in discovering. No. 133—"There's luck in odd numbers," he said to himself, with a nervous laugh—was an eminently respectable, although small villa, not at all the sort of place he had expected to find a fortune-teller at, his experience in such matters being restricted to certain "revelations" he had read in the papers from time to time. In answer to his modest knock, a trim servant appeared at the door.

"Is Madame L'Anson at home?"

She was; did the gentlemen desire to see her?

Mr. Parsons replied that he did.

The neat little sitting-room into which he was ushered had nothing remarkable about it, except that the light was to a certain extent excluded by thick curtains drawn across the window; in other respects it was of the ordinary type, such as might have been expected from the exterior of the house.

Presently the door opened, and a well-dressed woman of about thirty-five years of age made her appearance.

That she was an eminently handsome woman most people would have admitted; and the majority would probably have been unanimous in agreeing that there was a something out of the common about her. Her big black eyes seemed to search one through and through, and as she looked at Mr. Parsons he felt decidedly uncomfortable.

She lost no time in coming to the point.

"You desire to consult me, I presume."

"I—er—do, madame; my friend, Mr. Sellers, tells me he mentioned my name to you."

"He did; and what is it you desire. Love or business?"

"Did not Mr. Sellers mention that I am already married?"

"Oh; then"—as if relieved—"it's business, I suppose—business is always more satisfactory to deal with; allow me to look at your hand.

"H'm; you have had a varied experience I can see."

Mr. Parsons smiled; this was a safe remark to make, he thought.

"Things have not been going well altogether with you of late, I understood from our friend, Mr. Sellers."

"That is so, madame; and what I want to know is, if there is any chance of their improving?"

"Quite so. Cut these cards, please," handing him a well-used pack.

He obeyed her request, mechanically.

"Thank you," proceeding to deal them out, and arranging them in the form of a circle.

Mr. Parsons looked on and said nothing.

After regarding them intently for a while, the lady spoke as follows:

"I can see you won't remain long where you are."

"I can't, if things don't improve," was Mr. Parsons' remark to himself; at least he was not aware he gave vent to his thoughts, but she evidently divined them.

"That is to say, you won't be able to, if things don't mend; is that not so?" with a smile.

"The very thought I had in my mind," he answered nervously.

"Quite so; so you see I was right, but"—looking again at the cards—"I think business will improve, and that very shortly, too; now, what would you say if you were to unexpectedly—quite unexpectedly—receive payment of a sum of, say, two thousand pounds?"

"Why, that's exactly——"

"Yes, exactly enough to put you on your feet, you were going to say—give you a fresh start somewhere else perhaps; but possibly you could do this with one hundred less—say one thousand nine hundred pounds, now."

"I should be very pleased to see the one hundred just now."

The lady took no heed of the remark, but continued as if she had not heard it.

"Well, now, I am prepared to make you a bet that within, say, ten days from now, you are a richer man than you are at present by the sum I have named. Is it a bet?"

"But suppose I am not, you will have to pay me."

"Exactly, that's my lookout; but I can see from the extraordinary combination formed by the cards that, surprising as it may seem to you, it will nevertheless be as I say. Men may lie, women deceive, but cards tell the truth," and sweeping the outspread cards together she looked at him intently and again asked, "is it a bet, now?"

"But this is so very unusual, so, er—unbusinesslike," inwardly wishing he had never come into the place.

"My profession is not conducted on the same lines as an ordinary business. I have told you what I foresee; it is for you to say whether you accept my wager."

"But I can't lose."

"Pardon me, but you can——and really my time is too valuable to waste," rising as if to go from the room.

"Well, as you are so good"—with a laugh—"it would be idiotic of me to refuse; let it be a bet between us, then."

"Thanks, then I'll just put it in writing, if you don't mind," and taking out a neat little pocket-book she made an entry therein. "Perhaps you wouldn't mind signing it; your initials will do quite well. Thanks; and now if the luck I have foretold does not come off, on the tenth day from now I will remit you one hundred pounds; if it does, I shall expect you as an honourable man to do the same. Au revoir." And before the now bewildered Amos knew quite what had happened he found himself alone.

Once in the open air the mysterious compact ceased to trouble him so much, and he actually went so far as to laugh at what had just taken place.

Sellers was awaiting his return. "Well, what did she tell you?"

Mr. Parsons gave a graphic description of what had taken place, expecting his friend to well laugh at him for having been so easily bamboozled.

To his surprise he did nothing of the sort; but in a sententious tone, remarked: "My experience of Madame L'Anson is that she is a very clever woman; that's all I have to say."

"But my dear fellow——"

"I mean what I say, that's all; but if you are inclined to look upon the whole thing as a joke, well, so be it."

The next day the two friends returned to Mayneborough, the topic not having again been referred to.

The following morning Mr. Parsons was at his office in good time. "Any letters, Wilkins?"

"Yes, sir;" handing them to him. To his agreeable surprise three of them contained orders (from strangers), in each of which the necessary payment was inclosed.

During the next day or two business decidedly improved, the customers in every case being new ones, so that he had no hesitation in asking for prepayment.

Towards evening Mr. Sellers, as neat and spruce-looking as usual, called in casually.

"Business any better, Parsons?"

"Things are certainly looking up. That's a good sign, isn't it?" pointing to a freshly delivered bale of cotton waste standing just inside the door-way.

"I told you things would improve before long. Hallo! here's a customer," as a smart, dapper-looking little man, carrying a small black hand-bag, approached.

"I was informed at my hotel, sir, I might rely on getting a small printing order executed expeditiously at this establishment. I have run short of these price cards," handing over a square-shaped business card with a long list of prices of goods, but no name of the vendor. "I should be very much obliged if you could let me have 500 by twelve o'clock to-morrow, when I will call; and may I leave my bag here till then?" suiting the action to the word, and putting it down just by the cotton-waste.

"I'm afraid that waste is greasy, sir."

"Oh, it won't hurt, thanks; it's only an old bag; and now I'll pay you, please, if you will give me a bill. . . . Thanks. I may rely on these cards to-morrow, mid-day?"

"They shall be ready, sir."

"Smart little chap that, Parsons."

"Yes; who did he say he travelled for?"

"I didn't catch the name; isn't it on the cards?"

"No; they are only list prices."

"You charged him a pretty stiff price, didn't you?"

"Well, you see, it is short notice; in fact, my men are all gone for the night, and I was just going to lock up when you came."

"Always do that yourself?"

"Always. I never go away till I have been round the place and seen that everything is all right. One can't be too careful, I think."

"Quite right, too. Going straight home to-night?"

"Yes. I shall just catch the 6.30 train. If you've got nothing to do you might come and dine with me. I'm better company than I was now business is looking up."

* * * * *

A headline in the next morning's paper announced "Great fire in a printing establishment," and the account went on to say that the premises lately occupied by Mr. Parsons had been totally destroyed by fire.

* * * * *

Of course, there was the usual inquiry, at which it was elicited, amongst other things, that the proprietor had been the last to leave the building on the preceding evening, and his friend Mr. Sellers came forward to prove that he had accompanied him on his final tour of inspection when everything appeared to be all right.

* * * * *

The origin of the fire remained a mystery; but there being no reason to suspect incendiarism the insurance company paid up in full, after deducting the claims of several customers who had orders in course of execution, for which, as they proved by producing the receipts, they had paid for in advance.

No claim was, however, entered by the smart little man with the black bag, which was, of course, consumed by the fire, and he did not even come forward as a witness at the inquiry.

Mr. Parsons sent a one hundred-pound bill to Mrs. L'Anson, and that lady in return, by way of acknowledgment, sent him a leaf from a small pocket-book, setting forth the terms of a certain wager, to which oddly enough the initials A. P. were appended. Although the ground landlord offered to re-erect fresh premises for him, he decided that he had had enough of the place, and set up in the printing line in another town, some distance away. He has not had his fortune told since.

S. J. F. Newbery.

The Secret of the Mine.

EVERY day, at the peaceful hour of the siesta, Techina, the daughter of Señor Don Andres, used to ascend the hill and sit in the shadow of the old rock, whose jagged summit was mirrored in the blue waters of the Sangre de Dios. Juan was always awaiting her, and both used to lose themselves in dreams of future happiness. For the two loved each other, but, alas! with a hopeless love. Juan was poor; he had nothing in the world but his health and strength, and what was that to Señor Don Andres, the richest rancher in the country?

Juan and Techina, entirely absorbed in their love, never dreamt that Don Andres could refuse to unite his daughter's wealth to Juan's poverty. But one day the old ranchero informed Techina that he had promised her to Don Pablo, whose fortune was nearly equal to his own. The girl begged and prayed; but prayers and supplications were useless.

Juan remained silent while Techina was telling him her trouble, but when the girl rose to return to the rancho Juan stopped her. "Techina," said he passionately, "swear that you will love me—that you will wait for me—and I, too, will be rich!"

"I do love you, Juan," she answered. "I will never marry anyone but you; I swear it now, by the God who hears and sees us!"

One night Juan appeared before her near the rancho, his big, black eyes sparkling with pleasure.

"Come, Techina," he said, embracing her; "cheer up, and dry your tears. To-morrow we shall be happy, for to-morrow I shall be rich. I shall have so much gold that the most powerful will bow to the earth and call me 'Señor.' I will lay a queen's dowry at your feet, Techina mine, and for our wedding you shall have a dress richer and more beautiful than the Madonna's! For I have discovered the secret of the mine—that old mine where great lumps of gold have been sleeping for centuries."

"Stop, Juan, stop!" cried the girl in terror. "Do you not know that the secret of the mine is fatal?"

"Ah, the Indians say so, Techina," he answered, "but I don't believe it. The secret may kill those who wish to carry off the gold from mere love of riches, but it cannot harm him who seeks it for love of you, Techina mine."

This was the legend at Los Angeles. Long ago, the Indians said, strangers came to the country. They dug up the soil and discovered gold. They compelled the natives to extract the precious metal for them; but, as if the earth desired to preserve inviolate the riches hidden in her bosom, all who worked in the mine were struck down by a mysterious death. Then the Indians took to flight. The strangers also abandoned the district. When they had gone the natives returned, blocked up the mouth of the mine with rocks, and spread the rumour that to touch the gold was death.

Juan knew the legend, and had long shared the popular belief. But he would have dared anything for Techina's sake. He had, therefore, sought and found the entrance of the mine. Once master of the secret, he had boldly attacked the rocks, which were now bound together by the roots of great trees, whose seeds had been carried to the spot by the wind centuries before. Juan told all this to Techina, and when they parted that night she had forgotten her sadness and despair. Next morning Juan resumed his labour, which was so difficult that he often doubted whether he should ever accomplish it. But the thought of Techina nerved him, and when darkness fell he always turned homewards murmuring "To-morrow."

About this time a number of men arrived from the north. They brought strange instruments, surveyed the valley, and calculated the heights of the mountains. They also drove in stakes surmounted by little red flags. They were engineers engaged in making the Southern Pacific Railway.

Among them was one man who took no part in his companions' work. All day he used to wander about the mountain, striking the rocks with a little steel hammer, and carefully picking up the pieces which he broke off. His name was Atkins, and the inhabitants looked upon him as a madman. Several times he met Juan with his pick on his shoulder. He then followed him at a distance, and watched him at night. He came, too, in Juan's absence to satisfy himself of the progress of the work. Then Atkins' face, usually so calm and cold, was lighted up with a strange expression. He also was in search of the mine whose terrible legend he well knew.

One evening, in the little chapel, Techina was kneeling before the Madonna. She asked a blessing on Juan and on their love; and, clad in her beautiful pale blue robe, embroidered with gold and adorned with false jewels that glistened in the taper's light, the Virgin seemed to smile down upon her. Her name, pronounced quite close to her, startled her.

"Techina," a well-known voice repeated.

It was Juan who called her. She rose and followed him.

"Techina, dear Techina," he said, leading her into the shadow of the trees, "to-morrow will see my triumph and happiness. To-morrow I shall have penetrated into the mine. I have cut my way through the stones piled up by the Indians. But I wish you, Techina, to be the first to see the treasures that I have won for you; so to-morrow we will descend together. Then we will take your father with us, and let him judge whether my wealth is great enough."

"Ah! Juan," she cried, "how I love you. And how happy I am! But—I am afraid."

"But I fear nothing, Techina. The legend lied! I found the secret of the mine, and when the last stone rolled away, disclosing the entrance to the dark gallery, I did not even tremble. No, no, Techina mine, I fear nothing. You love me, and—I am rich."

Next day, when all was still in the rancho, Techina climbed the hill, and approached the base of the old rock. Juan was waiting for her, leaning on his pick beside the black hole that had been opened at the cost of so much labour. He was happier than a prince and prouder than a conqueror. Techina approached trembling, but dared not look within. She was possessed by a strange fear.

"The legend lied, Techina!" exclaimed Juan; "the secret of the mine kills no one!"

He had scarcely spoken when a sharp report sounded, a cloud of white smoke burst from a neighbouring bush, and Juan fell on his face, dead, at Techina's feet.

Another report, another cloud of smoke from the bush, and Techina had fallen on her lover's body.

Thus were they united for ever.

A man now appeared. It was Atkins.

He looked at his victims a moment; then, slipping two cartridges into his revolver, he withdrew, muttering: "The secret of the mine kills those who discover it. Now I can work it without fear."

FERNAND HUE.

[All Rights Reserved by the Author.

The Queen of Night.

By HEADON HILL,

Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.

◆◆◆

SUMMARY.

Gaston Vizard gives to Sir Simon Crawshay an introduction to the agent of the vessel Queen of Night, in order that he may make special arrangements with regard to the trip of his wealthy ward, Miss Challenor. Dr. Zavertal calls on Vizard, and informs him that a new captain will be wanted before the next cruise.

The Queen of Night, under the guise of a popular pleasure boat, is used in reality by a set of unscrupulous adventurers for the purpose of doing away with objectionable relatives.

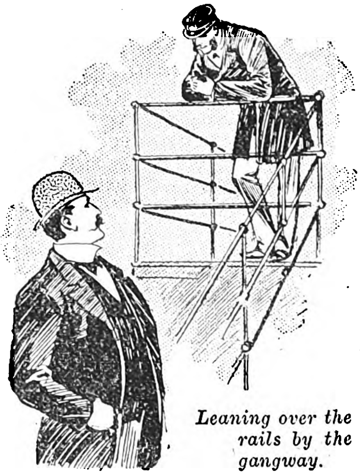
In Chapter I. Cyril Forrester receives his dismissal from the Flower Steamship Company for breaking regulations while saving the life of Miss Aline Challenor. He applies for and obtains from Nathan and Co., of Fenchurch Street, the vacant command of the ocean yacht Queen of Night.

Becoming engaged to Miss Challenor (who comes in for a quarter of a million on attaining her majority), he obtains an interview with Sir Simon Crawshay, who promptly refuses a consent to his engagement, and informs him that his ward will be out of his way for the next six weeks, as she is about to take a cruise on board the Queen of Night!

CHAPTER IV.

The Face at the Gangway.

As I stood in the Victoria Docks looking for the first time at the noble vessel I was to command I will dare wager that there was not a happier man or a prouder man than the Queen of Night's new captain within a thousand miles—no, not even among those homeward-bound passengers debouching from the great "liner" in the next berth.



Leaning over the rails by the gangway.

Her hull was painted a pale yellow, or cream-colour, her two funnels the same, and her brass-work glittered like burnished gold. She was bigger than any other steamer in the Docks, and from her yacht-like smartness would have been taken rather for a Navy ship than for a liner, were it not that the bright flowers and tropical plants displayed on her decks suggested war as little as commerce.

I repeat that I was a proud and happy man that morning. The ship was the cause of my pride, and need I say that my happiness sprang from the knowledge that she was to be Aline's home as well as mine for the next six weeks. Sir Simon Crawshay's announcement—made in all ignorance of my appointment to the Queen of Night—that my dear girl was to be one of her passengers on the coming trip had seemed almost too good to be true. But that it was true I gathered from his succeeding sentences, and I said nothing to disturb his ignorance.

Not knowing what was the real—the terribly real—meaning of this pleasure-cruise, I could have shouted with laughter, and had hard work to compose my face as the baronet went on to discuss the merits of the vessel I was to command. All that my silly nautical brain could grasp was, firstly, that I was besting Sir Simon, and, secondly, that Nathan's visit to Grosvenor Square was explained by business connected with the trip. I did not pause to wonder why the passage had not been booked in the ordinary way at the West-end office.

I concealed my triumph as best I could under an air of bitter chagrin, and as soon as possible took my leave, the one great hope in my heart being that Sir Simon would not discover my appointment to the Queen of Night before the steamer sailed. I did not know whether he was to accompany his ward, but that mattered little. If the ship could only get away without his knowing who the captain was, Aline and I would have at any rate six clear days on board together before anyone could land at Gibraltar—the first port of call. From what Nathan had let drop I gathered that the owners were not anxious to advertise the change of captains among the clients, so I thought there was every chance of gaining my object.

The testimonial of the Flower Line proved satisfactory to Nathan, and now here I was, on the day after the events recorded in the previous chapter, taking my first view of the "floating palace," as the advertisements called it, that had been committed to my charge. I had hurried down to the docks the moment the letter had been approved and the appointment ratified. The little Jew had given me a note of introduction to the surgeon of the ship—Dr. Zavertal—whom he said I should find living on board, and he further admonished me to get on as well as I could with the Doctor, as the medico of a vessel frequented largely by invalids in quest of health was necessarily an important personage.

"You will find him a nice-spoken, easy shentleman to sail with, but you had better let him have his way in anything outside the navigation of the ship," Nathan had said on handing the letter, and then he had emphasised the words by adding, significantly: "Them's instructions, remember."

As there still remained nearly a week before the date of departure no signs of bustle or activity were as yet apparent on the steamer, which lay alongside the wharf with her gang-plank out and only one or two men visible on deck engaged in polishing and painting. Nathan had told me that the main portion of the crew would not be shipped till two days before sailing, and that I should only find on board the officers and a few permanent hands who were retained to keep things ship-shape. Even the business of taking in the stores had not yet commenced.

Having satisfied myself with a general view of the vessel, I picked my way towards her across the lumber-strewn quay, and I was about to step on to the gang-plank when for the third time the uneasy feeling that had moved me in the office of Nathan and Co. took hold of me. Instinctively raising my eyes I saw that a man was leaning over the rails by the gangway, watching my progress with quiet interest. He wore a gold-braided cap with a peak, and from this and his dark-blue brass-buttoned frock coat I judged him to be one of the officers. That, however, was not the cause of the thrill that ran through me. Rather was it that the face was the face of the man who had turned and looked at me outside the Flower offices in Leadenhall Street, and that the eyes were the eyes which had then so vividly recalled the mysterious slits in Nathan's chart of the Black Sea.

But the strange part of this last meeting—whether it was really the second or the third I could not say—was that, as his eyes met mine and I returned look for look, the uneasy feeling left me at once and I wondered at myself for ever having entertained it. He began beaming at me with a genial smile of good-fellowship that promised the most friendly relations, and almost immediately sang out:

"Step aboard, sir. Welcome to the Queen of Night."

Quickly crossing the plank, I found him waiting at the other end to receive me, when he added:

"A passenger to view the ship?"

I was dressed in plain clothes, so that the question was a perfectly natural one, provided that I had been mistaken about the eyes in the map, and that his presence outside the Flower offices had been accidental. There was certainly nothing in his demeanour to show that he had ever seen me before, or that he was not thoroughly aboveboard.

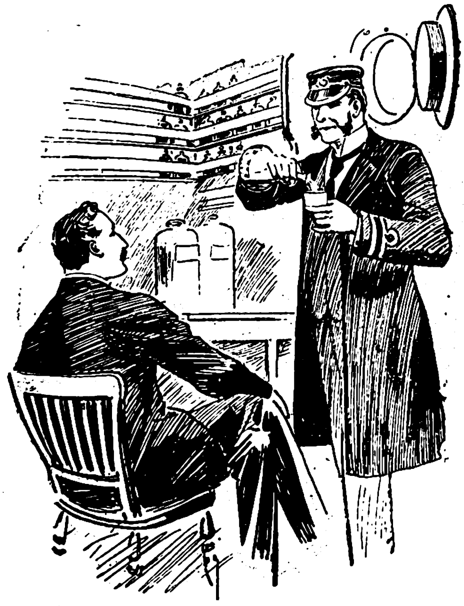
"No," I said. "My name is Forrester—Captain Forrester. I have been appointed to command the ship. I have a letter here for Dr. Zavertal."

"My dear Captain, I am delighted to be the first to receive you," he said, shaking me warmly by the hand. "I am Dr. Zavertal. Come into my den and refresh yourself, or perhaps you would prefer to make your tour of inspection first."

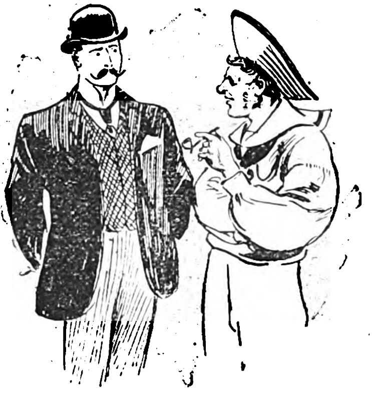
I told him that I should be very glad to begin with a chat, and he led the way to his deck-cabin amidships, glancing at Nathan's open letter of introduction on the way. The combination of surgery and study into which he showed me was, like every other portion of the steamer, luxuriously furnished and softly upholstered. The walls were matchboarded with some costly polished wood, and the floor was thickly carpeted. On the two seaward sides were plate-glass windows instead of the usual circular lights. At the fore end were fixed the shelves for drugs and medical appliances, while right across the after part of the cabin hung a gorgeous curtain shutting off the Doctor's sleeping apartment. A canary and a couple of gaudy parroquets twittered in gilded cages, and there were bright flowers everywhere.

"Snug quarters, Doctor," I said, coming to an anchor on a chair, while he busied himself with glasses and decanters.

"Yes, it's not a bad crib for a struggling medico, is it?" he assented jovially. "You see my department is the health, happiness, and comfort of the passengers. I couldn't keep them healthy, happy, and comfortable if I wasn't all that myself—so I do myself well."



Busied himself with glasses and decanters.



"It ain't always the sickest as snuffs it the quickest!"

"I can understand that you have your hands full," I replied. "The doctor on a regular liner hasn't too soft a time of it—on a ship full of health-seekers you must almost need an assistant."

A wink seemed now quite natural to those smiling eyes which had struck me with such a queer chill at first, and Doctor Zavertal winked as he said: "Oh, don't run away with that idea, Captain. They're not so sick as all that. Only about ten per cent. each voyage are what you might call invalids, and of them not more than half are bad cases. This is a very gay ship, I can tell you. Nathan will have said as much?"

"Yes, he seemed to set as much store on social qualities in his skipper as in seamanship," I replied.

"Well, hardly that; it is a combination of the two that is indispensable in our line of business," said Zavertal. "Old Nathan is a sharp man. If you'll allow me to say so, Captain Forrester, I think he's got the article he wants. At any rate, you look the part."

It crossed my mind that to "look the part" was about all that would be required of me in the character of a Master of the Ceremonies, if what the little Jew had told me was correct—that Zavertal himself bore the brunt of the entertaining. That would suit me very well, for I was never a lady's man, and should much social philandering be expected of me my appointment would not be likely to be a durable one.

"Well, Doctor," I said, "after all I'm here to sail the ship, and that must be my first care. I have no doubt that with you to do the social part I shall be able to look it all right."

He waved his hand deprecatingly, as though pleased that I had no intention of usurping functions which he had been in the habit of performing, and then for the fraction of a second his eyes hardened, and there came into them that peculiar glint which had startled me as he stood on the kerb in the city street. It was as if he shot one keen glance to probe my honesty of purpose and was satisfied, for the look passed and the eyes smiled again. Let me say here that though I was this man's nominal chief, and he treated me with proper deference, yet I felt from the first that his was the influence which with the owners and passengers, if we ever came to a conflict, would prevail.

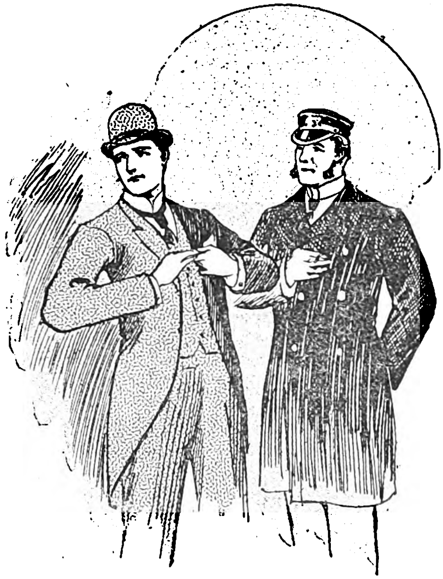
We smoked and chatted for half-an-hour, and then I asked him to show me over the ship and introduce me to the other officers. To the first proposition he agreed with alacrity, the second was out of his power, as the three mates were living on shore during the steamer's stay in port. The chief officer was expected next day, but at present the ship was in charge of the bo'sun. I made the acquaintance of this honest sailor-man, and was conducted by him from stem to stern, the result of the inspection being that never had I seen a better found and equipped vessel, with more generous owners, honestly desirous of promoting the comfort of the passengers and crew. Doctor Zavertal accompanied me through the after part of the ship, but after a while he left me with the bo'sun, who took advantage of his absence to fire off a volley of eloquence on the benefit of serving such a firm as Nathan and Co. in such a craft as the Queen of Night.

"Jest a sea-goin' hotel, she is," was the bo'sun's verdict. "Plenty of vittles, lib'ral grog, and every one to enjoy theirselves—'fore the mast and in the cabin. It may be kindness of 'art, or it may be the way the owners takes to make 'em forget the funerals. I don't say but what it ain't a bit of both, but it makes a live ship, anyway."

"To forget the funerals! What on earth do you mean, my man?" I exclaimed.

"Well, you see, sir," said the bo'sun, hitching up his trousers, "there be some as come aboard the Queen in search of 'elth as finds the other thing. Bound to be above the average of sea burials on a craft as is in a manner of speaking a 'elth resort as well as a big yacht. You may have observed, sir, that 'elth resorts is mostly the parrydise of the on'elthy."

My bo'sun was evidently a philosopher, and, gruesome as was the idea, I could well understand that it might not be altogether groundless. There is nothing more depressing than a funeral at sea, and the owners would be quite likely to do their best to counteract this influence by infusing as much gaiety as possible into the life of the ship. "But surely," I asked, "the passengers were not in the habit of dying wholesale? You cannot mean to suggest that that happens."



A tall, finely-built fellow.

"Lor' bless you, no, Captain," was the reassuring reply. "Sometimes one, sometimes two, but never more than three or four a voyage. That's not bad out of three or four hundred, and it ain't always the sickest as snuffs it the quickest, neither."

We made our way aft again along the main deck, taking the engine-room, with its slumbering "triple-expansion," "twin-screw" giants, en route. In passing along I could not fail to be struck with the beautiful fittings of the staterooms, with the electric light and electric bells everywhere; while the cooks' quarters, with their shining copper utensils and cool marble slabs, the great ice-chambers, and the bandroom, now empty save for rows of uniform coats and the bright brass instruments, claimed my admiration in turn. As for the grand saloon, music-room, and smoking-room, though I had sailed in many crack liners, I had never seen anything to equal the lavish splendour of the decorations in white and gold, the costly pictures, and tasteful harmony of colouring that prevailed.

Mounting to the upper deck, Simmons, the bo'sun, showed me my own cabin, which was situated under the main bridge, next the chart-room. It was a large, comfortably-furnished apartment, having a bedstead instead of a bunk in a curtained alcove, and good enough for a lady's boudoir. I had never been berthed like that before, and as I looked at the cushioned couches and easy chairs, I remember feeling positively afraid lest I should grow "soft" amid so much luxury.

Outside my cabin I dismissed Simmons from further attendance, and went towards the surgery to take leave of Doctor Zavertal before quitting the ship. Approaching his cabin from forward I had to step on several new coils of rope that had not yet been stowed, and these so deadened my footfall that I reached the door without giving any warning sound. Owing to this cause I overheard a few words of conversation which I now know were not intended for my ears.

"If this cursed American really means to go the trip, I should indeed be glad to have you with me," Doctor Zavertal was saying. "But how about your schemes for the subsequent voyage?"

"They would have to go by the board for this once," came the reply in a well-modulated gentlemanly voice. "We have done so well that we can afford to lose our special profits on one trip—what we can't afford to do is to take risks."

At this point I stepped into the cabin, and found the Doctor with a tall, finely-built fellow who had apparently not long arrived, for he stood just inside the cabin, and was in the act of removing his gloves. Neither he nor the Doctor showed any apprehension of having been overheard, but the latter said quickly:

"Ah, so you have completed your round of the ship, Captain? This gentleman, Mr.—thank you, I did not quite catch the name—Mr. Vizard, is a possible passenger, and has come to have a look at our accommodation."

"I hope he will be as pleased with it as I have been," I replied, bowing to the stranger.

"This is Captain Forrester, who has just been appointed to the command," explained Zavertal.

Mr. Vizard had been regarding me with a rather critical stare, but on the introduction being made mutual he smiled politely and remarked that he hoped to have a pleasant voyage in the Queen of Night under my auspices. I made the proper sort of reply, and, having arranged to take up my abode on the steamer on the following day, I bade them both good-day and went ashore.

"But why," I asked myself, as I passed through the dock gates, "did Zavertal hesitate in giving Vizard's name as though to convey the impression that it was unknown to him?"

The answer was beyond me, for I was ready to swear that they were not strangers to each other. Vizard was the man who had been with Zavertal in Leadenhall Street on the previous day. And who was "the cursed American," and what did "risks" and "special profits" mean?

CHAPTER V.

The Missing Passengers.

The day appointed for the departure of the Queen of Night broke fair and sunny, and the hour of noon found us all in trim to receive the passengers. A crew fit for a man-of-war had been shipped. The stewards' department was in full working order under its permanent chief, and the store rooms were crammed with all the delicacies in and out of season. There was little of the bustle customary on the sailing of a big steamer—first, because we carried no cargo, and, secondly, because there was no heavy baggage to be shipped. A cabin trunk or two generally sufficed each passenger for the six weeks' cruise, and these they brought with them.

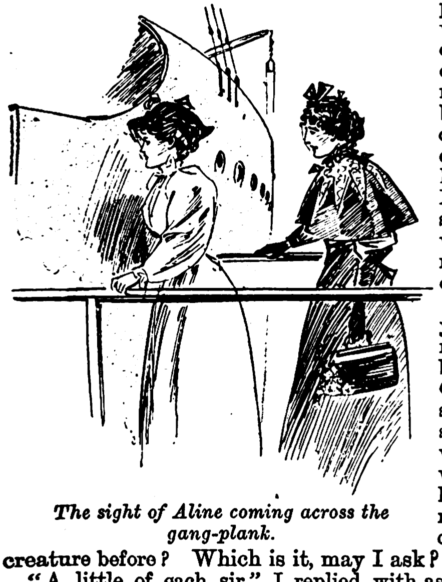
We were not due to warp out of dock till three, but the first comers began to arrive in time for the luncheon that had been announced as ready for passengers and their friends at one o'clock in the grand saloon. As captain of the ship it was beneath my dignity to receive our guests in person as they came on board, but Dr. Zavertal was literally a "host in himself," welcoming, assisting, and directing everyone—a duty in which he was ably assisted by the purser and stewards. This arrangement suited me admirably. I had ascertained from the passenger-list that

Sir Simon Crawshay had not booked a passage for himself, Aline having for a travelling companion a certain Mrs. Brinkworth, of whom I had never heard. But there was the chance that the baronet would accompany his ward to the steamer for the purpose of seeing her off, and my great fear was lest he should take her ashore again and forfeit her passage on finding that I was in command of the ship.

To obviate any such discovery, I kept my own room while the passengers were arriving, and it was fortunate that circumstances favoured my doing so without attracting attention. Apart from the fact that the Doctor was making himself so useful, I had a reasonable excuse for remaining out of sight in the necessity of sticking to my desk for the signing of reports and orders, as well as of holding an interview with Nathan to receive final instructions. There would be nothing to call me to the bridge till the bell rang "all clear."

The windows of the captain's room gave a clear view of the quay-side and of the gangway, and you may be sure that never on dark and dirty nights did I keep a sharper look out than I did for my girl's sweet face that day. Like most good things she was "lang o' comin'." Troops of smart people thronged gaily over the plank to the gangway where our courteous purser stood to check the passenger-list, the popping of champagne corks from the saloon told us that the farewell lunch had begun, but as yet there were no signs of Aline. Presently Nathan's shambling footsteps were heard outside, and he entered my cabin to furnish me with a list of places where I was to coal, and of the firms I was to deal with; and I had hard work to give him my attention and to watch the gangway at the same time.

He was sitting by my side at the cabin table with his papers before him, emphasising his instructions with the tip of a strong cigar which served the double purpose of a pointer. His ferrety eyes shifted from the paper to my face and back again perpetually, noting whether or no I understood his points. It was while he was searching for some particulars relating to his agent at Malta that my heart bounded at the sight of Aline coming across the gang-plank followed by a good-looking, ladylike woman of about thirty. I had barely time to notice that my girl looked pale and sad, and to indulge the glad hope that, rather than to illness, it was due to a cause which would soon be dissipated, when a wheezing chuckle at my elbow recalled me to the desirability of concealing my emotions. I was half afraid that I had not done so, for Nathan was regarding me with a sardonic leer.



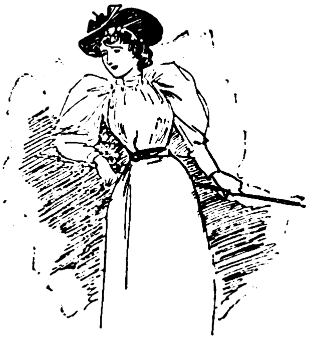
The sight of Aline coming across the gang-plank.

"I see that you are an admirer of female beauty, my gay Captain," he said, glancing significantly towards the gangway, "or perhaps you have met that charming young creature before? Which is it, may I ask?"

"A little of each, sir," I replied, with assumed indifference. "I know a pretty face when I see one, and I think I have some slight acquaintance with the young lady who has just come aboard. That is," I added, "if I am right in recognising her as a Miss Challenor, the ward of Sir Simon Crawshay."

Nathan shrugged his shoulders with an air of unconcern, but he still kept his eyes on mine as he answered: "Mosh likely that is her. A shentleman named Sir Simon Crawshay has booked passages for two ladies, I know. Ah, well, Captain," he continued, relaxing his gaze at last, "you had better make hay while the sun shines. Sir Simon will not be on board to shpoil shport."

He evinced no curiosity as to where and when I had met Miss Challenor, and we resumed our business. Now that I was assured of Sir Simon's absence, I was able to give my owner an undivided attention, with the result that the remaining matters were quickly disposed of, and Nathan left the cabin. He had scarcely gone when the chief officer, Mr. McIntyre, came to tell me that the pilot was aboard. I gave orders for the first bell to be rung to begin to clear the ship of passengers' friends, and then went up on to the bridge to direct the preparations for warping out. After a few words with the pilot and the mates I turned to scan the deck below for Aline. I was rewarded at once. She was standing with her back to the railing on the side farthest from the quay, quite alone, and watching, with what I thought was a wistful interest, the first departures for the shore.



She was standing with her back to the railing.

Telling the chief officer that I had caught sight of some friends, and that I would be back directly, I hurried from the bridge and went aft to where Aline stood. Never shall I forget the look of glad wonder with which she started to me as I softly spoke her name, and she realised by the smart uniform I was wearing that I was probably, as she naïvely put it, "going too." Let me be excused from recording the few words in which I confirmed that happy surmise, and those with which she received the news. Most of the people were still down in the saloon, doing justice to the farewell luncheon, and those on deck were busy with their own affairs, so that our meeting was more private than might have been expected in such a place.

"And now, dearest, what is this that Sir Simon tells me of your illness?" I asked, when I had briefly explained my position on the Queen of Night. "I thought you were looking a little sad just now, but you do not by any means justify the poor account he gave of you."

"There is absolutely nothing the matter with me, Cyril," she replied. "If I looked sad the cause of it is all gone now. I was regretting having to leave England without seeing you, but the last few minutes have changed the prospect of the voyage into a dream of delight."

"But your guardian must have had some grounds for making such a statement, surely?" I persisted, though my anxiety was nearly quelled by the obvious truth of her own account of herself. Now that the sadness had left her face, she was again the picture of radiant health.

"Oh, I expect the wish was father to the thought," she said lightly. "Sir Simon kept harping on my pallor and want of appetite—two utter fictions—so long that I almost began to believe in them myself. Do you know what I think his real motive was in sending me on this trip?"

"No; tell me," I said.

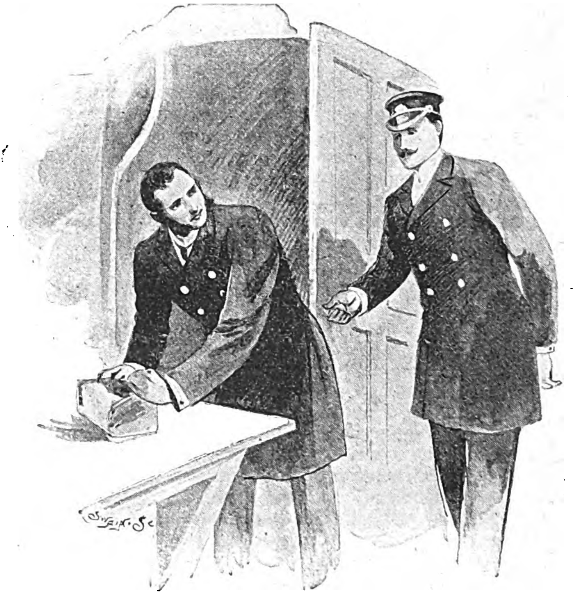
"I believe he suspected that there was something between us, and that he wanted to get me out of the way before your return," Aline said. "The steamer would have sailed a week ago, I am told, if they had found a new captain sooner. To think that it should be you."

"Well, if that was his game, Sir Simon has been fairly sold," I laughed. "And now dearest I must run away. The skipper of a boat of this size has plenty to do on leaving port, and I may not see much of you for the next twenty-four hours. One question, though. Who is your companion?"

"She is a Mrs. Brinkworth—Ella her Christian name is, and I call her by it already," was the reply. "My guardian engaged her specially to chaperon me on this trip—through an advertisement, I believe. I have only known her three days, but I like her much. She has been unhappy in her married life—poor thing."

"Do you trust her well enough to tell her of our engagement?" I asked, with a keen appreciation of the value of a friendly chaperon during the voyage.

"I have not told her yet, but I shall soon see," Aline said, as nodding gaily she dismissed me to my duties.



Engaged in unpacking a parcel of drugs.

It was time to finally clear the ship of strangers, and as soon as I reached the bridge I gave orders for the last warning bell to be rung. The lingerers at the saloon table came streaming up on deck, and the crowd quickly thinned as the friends and relatives of our passengers went streaming on to the quay. It was a festive scene, resembling more the close of some social function than the departure of a great steamer. The sadness of farewell, so noticeable when a regular liner starts for a distant port, was entirely absent in the case of a six weeks' pleasure cruise.

At last the chief officer reported "All clear," and I was about to order "In gang-plank," when the purser came running up the bridge ladder and announced that two passengers who had booked had not arrived. One was a Mr. Franklin Kennard, of the United States, and the other Mr. Gaston Vizard, of Park Lane. Would I wait for them?

In the rush and bustle of the past week I had almost forgotten the American who had appeared while I was waiting in Nathan's office, and who had had the curious rencontre on the stairs with some unknown individual as he left. Vizard, of course, I remembered as the man whom I had seen on two occasions—once in Leadenhall Street, and again when I first came to see the ship. I was too busy to be struck with the coincidence that the only two intending passengers, besides Aline, of whom I had any previous knowledge, and both, so far as I knew, entirely unconnected with each other, should have failed to embark. All my mind was concentrated on getting the ship away as quickly as possible, and knowing that Zavertal was practically in charge of the passengers, and would be aware whether any special circumstances called on me to wait for the two truants, I ran down to consult him.

In the last few days, while living on board, I had got very chummy with the Doctor, and deciding to draw the "home cover" first, though hardly expecting to find him there, I did not hesitate in my haste to open the door of his cabin without knocking. Judge, then, of my surprise when crossing the threshold I not only heard Zavertal's voice, but, as I thought, that of the Mr. Vizard who I had just been informed was not on the ship. Opening the door smartly, I was still more astonished to see the Doctor, quite alone, engaged in unpacking a parcel of drugs.

"I thought I heard Mr. Vizard's voice," I said, looking round blankly.

"Did you, Captain?" said Zavertal, looking up with his usual friendly smile. "I expect he is somewhere around on deck, then."

"No," I answered; "I didn't see any one outside. I came to say that the purser reports him as not on board. Also another passenger who booked—a Mr. Kennard—has not turned up. What is the custom in such cases? Shall we give them a little law?"

"Well," said the Doctor in the confidentially respectful tone of a subordinate who desires to be really helpful, "that is for you to decide, sir; but if I may advise you in my private capacity I should say not. The owners won't be inclined to blame you for a couple of forfeited passages, seeing that there will be two mouths less to fill. It has happened before, and the last captain never waited?"

"That settles it, then," I exclaimed, and returning to the bridge I gave the word to close the gangway and warp out of dock. So sure was I of having heard Vizard's voice that I suspected the Doctor of a practical joke, and I was strengthened in the idea by having noticed a tremulous motion in the curtain that screened the bedplace from the surgery. I fully expected that Vizard, if not Kennard as well, would put in an appearance the first time the gong sounded for a meal.

But it was not so. Owing to the difficult navigation at the mouth of the river I had to stick to the bridge that night, and was unable to join the company at dinner in the saloon. After the meal was over, however, I sent for the purser and inquired if anything had been seen of either Mr. Kennard or Mr. Vizard.

"No, sir," was the reply; "they are certainly not on the ship. Their cabins are unoccupied, and they were not at dinner. I have ticked them off as 'forfeits.'"

(To be continued.)

A Splendid Serial Story, by the Author of "The Queen of Night," is now appearing in "PEARSON'S WEEKLY." One Penny. Every Saturday.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

"Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending Six penny stamps a book 'Corpulency, and the Cure,' 256 pages, containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the 'recipe,' can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C."—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

A POSITIVE REMEDY

FOR CORPULENCE.

"Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 6d), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slighest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid: 'My son, Count——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days, 16 kilos—i.e., 34lbs.' Another writes: 'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes: 'I am just half the size.' A fourth: 'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lbs. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18lbs. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes: 'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says: 'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says: 'Step on a weighing-machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lbs. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.' "—Cork Herald.

CAMBRIC POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS

	Bordered. per doz	Hem-stitched. per doz.
Children's	1/3
Ladies',	2/3	2/9
Gents',	3/3	3/11

Direct from the Manufacturers

"The Irish Cambrics of Messrs. Robinson & Cleaver have a world-wide fame."—The Queen.

Samples and Price Lists Post Free.

LINEN COLLARS, CUFFS, AND SHIRTS.

Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, 3/6 per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4/11 per doz. Cuffs for Ladies or Gentlemen from 5/11 per doz.

Shirts, Best quality Long Cloth, with 4-fold Linen Fronts 35/6 per ½ doz. (to measure 2/- extra).

"Exquisite quality, most moderate in price."—Myra's Journal.

(By Special Appointments to the Queen and Empress Frederick of Germany.)

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

HAIR DESTROYED.

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, or no charge made. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address Mrs. E. GOULD, 129, New Kent Road, London, S.E.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full PARTICULARS of a REMEDY, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—

D. COLLINS,
GOTHIC HOUSE, 9, ERSKINE STREET,
LIVERPOOL.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

IMPORTANT ☞ TO LADIES.

Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOWLE'S PENNYROYAL & STEEL PILLS FOR FEMALES.

QUICKLY CORRECT ALL IRREGULARITIES, REMOVE ALL OBSTRUCTIONS, and RELIEVE the distressing SYMPTOMS so prevalent with the sex. Boxes 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. (the latter size contains three times the quantity), of all Chemists, or will be sent anywhere on receipt of 15 or 34 stamps, by the maker,

E. T. TOWLE, Chemists, NOTTINGHAM.

Beware of Imitations injurious and worthless.

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.

Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

New Harrison. SWIFT GOLD MEDAL.

KNITTER

KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd., Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

ONE BOX

OF

DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use

Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.

1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
5, DENMAN STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, S.E.

Beware of injurious imitations.

"MEPHISTO" MYSTERY.

To induce a trial we will send (once only) to every applicant a Sample Package of Imported Cigars, rivalling the choicest 6d. Also an excellent Briar Pipe with the great "Mephisto" numerous human figure-producing Smoke Mystery. The whole post free, 1s. 6d.; abroad 1s. extra.

N. PAIN & Co., Importers, 194, Brooke Rd., London, N.E.

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE Medically approved for Red Noses, 3s. 9d. post free, under cover. Pamphlet "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1s. Machines for Ugly Noses. Particulars for stamp. LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, L'pool.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

OTTEY'S Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps from THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent. Please mention this paper.

MADAME FRAIN'S

FAMOUS

FEMALE MIXTURE.

The most powerful and effective on earth.

For the most obstinate cases. Will not injure the most delicate. Price 7s. 6d. (Strongest, 11s. per bottle); post free, 6d. extra. HERBAL INSTITUTE, 1a, Hackney Road (opposite Shoreditch Church), London, N.E. Send at once stamped directed envelope for particulars and proofs. I will forfeit £100 for every testimonial that is not genuine, and they can be seen at any time.

Sold also by all Chemists.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. HOWELL, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.

TO THE DEAF.

A Gentleman who cured himself of Deafness and Noises in the Head after fourteen years' suffering, will gladly send full particulars of the remedy post free.—Address, H. CLIFTON, Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for SPECIAL TREATISE and PRICE LIST of SURGICAL APPLIANCES. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, GRAHAM ROAD, LONDON, N.E. Please name this paper.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

32 PAGES. STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE. 32 PAGES

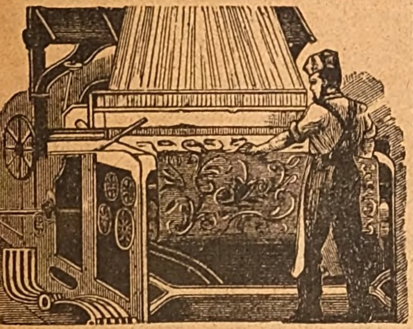
SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 353. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 5TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

BE SURE TO CUT THIS OUT. IT MAY NOT APPEAR AGAIN.

10,000 RUGS
GIVEN AWAY.



THIS PHENOMINAL OFFER is made to the readers of SHORT STORIES only. On receipt of this advertisement, accompanied by Postal Order for 6s. or 74 stamps, we will forward DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS to your address, one of our genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, etc., handsomely bordered, and woven in thirty different patterns and art colourings to suit all requirements, and LARGE ENOUGH TO COVER ANY ORDINARY-SIZED ROOM. These Carpets are manufactured from a material equal in wear to wool, and are undoubtedly the cheapest in the world.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send two CARPETS and Two RUGS for 10s. 6d.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

The Queen says: "Decidedly stouter and handsomer than any of the kind, the price being the astounding part of the matter." Schoolmistress: "For style, durability, and cheapness they cannot be beaten." Penny Illustrated Paper: "Manufactured in every variety of colour, and is one of the most surprising bargains I have seen." Church Bells: "Truly wonderful value."

Thousands of Testimonials similar to the following, and Repeat Orders have been received from our Customers.

"16, Clarendon Villas,
"West Brighton.

"DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for your prompt attention to my wire of Friday. The Carpet came duly to hand on Saturday, and I am exceedingly pleased with it, so much so that I purpose calling at your warehouse one day this week, when I expect to be in town, to see if I can supply myself with two more to suit my present requirements.—Yours faithfully, W. HEATH HAYWOOD."

"45, George Street, Plymouth.

"GENTLEMEN,—The Carpet is duly to hand, and gives entire satisfaction.—Yours truly, J. C. PICKFORD."

"Mullaghmore.

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of Carpets, with which I am very pleased; they are splendid value for the money, and far superior to what I expected. Later on I shall be pleased to favour you with further orders.—Yours sincerely, H. CUNNINGHAM."

This offer is made to the readers of this paper only, and may not be repeated. All orders despatched same day as received. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "Union Bank," and made payable to J. HARGREAVES, Sec. Established 1872. Address—

The BRITISH CARPET WEAVING CO.,
31, OLD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

100 YEARS' WORLD-WIDE RECORD OF SUCCESS.

NORTON'S
CAMOMILE
PILLS

INDIGESTION BILIOUSNESS HEADACHE
STOMACH & LIVER COMPLAINTS DEBILITY

THE BEST OF ALL TONICS and a GENTLE APERIENT. Mild in Operation, Perfectly Safe, and Free from Injurious Drugs. Sold Everywhere in Bottles at 1/1½, 2/9, and 11/- each.

Ask for "NORTON'S CAMOMILE PILLS," and do not be persuaded to purchase an imitation.

Prepared by NORTON'S,
Limited.

NORTON'S
Trade Mark—One Little Bottle.

21, Spital Square,
London, E.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

The PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, Hanley

Are Selling Fast the most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful. The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well. Apply at once. Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE
FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

Languid Feelings.

If your strength is failing, and you have unusual lassitude, with weak, languid feelings, are easily fatigued and become short-breathed with slight effort, are losing weight, and are troubled with night sweats, and moist clammy skin by day, with general enfeeblement, and a weariness throughout the whole frame, you are suffering from General Debility, and Guy's Tonic is the strengthening remedy that may be relied upon to restore you to robust health and vigour.

An Illustration.

Miss Cocksedge writes from Ipswich, on June 7th, 1895: "Miss Cocksedge has much pleasure in highly recommending Guy's Tonic as a remedy for weakness and debility, having derived the greatest possible benefit from taking it. Guy's Tonic gives an increase of appetite and a general feeling of elasticity and strength to the system."

The Opinion of a Distinguished Actor.

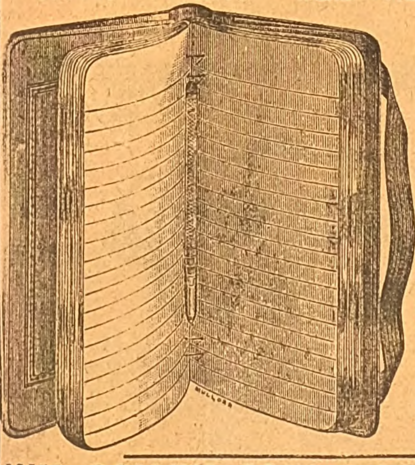
William Terriss, Esq., writes from the Adelphi Theatre, London, on June 20th, 1895:

> "I can heartily recommend Guy's Tonic. It is a most excellent Nerve Remedy, and is as good as new life in its recuperative results."

No other medicine can be compared to Guy's Tonic in all cases in which the general health has become enfeebled from any cause, where the Digestive Organs are weak and irritable, the Nervous System shattered, the Blood poor, the Spirits depressed, and the patient reduced to despair. In all such cases the action of this wonderful medicine is at once prompt and gratifying. Guy's Tonic communicates Vitality and Energy to every part of the System, steadies the Nerves, Strengthens the Stomach, invigorates the Liver and Kidneys, promotes the action of the Skin, and assists Nature in her own way in the recuperation from Disease. Guy's Tonic can be obtained of Chemists and Stores throughout the world.

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.

WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST
AND THE BEST.
THE SIMPLEST
AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register."

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY

SHORT STORIES

No. 353.] For the Week ending October 5th, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

Their First Dinner Party.

THEY had only been married a month, and they had asked two friends to dinner. It was only an informal invitation, and her note wound up with: "If you are able to come don't trouble to reply." It was the first time they had had guests; consequently they were a little flurried when the time came for them to arrive.

She had superintended the arranging of the table herself, and now stood surveying its obviously new silver, glass, and linen, with housewifely pride.

"Do you really think everything will go well, Edward?" she asked for the twentieth time.

And for the twentieth time he replied:

"Of course it will all go well. I only pity the poor fellows who have no little wife and no home of their own."

"Oh, Edward, how nice!" she whispered; "and how I do pity the poor girls who have no nice, kind husbands. There is Edith. She is such a sweet girl, she really ought to know how nice it is to be married."

"Yes, indeed; and then there is George. He has no idea what happiness he is missing."

She walked into the drawing-room, and, standing before the mirror, rearranged the rose in her hair.

"Do you like it so?" she asked.

"It is lovely. Poor George, how he must envy me!"

"And, oh, Edward, I do feel sorry for Edith. Hark, is that a carriage?"

They both fell into easy attitudes of expectancy, but the carriage rolled on. He took out his watch and looked at it; it was just seven.

"Oh, dear," she moaned, "I'm afraid they will not be prompt, and my note said seven sharp."

"Perhaps my watch is fast," he said soothingly.

She shifted the rosebud a little, then replaced it, regarding herself in the glass with a critical air. He walked up and down with his hands in his pockets.

* * * * * *

The clock chimed the half-hour.

"You are sure you said seven sharp?"

"Of course I am. I am not quite an imbecile yet, if I married you."

"Who is talking unkindly now?"

"Oh, I never thought that you would treat me so when you begged me to marry you."

"I only asked you once, and you said yes quick enough."

"I never thought you would be a brute."

"And I never thought you would lose your temper like this."

"Nobody will accept my invitations now, just because I have married you—mamma said I was making a mistake."

"People were always glad enough to accept my invitations before I was married."

"Very well, if you want to be free I will go home."

"If you want to go, pray don't allow me to detain you."

* * * * *

The clock chimed out eight strokes; carriages kept rolling by, but none of them stopped. She swept into the bedroom, and began opening drawers and boxes and taking out their contents, which she could not see for her tears. He tried to hum "After the Ball," watching her movements furtively through the open door. Would she leave him? And what would people say if she did?

She tumbled the costly things about in a careless fashion. What did their beauty matter now when she was going home with a broken heart to die!

Then she gave a cry. Her eye had fallen on a white slip of paper in the corner of a drawer.

"Edward!" she cried, in tragic tones, "here is the note—I had forgotten to send it!"

They looked at each other for a moment—these two who were about to part for ever—then a smile curled the corners of her mouth. In an instant she was clasped in his arms. Then a harsh voice sounded at the door:

"Would yez be havin' any dinner to-noight?"

"Oh, Edward," she whispered, "how shall I ever tell the cook?"

W. H.

All rights reserved.]

Love - and - Life.

A TWOFOLD SACRIFICE.

It was the very saddest summer that I ever spent. I do not think I shall ever forget the pathos—the tragedy of it. After a few weeks' tramping tour through the south-west of England I found myself again in London, somewhat freckled and tanned, and my senses full of the perfume of mignonette and wild-rose hedges. I did not intend to stay long—only long enough to glance at accumulations of letters, and send a few telegrams, and then be off again to the streams and the meadows and the quaint old roadside inns, with their apple-cheeked barmaids and excellent provender. But where to go? That was the question.

Ah? here was a letter on the very top of the little heap that my landlady had piled on my mantelpiece, and that decided me at once. It was from Archie Trevor, as bright and handsome a boy as ever toed football-leather, and who had distinguished himself scholastically as well as athletically at Cambridge. "I won't take any refusal," he wrote; "you simply have to come, old chap. This is the loveliest spot in the world, and, besides, I'm engaged, and I want you to see the loveliest creature that ever drew breath. I'll expect you any time within ten days. If you don't show up in that time I'll come after you."

As the friend of Archie's father, though many years his junior, I had been thrown much in contact with the boy, and since the old gentleman's death we had been warm friends. Archie in love, eh? Well, I felt sure it would be a serious matter with him. He was earnest and intense by nature, and had never played the butterfly with the women of his acquaintance.

Archie's letter was, I perceived, a week old, but in just three days I found myself in the quaint little Welsh seaport town from which he had written. I climbed the hill and inquired my way to Rose Cottage, and when I came to it and to Mr. Archie it was all I could do to prevent myself bellowing with delight at the infinite beauty of the scene.

The long white walls of the cottage were massed with roses from top to bottom. Roses clustered over the thatched roof, roses nodded their heads from the mullioned windows, and brushed your coat-sleeve as you walked along the narrow path. At the back of the cottage was a comfortable lawn and more roses—ever roses—countless roses. And, stretching away in the distance, shimmering in the sunlight, was the sea.

Archie leapt from a hammock and grabbed me by the hand. "How glad I am to see you, dear old Jack!" he exclaimed, his delicate cheeks flushing with pleasure. I returned his greeting in kind, and then for the first time became conscious of the girl standing shyly by us.

She had risen from a low chair on the farther side of the hammock, and had a book in her hand, from which she had evidently been reading to my constitutionally lazy friend. Her beauty simply stunned me. She was very tall, quite two inches taller than Archie, with one of those almost faultless figures that, in girlhood at least, one finds in England, and nowhere else.

She had light-brown hair, on which the sun scattered little gold flecks, and her eyes were of the deepest, tenderest blue, and big and earnest and wistful. Lastly, she was dressed all in white—the only hue for a sweet girl's dress in summer—and it is scarcely necessary to say that I surrendered to Master Archie's fiancée at discretion, mentally voting him the luckiest dog under heaven, no matter who she might be.

That night, as we sat smoking our farewell pipes, and with that glorious odour of roses stealing in through the open windows, Archie told me his story. It was romantic enough. He had been riding past, three weeks ago, on his bicycle, and had had a bad fall at the very moment he had been slackening speed to admire the beauty of the garden of roses. Dorothy (for that was her name) had seen his ungraceful performance, and his ineffectual effort to rise. At her commands an ancient gardener had wheeled him into the house, in ridiculous fashion enough, and the village doctor had attended to his dislocated knee. Dorothy's aunt had, during the next three weeks, fallen almost as deeply in love with the handsome young sufferer as had her niece. Yes, indeed, I congratulated Archie over and over again.

Dorothy and I became firm friends at once. Perhaps it was because I knew myself to be too old and worldly-wise to get into any sort of danger that led me to associate with this pair of lovers so freely. The three of us took long rambles together through the meadows and down by the restless and ever-changing sea. It did me good on such occasions to note Archie's almost childish delight in his fiancée. After all, he was nothing but a boy, despite his twenty-seven years. He laughed the whole day long, and made love to Dorothy as one makes love to a beautiful, spoiled child.

And she? Why, she accepted it all in a silent, satisfied sort of way. She accepted the boy's kisses soberly, without any show of emotion, and as a matter of course. I sometimes thought I would give £100 to see her tremble or blush. It was easy to see that this was her first love. She was so matter-of-fact about it all, and it was so easy to see there was not a vestige of passion in it for her. I could see, too, that she was proud of her handsome boy-lover in a certain way. As she sat on the sand, looking so very lovely in her white dress, with that far-away look on the dewy blue eyes, she would stroke with her slim hands the blonde head that lay so luxuriously on her lap and smile shyly up a me for congratulation and approval.

And then came the first chapter in the tragedy.

The three of us had been for a long ramble along the beach, and Archie had his pockets filled with the shells and other treasures gathered by his sweetheart. We were on our way back, for rain had begun to fall heavily and a few rumblings of thunder warned us of the typical Welsh storm that was in store for us. We were making a short cut up a winding path through the cliffs, when the storm broke in all its fury.

I don't think I have ever seen such lightning, or heard such thunder, not even in the tropics. I was leading the way, and between the awful peals I could hear

Archie encouraging the beautiful girl he was half carrying, half dragging along.

There suddenly came a peal loud enough to wake the dead, and as it died away I uttered a yell of warning and sprang aside. A huge piece of rock, fully four feet high, loosened by the shock, was sliding down the path. As it passed me I glanced back, and turned sick with horror, for the pair were just at a point where they could not hope to escape it. They could not turn to the right or left, and immediately behind them was another rock, immovably fixed, and against which the down-coming fragment would grind them, as it seemed, to pieces.

It all happened in an instant. I was powerless to help. At the instant, apparently, that the rock was sliding upon them, I saw Archie seize Dorothy in his arms, below the waist, and lift her up. Higher and higher he raised her, till she rested on his shoulder. Then there was a horrible crunching sound that I shall never forget.

* * * * *

It took two strong men with crowbars to release my friend. By good fortune the rock that had fallen was conically-shaped, the smaller end uppermost, else he would have inevitably been crushed. As it was, both his legs were shattered from the knee down.

No sufferer was ever nursed as Archie was. Dorothy, whose grief was pitiable, would never have left his side if I had not forced her to do so.

I had, of course, written to the Trevor family of the accident, and then, one divinely-beautiful August night, Lieutenant Guy Trevor, Archie's elder brother, came to Rose Cottage to see him. His ship was at Portsmouth, and the moment he heard of the boy's mishap, he hurried to him. And the great big sailor—he was over six feet, and looked like some giant of the Orient, with his splendid proportions, and tanned features—knelt by his young brother's bed, and spoke to him with sobs in his deep bass voice.

Through the window I saw the meeting between the sailor and Dorothy, and I have often wondered since then why I did not scent the peril at the time.

Both stood for an instant perfectly still, transfixed by each other's wonderful physical beauty; then Guy introduced himself, and the two walked slowly away, talking in whispers of the calamity that had befallen the boy they both loved so dearly.

Twice during that week I saw the tears stealing down the pale cheeks of the cripple, as he lay there, so still, on his narrow white bed. Once he spoke to me of Dorothy. "You must tell her, old man," he whispered, "that I release her unconditionally."

"She will not hear of it," I answered.

And then the day arrived for the coming of the London surgeon. He brought two assistants with him. Guy, Dorothy, and I were present at their interview with the lad.

"Let me understand," said Archie, in weak tones, but bravely; "if I do not choose to submit to this—this operation, it is certain death, isn't it?"

The great man bowed his head.

"What shall I do, Dorothy?" The tones were very tremulous now.

"Oh, Archie!" she sobbed, sinking on her knees by the bed, "submit to it for my sake. It will make no difference. I will care for you as long as I live."

I happened to glance at the giant, Guy, and saw that his bronzed face had turned almost white.

"Well," sighed the patient, softly stroking the bright head of the kneeling girl, "it shall be as you say. Shall we begin, doctor?"

"Not to-night, my boy," answered the surgeon, rather huskily—the man evidently possessed some feeling—"you will need all your strength. To-morrow morning, early——"

He did not finish the sentence, and all but I withdrew, Dorothy weeping silently. I sat and watched my young friend sink into a restless sleep.

I must have dozed myself, for I presently found the moon shining softly through the open window, and with the silvery beams that lighted up the wan face on the pillow in a ghastly way came the eternal scent of roses.

As I leant forward to make sure my patient was asleep, I heard voices from the verandah just beyond the window of the room, which was on the ground floor of the cottage. Presently I heard Guy speaking. There was no mistaking those deep bass tones.

"I do not think," he was saying, "that it is so very vile in me. No man could help loving you, and Heaven knows I would not seek to betray that poor boy in there by so much as a thought. Nor would I wish you to do so. To-morrow I will go away, for I cannot bear it. But before I go you must tell me—there is no harm in that, I think—you love me, do you not?"

I could not hear the response; only a low, passionate sobbing. That placid nature was aroused at last.

"I knew it, dear," went on the deep voice, "I knew it that first night that you looked into my eyes. And it is because I know that you love me that I should wish you to be as you are—strong and faithful and true. I love my brother and—I am an honest man. But when I go I shall leave all my life here with you. Dorothy, dear, good night and—good-bye."

Silence. I could feel the magnetism of the inevitable kiss, just as if I had seen it. I heard a faint rustle of draperies and the tread of vanishing feet. Then I looked at Archie, and my heart stood still.

His eyes were closed, but tears were trickling through the long lashes, and the sensitive mouth quivered. He had heard every word, I had no doubt, and was now trying to feign sleep, obviously for my benefit.

There was a choking in my heart as I rose and left the room. I could not bear it. I looked in once or twice during the night, to find the same thing—tear-stained cheeks and a sham sleep.

When we entered the room in the morning he smiled cheerfully, and extended his hand to the surgeon. "Doctor," he said, briskly, "I've changed my mind. You shan't saw my shins off. I'll take chances. I've that right, haven't I?"

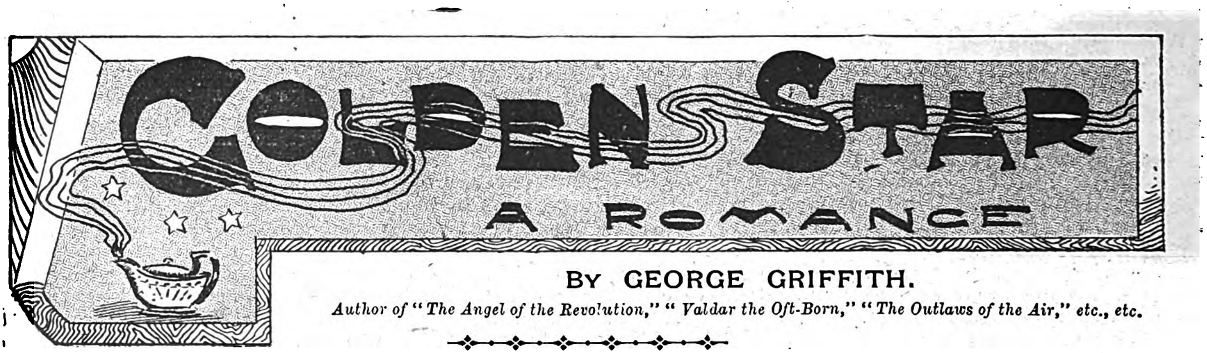
"Certainly, Mr. Trevor," answered the man gravely, "but I warn you that it will be fatal."

Nothing that we could say could shake his determination. His brother Guy, whose great figure seemed to fill the room, joined his pleadings to Dorothy's, but to no avail. When the doctor and his men had gone, he breathed a sigh of relief, and went fast asleep with his hand in Dorothy's.

He died very suddenly ten days afterwards. There was a glorious sunset of crimson and gold, and still that eternal scent of the roses. He rose suddenly from his pillow and looked out over the sea and then sank gently back. Dorothy was by his side in an instant, but he only touched her cheek lightly with his lips and then beckoned to his brother. "Guy—dear old Guy!" he murmured, pulling the great shaggy head down upon his emaciated breast—"kiss me, old chap, and take care of her." That was the end.

And neither of them ever knew.

Mary Bryan.



GOLDEN STAR

A ROMANCE

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

The prologue tells of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, on the eve of the fall of the Inca empire. It has been prophesied that when the sceptre of the Incas shall be grasped by the hand of one who has been dead, and is alive again, the ancient glories of their empire shall be restored. Golden Star, one of the Virgins of the Sun, offers herself as the bride of him who will fulfil the prophecy. Vilcaroya swears for love of her to dare the ordeal. Three hundred years later Professor Martin Lamson brings back to England a mummy which he found in a cave in the Cordilleras of the Peruvian Andes. A doctor, Laurens Djama, is present while he is unpacking it, and undertakes to restore it to animation. The mummy is removed to Djama's laboratory, and in a week he shows the Professor his mummy alive. The Professor learns that he is the Vilcaroya of the legend. He asks for Golden Star, and they tell him that she has been dead for over three hundred years. He promises them that if they will restore her, too, to life he will give them untold treasures. He rapidly regains health and strength, chiefly under the guidance of Ruth, the doctor's sister, and in six months all preparations have been made, and the party, including Ruth, embark for Peru. They meet in Panama a friend of Professor Lamson, Captain Hartness, who joins their party.

CHAPTER VII.

SOUTHWARD.

The voyage of the Imperial from Panama to Mollendo was as lacking in any element of excitement as such voyages always are, saving in times of war or revolution. It so happened that just now the whole coast was quiet from Colombia to Chile, a strange phenomenon which was destined to be the prelude to a battle-storm, compared with which all the wars and revolutions that South America had seen were to seem little more than sanguinary riots. As for those who were to be responsible for the social and political upheaval of a continent, they lived in the meantime their pleasant, easy lives as quietly and as unobtrusively as the most insignificant of the Imperial's passengers.

"Now it's no use frowning and looking black over it, Laurens."

Yet the undercurrent of their existence was not quite so peaceful as its surface, for a very serious question was demanding a speedy settlement one way or the other. Was Captain Hartness to be told the secret of Vilcaroya's past existence and the reason and manner of his return to the world of living things, or was he not? Djama steadily and strenuously insisted that he should not be told, while his sister and the Professor had somehow talked each other into the belief that there could be no harm, and possibly not a little good, in doing so. Ruth had, perhaps, the more decided opinion of the two, though nothing would have been further from the Professor's inclination than to admit that he had been talked into his conviction by a young lady.

Vilcaroya, who, after all, was more deeply concerned than any of them, had but little share in the private discussions which took place every evening in the double cabin which he shared with the Doctor and the Professor. But the night before the steamer entered the Bay of Callao he somewhat astonished them both by quietly but decisively telling them that he wished the English warrior to be his friend and companion, and that therefore if they did not tell him the whole truth, and offer him a share in the expedition, he would do so himself.

"And I," said Ruth, who as usual was present at the conference, "shall tell Captain Hartness that every word of the Inca's story is true as far as we know. Now it's no use frowning and looking black over it, Laurens. As I have said over and over again, Vilcaroya has a perfect right to say who shall or who shall not share this wonderful secret of his, and if Captain Hartness is willing to go with him and help him I don't see that any of us have any right to try and prevent him. Really this prejudice that you seem to have taken against the Captain is much too unreasonable to be worthy of a man of your intellect and perception. I always thought you rather prided yourself on your keenness of perception. What any one can see to object to in Captain Hartness I really can't imagine."

"No, I don't suppose you can," replied her brother with a look and a smile that brought a flash into her eyes and a quick bright flush into her cheeks. "I have always heard that acquaintances ripen very rapidly on board a ship, and I certainly think that we have had a case in point. Let me see, we are seven days out from Panama——"

Ruth's dark slender eyebrows came just the slightest shade closer together and her eyes looked just a trifle brighter than usual, but there was not a trace even of vexation in her voice as she answered:

"My dear Laurens, that is the first attempt at chaff that I have ever heard from those serious lips of yours. I am afraid I can hardly congratulate you on its brilliance, but I am quite prepared to confess that of all the men I have ever met—not very many to be sure—Captain Hartness is quite the manliest and therefore the nicest; and so I for one should be very glad indeed of his company and protection during our journey among the mountains if he only chooses to come."

"Very well," said Djama in his easiest and pleasantest manner, "I see that public opinion is unanimously against me, and so of course I must bow to the decision of the majority. But as for any prejudice against the Captain, I can assure you you are quite wrong, he is a soldier and a gentleman, and I think a man every inch of him. My objection to telling him the story was first the fact that I have told him an entirely different one, and therefore shall look somewhat of a liar in his eyes, secondly that I have thought, rightly or wrongly, that for the present at least it was better to keep this business in as few hands as possible. However, it is decided that we shall tell him, and I have no doubt he will be as discreet as the best of us. Now to make amends for my disagreement, and what I suppose Ruth thinks my unpleasantness, I will go up on deck and find him and bring him in."

He rose from his seat as he spoke and left the cabin. In a few minutes he came back with the captain and said:

"There will be rather a crowd of us in here, and it's pretty hot. Suppose we adjourn to the drawing-room? There's no one there as it happens, and we can get a quiet corner all to ourselves."

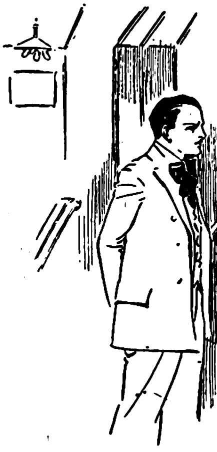
This was agreed to, and when they were settled in the luxurious "social hall" on the promenade deck, Djama told the Captain what they had asked him to come for, and then asked the Professor to tell the story.

Hartness gave no sign of surprise beyond a slight lifting of the eyebrows. All he said was:

"I know that you propose to tell me something of no ordinary importance, and before you begin I should like you to allow me to say that nothing is farther from my thoughts than any desire to trespass, in however slight a degree, in your confidence. At the same time, if I can serve any object of yours or of Señor Vilcaroya's, either in hearing it or afterwards, I shall be happy to do so. Of course, I hope I need hardly say that whatever you tell me will be as sacred as a gentleman can keep it."

"We know that, Hartness," replied the Professor. "If we had not been absolutely sure of it we should not have asked you to hear the story."

The Captain bowed slightly in his seat, and then the Professor began in a low but distinct tone, and told him in terse, matter-of-fact sentences the strange tale of the beginning of Vilcaroya's second life, and after that laid before him in brief outline the object of the expedition to Peru, and the intentions of the Inca should it prove successful.



Left the cabin.

"And now," he said, when he had finished the story, "of course you will see, Hartness, that we have not decided to tell you this without an object. Granted always that you believe what may well appear to you as the wildest romance, do you feel inclined to join us, supposing you can find nothing better to do when you get to Callao?"

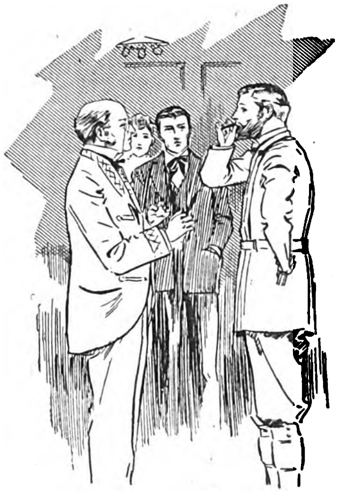
There was silence for a moment or two, and then Hartness looked up and saw Ruth's eyes turned on him with an expression that he had never seen in them before.

"As for believing your story, my dear Lamson," he said very quietly, "I may say that I have guessed a good deal of it since we left Panama, and so I am ready to believe the rest. With regard to your proposal, I accept it without a moment's hesitation, and if the ship was met with a deputation in Callao to-morrow offering me the presidency of Peru, with all the plunder appertaining thereto, I should respectfully decline to stay, so that's settled. Now, if I may make a suggestion, we'd better not prolong this conversation here, for someone may come in any minute. I propose that we adjourn to the saloon and drink a bottle of Irroy to the success of the expedition, and the health of his Imperial Majesty, Vilcaroya the First."

Four days later the party landed on the wretched mole at Mollendo, and the next morning took the train to Arequipa.

A great mental change had now apparently come over Vilcaroya, nor was the cause of it very far to seek. Day after day on the southward voyage he had walked alone up and down the promenade-deck, or stood gazing rapt in thought at the desert foreshore along which the steamer was running, and at the colossal masses of the dark brown, barren mountains, as they towered, range beyond range, till they overtopped the clouds themselves, and stood serene and sharply outlined against the blue background of the upper sky.

Behind those mighty ramparts lay the well-loved, well-remembered land over which his fathers had ruled in the good days before the stranger and the oppressor had come. On the other side of them he would find, as he too well knew, only the poor fragments of the great cities and stately pleasure-houses that he had known in all their pride and beauty—only the silent and deserted ruins of the mighty fortresses which had guarded the confines of the Inca empire from the incursions of the wild tribes which surrounded it, and furnished portals through which the armies of the Children of the Sun had marched to unvarying conquest. He had thought of the broad green level plain of Cajamarca surrounded by its guardian ramparts of terraced hills; of the long verdant valley of Cuzco, with its hundred towns and villages nestling amidst the foliage that shaded their streets and squares, and looking out over the green fields of the valley and the innumerable tiers of terraces that rose green and gold with maize, or glowing with flowers to the summits of the hills, and of that earthly paradise of Yucay wherein the Gardens of the Sun, the golden shrines of his lost religion, and the wondrous pleasure-palaces of many generations of Incas glowed in their almost unearthly beauty, embosomed in green, and gold, and scarlet in the midst of inaccessible mountains which themselves were overtopped by the mighty peaks of eternal snow that he had seen glimmering white and ghostly in the moonlight like guardian spirits around an enchanted realm on many a night of delicious revelry now far past and lost in the swift flood of years that had rolled by since then.



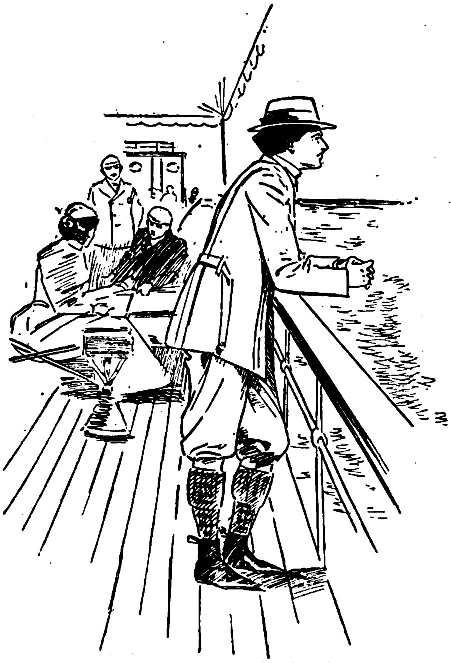
"Do you feel inclined to join us?"

It was to the poor remnants of all these glories that he was now returning to find the habitation of his ancestors laid waste, and the descendants of his people the slaves of strangers. The change which it had taken centuries to accomplish would be to him but the transformation of a day and a night and a morning. He had seen the last day of the Inca empire; he had fallen asleep, and he had awakened, and now, on the morrow of his sleep, he was coming back to the ruins which the slow pitiless work of the years and centuries had left behind it.

But no sooner did his feet tread the soil that had once been sacred to his father and deity the Sun, and his lips breathe the same air that they had breathed in his other life, than he remembered the ancient prophecy to whose fulfilment he had devoted himself, even to death, and how in him and this new life of his one part at least of that prophecy had already come to pass—and if one part, and that not the least, why not the rest? Far away beyond those towering tiers of mountains lay Golden Star in the resting-place to which she had been borne with him, sleeping soundly in the impassive embrace of their mighty arms.

And within the safe keeping of those arms there lay, too, that uncounted treasure, that vast legacy which the departed leaders of his people had bequeathed to him for the sacred purpose of restoring those glories which all men save himself now believed to be but a dream of the distant past, that incomparable inheritance of which he was the sole heir on earth, and which he had come to share with Golden Star on the restored throne of the great Huayni-Capac.

As he thought of all this the blood that had been so long stagnant during his magical death-sleep pulsed like living fire through his veins. His new life, with all its marvels, became glorified into a waking vision of new conquests and re-won empire. The past was a dream both sweet and bitter in its vivid memories, but still a dream that had been dreamt and was done with. The present and the future were realities, golden and glorious with a hope justified by the miracle that had made them possible. He had learned enough of the new age in which he had awakened to know that that lust of gold which had brought the conqueror and the oppressor into the land of the Children of the Sun burnt every whit as fiercely in the hearts of the men who were living in his new world, and that lust should now work for him and for the redemption of his people, and so that which had been their ruin should yet prove their salvation.



Stood gazing rapt in thought.

Thus through the long sunny days and starlit nights Vilcaroya, last of the Incas, had mused and dreamed, and now he was once more in the Land of the Four Regions, hale and strong and burning with the divine ardour of his sacred mission, ready to dare and do all things and to use unsparingly the tremendous power that would soon be in his hands to fulfil his oath and Golden Star's, and accomplish the work that he had come through the grave and gate of death to do.

End of Book I.

BOOK II.

For Love and Gold.

[With the landing of Vilcaroya and his strangely-acquired friends in Peru the diary of Professor Lawson, to which I am indebted for all the facts and most of the suggestions in the foregoing Book, suddenly and quite unaccountably breaks off, or perhaps I should rather say, expands into a mass of notes, archæological and geographical, unconnected by the slightest thread of narrative. Probably the learned Professor lost interest in the human element of his surroundings when he found himself once more on his favourite field of research; possibly, too, his near approach to what he doubtless believed would be illimitable wealth had by this time killed his interest in the wonderful destiny of the man whom his friend had, as it were, brought from the sixteenth into the nineteenth century. Happily, however, so far from the after-history of the Inca Vilcaroya being lost, it comes to us from the best and most interesting of all sources—his own hand. The manuscript, of which the following chapters are a translation, is written in his own Quichua tongue, and has been rendered into English for me, with such alterations of arrangement and expression as have been found necessary, by my learned friend, Professor Adolf Bandalier, of Lima.]

CHAPTER VIII.

The Inca's Oath.

As the time passes between dreaming and waking, so for me did the long years pass, flowing like a smooth and silent stream seen from afar, out of the darkness that fell so slowly and so sweetly over my eyes that night when I sank into the death-trance beside Golden Star, my beloved, in the bridal chamber that they made for us in the Temple of the Sun, into the light that shone into them when they opened upon a scene so different, and saw a white, haggard face bending over me, and two black, burning eyes looking into them. Then I closed them again and slept, and when I woke again there were two faces looking at me, both white and full of fear and wonder, and I saw two beings who seemed very strange to me, such as I had never seen among the Children of the Sun, standing by the couch on which I lay, and one of them fell down as though sore stricken, and I tried to think what this could mean, and thinking fell asleep again.

Then I dreamt a long sweet dream of the days that I now know were far past, when I, Vilcaroya, son of the great Huayni-Capac, lived in the Land of the Four Regions, a prince among princes, a warrior and a child of the sacred race whose blood had flowed unmixed through many generations from the divine fountain of life and light, our father the Sun. I dreamt of Golden Star, and the days when I loved her in timid silence, for she was the fairest of all our race, and so, as it seemed to me, destined to no less a lot than the motherhood of a long line of Incas, in whom should live, and grow to ever greater splendour, the glories of the race that owned no earthly origin.

I called to her in my dream, but she made no answer. I saw her lying by my side in that well-remembered chamber with the shadowy forms of the priests standing about us as I had seen them long before; but, alas, she lay still with closed eyes and lips that seemed to have forgotten how sweetly they once could smile. I whispered her name, mingled with many a loving word, into her ear, and still she moved not. I put my arms about her, and kissed her, and instantly I shrank back, shivering with a fear unspeakable for the form that should have been so warm and soft and yielding was chilled and pulseless, and rigid, as though some foul magic had changed it into stone, and the lips that should have given me back kiss for kiss were still, and cold, and senseless.

Then I saw, as it seemed with half-closed eyes, that dear shape of hers being borne away from me, while I, longing to snatch her from the hands of those who were robbing me of her, yet lay helpless on the couch without strength to move or speak until all grew dim around me, and I felt myself raised by invisible hands, and borne far away through the darkness, and so my dream melted away into the night of sleep.

Then, yet again, I woke and saw the two strange men that I had seen before, and one came and spoke to me kindly in my own tongue, and called me by my own name, and gave me food and drink, and told me in few, but to me terrible words that the dreams I had dreamed were dreams indeed—dreams of a time that was long past, of things that had passed away, perchance for ever, and men and women whose names were only memories.

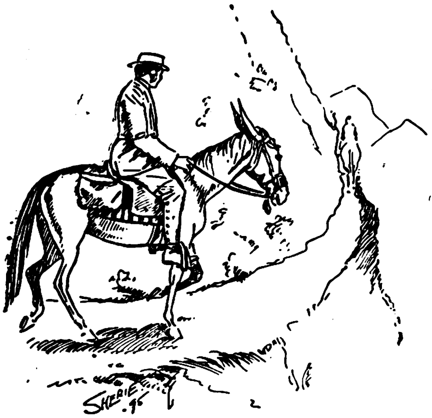
Thus did I come from the evening of one age into the morning of another, falling asleep in the prime of my strength and manhood, and waking again even as I had fallen asleep—though those who had closed my eyes had been dead for many generations, and the name of our ancient race was but a bitter memory to the sons and daughters of my own land amidst the mountains.

Then I went forth into the wondrous new world into which I had awakened, the world which you who read this hold so common, and which I found crowded with wonders so many and marvellous that if it had not been for the loving care of her who guided my first footsteps on my new journey, as she might have guided those of a little child, my re-awakening reason must soon have been quenched in the night of madness.*

So I came back to the shores of that well-loved land of mine which, by the reckoning of the new times into which I had come, had been for more than three hundred years the sport and prey of the generations of strangers and oppressors who had followed those first conquerors of the Children of the Sun, whose coming had sounded the hour of doom and ruin through the length and breadth of that glorious land of green plains and verdant valleys, of terraced hills and towering mountains, which had once been our empire and our home.

From the mean coast town of wooden houses where the railway begins we travelled ever upward over great grey sloping deserts and by rugged ravines with steep, broken walls of red earth and ragged rock, through range after range of mountains, that were all strange and hateful to me until we swung round the shoulder of a great crag-crowned mountain, and I saw across a vast plain, into which range after range of lesser hills sloped down, the crystal peaks of the snow mountains towering far beyond the clouds into the blue sky above them.

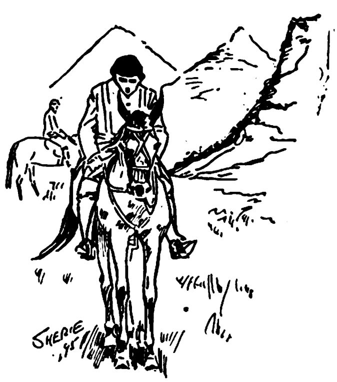
Then I knew that I was coming nearer to the land that had once been mine, and ere many hours had passed we stopped in a great city which still bore its old name of Arequipa, the Place of Rest, which my own ancestors had given to it. It was no longer the place of palaces and pleasure-houses, of flowery gardens and leafy woods that I had seen it, but above it still gleamed the white snowfields and shining peaks of Chanchani and Pichu-Pichu, and between the two great white ranges still towered the vast black snow-crowned cone of Misti, the smoke-mountain, rising sheer in its lonely grandeur twelve thousand feet above the sloping plain on which the city lay.



We journeyed on by road.

As I looked at it again for the first time after so many years I asked the Professor, as we all called him, if since I had been asleep the mountain had been rent asunder again as it had been in the olden times long before the Spaniards came to seek gold and blood in the Land of the Four Regions. He was very learned in such matters, even as Djama, his friend, who had awakened me from my long slumber, was learned in secrets of life and death, and when he told me that the fires within it had slept for more years than men could remember, I was glad—yet I said nothing of my inward joy, for had I told him all that I knew about the valley of black sand and yellow rock that was hidden behind the far-off wall of snow, that shone so whitely against the blue of the midway heaven, it might have been many a long day before we had again set out on our journey towards the place that was the goal at once of my hopes and fears.

We stayed seven days in Arequipa, making our last preparations for the work that lay before us, and then we went on again by train to Sicuani, in the valley of the Vilcanota. Then from Sicuani we journeyed on by road, riding on mules through a land that was lovely even in my eyes, though its loveliness was to me only the beauty of ruin and decay, for this was the heart and centre of that vanished empire whose glories no living eyes but mine had ever seen.



I bowed my bared head towards it.

I saw wildernesses where there had been gardens, and gaunt treeless mountains lying bare to the glare of the sun. Lakes that had shone encircled with gardens now spread out dull and stagnant over the neglected fields. A few ragged fragments of grey clay walls still rose from the green plain of Cacha, where I had last seen in all its glory of gold and rainbow colours the holy Temple of Viracocha; the great guardian fortress of Piquillacta, which I had seen stretching its impregnable length and rearing its unscaleable height from mountain to mountain, across the entrance to the once lovely valley of Cuzco, lay a huge ragged mass of towering ruins, splendid even in decay.

As we passed through the one half-choked portal that still lay open, I thought with heavy heart and bowed down head of the great fortress as I had seen it in the glory of its pride and strength, of the gallant warriors that had defended it, and the gay processions that I had seen winding in and out of its stately gates, making its hoary walls ring with songs and laughter, and, farther on, as we rode along the valley on that sad and yet eager three days' march of ours, I saw on the hill-spurs about me the black and ragged ruins of the fair cities and stately temples and palaces that I had seen crowded with happy throngs, bright with gold and colours, and so fair and strong that no man could have dreamed of the ruin the oppressor had brought upon them.

And so, journeying amidst all these sad memories through a land which, for me, was peopled with the ghosts of my long-dead friends and kindred, we came out at length on the broad, green Plain of the Oracle, and there before me, still nestling under her guardian hills, lay, glimmering white and grey under the slanting sun-rays, all that was left of the mighty city that had once been Cuzco, the City of the Sun and the home of His children, and as I raised my eyes and gazed upon it through the rising mist of my tears, I bowed my bared head towards it and swore in the sadness and silence of my desolate heart that, to the full extent of the power which I believed was soon to be mine, I would take life for life and blood for blood, and I would give sorrow for sorrow and shame for shame until I had paid to the full the debt which the long years of plunder and cruelty and oppression had heaped up against those who from generation to generation had brought this shame and ruin on the once bright home of the Children of the Sun.

(To be continued.)

---

* Several pages of the original MS., descriptive of scenes and characters already familiar to the reader, are omitted here.

A CURE FOR NEGLECT.

SHE was sobbing bitterly. He was frowning wickedly. They had been married six months.

He had married her because he had fallen in love with her piquant brunette beauty. She had married him because she liked him as well as she liked any of her half-a-dozen suitors.

He was very fond of her still. But he was tired of her constant companionship, so tired of unintermittent conjugal felicity and constantly expressed affection that he almost fancied himself tired of her—of her, the pretty, dainty girl who lay—in the agony of her wifehood's first grief—lay with her silken head buried in the velvet cushions of her boudoir lounge.

She, on the other hand, had fallen in love with her husband. She had grown fond of him in the ardent days of courtship that had preceded the wedding. The warmer ardour of the first honeymoon days had kindled a spark of passionate love that had lain dormant in the girl's heart through two London seasons. The spark fell upon the quickened oil of young wifehood, and a great flame grew—a flame that inwrapped all her being; and this unexpected, burning, eager love had grown and grown with every hour of her wifehood.

Fred had been intensely pleased at first when he saw the big love grow up in his wife's heart. He had had grave misgivings once or twice before their marriage. He knew that Mabel had flirted sadly with Hylard and with other men. He had felt "a cold faint fear" that his preferable bank account had had something to do with her preference for him; but he had put the thought behind him as a man imprudently will when he is in love. Nevertheless it had been an inexpressible relief to learn that of a certainty his wife loved him—loved him with a love that absorbed every thought of her mind, every pulse of her heart.

The first intoxication of love gratified had passed away, and left him temporarily disinclined for further draughts of the sweet liquid.

He wanted a change for a time, and he was going away—going to shoot with some men in Scotland. And Mabel's heart was broken, or she thought it was, which hurts quite as much while it lasts.

"Mabel, dear, do be reasonable," he said, "I'm only going away for two weeks."

"If you loved me you wouldn't go at all."

Duncan groaned. He was face to face with one of the great difficulties of a man's life—the difficulty of teaching a woman that the love which is her "whole existence," is of man's "but a part"—of teaching her this without hurting her—of teaching her that this great sexual difference is a righteous, affectional dispensation.

"It's only a stag party," he began. The girl sprang to her feet, and her flashing black eyes were so beautiful that he felt half inclined to throw over the hunting party and stay with her.

"Only a stag party!" she cried; "I should hope so! If you were going without me to a place where there were other women, I'd kill you!"

He caught his pretty wife in his arms. He was going away in five minutes. He could stand a bit more love-making. He almost felt inclined for it.

"Mrs. Othello! Mrs. Othello!" he whispered, lifting the lovely tear-stained face to his. "My jealous darling! Now, for my part, I'm as trustful as Desdemona. I want you to have the best possible time while I'm away. Accept all your invitations. Spend heaps of money—you haven't bought a new frock since we've been married, have you? Don't you be dull, girly, because I've gone for a two weeks' shoot at the beginning of the season. Go everywhere; see everything. I'm sure Hylard will be delighted to play escort to you anywhere. You see, I'm not jealous. And I haven't forgotten how keen Hylard was to marry you."

Mabel drew back indignantly. Then she did what every woman does when it comes to an issue between her and the man she loves. She yielded—as Cleopatra yielded when Antony left her at the bidding of Cæsar. She threw her arms about Duncan's neck and kissed him.

"I hope you'll have a lovely time, Fred, darling," she said. "And, oh!" with a half-controlled sob, "remember every moment you're away that Mabel loves you—Mabel loves you."

* * * * *

Duncan stayed in Scotland three weeks instead of two. Then a great sudden longing to see his wife caused him to catch the first train for London.

When he entered his own hall the first thing he saw was a wonderful opera cloak that lay across the table. Then Mabel came out of the drawing-room door. Mabel, in a marvellous yellow dress, all satin and chiffon. The great Duncan diamonds flashed from every conceivable part of her person. Her bridal pearls were twisted carelessly in her hair. They were half hidden by a great jewelled butterfly.

"You!" she cried. "I'm afraid the dinner is all cold. But you can tell them to get you something quickly. I'm going out. I've three receptions and a ball. Don't sit up. Lord Hylard will see me home. Don't crush my flowers," she added, almost avoiding his kiss. She held up a magnificent bouquet. "Wasn't it nice of Lord Hylard to send me such a beauty? Did you have a good time, dear? Isn't my gown incomparable? I hope you won't be cross when you see the bill! The carriage? Yes, Binks, I'm coming."

She handed Duncan her long, elaborate wrap, and he helped her into it in a dazed way. "Binks, see that your master has something to eat," she said carelessly, and passed out.

That was three years ago. Duncan is a little laughed at now for clinging so closely to his wife's side. She, on the contrary, is very gay, and just the least neglectful of him. Often she stays his kisses with the cry "Don't crush my gown." He longs bitterly for the lavish girlish love he once spurned. Often in the night, when he sleeps, she lifts the yellow curls, and lays her sweet lips with passionate kisses on his forehead.

Is she foolish to hide part of her love from him? No; she is wise. If he knew how much she loved him he would love her less.

Is she unjust? No. He spurned the absorbing love he had voluntarily created. He deserves a life-long punishment. Is the man less guilty who breeds in a woman's heart a great love, and then neglects to feed it with kind words and loving acts? No; not a whit.

E. C. WAGGENER.

A CLEVER CAPTURE

To capture a slaver had, at one period of his life, been the great idea and dream of ambition in the breast of Commander Warner. But that was many years ago when he had for the first time donned Her Majesty's uniform as a midshipman in the essentially maritime town of Portsmouth. Time had gone on and he had steadily worked his way upwards, and now, at length, the object of his youthful desire was actually within his reach—chances of accomplishing it, moreover, were well within the bounds of possibility, seeing that he had recently been appointed to the command of a small armed cruiser whose destination was a coast where the authorities had reason to believe an illicit trade was being carried on in the way of slave dealing. His orders were to cruise in certain waters, and, if possible, intercept one or other of the suspected vessels.

In these piping times of peace, there is not so much chance for earning prize money in H.M. Navy as was the case formerly, and the prospect of "making a bit" was no less alluring, probably, to the officers than to the crew of the Lapwing, so that it is not to be wondered at that all through the outward passage the feeling on board the cruiser was one of pleasant expectation, and that a general alacrity to obey orders with willingness and despatch was more than usually apparent.

Once arrived in the blazing atmosphere of the tropics, however, things became different. For the first few days the anticipation that any day a suspicious craft might come in sight served to stimulate the spirits of all on board, but after a while, during which nothing eventful had occurred, a general feeling of listlessness prevailed. Well it might, seeing the excessive heat existing, and when not on duty the crew were quite content to do their best to keep themselves from bodily melting away without troubling much about anything else.

One day, however, a shout from the masthead of "Sail ho!" effectually dispelled the existing feeling of lethargy, and the Captain, who had gone below in the hopes of finding his cabin cooler than the deck, hastily appeared.

"Where away?"

"A couple of points on the port bow, sir."

"What do you make of her, Mr. Graves?" was the Captain's anxious inquiry of the first lieutenant, who, glass in hand, had been carefully scanning the stranger ever since she had been sighted, until, the wind being light, and the Lapwing's engineer having, in compliance with the Captain's order, gone ahead full steam, the distance between the stranger—a long three-masted schooner, with tall raking masts and lying low in the water—and H.M. cruiser had been sensibly diminished, and the two vessels were now within range of each other.

"She is a flyer, sir, I'm thinking, and if she can only get a bit of breeze she will as likely as not get away from us yet."

"She shan't sheer off without disclosing her name and nationality," replied the Captain, with a look of determination about his lips which did not betoken too favourably as to the schooner's reception.

"Mr. Johnson," to an officer standing by.

"Yes, sir?"

"Give the order to fire a blank cartridge, and signal to her to give her name and nationality."

"Aye, aye, sir."

In another instant the sullen boom of the gun rang out over the water, and almost immediately the schooner hoisted the American colours.

"She is bearing away, sir," was the report of a warrant officer, saluting as he spoke.

"The deuce she is; that game won't pay, I can tell her.

"Reload your gun, Mr. Johnson, and put a shot in. Signal again for her name, colours won't do for me."

The order was obeyed, but elicited no response.

"Fire a shot—well in front of her bows."

Again the boom of the gun rang out, but there was a distinct difference in the sound; instead of a loud report only, as before, the second discharge was accompanied with an ominous growl, as if to say: "Now, then, no nonsense, you know."

The effect was little short of magical. There was a hurrying and scurrying on the schooner's deck; first one flag was run up, then another, until when the signal was completed those on the cruiser could make out that together they denoted a name the Black Swan.

"H'm, a mighty suggestive title. Just look up the U.S. Merchant Registry, Mr. Graves."

"No such name here, sir," was the answer, in an excited tone.

"Very well, then—signal to her to heave to, lower a boat, and take half-a-dozen men with you, Mr. Graves, board her, show your authority, and demand to inspect her papers. If they are in order make the best excuse you can, and return at once; but keep your eyes about you and note anything which seems suspicious—above all be circumspect whatever you do; I don't want a wigging from the Admiralty."

"Aye, aye, sir;" and in less than a minute one of the cruiser's boats manned with the officer and six men had been lowered, and the crew, bending to their work with a will, were soon alongside the schooner.

With the eye of a practised seaman Lieutenant Graves took in all that was noticeable about her at a glance, and in addition to noting that she was unmistakably a fast sailer, there was a generally rakish look about her that did not inspire his confidence.

He was received politely by an easy-going individual, clad in light nautical costume and speaking with a strong American accent.

"Guess yonder boat is a Britisher."

"She is H.M. cruiser Lapwing, and I have come on board to see your papers, if you please."

"Certainly, there there are," and he handed them over. They appeared to be in order, and the Lieutenant thought it well to be cautious.

"What's your cargo, may I ask?"

"Dry goods generally."

"I couldn't find any Black Swan in the Registry."

"Couldn't ye, now. Wal, you see, this here is a new craft, and we, not long bein' in command, haven't had time to christen her properly yet, but there's a bit of wind coming up, I guess, and I've been here about long enough, so if you're satisfied p'raps you'll go back the way you came."

"But I'm not satisfied."

"Is that so, Mister?"

"Yes, it is," replied the Lieutenant, exasperated by the other's slow, aggravating manner. "I want to have a look at your cargo, so kindly give orders to knock the hatches off."

"I guess I'll do nothing of the sort, Mister. I don't know what right you have to come aboard a United States merchantman and demand to inspect the cargo as if I was a tarnation slaver, and I can tell ye there'll be more heard of this before I've done. I shall report the whole circumstance, and the quicker you take boat the better."

In face of this, practically speaking, command, the Lieutenant had no alternative but to obey, and in a short space of time had regained the deck of the Lapwing.

"What's your news?"

The Lieutenant detailed what had occurred, and wound up by saying: "I am convinced, in my own mind, she is a slaver, sir."

"But you say her papers were in order."

"Apparently, sir."

"Then I can do nothing, I am afraid. Did you notice which course she was taking?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very well, then, lay our head in the same direction. We may come up with her again in the morning. There's only a light wind, and she can't get away far in the night."

There was considerable discussion amongst the crew, before turning in for the night, as to the probabilities of ever seeing the Black Swan again, and the interest was intensified by one of the boat's crew stating most positively that the schooner had at some time borne a name on her stern, and that it had evidently been painted out early in the morning. All doubts that might have existed as to again viewing the schooner were dispelled, as there, right ahead of the cruiser, lay the Black Swan, and the wind having died away, she was practically becalmed.

The Captain hastily came on deck on hearing the welcome news, and at once ordered the engineer to go full steam ahead.

"Signal to her to heave to, Mr. Graves, and if she doesn't, fire a shot across her bows."

There was no need, as it happened, to resort to any such drastic measures, the schooner, in response to the signal, coming head to wind at once and remaining stationary, presumably divining the Captain's intention and thus notifying her skipper's willingness to receive a second visit from the Lapwing.

"Ha! that's sensible, now; the fellow knows he has no chance of getting away in this light breeze, and is going to make the best of a bad job and surrender. Give orders to lower the pinnace, Mr. Graves, and take a full boat's complement, well armed; you never know in these cases; that chap may make a fight of it, after all."

On boarding the schooner the second time, the Lieutenant's reception was altogether different to what it had been before—a younger man than he had seen on the last occasion deferentially awaited his arrival on the deck, and announced himself as in temporary command, the skipper, he explained, being below.

"I mean having your hatches off this time," was the Lieutenant's opening remark.

"I beg your pardon, but I am not accustomed to be spoken to in this way."

"Well, whether you are or not, that's nothing to do with me. I demand the removal of those hatches, and here's my authority; are you going to let your crew remove them or must I summon my men to do so for you?"

"I shall certainly not comply with such an unreasonable request. You can do what you like," turning on his heel as he spoke.

Five or six of the schooner's crew had in the meantime gathered round, and the Lieutenant hesitated for a moment, mindful of the caution his commander had given him—"don't do anything rash, whatever you do," but his blood was up, and, leaning over the ship's side, he gave the order for a score of his men to come aboard.

Needless to say the order was obeyed with alacrity.

"Now, my lads, off with those hatches."

Two score of strong hands obeyed the mandate willingly enough. No sooner had the first hatch been removed than the sickening effluvia which ascended was enough to proclaim the truth. Several hundred slaves were stowed away as closely as herrings in a barrel.

"Now, sir," with a tone of exultation, "perhaps you will admit my suspicions were not unfounded?"

The young officer made no direct reply.

"It is, I believe, sir, the custom of your country to treat prisoners of war with humanity. I and my crew are in your hands. All I ask is that we be not subjected to the indignity of being put under restraint until, at all events, we reach the nearest port, to which I presume it is your intention to convey us. And I would esteem it a particular favour if you would allow us to remain on board our own vessel. Our crew is only a small one—twelve all told—and you can easily spare a sufficient number of men from your vessel to navigate this schooner, and," with a smile, "act as guard over us."

The Lieutenant was an officer and an English gentleman to boot, and was not disposed to crow over a vanquished foe.

"The disposition of the schooner's crew, sir, is a matter for my commander to settle, but I will represent your wishes to him."

To signal the fact of the capture to the Lapwing did not occupy long, and so near were the vessels to each other that the ringing cheer which went up from the excited crew still remaining on the cruiser could be plainly heard, and was heartily responded to by their elated companions on the schooner.

"I congratulate you most heartily, Mr. Graves, on the way in which you have carried this matter through; how many men will you want, do you think, to work the schooner into port, and leave a sufficient number to be responsible for the crew?"

"I was thinking, sir, that, subject to your approval, the better plan would be to take her in tow. We have a good supply of coal left, and, the wind being so variable, we may be some days making the nearest port."

"An admirable suggestion on your part. Yes, that will be by far the best, and then it will only be necessary to put a guard on board."

Shortly after the schooner, with her living cargo, was being towed astern the Lapwing, and in the course of less than a week had been triumphantly taken into port. The advent of the two vessels was, as might have been expected, the cause of considerable excitement; but the climax arrived when the U.S. maritime representative boarded the Lapwing, and cordially thanked her commander for having assisted the officers and men of the U.S. man-of-war Warspite to bring their prize into port.

The whole mystery was cleared up by the appearance soon afterwards of the easy-going individual whom Lieutenant Graves had seen on the first occasion, no longer attired in loose, easy-fitting flannels, but in all the resplendency of a U.S. naval uniform.

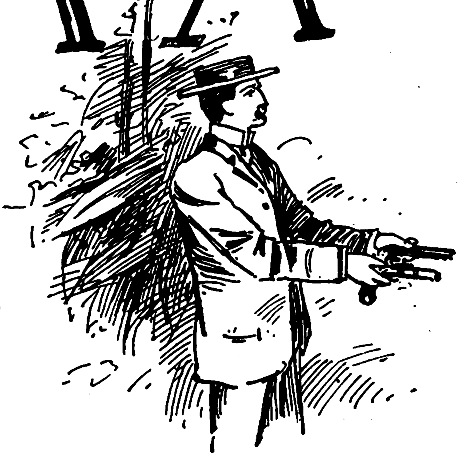
"Guess you're considerable smart, Mr. Graves, but you didn't ask me who I was when you came aboard the first time; otherwise, I might have saved you a lot of trouble, and told you how my boat, the Warspite, like yourselves, on the look-out for slavers, fell in with the Black Swan, when the Captain sent an officer aboard, your humble servant, in fact, just as yours did subsequently, and finding out what her cargo was, I obtained permission to transfer her crew aboard our own ship, and put 'em in irons. The Captain then assigned me a dozen of our own men to work her into port here, which you've kindly done for us. When you hailed us first, I guessed what was up, and we rigged ourselves up in some old clothes belonging to the original Captain and crew of the slaver. I was bound to make a bit of a pretence about not allowing you to uncover the hatches just for the fun of the thing, you know, thinking what a joke it would be to explain after, and if you had not insisted so peremptorily as you did, I meant, after a little palaver, to have given in as my first officer did later on. We guessed you'd follow us up; still, all's well that ends well; and if we can do you a similar turn some day, I shall be only too pleased. Slave-catching's a funny game, I guess."

"But what about the name being painted out?"

"Oh, yes; the slaver chap did that, not us; why should we?"

What Commander Warner said, sotto voce, had better be omitted. S. J. F. Newbery.

AN ARRANT COWARD



Ceylon is a country where matrimonial relations are apt to get a trifle strained. The usual opinion is that the climate is mostly at fault. So it was generally assumed by a society which could not afford to throw many stones indiscriminately, that the climate was to blame for the trouble between the Dexters.

It appears, according to experts, that a good deal depends on seasoning. The first two or three years are the trying ones. After that the matrimonial cart may be expected to go smoothly. That is why some men marry daughters of the land, or girls born on the island, in preference to importing wives from home. The unmarried man is wise in his generation, and tries to avoid running risks.

But Dexter had been foolish enough to become engaged to a girl at home, and in due course he married her. This interesting event happened at the end of his six months' leave, and he came back with his bride and set her down in the midst of his plantation, just as he would have brought a new kind of shrub and expect it to grow naturally in its new surroundings.

He was a reserved, passionless sort of man, who had never wasted much thought on the other sex, and it really did not occur to him that he was engaged in a risky experiment. He knew something, and had heard more, of what was going on round him. But it did not come within the range of his ideas that his wife should follow the example of other men's wives.

Mrs. Dexter was a very attractive little body, as was speedily discovered. At first she was rather taken aback by the novelty of her position, and was shy with her husband's old friends. As for the women-folk, she was not long in taking their measure and putting them on a proper footing. But with the male portion of society she was not so exacting or discriminating.

Anyhow, as time went on, the Dexters' house became a gathering place for several men, but very few women. Dexter himself did not seem to notice the distinction. All he noticed was that his wife kept up her spirits well after the first inevitable home sickness, and that she never complained of feeling lonely. He was not a very observant man.

If Mrs. Dexter had been wise, she would have taken care to divide her attentions. There is safety in numbers, and she really meant no harm. But she was young and inexperienced, and the man was neither. This happened about six months after the arrival of the little woman, and at a time when, as luck would have it, Dexter was more than usually busy.

The man had contrived to clear the field of rivals. He was not a particularly nice sort, though he was on such good terms with Mrs. Dexter. As regards reputation, he was one of the best hated men in the district—by husbands. And the strange thing was that he was not a good-looking man. On the contrary, he was rather ugly. Perhaps it was his swagger and bounce that proved irresistible.

It became a matter of course for him to be in constant attendance on Mrs. Dexter. Not a day passed that they did not spend almost entirely together, walking, riding, or driving. The people in the neighbourhood looked on with interest. They expected a repetition of the old story. And in the nature of things it happened that the husband was the only person ignorant of the threatening tragedy.

One day, however, Dexter was suddenly brought to his senses by a chance remark. It was not intended for his ears, but he heard it, and it went home. He followed its example, and having arrived at his own house, sat on the verandah and considered the situation for an hour and a half. At the end of that time he inquired for his wife. She was out, as usual, with the man; and the servant who answered his question seemed to treat the event as in the usual order of things.

Dexter did not try to obtain any more information. He simply went to his room and changed his clothes, rummaging about as if in search of something. Then he came out, looking quite cheerful, lighted a cheroot, and asked which way Mrs. Dexter had gone. Having learned this, he walked briskly in the direction indicated.

In the meantime Mrs. Dexter and the man were sitting together in a favourite dell, about half a mile away. She was rapidly approaching the stage where folly ends and guilt begins. Whether she would ever actually have transgressed is a delicate point. She had resisted the voice of the tempter successfully so far, greatly to the tempter's chagrin.

They had, in fact, reached a positive difficulty. He was getting rather angry, and she was not exactly happy, so that it was something of a relief to both of them to hear some one approaching. They neither of them expected Dexter. He was supposed to be some miles away, shooting.

Unfortunately, their calculations were wrong, for it happened to be Dexter who disturbed their solitude. He knew his way well, and came straight into the opening, to find them sitting side by side on a fallen tree; and when he saw them he stopped for a moment and looked at them, a grim smile on his face.

They both saw him at the same instant. The man jumped up hastily. As for Mrs. Dexter, she uttered a slight scream. The husband was the coolest of the three.

He walked up to them slowly, with the smile gradually effacing itself. The man was far from happy. He saw danger in the pale face and steady eyes, and under his swagger he was, like most of his class, as arrant a coward as ever walked.

Mrs. Dexter simply sat still where she was, her eyes glancing alternately from the man to her husband and back again. After her first exclamation she did not utter a syllable.

Dexter did not waste many words.

"You confounded blackguard," he said.

The man had expected something more violent. Then, cur-like, he began to pluck up courage. He even began to swagger a little, as usual, and stood up straighter. But Mrs. Dexter, who was watching him closely, noticed that his hand trembled as he curled his moustache.

"I have been thinking the matter over," Dexter continued, "and it seems to me that one or other of us is superfluous. I can only see the one way to settle the difficulty. Here we have a fine, open spot, well lighted, and in every way desirable. We have also a couple of weapons, and, in addition, a lady to give the signal."

As he spoke, he produced from his coat pockets a brace of revolvers. "They are exactly similar and both are loaded. Pray examine them and make your choice. Then we will agree to a distance and begin."

He grasped both pistols and held them out to his opponent, looking him keenly in the face the while. Mrs. Dexter had risen and walked up to them. Husband and wife kept their eyes fixed on the man's face.

But the man did not offer to take the revolvers into his hand. His swagger had gone. His cheeks shook like a jelly fresh from the mould, his lips worked convulsively, and his hands quivered. As Dexter moved nearer to him, he drew back, shrinking from the outstretched pistols.

And Dexter smiled.

Mrs. Dexter did not smile. Her face suddenly became crimson. Then, with an irresistible impulse, she clenched her fist and struck the man smartly across the mouth.

"Coward!" she exclaimed.

The word seemed to cut him like a knife. He staggered back a pace or two, gazed blankly from one to the other, and then fled.

They listened to his retreating footsteps without speaking. Then Dexter quietly put the revolvers back into his pockets, and turned on his heels to go home.

As he did so, he looked back over his shoulder to where his wife stood, with her face buried in her hands.

"Is there any reason why you should not come with me?" he asked.

She lifted her head, and for a moment her eyes flashed with indignation, and her face became red with sudden anger. Then, as quickly, she subdued the feeling.

"You have the right to ask," she answered humbly. "No, there is no reason."

And then he put his arm round her, and they went home together.

G. F. B.

A WAXEN HEAD.

A Study of Madness.

YES, I killed him.

But why? you ask. Ah, that is the question. The judge, the lawyers, and the jury cannot tell. They have ascribed all manner of motives to me. They have said that I was brutal and cold-blooded from my birth—a moral monster. Wrong—I am gentle almost to timidity. They have said that there was a woman in the case. Wrong—I scarcely knew the man, and knew no woman whom he knew. My advocate has said that I am mad, and that the waxen head reminded me of some woman whom I had loved. Wrong—I never loved but one, and she was dark.

The head, you will notice, is that of a blonde.

Yes, I killed him, and for what you will think a trifle—because he refused to remove a waxen image from the window of his hair-dressing shop.

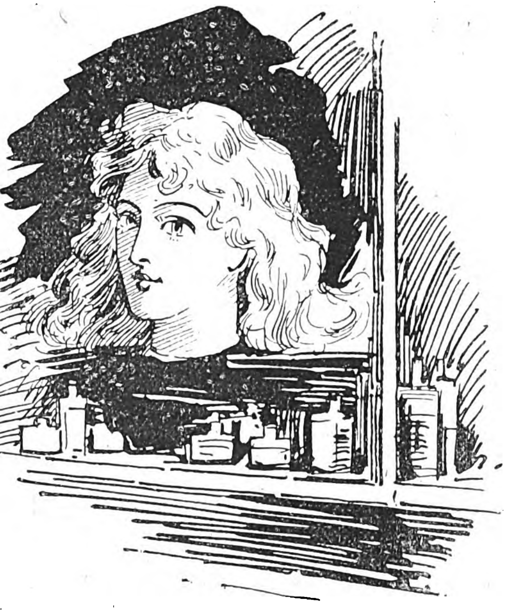
Odd, was it not?

Let me tell you the story. I was poor—miserably poor. I had come to the great city, as come so many men, in search of employment. Anything, whether hand-work or brain-work, would I willingly have done. But work I could not get. The first day I went to seventeen places. They were sorry there was no opening; possibly there might be; would I call again? and I was politely ushered out.

I waited. I called again. I was again rebuffed—a little less politely than before. I went to other places. The same experience. In all the great city there seemed no work for me to do.

I was gradually spending the small stock of money I had brought with me—all I had in the world. Finally it was gone. I pawned what few articles of jewellery I had, and continued my quest for work. At last I received some. It was copying, at a miserable pittance, but it was work.

My humble lodging was in a dingy street, and directly opposite was a hair-dresser's shop. In the window was an object, the sight of which annoyed me. In this life you meet persons who are repugnant to you, as well as those whom you like. To one of a sensitive nature, like myself, the same rule applies to inanimate objects. Even for tables and chairs I have my likes and dislikes.



It looked like a real head.

I crossed the street, and examined the object of my dislike. It was nothing—nothing but a Waxen Head. But it was disagreeable. It looked like a real head—a head cut from a body. It was not a bust, such as hair-dressers ordinarily have, but a simple head, cut off at the neck, and placed on a shelf, with a background of coarse, red cloth. A flowing blonde wig was upon it, and its glassy eyes had a metallic lustre. There was a mechanical smiled upon its painted lips—a disagreeable smile. Almost a contemptuous smile. And I could not help thinking that the Thing looked superciliously at me.

I finished the copying I had, and went for more. None to be had. Again I went my weary round. No work. Dispirited and melancholy, I returned to my lonely room. It was after dark. The hair-dresser's window was faintly illuminated by a sickly, spluttering lamp. But in the darkness there shone out two brilliant points of light.

They were the eyes of the Waxen Head.

I began to grow alarmed, despite myself. Could the Thing be acting on my brain? Was I in danger of madness? But no; what folly; I would not look upon it. I would avoid gazing out of the window. For a week I would not let my eyes fall upon it. But it was not without an effort. I experienced veritable tugs at times, pulling me round to look at the Waxen Head. But I resisted.

At last one night I was returning home just after dark. The window was not lighted; I was safe. Just as I reached the front of the shop a lamp-lighter touched a street lamp near by. The flame shot from the jet, the light fell upon the window. Starting out of the darkness I saw a mocking head.

I could not restrain myself. I entered the shop, determined to make the owner remove the hideous Thing. As I crossed the threshold a smug fellow advanced, bowing, smirking, and rubbing his hands.

"What can I do for you, sir?"

"Nothing," said I; "that is, nothing in the—what a very singular head you have there in the window."

"Do you think so, sir?"

"Yes. Can it be possible that it is of any use to you?"

"Oh, yes; it serves to attract customers, and to display wigs. And then, you know, it is one of the accessories of our business."

"But," said I hotly, "why do you not have a bust? You certainly should have a bust." He was staring at me. I went on more calmly. "Besides, with a bust, a handsome pair of shoulders, a necklace or something of the kind, your window would look much more attractive."

"Very true, sir," he replied, "but such things cost money, and money, sir, is not very plentiful in this shop."

I grew excited again. I could not help it. "I do not care," said I; "that object there looks like a genuine head—a human head. There are people whom such things affect. A nervous shock might be caused——"

He burst into a roar of laughter.

I changed my tone. I became humble. I admitted that the head produced a sinister impression on me, and begged him to remove it.

"Why," said he, "if you are so nervous, you had better change your lodgings. It is easy to do that. I do not see why I should injure my business on account of your whims."

He was right. I could not rightfully ask him to do it. But change my lodgings—what a bitter jest! I could not pay for those I had, much less secure new ones, with payment in advance required. I went out dejectedly, my head bent, and left the thing still in the window. And yet they call me ferocious!

But my torture was only begun. The barber told his neighbours of my visit. I became a show for the giggling shopkeepers. They would watch for my goings and comings, and when I passed the window, with averted face, they would chuckle and sneer. Even the little children would point their fingers at me, and their childish trebles would join the sneering laughter of the elder fools.

One day my friend Arnold came to see me—the only friend I had in the great city. He brought good news—he had secured a place for me as clerk in an office. The pay was wretchedly small, but it was a place. I could have wept for joy. I pressed Arnold's hand convulsively, and thanked him as few men are thanked. I was to take the place in two days. He left me a happy man.

The next evening I was seated in my room. It was cold, and I was shivering, for I had no fire. It was the 20th of February. Oh, yes, I remember the date. I can never forget it. As I sat there, thinking over my unexpected good fortune, and pinching myself, partly to keep warm and partly to be sure I was awake, I heard a knock. I opened the door. A letter. I unfolded it and read:

> Dear Sir,—We regret to inform you that the position which was secured for you in our employ by Mr. Arnold is no longer vacant. It has been filled by the appointment of a relative of one of the members of the firm.—Yours very truly, ———

I crumpled the letter convulsively in my hand. The room began to whirl round me. I staggered and fell to the floor.

When I recovered my senses a new and strange light fell upon my dazed eyes. The curtain was drawn, but still the light came through. Mechanically I pulled aside the curtain to see what it could be; I recoiled. For the barber had fitted up his window with gas-jets, and in the centre of an aureola of ten lights appeared the Waxen Head.

I glanced at it. There was the same haughty look from its glassy eyes, the same sneering smile upon its painted lips. They moved—I vow I saw them move.

With a hoarse cry I bounded from the room. In two seconds I was in the villain's shop.

"Scoundrel!" I hissed, "you have mocked at me—you shall never again have the chance."

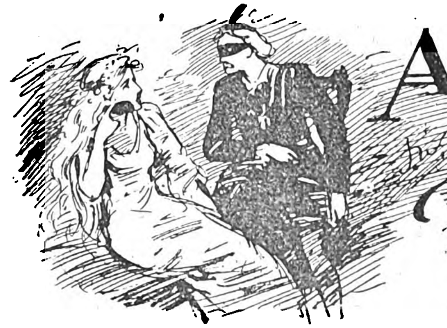
"Pooh!" said he insolently; "what's the matter with you? Go and sleep the drink off."

There was a sneer upon his fool's face as he spoke.

A knife came to my hand.

There was no sneer upon his white face when he died.

Jerome Hart.



A Strange Request

BIBLIOTHECA·BODLEIANA

SOME years ago I was spending a few weeks in Paris. My business had been successfully accomplished, but I still lingered on, awaiting the arrival of my old college friend and chum—Maurice Owen. We had not met for many years, but this was entirely owing to circumstances which had cast our lives apart. At the time I refer to I was expecting my friend the next day, and wondered how I could best while away the intervening time.

While pondering this question, my attention was attracted by a large placard announcing that a masked costume ball would be held that evening at the Maison Foisson, Rue de la Concorde. For a moment I hesitated, but my decision was soon made. What better could I do to pass a few hours? I retraced my steps and sought the shop of Maître Pierre, where I knew that a large choice of costumes could always be had on demand.

Maître Pierre showed me a variety of fancy costumes, but none of them were to my liking.

"Ah!" he suddenly exclaimed, rubbing his fat hands together, "I have the very thing for Monsieur. See here, only this morning the gentleman who ordered two costumes of Hamlet a week ago, returned one, saying he would not require both, but he paid for them, and well, too."

It was the very thing I wanted, and fitted me to perfection. After selecting a suitable mask, I left the shop, well satisfied with my purchases.

On entering the ballroom at ten o'clock that night, I looked round with some interest to discover my double, but as far as I could see I was the only representative of Hamlet then present.

I amused myself for some time by watching the dancers as they glided swiftly past, and wondered what secret joys and tragedies the masks concealed. My attention was suddenly arrested by a light pressure on my arm, and turning round I found myself face to face with the Hamlet of my previous speculations.

"Pardon me for addressing you," the unknown exclaimed in a voice that seemed strangely familiar, "but I find myself in a very awkward position, and am obliged to throw myself on the generosity of a stranger for assistance."

Here the masked Hamlet paused. I bowed slightly, and inquired what service I could render him.

"I came here with a lady," he explained, "and I have just discovered that I must have left a most valuable diamond ring on my dressing table at the Hotel d'Angleterre. It is a ring I value greatly, being, indeed, an heirloom of the family. I do not wish to trouble the lady with my loss, and could easily absent myself half an hour, if you would stay by her until my return. She is dressed as Ophelia."

"But surely," I objected, "the lady you refer to as Ophelia will detect the difference, and——"

"No, no," he interrupted eagerly, "you have nothing to fear. The lady and I have decided never to refer again to the subject of our recent conversation, and you can readily converse with her on any commonplace topic. You will find her rather absent-minded, but that will only make your task the easier."

I felt a singular reluctance to comply with the stranger's request, but curiosity, and a certain sense of humour at the novelty of the situation prevailed, and I expressed my willingness to take his place. The unknown was profuse in his thanks.

"You will find her in the little recess to the right of the balcony," he added, hastening away before I had time to repent of my good nature.

"There is no help for it now," I reflected, as I mounted the staircase to the balcony. I had no difficulty in finding the object of my search, and seated myself in the vacant seat at her side. She took no notice of my presence at first, and I was only too glad to be spared the necessity of conversing. Her thoughts were evidently not of a pleasing nature, for her eyes bore traces of recent weeping.

"Have you not forgiven me yet?" she said appealingly. "I have suffered terribly, God knows how much. Indeed, I have no right to be here at all, and if my husband knew——" Here she broke down, weeping bitterly.

I was dismayed. This was more than I had reckoned for, but before I could frame a reply she broke in hurriedly:

"And if you have given him too much ether, if he should remain unconscious, if——" her voice failed her, and she hastily put up her handkerchief to her eyes.

My curiosity was now completely aroused, and under the pretext of obtaining a little fresh air, I suggested she should remove her mask for a few minutes.

"Do you think it is safe to do so?" she queried.

"Yes, perfectly," I replied, "there is no one near, and a little fresh air will do you more good than anything else."

She removed her mask without any further hesitation, and to my unbounded astonishment, I recognised her as the beautiful Mademoiselle Adelaide Etienne, whose picture had appeared in the leading society papers a month ago, on the occasion of her marriage with the rich advocate, Monsieur Dubrey.

It was no secret that the marriage had been purely a mercenary transaction on the part of the parents, who regarded the rich suitor's money as an adequate equivalent for the great disparity of years. I was too overwhelmed with dismay at this discovery to find words for the moment, and greatly to my relief, I saw that the real Hamlet of this modern tragedy had reentered the dancing-hall.

"Pray excuse me for a moment, I see a friend below," I stammered out, and without further ceremony I hurried down the broad staircase. My double met me at the foot of the stairs, and after ascertaining that he had secured the missing jewel, I quitted the festive hall. My mind was in a strange state of tumult; indignation gave place to pity in my heart, as I thought of the beautiful face that had looked up at mine with such wistful entreaty. For the first time I felt that the remembrance of a woman's face would haunt me, do what I might, go where I would—and that woman the wife of another man.

Wild dreams troubled my sleep that night, and it was with a vivid sense of relief that I saw the dawn herald in a new day. While glancing at the morning paper my attention was arrested by a paragraph headed "A Suspicious Death," and running my eye rapidly down the column, I read the account of Monsieur Dubrey's death the night before, from an overdose of ether.

Suspicion, it was said, pointed to the wife, who had been arrested on her return to the house. I snatched up my hat, and on the impulse of the moment hurried off to the Bureau of Police, intent only on clearing the young wife from so terrible an accusation. My statement was gravely received by the detective in charge of the case, and after taking down my deposition, I was informed that my attendance would be necessary at the forthcoming trial.

The remainder of this dreadful tragedy is soon told. I was present at the trial, and to my horror and despair I recognised in the accused accomplice and lover of Madame Dubrey the friend of my youth, the friend whose advent I had been daily and hourly expecting. I turned sick and faint at meeting him again under such terrible circumstances. He pleaded guilty of manslaughter, no doubt with the idea of exonerating Madame Dubrey from any share in the fatal deed.

The jury brought in a verdict of wilful murder against Maurice, but recommended him to mercy. Adelaide Dubrey was acquitted, but I can never forget the awful look of despair on her face as she heard her lover condemned to penal servitude for life. She staggered out of the court in a half-dazed condition, like one bereft of reason. I would feign have spoken to her and offered some word of sympathy, but the frozen look of horror on her face held me silent. No comfort could avail aught to mitigate a grief like hers. The next day, when they came to wake her, she was found dead, and by her side an empty bottle of chloroform.

So began and ended the brief and only tragedy of my life.

F. White.

LADIES! LADIES!! LADIES!!!

THE GRAND DOUBLE FASHION NUMBER OF "HOME NOTES"
Is on Sale NEXT THURSDAY, October 3rd.

A NEW SERIAL STORY COMMENCES IN THIS NUMBER:
Thousands of Useful Hints for the Home.
Be sure and obtain a copy.

The Passing of Jack Thompson.

There were four of them—all barristers—seated by the window of a cosy room overlooking King's Bench Walk, in the Temple.

The youngest was the first to break the silence which had existed for several minutes.

"Whoever heard of a man going to a hospital for his heart before," he said, looking over the trees—light green in the pale sunshine of an early summer evening. "We miss poor old Creasy," and he began drumming a little operatic air on the window-sill.

"I don't know how we shall exist without his stories," observed a Q.C., with a quiet smile. "They say it will be a month or more before he is fit to move."

Someone sitting on the sofa produced a little bunch of manuscript written in a neat feminine hand. "If he cannot tell stories he can write them," he said; "this is for the Illustrated Quarterly."

"Read it," said the Q.C.; "anything to enliven us a little."

The man who had spoken hesitated a moment. Then he began:

"It is called 'The Passing of Jack Thompson,'" he said.

"CHAPTER I.

"It was February. The desolate and dreary prairie was covered with a light blanket of snow, save here and there bare spots where the cheerless wind had swept. The deflecting rays of the cold, low-hanging sun caused the burnished glass in the western windows of a little house standing off the old Santa Fé road to blaze as if on fire, and to seem to melt the freezing air.

"Half-a-dozen hounds bayed forth vociferous welcome to a horseman, their returning master, now ascending the steep road. A frail, dejected woman peeped through the half-drawn paper curtains of the low window, and, seeming to gather assurance, opened the door and stood upon its threshold.

"'Well?' she said interrogatively.

"''Tain't no use, Sal. Th' horse was found with my halter on her, an' that's enough to convict th' Apostle Paul.'

"'Why don't you go to ol' Judge Gilman. Tell him how little Bobbie was taken sick, an' how you just borrowed the mare to go for the doctor?'

"'Sal, will you dry up? I tells you 't ain't no use. He'd jest say 't was fer me to make it wash with the jury if I could.'

"'Why couldn't you, Jack?'

"'Why? Because I couldn't, I tells you. Do you hear that? If I'd a went to th' ol' Doc's house first an' had been ketched there, it might work, fer then he could swear fer me.'

"'Well, I'd be honest an' jest tell why Doc Tuff ain't on your side.'

"'I say 't ain't no use. This borrowin' of horses is gettin' to be too all-fired common. My lawyer, ol' Parsons, says it's a mighty thin go, though he do say, if I'll swear to it hard, an' you'll stand up to the same racket, he'll do the best he can; but he didn't make no bones of tellin' me his own mind as to th' outcome.'

"'Of course I'll swear for you, an' you know I'll do it cheerful, too. But what else did he say?'

"'He said 't would be deader medicine if we could prove a aliby while he had our hands in. 'Tis easy to see he don't take no stock in the sick child racket.'

"'God knows 'tis the Gospel truth, an' I hain't afeerd but what there'll be some of the jury that'll know the truth when they sees it. I recollec' a hearin' ol' Jedge Carson, when he was a ridin' the circuit, and used to stay with pa, say you could count safe on a findin' at least ten honest men in his box.'

"'Mebbe that rule would go them days in Missouri. But Jedge Carson was never up fer horse stealin' in Kansas, was he? I guess not. A feller has jest about got to prove hisself everlastingly innecent, or he's a goner.'

"'How does you make that out?'

"'Ol' Parsons says that th' Supreme Court, in Cassidy's case, made a law that th' havin' of a thing right away after it's stole is enough. That makes out a primer face—or some kind of a Latin landguidge case—which means, in plain United States, that you are in fer it, unless you can get out.'

"'Mebbe, Jack, if you 'll tell 'em of your conversion, an' a joinin' of th' church two years ago down to th' Stranger Creek camp meetin', 't would help. Elder Berry would recomember how you stumbled 'long up to the mourners' bench, an' give up so complete!'

"'Yes, an' he knows how darned quick I back-slid. That'd make a fine case, now, wouldn't it? What fer show would a feller have with nine out of ten Methodists, mebby, on the jury. I'd be no bigger'n a ten spot.'

"'But, Jack, mebbe God would move 'em to overlook your faults, for who is there that hasn't his own? Besides, mebbe there'll be some on the jury as isn't perfessors, an' will be prejudiced fer you. An' mebbe Judge Gilman would tell 'em that you was up fer horse stealin', and not fer back-slidin'!'

"'Mebbe he would, Sal. But what does you know 'bout juries?'

"And with that he fastened his horse and went inside the cabin disconsolately.

"CHAPTER II.

"The State versus Thompson had come up. The court-house was filled to overflowing with curious spectators and idle hangers-on. A number of witnesses were loitering about the courtyard waiting to testify. Here and there knots of sun-browned farmers discussed Thompson's case. A few expressed no opinion. Many said he was undoubtedly guilty. All agreed that there must be an organised band of horse thieves operating in the country, and suspicion fell on Jack Thompson as being a member thereof, partly because his farming seemed to be a mere pretence, but more especially because of his sudden disappearance and his frequent returns after several days of absence, often with a new horse, concerning which, when questioned, he always declared either he had won it at a race or 'swapped' for it.

"Everybody who spoke of Thompson's wife at all spoke well of her, and expressions of sympathy for her were frequent. 'She ought to leave him, for he treats her shameful,' was the general verdict as to her; while, as to him, it found expression in muttered, 'we've no use for the lazy, drunken thief, and gambler,' often accompanied by curses in menacing tones.

"There was no mistaking the temper of the community, and no one was more sensitive to it and its demands for a victim, upon whom its indignant wrath might be visited, than old Parsons, the defendant's counsel. Technical defences would only result in mob violence.

"After some delay, incident to numerous challenges, a jury of 'twelve good and lawful men' was duly empanelled and sworn, and was at once confronted by Mr. Idleman, the county attorney, who proceeded to state the case the State expected to make, and was followed by Parsons, who, in a low voice, very briefly stated the defence.

"Then the prosecution introduced its evidence. The ownership of the mare was proven to be in Deacon Ezekial Snoddy. Then the circumstances of her disappearance in the night from the barn of her owner—of her being found next morning tied to a post in front of a saloon in a town about fourteen miles from the point of asportation—of the defendant being seen hurriedly riding her into town at day-break, and of his being intoxicated when arrested, were all narrated by the witnesses. All of which, of course, it was shown occurred in the County of ———, and State of Kansas.

"It was remarked by a number of bystanders, who had heard of the adroitness of defendant's counsel, and of his skill as a cross-examiner, that he must have considered the case of the State impregnable; for there was scarcely a question put by way of cross-examination.

"The defendant then went into the witness-box. Under the skilful handling of his attorney he told in a simple way his story. Briefly it was this: His little child was taken sick on the night in question; he left home about two o'clock, taking a halter with him; upon going to his corral he found the bars had been thrown down (probably by some mischievous person or enemy), and his horses had gone to the woods; he then decided to go to his nearest neighbour, Deacon Snoddy, and borrow one; arrived there, he concluded, on account of the lateness of the hour, that he wouldn't awaken the sleeping household, but would go to the barn, take a horse, and explain matters fully to the Deacon on returning with Dr. Tuff in the morning; that when he arrived in town it was a little after daylight; the night having been cold, and he being faint and chilled by his long ride, he determined on taking a good stiff drink to brace him up before going over to the doctor's residence; that, after taking the drink in the 'Red Front Saloon' (for it was before the days of prohibition), he sat down by the stove in the bar-room to get warm, and must have fallen asleep, for the next thing he remembered was his arrest; that he then sent word by the constable to the doctor to go out to see his child.

"On cross-examination Thompson admitted that he understood the child was found up and playing when the doctor arrived; that he had not, previous to his arrest, said anything to the bar tender or to anyone else about his child's sickness; admitted that he once had a quarrel about a divisional fence some time before with the owner of the mare; he further frankly admitted that the halter found on the mare belonged to him.

"When Thompson was excused a smile spread over the faces of the bystanders. Evidently he had not made a favourable impression. He had not looked at the jury, but kept his restless eyes on the sheriff, as if imploring his kindly protection. Such expressions as, 'Too thin,' 'He's dead sure to walk,' and 'How long do you think he'll get?' were exchanged in audible whispers.

"Then the pale little woman in black, whose eyes had been riveted on the face of her husband during the narration of his story, entered the box. In a low voice she told of being awakened in the night by little Bobbie's croup; of her husband starting for his horse to go after the doctor; of her using the simple remedies at hand; and of Bobbie's being up and playing when the doctor came. On cross-examination, she admitted her husband had quarrelled with Deacon Snoddy, but stated that she thought it had been made up at the time her husband was converted.

"Here a titter went round the audience that occasioned the old bailiff to rap on the table three times with his knife, and to look threateningly at the standing men.

"The witness became excited; the colour came to her thin face; she stood erect, and her eyes brightened. Elevating her voice, her nostrils quivering with passion, she continued:

"'Those silly men may laugh; but, man'—addressing the jury—'Jack was converted the time our baby girl died, and he would 'a' stayed, had not the drink habit got such a grip on him, as it has, too, on lots of men I know who laughed out loud just now. Oh, I know you, Tom Green, and——'

"The Court interfered here, and cautioned the witness to confine her answers to the questions asked.

"The witness proceeded:

"'Before Jack got religion, Mr. Snoddy came over during the revival, an' brought along his hymn book an' Testament with him, an' sung, an' read, an' prayed, to beat all out of doors. He said he was wrong about that fence, an' asked the good Lord to forgive him for the scrap, too—which I doubt if He did—an' said that neighbours should dwell together in peace, an' all that kind of stuff.'

"The Court again admonished the witness to state only what was said and done, and to keep her opinions to herself.

"'Yes, sir; as I was sayin', the old hypocrite—there he sets now—said he was sorry, too, and he won't dispute a sayin' it neither, an' then he asked Jack an' me down to th' camp meetin', an' took on as if the Kingdom had come. Then he went, an' th' next Sunday Jack riz up for prayers, an' before I knowed what was on, ol' Deacon Snoddy was a hustlin' Jack for'ard to the mourners' bench, both on 'em a-shoutin' "glory" an' "amen" at every jump; an' afore the meetin' broke Jack was singin', "While the Lamp Holds Out to Burn," an' everybody was so happy that I couldn't keep th' tears back!'

"Here the witness, overcome by the memories which her narrative recalled, began to weep, and there was an opportunity for Idleman to collect his thoughts, and to renew the unfortunate cross-examination. The prosecuting witness leant over and whispered in his ear, to which the County Attorney made a responsive nod.

"'Mrs. Thompson,' he said sternly, 'do you mean for these gentlemen here—the jury—to understand that at the time of this larceny—that at, or just before, this horse was took—there was no bad blood betw'xt the families of the prosecuting witness and your said husband?'

“ ‘No, sir ; no, siree,’ the witness answered emphatically.

“ The County Attorney looked round the room with an air of victory, and proceeded deliberately to the attack, as he returned the little roll of tobacco wrapped in tissue paper to his pocket.

“ ‘Then you admit that there was bad blood ? ’

“ ‘I do.’

“ ‘ Will you be kind enough, Mrs. Thompson, to state wherein and whereof that bad blood consisted ? ’

“ ‘Yes, sir, if you wants me to, an’ it has any bearin’ on th’ case.’

“ The prosecuting witness pulled nervously at the shiny coat sleeve of the County Attorney, but as he had repeatedly done so before only to suggest irrelevant questions, Idleman paid no attention to him.

“ ‘ Madam, since we have started in, we might as well go on ; but I want the jury not to lose sight of the fact that we air a-tryin’ your said husband for larceny of a bay mare, and not the prosecutin’ witness for bein’ a Christian. You may proceed—state fully.’

“ Idleman emphasised the last two words.

“ ‘ Well, one night, as we was about to get into our waggon to come home from th’ revival, Mr. Snoddy says to my husband, says he : “ Brother Thompson, supposin’ Mrs. Snoddy gets up in front on th’ big spring seat with you—she’s a-gettin’ old and crippled up like with rheumatz—an’ I’ll ride behind with Sister Thompson ” —a-meanin’ me. We hadn’t more’n got started till Mr. Snoddy said, says he : “ Your seat, Sister Thompson, would be a mighty sight comfortabler if you had a back to it.” An’ then I felt his arm a-pressin’ close agin’ my back. I edged away, an’ he edged closer ; every time th’ wheel struck a rut he slid up, an’ didn’t slide back neither when th’ rut come his side. Then—— ’

“ ‘I object, as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial,’ shouted the County Attorney, aroused by the titter that went round the room. ‘ This has nothin’ to do with the bad blood asked for, and is not responsive to my question.’

“ The judge removed his corncob pipe from his mouth, and wearily stretching his long legs on the corner of the bench, announced :

“ ‘Mr. Idleman, you asked the witness to “ state fully.” I don’t think after doin’ that you ought to be allowed to object to her manner of doing it. What the witness is about to state may, or may not, be material ; no one can tell till she’s stated. So I’ll overrule the State’s objection, Mr. County Attorney, and give you an exception, and you can move to strike out after the witness shall have done.’

“ ‘ Very well,’ said Idleman, obsequiously bowing to his Honour, and motioning to Mrs. Thompson to proceed.

“ ‘Then he put his right arm tighter than I thought was becomin’, an’ him a deacon, an’ I was so provoked I didn’t know what to do. I didn’t want to make no scene with his poor invalid wife, an’ her a good Christian woman as I thought then. So I jest pinched his hand as hard as I could, but he only hugged me harder. It took all the Christian grace I had to keep from yellin’, an’ he was afeared, too, for when I was goin’ to say somethin’ he’d clap his hand over my mouth. An’ we kept on that a-way till we got to their bars, an’ they got out, an’ th’ ol’ hypocrite thanked my husband perfusely. I was afeared to say anythin’ to Jack with his quick temper, so I jest made up my mind I’d put on my bonnet next mornin’ an’ go over to Mrs. Snoddy’s, which I did, an’ tell her jest how worldly her pretendin’ husband was. After I’d set awhile an’ we had went over th’ list to be baptised th’ next Sunday at the ford, an’ she had asked me to stay to dinner, I up an’ tol’ her jest why I couldn’t, as a Christian woman, accept her kind invite. She got boilin’ mad, an’ ’lowed if I hadn’t pinched Ezekiel’s arm he never would ’a’ hugged me, an’ that it was all my fault. The pretendin’ ol’ thing said Ezekiel had never hugged her a-comin’ home since they were married, if she’d pinched him for a signal. She jest kept right on a-tryin’ to put the blame on to me, till I left in a dudgin’, an’ we hain’t spoke since. Then as I was a-comin’ home, who should I see a-cuttin’ across th’ cornfield but that there same ol’ hypocrite, an’ him a deacon, too. When he gets up close enough, he says, says he, all a-beamin’ too : “ Sister Thompson——”

“ ‘ I says, says I : “ Don’t sister me, you old pretender.”

“ ‘ He says : “ What’s up now ? ”

“ ‘ I says, says I : “ I’ve been down an’ told your wife on you ; that’s what’s up.”

“ ‘ “ Told her what ? ” says he, a-pretendin’ ignorance.

“ ‘ “ You know well enough,” says I.

“ ‘ Then he says, says he—him a-gettin’ closer up, an’ reachin’ for my hand—“ Sister—or Mrs. Thompson——”

“ ‘ “ Stand back,” says I, indignant.’

“ Here the prosecuting witness moved restlessly and whispered in the receptive ear of counsel for the prosecution, and that functionary, perceiving a dangerous crisis was imminent, proceeded to object, and to ‘ strike out,’ getting into an animated discussion with the Court over the relevancy of the testimony. Counsel for the defence shrewdly realising that with the Court on his side the matter would be presented with sufficient convincing potency, said nothing. The Court, after overruling the objections and motions, and allowing exceptions to the State, again admonished the witness to state only facts.

“ A number of the open-mouthed by-standers whispered together—the consensus of opinions being that Judge Gilman was too learned in the law to permit the forceful Idleman successfully to pull the wool over his eyes. Parsons simply winked at his client.

“ The witness resumed :

“ ‘ Well, as I was a sayin’, that ’ol’ pretendin’ hypocrite there——’

“ ‘The witness will not express opinions, but state facts. Don’t call any names, Mrs. Thompson,’ cautioned the Court.

“ ‘ No, sir, I won’t ; but I could, though. Well, after that ol’ pretender—an’ him a deacon, too—got up a-close enough to shake hands, he went on to say as how I knowed th’ seat had no back to it, an’ that he jest didn’t mean nothin’ but to keep me from a-fallin’ out back’ards. An’ then—th’ cheek of him !—he ’lowed if I hadn’t pinched him—as if I did it before he did nothin’. You see, he was jest everlastingly bound to put it on to me, jest as that old huzzy, his wife, done. Then he says, says he : “ Sister—or Mrs. Thompson, ’t ain’t no use in neighbours havin’ words or hard feelin’s agin one another ; suppose we try to compromise it ? ” says he.

“ ‘ “ How can we,” says I, “ as honest Christians, compromise with Satan ? ”

“ ‘ “ Well, of course,” says he, “ we can’t do that if huggin’ is a sin ; but,” says he, a raising’ his hand to threaten, “ I’ll tell you what’s what if you ever tells your husband, or anyone else about that ride, I’ll be doddurned if I don’t tell the State’s Attorney your husband belongs to the Jones gang of horse-thieves." Them air his exact words. Well, then I got so mad at the ol' cowardly pretender that I jest rode off an' left him a-callin' fer me to come back an' make up. Do you think I went back? Not much.'

"'Why didn't you tell your husband about his threat?' propounded the persistent prosecutor, with an expansive feeling of self-admiration visible in his countenance.

"'Why didn't I? Well, because I knowed what ol' Snoddy said was a libel. He knowed all the time he was a-talkin' that Jack was no bigger a horse-stealer than his own self, an' him a deacon. An' I knowed if I told Jack that there would be a world of trouble; so I just considered it my Christian duty to keep low, an' so I jest kept mum, an' said nothin' till now—an' I reckon I wouldn' now if you, Mr. Idleman, hadn't started in on it.'

"The round of half-suppressed laughter that greeted this last statement stung the usually obtuse Idleman to the quick. Seeking to recover his composure, he nervously fumbled the court files, and made a side remark to the prosecuting witness, for the benefit of the jury, to the effect that he guessed an intelligent jury would know how much of her testimony to believe, seeing that she was an interested witness.

"At last the witness was dismissed. Old Parsons eyes twinkled, and he stroked his moustache and goatee, and ran his hand through his thin grey hair with an air of extreme satisfaction at the result of his adversary's cross-examination. Thompson's case, too, had evidently been strengthened in the minds of the bystanders.

"Then numerous motions were made, and special instructions were asked, all presumably aimed at getting before the jury the real points at issue. The court then, with greater verbosity than perspicuity, instructed the jury as to the law, laying particular stress on the intention of the defendant, and also on the presumption which arises when recently stolen property is found in the possession of another.

"The respective counsel then harangued the jury in the customary voluble and vociferous manner. Idleman and Parsons were both in their shirtsleeves, the latter sans vest and sans collar.

"At length the jury retired to consider solemnly of its verdict. Soon a loud and prolonged rapping on the door of the jury room imported a probable agreement. Then the twelve good men and true slowly filed in, the old bailiff bringing up the rear. No one could guess the result from their sphinx-like countenances. The clerk received the verdict from the foreman, and proceeded to read it in a deliberate tone. When he reached the closing words he hesitated as if astonished, glanced at the County Attorney, and said: 'Not Guilty.'

"CHAPTER III.

"IT was dusk.

"A mule team stood lazily before the 'Red Front' saloon. A waggon cover was loosely thrown over some sacks of meal in the waggon behind the seat. Before long Thompson came out, a long-necked bottle projecting from one of the pockets of his sack coat, climbed to a seat beside the waiting woman, placed a six-shooter between them, and sullenly commanded her to drive on.

"On their way home, Thompson told his wife that some one said that it was her testimony, and her manner of giving it, that won the case.

"'Didn't I tell you what Jedge Carson said about a jury havin' ten honest men on it? I jest prayed hard to convert th' other two,' she observed.

"'But how did you come to give 'em that round up on th' Deacon, Sal?'

"'Well, I jest got kinder desp'rate when I see what a poor cut you made of it. Our lawyer said to just keep cool; that he'd let me off easy on th' direct, 'cause he knowed th' County Attorney would give me a chance to get in my work on th' cross. An' it seems I did.'

"'Sal, did th' ol' Deacon hug you as you let on like that?'

"'Of course he did. Wasn't I on oath? Does you reck'n I'd swear to a lie to save you, or anyone else, Jack Thompson? No, siree! You know I wouldn't.'

"'I'm mighty glad he did hug you, fur it saved me, dead sure, from goin' up to Lansing. But I'm blamed if I sees how you come to give it up in the box in th' powerful way you did, Sal.'

"'It jest popped into my head when I see Idleman was tryin' to make out you stole th' mare, to get even with th' ol' Deacon, or else to make it seem onlikely that you'd do your borryin' of him. It did go hard to tell it right out before all them men; but I done it 'cause you was my husband, an' 'cause I didn't want the neighbour children to throw 't up to Bobbie that his pa was in th' gaol for horse-stealin'. I could stand that.'

"'Well, ol' girl, you've broke the record as a winner. If I hadn't got gull, an' that fool Hank Blackman had 'a' showed up as he agreed fair he would do, th' Deacon's mare would 'a' passed along, layin' by daytimes in th' brush, an' travellin' nights, till she'd 'a' been over th' line in Clay County long ago. 'Tain't fair, Sal, I oughter tell you now, a-seein' as how you played white by me, an' saved me by yer tall swearin'. I reckon I'm th' fust horse thief as ever got off in Eastern Kansas.'

"'Thompson, does you mean to own up to me that you did steal the Deacon's mare?'

"'That's what, Sal. You see I agreed to do it that night, an' Bobbie's a-gettin' sick gave me an excuse to you fur to slide. An' that's the everlastin' truth, too.'

"'An' you belong to th' Jones gang?'

"'Yes; that's about the size of it.'

"'An' you'd have me swear to a lie to keep you from th' law?'

"'In course I would, an' you'd do it too—if not for me, you'd do it for little Bob!'

"Thompson here took the bottle from his pocket and placed it to his lips, as he already had done several times. His wife watched him askance. She knew that any protest from her would be received with curses, but she had grown as insensible to them as any woman compelled to drag through life tied to an ill-tempered drunkard ever grows.

"'Thompson, seems as though we'd had 'nough trouble for one day. I wish you wouldn't drink no more till mornin'. Please try jest this once? I don't want Bobbie to see me a-cryin' when we get home.'

"'Darn you; look on your book, will you? I don't want no woman who has been a-carryin' on with another man an' keepin' quiet till it is forced out o' her to be tellin' me what to do. Do you hear me?' Thompson sullenly responded with a most tantalising expression.

"There was a period of silence, during which the little woman, already overwrought by the nervous strain of the trial, and now so rudely shocked by the cruel audacity of her husband, tried to swallow the lump which seemed to come persistently into her throat.

"'Thompson, air you goin' to lick old Snoddy?' she ventured.

"'No, you bet I ain't. He can hug you again, if he likes to, fur all of me.'

"'Thompson—answer me true now—supposin' th' Deacon had 'a' went on an' done th' very worst a man could do—an' then, supposin' I'd told it in th' box, an' it had saved you from the pen, wouldn't you 'a' done nothin' to him fur it?'

"'I don't know as I'd a' made much fuss 'bout it.'

"'Take that, you cowardly whelp!' shouted a masculine voice from the rear end of the waggon.

"As Thompson fell backwards, his wife, turning, saw through the puff of smoke a man half concealed by some meal sacks, holding in his right hand a revolver, which he had quietly slipped from the seat as he had listened to Thompson's confession and audacious cruelty.

"'Hank Blackman!' gasped the confused woman.

"'Yes, the same ol' Hank what loved you back in Clay; he's been a-hangin' 'round these parts more'n you know, Sally, a-thinkin' mebbe you'd have use fur him some time.'

"'Don't tell me that you love me; you're a horse-thief an' a——. Oh, Hank, why did you do it?'

"''Cause I could stand it no longer to hear Thompson abuse you and refuse to fight for you, Sally. I won't let no woman be used in sich way, all the more you; 'sides, what he said 'bout my b'longin' to the Jones' gang 's a lie. I only trained with 'em to be near you, an' that's the God's truth.'

"'Oh, Hank, you oughter 'a' waited.'

"'Wait! Haven't I been a-waitin' patient all these years, an' seen you a droopin' an' a fadin' under bad treatment? It's done now. I may swing, but I'll know that you won't have to suffer no more from him.'

"The pale woman sat motionless and silent. At last, with an effort, she sobbed, 'Hank——' but speech failed her.

"Blackman caught her in his arms as she was falling from the waggon. When she had revived, he said:

"'Sally, 't ain't like you to give up so; be brave; remember that Hank 's your friend, your lover, and will wait for you. I must leave yer now. If the Vigilance Committee comes to your house to-night, jest tell 'em Thompson is already done for—was killed by some one a-shootin' from behind on your way home.'

"Blackman drew the frail form of the woman to him, kissed her, and disappeared in the darkness into the tall grass.

"The poor woman quietly placed her shawl over her dead husband's face, picked up the reins, and with eyes staringly fixed upon the mules, drove on.

* * * * *

"The neighbours gave it out that although Jack Thompson was undoubtedly 'stick,' he could not and did not elude the vigilance of the 'Committee,' whose unerring judgment could always be safely trusted to supplement a doubtful verdict; and so the credit of his passing was with many a sly and knowing wink appropriated by others."

* * * * *

"That's a good story," said the Q.C., as the reading finished, "but where did Creasy learn his American dialect from?"

No one seemed to know.

"There's an American nurse at the hospital," suggested the man who had read the story, "possibly she collaborated with him."

"Possibly," asserted the Q.C. "In that case the poor fellow's condition is hopeless." W. G. C.

ON THE BRINK.

One evening—I think it was the first night of the revival of Romeo and Juliet at the Lyceum—Jack Saloeny and his wife occupied a box there, which, after much difficulty, as he averred, Colonel Dunkirque, of the "Heavies," had been fortunate enough to secure. As a general rule, Colonel Dunkirque was not in the habit of presenting first-night boxes to his friends unless he had some object to gain. People suggested that it was a ruse on his part to win Jack's good graces—especially the smiles of Jack's wife; but, then, people might have lied—they frequently do in such matters—and yet for once they were right.

Dunkirque was as handsome a man as you would see anywhere—a man whose appearance was hailed with inward tribulation and groaning by poor beggars who had not the pluck to kick him out of their houses when his attentions grew too pronounced. It was rumoured, too, that his doings lately had been very shady—so shady that his friends (he had many friends) all predicted that he would speedily have to bolt from the impending clutches of those ministering fiends, Messrs. Shylock and Co.

Sibyl Saloeny was a very handsome woman—dangerously handsome. She had masses of golden hair, which did not owe its sunny tints to some vile wash; arched red lips, sweet blue eyes, a soft, white neck, and a complexion of dazzling fairness. In addition to these charms, she possessed a knack of pleasing people when she chose to take the trouble, and was also very popular in her own immediate circle. Jack had fallen in love with her in his usual impulsive, headlong manner; but, for my part, I always thought her a trifle hard and unsympathetic.

There was sometimes a look in her sweet eyes not entirely acquiescent when Jack had intimated something of which she disapproved. Having said what he wanted, Jack generally let her have her own way, and so the impending storm always blew over—for a time. She demanded absolute slavery from him, and accepted his devotion as a matter of course. Club friends, amusements, all had to give way to this little autocrat's imperious mandates; and poor Jack was spoilt for us.

Yet he was very happy. In her softer moments, prejudiced as I was, I could but admit the charm of her sweet, low voice, and the winning eyes which could have lured a babe from its mother's arms. But I often imagined that her thoughtlessness would one day bring her to grief. She had such a superb contempt for conventionalities. You and I, gentle reader, know better. We bow down to and worship Mrs. Grundy as if we liked her; but do we? I think not.

That evening things seemed to be approaching a climax—a particularly unpleasant one, too, for poor Jack. He did not notice what was going on. He loved his wife too dearly even to dream of suspecting her. It was a delightful experience to him to listen to the balcony scene, and to follow the hapless fortunes of the star-crossed lovers, although he could not help wishing that the Romeo would be a little less intellectual, and a trifle more impressive with the lovely Juliet. Practically, his wife and Dunkirque were alone—Jack told me all this long afterwards without attaching any importance to it, and I linked the fragments together.

Half an hour later I stepped in. Jack whispered to me not to speak, and I was greeted by Mrs. Saloeny with the usual polite indifference a wife reserves for her husband's friends. In short, it was not ten minutes before I had seen enough of the situation, and concluded to step outside for a lounge in the corridor. The glamour of the scene had failed to touch my jaded senses. I could not help seeing a grimy stage carpenter up in the flies, and this naturally did away with all illusion. What an awful bore if the man had dropped his old wideawake upon the passionate lovers.

The door opened (I was leaning against the next box); out came Mrs. Saloeny and Dunkirque; she shivering—in the hot atmosphere—and a trifle pale. Her eyes wore a frightened look; and—yes, she certainly did seem inclined to cry.

"We shall be just in time for the last train," she nervously whispered. "I told Jack that you should see me to my carriage, and he—he is going to his club."

"So much the better," said Dunkirque hurriedly. "We shall not be missed until we cross the Channel."

I hate scenes; but it was necessary to do something. A little fellow whom I had dandled on my knee, and loved like a son, must not be duped in this shameful way.

Dunkirque hurried past me, but I reached the staircase before Mrs. Saloeny reappeared, hooded and cloaked. Heaven knows I never acted so promptly before in my life; and yet I have been in one or two tight places.

When Colonel Dunkirque's carriage was called the coachman drove up with his fur tippet nearly over his ears. The night was cold, and Mrs. Saloeny trembled, half-turned for a moment, then stepped in. She had crossed the Rubicon—and was lost!

I wonder if she thought at that moment of the little hands that were folded before her night and morn, as the little sleepy eyes were raised to hers, and Jack's children lisped out their usual prayer: "God bless papa and mamma, and make us all dood. Amen!" I do not believe that she could have thought of them, or else she never would have been there.

"Viaduct Station!" called out the Colonel, flinging the fellow one of his few remaining half-crowns—it was the last desperate flight of the butterfly in the sunshine. Afterwards he would have time to repent or die in a gutter unshriven. In the madness of the moment he did not care which.

The horses dashed forward into the darkness, pulling well up to their collars, but—they did not go to the Viaduct Station!

Half an hour later, when they drew up, the Colonel jumped out to assist Mrs. Saloeny to alight. She was trembling still, and half inclined to return. Already the dark shadows of the weary years to come were lengthened out before her. And the man whose love she was about to betray! Well, it was now too late to recede. She was sorry—most women are—when they are found out.

"Sold!" hissed the Colonel, in his rage kicking a poor crossing-sweeper who had rushed up to open the carriage door.

"I wos only a-openin' the door," whined the old mendicant.

"Confound you!" foamed the Colonel, "you're always opening doors when you're not wanted. What the dickens is the meaning of this? But it is not too late."

"Not so fast, Dunkirque," I said, swinging down from the box, the fur tippet still upon my shoulders. "Wait a minute, Mrs. Saloeny"—for the benefit of the servants—"I have won my wager. The Colonel betted I would never drive him anywhere without his knowing it. Let me take you into the house."

Mrs. Saloeny took my arm, and I led her up the steps. She did not speak, but smiled strangely, and touched my hand.

Then I turned to Dunkirque.

"You are an infernal scoundrel!" I said, taking him on one side. "If you choose to make a scene I'll knock you down, old as I am. No; I shall not give you satisfaction. Before you are off let me warn you to beware of Scotland Yard. That bill of Lavington's has been placed in their hands, and the forgery traced to you."

This time he really went to the Viaduct Station, caught the last train, and was seen no more.

Then I returned to the house.

"You have acted like—a—hero," sobbed Mrs. Saloeny. "I can never repay you."

There stood Jack smiling in the doorway. She did not see him. He must never know.

"It was only a trifling service, and one which I was only too happy to render," I said, bowing low. "You over-rate it. A drunken servant is always dangerous."

"You have—saved—my—honour," she was beginning.

"Hush!" I whispered. "Jack must never know." Then aloud: "You are hysterical. Let me ring for your maid."

Between us we got her out of the room.

"What is it all about, old fellow?" asked the irreverent Jack, when Mrs. Saloeny had been safely disposed of in her room.

"Jarvis—drunk—again—as usual," I murmured laconically. (The lie cost me five hundred pounds and a free passage to the colonies for the irreproachable Jarvis and his family; but it was not a dear price to pay for the happiness of one's dearest friend.) "I've discharged the brute for you."

"All right," said easy-going Jack. "I'll get another."

And poor Jarvis was discharged.

I do not think that Mrs. Saloeny slept much that night. Jack told me that she cried a good deal.

"She seems to think that she has had a narrow escape, old fellow," Jack said unsuspiciously.

"Yes," I answered, "very."

But he never knew how narrow.

RICHARD SIBERT.

The Five Blue Spots.

Day after day, and night after night, did I brood over the great discovery which I thought was about to be opened up to me. I had long had a belief in the progressive development of creation; I believed that it was still possible to find the spec—the germ from which I could raise up a perfectly organised living being. I felt a new and strange pleasure in believing that the mystery of creation was now solved—that from the first inorganic atom which had received the force of life all other created beings had slowly, gradually, regularly advanced up to the period in which I lived.

The power of creation—the secret of life—was my god. My belief was that the force of life might be given to this inorganic atom. My laboratory was perfectly furnished; my days were spent there, and often entire nights. My mind was absorbed in the great truth I was bringing to light.

The confined air of my laboratory at length affected my health; a change was absolutely necessary. I struggled against the idea of removing for some time, and often left my little wife with tears standing in her deep blue eyes, after she had unsuccessfully implored me to leave London for a short time. Dear Annie! and yet I loved her! Heavens, to think that I—but I must proceed with my story as it occurred.

We went to the North of Northumberland to stay with an old college friend, who had frequently asked us to come on previous occasions. We were received warmly, and as it was winter time, we had plenty of occupation.

A few brisk runs with the county foxhounds almost made me forget my laboratory. The weather at length changed; first to a severe frost with snow, and then to a complete thaw. The dismal north-east wind shrieked through the leafless trees, and drove torrents of sleet splashing against the old-fashioned windows.

Tiring of hoping, and weary of grumbling, I was driven to take refuge in my friend's library. After a long search for something interesting, I came upon a little brown volume bound with two dingy, metal clasps. On opening its dark and discoloured pages, I found it was written in French manuscript. A hurried glance showed me that the work was on alchemy, a translation from the Arabic. All my former hopes returned in an instant. I pored over the pages of my newly-obtained treasure till late in the evening, heedless of the impatience of my friends, who, after doing everything to entice me away, left me to my book and self.

* * * * *

The secret, then, was now mine; here, in this old, neglected book, I had found a groundwork for my exertions. All the truths I had collected, all the experiments I had made, bore me out. I saw what had prevented others in ancient times from carrying out their designs. They knew not the life-giving power; the wonders of electricity had not then been discovered.

Vaguely hinted at and darkly guessed at in their works, I saw them groping their way in mist and uncertainty; but I—I was surrounded by the light of science. Wonderful, mysterious truths broke in upon my mind. My whole method and plan of operations stood out clearly before me. A restless force urged me to commence my scheme instantly. I must leave for London that very night.

I found my wife and friends retiring to rest. I told them my intention of starting for town immediately. Remonstrance and entreaty were of no avail, and in less than an hour I was seated in the train on the way to London. The train seemed to drag slowly through the darkness, but about noon next day I arrived at my house.

Without rest I commenced my operations; late at night I had nearly completed them, and, worn out in body and mind, I threw myself on the floor to sleep, lulled by the subdued sound of my furnace, which moaned and muttered like an unhappy spirit.

Early in the morning, after a feverish sleep, I rose, tired and unrefreshed, and began to complete the last portion of my arrangements. This was to prepare the liquid from which the beings to whom I had to impart life were to spring. On account of the experiments made in my late studies, I had all the ingredients ready in my laboratory. I poured the mixture then carefully into a large silver trough. The liquid was perfectly limpid, and of a beautiful blue colour, probably on account of a salt of copper entering largely into its composition.

And now I prepared my batteries, and soon afterwards the electric agent was applied. To my astonishment, no decomposition took place; the liquid remained clear and beautifully blue. Thus it remained for some hours. I hung over it in breathless expectation; the only change apparently being that the colour seemed deeper and purer.

Night came on, and the electric fluid still quietly streamed into the liquid. By accident, in adjusting one of the wires, I dashed a few drops from the trough on to the floor. There was a hissing sound as they fell, and as they touched the ground they burst into flame. This I extinguished, and then applied myself to observing closely the contents of the vessel, for I knew that a great change had taken place in their constitution. I removed the light to a distance, fearing lest it should ignite the vapours which were now rising from the surface. On returning in the dark I found strange flashes of light circling in the interior of the fluid; these gradually became brighter till I was enabled to see every object in the room clearly by their radiance.

Subtle fumes were also rising from the surface. On inhaling these fumes at first I felt faint, but the sensation passed away. The perfume now was delicious—it was heavenly; I drank it in like nectar. I gazed upon the coruscating surface, and a delicious ecstasy seemed to pervade the whole being; delicious streams of music fell softly on my ears, and shadowy forms of ineffable beauty floated in the air around me. Suddenly an insane desire took possession of me; I longed to seize the silver vessel and quaff the deep blue poison. I stretched out my hand with a cry of joy—and then——

* * * * * *

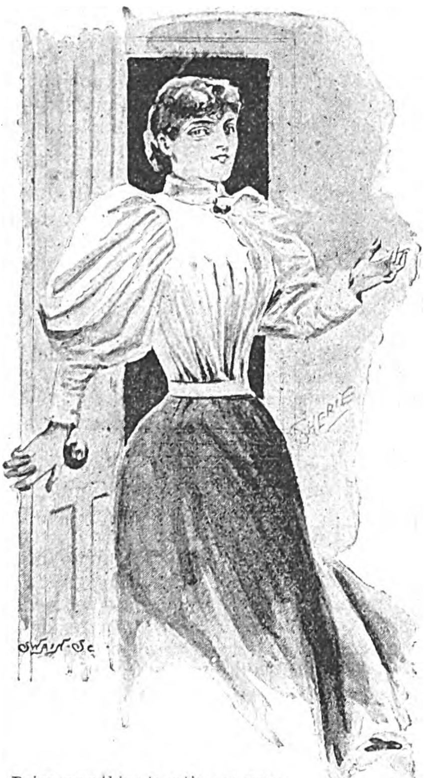
I recovered at last from a fever which had kept me insensible for a week. It was some days before I could get any explanation of how I came to be in my bedroom with my little wife attending to my every want, her gentle hands ever busy, and her eyes beaming with love and tenderness.

Gradually the details of my late occupation dawned upon my memory. I imagined I perceived the subtle odour diffusing itself through the chamber, and shuddered as I lay back on my pillow. A feeling of remorse came over me when I thought of my design. I felt as if I had intruded where man should fear to tread, and I felt a gratification in thinking that my designs had been frustrated.

One morning, when the doctor said that I was able to bear the news, I was told that one of the domestics, hearing a scream on that fearful night, had forced open the door of the laboratory. A strange, overpowering perfume, he said, at first drove him back, but rushing in a second time he found me lying insensible on the floor.

With breathless eagerness I asked if any of the apparatus had been touched? No, nothing had been moved. The windows had been opened to allow the poisonous vapours to disperse, the doors had been then locked and had never been opened since. A weight seemed lifted from my mind. I would instantly go down and destroy all that remained of my strange experiment.

I was still too weak; three or four days passed over, and then I was able to go downstairs. With trembling hands and beating heart (why, I could not tell) I turned the key and entered the laboratory, alone. Everything remained as I had left it a fortnight before.



Doing everything to entice me away.

There stood the ponderous batteries, long since worked out; there loosely hung the copper connecting wires, covered with green rust. The silver trough was tarnished and dim, but everything stood as I had left it.

The interior of the trough was coated with metallic copper, while the solution had almost entirely evaporated; there was still a small quantity of liquid at the bottom, covered with a thick, opal-tinted mould.

On looking closely at this mould-covered residue, I noticed a peculiar irregularity, or five little heaps or hillocks in regular arrangement—one at each angle of a square, and one in the centre—exactly like the five-side of a gaming die. These heaps were of such equal size and uniform shape that I could not attribute their presence to chance. I supposed that electricity had so acted upon the particles of the solution as to make them take up their present position.

I examined the mould under the microscope, and found it to be a fungus of a peculiar kind; but, in removing some more of the mould with a glass rod, I happened to touch one of the little heaps, and found under it a small blue crystal of cubic form, and under each of the other three angular hillocks I found a similar crystal.

On removing the mould from the centre hillock I found what, at first, I thought was a circular mass of the same crystalline substance, but imagine my surprise and horror when I saw the mass begin to struggle in the liquid, and, clearing away the silky needles of the mould, disclose to my view a large scarabæus of perfect shape, and of a deep blue colour.

A feeling of terror filled my mind. Whence had come this strange creature? Whence came the power with which he stretched out his antennæ, drew the blue case covers from his back, and cleared the mould from his filmy wings? Could this be the result of my researches—my days of toil, my nights of unrest? A beetle! I strove to laugh, but the attempt failed, and my heart sank within me with a strange foreboding. At this moment, from the interior of the trough, a peculiar sound arose, like the rapid ticking of a clock, although louder, and with a metallic tinkle in it. It was the same sound as that produced by the "death-tick" beetle.

As soon as the sound died away, I looked once more at the creature; he was half in and half out of the liquid, and evidently as yet unable to fly. The prominent desire in my mind was to destroy the insect, for his unearthly sounds and the strange flashing of his bead-like eyes made me tremble with a vague terror. However, I overcame the feeling, and determined to let him live for a few days.

Early next morning I visited the laboratory, but, on looking into the silver vessel, I was unable to detect any traces of the scarabæus. Puzzled and annoyed, I began to inspect the room, when I suddenly heard the ominous "death-tick," and after a few preliminary flights round the room, the beetle alighted upon the rim of the trough. A ray of sunlight glancing in fell upon him; his colour was exquisite—a rich, deep cærulean blue; he seemed a living sapphire, and would have been beautiful but for his loathsome form.

I had brought a piece of sugar with me, which I thought might please the taste of my new favourite. I placed it on the bench near; he flew directly towards it, and settled upon it, but, as if dissatisfied, a moment afterwards he flew back towards the rim of the trough. I heard a low whine at my feet, and, looking down, saw my wife's little dog, "Lalette." I threw the rejected sugar towards her, and soon heard her crunching it up in her jaws. Shortly afterwards I left the room, and as I closed the door louder than ever I heard the sound of the "death-tick."

I was engaged out of doors during the day, and in the evening my wife's first question was whether I had seen "Lalette" that day? I then remembered that she had been in the laboratory with me in the morning, and, fancying that she must be locked in, I went to the door and, opening it, called her by name. There was no movement or response; but, as I called again, something whirred past me in the air and dashed into the hall. I felt certain that my beetle had escaped. Shutting the door hastily, I rushed back for a light. On re-entering the laboratory, I could neither see nor hear anything of the beetle; but in the middle of the floor, exactly where I had left her in the morning, poor "Lalette" was lying dead.

Some portions of the sugar were still lying beside her—she had been poisoned. Once more I sought diligently for the beetle, but no trace was to be found. "Lalette" was a great favourite, and my poor wife was inconsolable. I told her the dog must have picked up some poison in my room, and with promises of a new canine favourite soon her grief calmed down.

All that night an indefinable horror took possession of me. When I thought of that living sapphire being at large in the house, a firm belief possessed me that "Lalette" had been killed by that poisonous insect. All that night he haunted my dreams; several times I started from slumber, thinking I heard that unearthly death-tick. I determined in my feverish sleeplessness to search every nook and corner of the house on the morrow. Somehow I felt at times that my existence, my destiny, was bound up in the life of this hideous insect.

Reproaches seemed spoken to me, in one dream of that long night, that I had created a living poison, and sent it out into the world. I shuddered and awoke. The words seemed burnt upon my brain. Could I ever forget them? Listen!

Next morning I heard that one of the domestics, a young, pretty girl of nineteen years, was ill. Three days after she died. The doctors said it was heart disease. One of them, a sententious old quack, said the only peculiarity of the case was a strange mark upon the girl's breast. A pang went through my whole frame. A mark. What mark? What was it like? By a mysterious perception I knew that this mark concerned me. But how? I soon knew. On the cold white breast of the corpse were five blue spots, arranged like the spots on the five side of a die!

Controlling my emotion as best I could, I locked myself in my room, and burying my face in my hands, cried in agony: "Accursed beast! this is thy work; the blood of an innocent being is on my hands." My brain seemed whirling round, and every attempt to collect my thoughts was in vain. The infernal creature—my creature!—had murdered this young girl, and how knew I where he would stop?

Every corner of the servants' room I searched, but no trace of the fiendish beast was there. After some time spent in this vain search, I left the room and joined my wife and friends below. They were shocked at my appearance. I sat apart, moody and silent. A heavy cloud of presentiment overpowered me, and I felt that my cup was not yet full, but that, when full, I should have to drink it to its bitter dregs. We separated to retire to rest; but though few of us expected to find it, no sooner had I laid my head on the pillow than I fell asleep—a dull, heavy sleep, as dreamless and almost as breathless as that of the corpse in the next chamber. I do not know how long I slept, but I awoke suddenly with an undefinable feeling of terror.

How dark the room is getting! Put your ear close to my mouth; I feel faint with speaking loud. But I must tell you all.

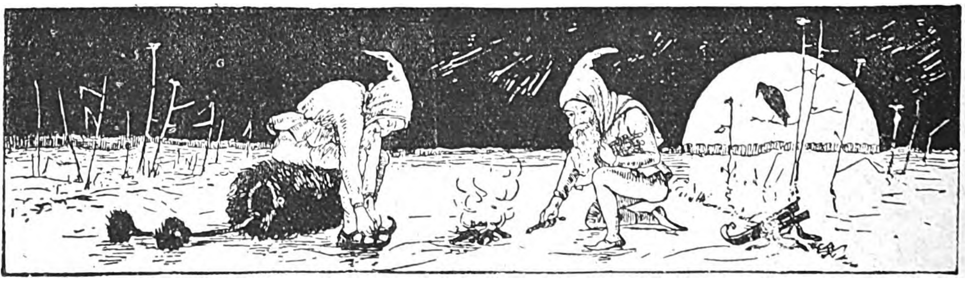
I awoke, and, seemingly, close to my ear, loud and distinct, I heard the death-tick. My hands clenched when I knew he was within my reach—close to my ear. "Heaven help me," I muttered, "if I do not crush the insect now!"

The moonbeams poured in through the window and filled the room with a mysterious light. The rays struck across the pillows of the bed, and fell softly on the upturned face of my wife. She slumbered peacefully, but on her snowy brow, glittering as blue as heaven itself, was the loathsome beetle. With one blow I struck him from her face, and then leapt from the bed. I saw his jewel-like form upon the ground; I seized it and crushed it in my hands. A fierce pain shot up my arm; my blood seemed changed to molten lead. The agony was excruciating. I dropped the vile abortion; he flew from me, and, dashing through the half-closed window, disappeared into the moonlight night.

My story is well-nigh told. You know—you know how my wife sickened and died. But, listen! you did not see the blue mark upon her brow.

How dark the room is, and how slowly my heart is beating! Look at this arm—here! Above the elbow there is the death-brand—five blue spots arranged like the spots on a die! I have but an hour to live. You know my secret. Let me rest.

D. SHAW.



A Waif from the Eternal City.

A BLOCK had occurred in one of the most crowded streets of Manchester. The carriage of the Chief Constable, with its well-matched bays, was forced to wait behind a brewer's dray till the confusion should have somewhat abated.

"Now, how long will this continue? We are late enough as it is."

The speaker's tone was that of a spoilt child, to whose pleasure all things are expected to give way, even the high pressure and the hurry of life of a great city. A beautiful woman was she, the pale spring sun rays—for it was early March—just striking the red gold lights in her warm brown hair as she sat there wrapped in dark Russian sables. She had a great bouquet of blue Parma violets in her hand; their subtle fragrance was flung abroad by the young spring breeze. Her eyes wandered to the other side of the street, and then they caught sight of something which gave her beauty-loving nature a throb of passionate delight.

"Paul, did you ever see such a face? It is faultless."

The petulant tones had a touch of rapture in them now. The Chief Constable adjusted his eye-glass, and followed the direction of his wife's eyes.

A boy stood on the pavement opposite, his basket filled with small plaster images. Such a face was his as Murillo loved to paint—a face with the beauty of dark eyes and the warm colouring of the sunny South.

"Call him across, Paul. I want to see him nearer."

"Oh, nonsense, my dear. Let us be going on now. The way is clear again."

"Paul!"

It is impossible to give the tone in which the name was spoken, half incredulous surprise, impatience, quick, intolerant anger—it was a mixture of all three.

The Chief Constable thought it wiser to obey. Pulling the checkstring, he beckoned to the boy. The lad came to the carriage door. Mrs. Bassett spoke to him in Italian. The soft, sonorous words came in a pretty English lisp from her lips: "Where do you come from?"

"Rome," he answered, and smiled up into her face, and then his eyes wandered to the violets she held in her hand. He gave a low cry, and stretched out his hands towards the blossoms with a gesture instinct with grace and longing.

She gave him some, and watched his face grow grave and sad as he held them close. Then she said:

"I should like to paint you—put you in one of my pictures. I will give you money—gold if you are good and still. Will you come to my house to-morrow?"

The boy's face flushed, his eyes were alight, his lips, scarlet as some bright blossom of his own land.

"To-morrow. Do not forget," said Mrs. Bassett to the boy, and she dropped the silver into his hand.

The carriage moved on.

For a moment the perfume of those violets, the flowers of his own dear land, was flung into the boy's face; then he stood alone upon the pavement, gazing after the swiftly-rolling carriage, with a little heap of silver and a cluster of Parma violets in his small brown hands.

* * * * *

"It is finished, Paul. Tell me what you think of it."

Mr. Bassett looked up from the papers he was studying as his wife came to his side with a square of canvas in her arms.

He regarded it silently for awhile through his eye-glass. Then he said, slowly: "It is a really wonderful likeness."

She passed her hand through his arm, and they stood together looking at the painting.

"It is very good," said Bassett again.

"Then it must indeed be so, for you are always sparing of your praise—always rather hard upon failure," she answered a little wistfully.

"Why should one fail? One ought to succeed in small as well as great things. But women never will so long as they work only from caprice."

It was true he had never yet failed in skill or energy or in clever administration since he had held the office of Chief Constable of Manchester, and he was not a little proud of the fact.

* * * * *

Autumn had passed away, and winter's cold, white pall was covering with icy impartiality the grimy streets of the city, when Manchester rang from end to end with one theme—the sudden, strange disappearance of the little Italian image-seller. The boy had become well known in the streets, through which, day after day, he wandered with his little store of plaster images.

When the news had spread through the force that Mrs. Bassett was painting his picture, the men had felt that he was somehow especially entitled to their protection, and many a friendly word had passed between them and the little soft-voiced lad—who was "as pretty as a girl," one said to another. Ladies, too—friends of Mrs. Bassett, who had seen the painting and pronounced it "too lovely"—stopped their carriages as he passed, and gave him bright smiles and brighter sixpences. And now, without word or warning, he had suddenly disappeared.

Every effort made by the police to discover his whereabouts was completely baffled. They more than suspected foul play. But this uncertainty as to the fate of the beautiful child was not long to remain.

One morning the Chief Constable was greatly disturbed by a report from one of his men that a "subject" purchased by some students bore a strange resemblance to the missing boy, and that, when the little body came to be examined, it was found that all the teeth had been extracted, probably from fear of identification on account of their unusual beauty.

These were the days of the "Resurrectionists." Burke and Hare, as yet undiscovered, were plying in secret their awful trade. But even already vague rumours had risen from time to time of graves rifled of their dead in the lonely watches of the night.

Mrs. Bassett was very much distressed. Full of generous and kindly impulse, she had concocted many a plan for her little protégé's future; had intended—when the picture should be finished—to rescue him from the streets, and place him somewhere in safe and kindly keeping. She urged her husband to leave no means untried of discovering his fate.

The Chief Constable, on his part, was both perplexed and annoyed by his repeated failures to run to earth the boy's murderers. Every effort was made by himself and his men to find some clue. The great probability was that the clothes the child had worn were destroyed; but the teeth, Mr. Bassett thought, being saleable, sooner or later might be traced. Failure in anything he had determined upon was trying to a man of Paul Bassett's turn of mind; but to fail in a matter like the present, with the eyes of all Manchester upon him, was peculiarly vexatious.

It preyed upon him to an extent so great that neither night nor day was he able to forget it. Like a thing of darkness, it haunted his sleeping and his waking hours.

And one night it came to pass that he dreamed a curious dream. He fancied he was riding along a lonely road in the dead of night. He knew the road well. It was one he often traversed in his waking hours. But when he came to a part where two roads met he thought he hesitated, and then, instead of turning to the right, as he was conscious even in his dream of usually doing, he took the left, an untrodden, gloomy lane, which led to a wide, lonely moor.

He rode on and on, and by-and-bye came to a solitary house on the edge of the desolate moor. It stood out against the dark background as clearly as a silhouette drawing in the moonlight. Suddenly—he knew not how—there was borne in upon him the conviction that the clue to the mystery of the Italian boy's death lay within that lonely house.

He drew rein and stopped. He felt a sensation of horror creep over him, which he tried to shake off, but it held him like a terrible nightmare. Suddenly the dream changed, and he found himself trying to enter. The door was fastened, but he burst it open. A sound of stealthy footsteps and whispered words was followed by death-like silence. Cold grey shadows filled the rooms, and a nameless terror dogged his footsteps. But, impelled by some all-powerful instinct, Paul Bassett went up the stairs, and entered a small room at the top—the only one that commanded a view of the back of the house. He saw before him a large garden, overhung by dark trees that cast weird shadows about it in the pale moonbeams.

Mr. Bassett, still having that strange sense of being under compulsion, descended the stairs, and found his way into the garden.

He was conscious of carefully searching beneath the trees, when suddenly his foot struck against a small lump of clay. Kneeling down, he felt with his hands under the long, dank grass, and found that the earth had been recently disturbed, and covered again by the coarse sods, and in an instant he knew, as if by a revelation, that what he was seeking lay below.

And just then the Chief Constable awoke. So vivid had been his dream, so strongly lay the impression of it upon him, that he started up with the fancy that he was still in that lonely garden. He lay down again, pondering over it a little perplexedly. It had seemed so real, so vivid, he could not at once shake off the impression it had left upon him; and by-and-bye he fell asleep again, and dreamed precisely the same dream in all its details. It was just as before; nothing was changed, from the time he was riding along the lonely lane till he stumbled over the little lump of clay, and saw that near where he stood the ground had been upturned, and then, as before, he awoke.

He was not by any means a superstitious man, but the clearness of the dream, and the fact of his having twice dreamed it, impressed him greatly. He awoke his wife and told her. No one likes to be aroused from sleep and told a horrible dream. The Chief Constable met with small sympathy from Mrs. Bassett, who told him to "hold his tongue and not frighten her to death."

He fell asleep, and again he dreamed the same dream, and awoke as he stood by the broken sod. He sprang from his bed and began hurriedly to dress.

"Really, Paul, I believe you are mad," said Mrs. Bassett sleepily. "What on earth are you about?"

But when he told her of his dreaming the third time the same strange dream, she entreated him not to go.

But he promised her to take four of his most experienced men with him, and she gave a reluctant consent—silently, except for the ring of their horses' hoofs upon the frost-bound earth, the chief constable and his men rode along, turning to the left as they reached the cross-roads, and down the long lane till the wide moor lay before them. And then Paul Bassett saw the house just as it had appeared to him in his dream. It stood aside on the edge of the desolate moor, silent as the grave, lonely as the place of death. Ivy covered thickly its grey walls, and tapped against the latticed panes in the rising wind like the touch of ghostly fingers. Pale, wan moonbeams fell aslant the garden, and sombre shadows gathered thickly under the trees. One of the men dismounted and knocked sharply.

"Open, in the King's name!"

The Chief Constable held the search-warrant in his hand as he sat motionless upon his horse, waiting. There was neither sound nor movement within. The constable knocked again loudly, and as he did so they distinctly heard stealthy footsteps and whispered words.

"Open, in the King's name!"

And the door was opened by a woman.

"Dismount," said the Chief Constable sharply, "and follow me," and he flung himself from the saddle. Instructing two of his men to watch that no one left the house, without another word he led the way to the place of his dream.

"Dig here, my men; you will find what we are seeking," he said quietly. And he looked on as one still in a dream, his breath coming thick and fast, his heart beating heavily, as his men slowly turned the loosened earth. Cautiously and in silence they dug, and their chief stood by with a pale, stern face. An exclamation from one of the men made him start. The spade had struck against something. They stooped, lowered their lanterns, and took out of the earth a small bundle. Yes, there were the worn jacket and little threadbare garments of the murdered boy, and as one of the men half tenderly lifted the poor little coat one or two pearly teeth fell from its folds. A savage murmur rose to the men's lips. "Poor little lad."

The Chief Constable's voice was husky.

"What is that?"

Sudden life and movement in the silent house and a sound of shots. Mr. Bassett gave his men some hurried, sharp directions. They dashed into the house only just in time; their comrades were engaged in a hand-to-hand struggle with the murderers who were armed.

Needless to say that at their trial they pleaded guilty, in the face of such evidence as this strange discovery.

Needless also to say that that was the first and only time in his life that Paul Bassett, Chief Constable of Manchester, was ever aided by a dream in the discovery of a crime.

Annie Davis.

[All Rights Reserved by the Author

The Queen of Night.

By HEADON HILL,

Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

Gaston Vizard gives to Sir Simon Crawshay an introduction to the agent of the vessel Queen of Night, in order that he may make special arrangements with regard to the trip of his wealthy ward, Miss Challenor. Dr. Zavertal calls on Vizard, and informs him that a new captain will be wanted before the next cruise.

The Queen of Night, under the guise of a popular pleasure boat, is used in reality by a set of unscrupulous adventurers for the purpose of doing away with objectionable relatives.

In Chapter I. Cyril Forrester receives his dismissal from the Flower Steamship Company for breaking regulations while saving the life of Miss Aline Challenor. He applies for and obtains from Nathan and Co., of Fenchurch Street, the vacant command of the ocean yacht Queen of Night.

Becoming engaged to Miss Challenor (who comes in for a quarter of a million on attaining her majority), he obtains an interview with Sir Simon Crawshay, who promptly refuses a consent to his engagement, and informs him that his ward will be out of his way for the next six weeks, as she is about to take a cruise on board the Queen of Night! On going aboard he is introduced to Dr. Zavertal, and meets among the passengers Miss Challenor, who is under the care of the doctor.

CHAPTER VI.

THE DOCTOR'S FIRST PATIENT.

IT was not till noon on the day after leaving port, when we were well down Channel, at the back of the Isle of Wight, that I felt justified in handing over the care of the ship to the chief officer, and in quitting the bridge. The day was fine, and the sea as calm as a duck pond, so that nearly all the passengers were on deck enjoying the fresh salt air, and busily engaged in forming new friendships which should last through the cruise. Already there were signs that one or two promising flirtations had arisen. The weather had tempted the ladies to put on their brightest summer costumes, everyone had left their worries behind, and the scene was one of light laughter and brilliant colour.

I went first to my room to remove the traces of the long night watch, and change my clothes. Having made my toilet, I strolled aft, and soon found myself doing the civil to the best of my ability to the various groups under the awning, purposely abstaining from seeking Aline at first. It was no part of my plan to make her conspicuous, or to attract to her the gossip which takes root so easily on ship-board. Zavertal was there, apparently in his element—introducing, advising, amusing, all in a breath—and as soon as he noticed my presence I saw that he was making the most of it. The words, "the Captain," are magical ones at sea, and their owner is an object of interest to all his nominal subjects to a quite unmerited degree.

"The Captain—Captain Forrester," I heard the Doctor murmur in a deferential whisper, as I approached a bevy of smart folk congregated round an old gentleman seated in a deck chair, who seemed to be telling funny stories. Zavertal's announcement caused all eyes to be turned on me, and he proceeded aloud:

"Good morning, sir. You have had a long spell of work while the rest of us have been playing and sleeping, I am afraid."

I returned his greeting, and, assuming the airs of a veteran skipper, I remarked that it was always my practice to take charge of the ship myself while in sight of land. Then I asked to be introduced to the other people around, and he pronounced a string of names, all immaterial to this story, though I got to be familiar enough with most of them in the next week or two. I do not know whether it was by intention, but Zavertal omitted to mention the old gentleman in the deck-chair, and he promptly put on an expression of comic resentment.

"Why should you pass me over, Doctor?" he protested with a distinct American accent. "I guess you think my yarns would keep the Captain from his duty, and that it would be safer for all parties if he didn't know me."

Zavertal looked at him, smiling with his lips; but, though the glance was not directed at me, and I could not therefore be certain, I fancied that the cold glint was in his eyes as he answered:

"I am quite sure, sir, it would be very much safer, if you always prove as amusing—to me, at any rate—as you have this morning, though that was not really the reason why I was so rude as to fail to introduce you to the Captain. The fact is I am sorry to have to confess that you are one of the very few passengers whose names I am not yet quite certain about."

Was it that there was a half-tone in Zavertal's voice that suggested to me some subtle meaning in his words, or was it only that instinct was beginning to teach me to look for such unconsciously? I cannot say truly even now, but I know that the thought crossed my mind and caused me to pay closer attention to him whom he addressed. The passenger in the deck-chair, as I have said, was old, his appearance being that of seventy at least, even allowing for a liberal discount due to his lively briskness of manner. I had come across the type many times before in many ships—the gay "old dog" of a passenger who prefers young society of both sexes, and attracts it to himself by a pleasing personality, and a fund of anecdote. This particular specimen had a rubicund face, shining like a setting sun, amid luxuriant masses of snow-white hair, his bright eyes twinkled humorously, and he was dressed, rather young for his age, in a well-cut suit of light dittos, surmounted by a white Panama straw hat.

One or two promising flirtations had arisen.

If there was any hidden meaning in the Doctor's speech the snowy-haired passenger showed no sign of suspecting it. Raising his hat lightly, more especially to me, but so as to include the general company, he said:

"Emerson C. Waldo, sir, is my name—General Waldo, late of the United States Cavalry, on a Yurrup tour for the benefit of health and education. I reckon I've powerfully neglected both, sir, in my time, having mostly spent my life in fighting Indians on the plains."

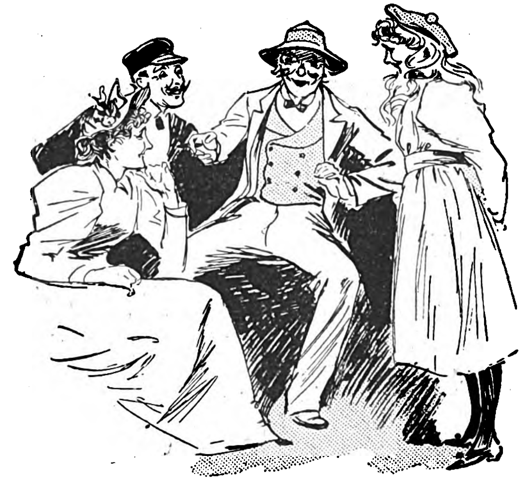
"Well, General," I said, "I hope that you will make up for lost time, and get all the arrears of enjoyment due to you on the Queen of Night. It's not in the contract, but we mean to give you fine weather, smooth seas, and, when we get down South, blue skies—if we can. We start fair anyhow."

I remained chatting a minute or two, and when I moved away Zavertal separated from the group and joined me in a promenade of the deck.

"You have been so occupied, sir, that I have got the start of you with the passengers," he said. "I may as well take the opportunity of posting you in what I have picked up. They are an average lot."

"Many invalids?" I asked, with a vivid remembrance of the bo'sun's reference to "sea-funerals," though my question seemed almost silly amid that scene of gaiety and robust health.

"A few, but not many serious cases. There, though you might not think it, is one of them," the Doctor replied, pointing to a happy-looking, chubby-faced boy of fourteen who was amusing some of the elders by skylarking on the lower rattlins. "That is the young Earl of Darranmore, who, if he ever attains his majority, will possess a rent-roll of forty thousand a year. I fear that the lad is doomed, though—heart complications." And Zavertal sighed sympathetically as we wheeled for another turn.



The gay "old dog" of a passenger.

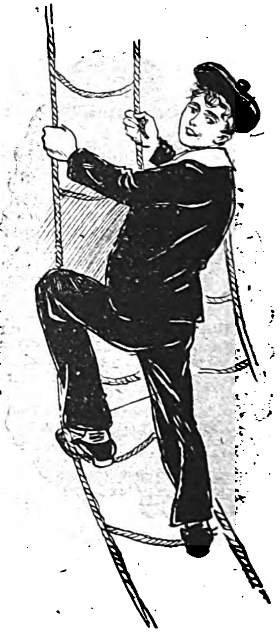
"That is hard lines," I said. "Are there any others about whom you are anxious?"

"There's a man called Desmond Orlebar, whom I doubt if we shall bring home again. He has gone the pace, and got himself into a generally played-out condition. There he is—sitting wrapped up on the other side of the deck, and indulging in his old games to the last, I see."

Following the direction of his glance, I saw a thin, sallow-faced man of forty, wearing a thick plaid ulster and propped up with pillows on a portable bamboo lounge. A steward had just brought him a mahogany-coloured brandy and soda, and Mr. Orlebar's efforts to take the glass from the tray into his shaking hands were painful to witness. There was no doubt about this passenger's illness.

"Poor beggar," I said. "And does that complete the list of dangerous cases?"

"Of the really dangerous ones, yes," replied Zavertal. "There are one or two other patients who come to me with bad reports from their relations or private medical attendants; but I see no reason to be apprehensive about any of them—except, perhaps, one."



A chubby-faced boy of fourteen.

"Who is that?" I asked, somewhat carelessly, I fear, as we reached the limit of our promenade at the stern. Facing about we both turned inwards to each other, so that as Zavertal answered my question his eyes for a moment dwelt on mine. Again they had that strange glint.

"She is a Miss Challenor," was the reply that so startled me that it would have been affectation on his part to have pretended not to notice its palpable effect. He hastened to add: "I rather fancy Nathan, before he went ashore, told me that you had met her."

"Yes, in a way I may be said to have saved her life," I replied, and, seeing no reason for further concealing a fact which was sure to get abroad in the ship, I briefly narrated the circumstances, only suppressing my present relations with Aline. "But surely," I concluded, "there must be some mistake about the state of Miss Challenor's health? I had a few words with her yesterday, and she laughed at the idea of there being anything the matter with her."

We turned again, and again I met the Doctor's gaze piercing me from out of a face that smiled with sad benevolence in every feature but the eyes. "The old story," he said sympathetically. "Everyone concedes the danger but the patient herself. I have not been called on to examine her yet, but her guardian wrote that it was an almost hopeless case of pulmonary phthisis. I presume her friends thought it unnecessary to frighten the poor girl by letting her know the nature and extent of her malady. However, as you take a very natural interest in her, I will observe closely, and let you know in a day or two. Excuse me, but I think I am wanted—and, Captain, if you will allow me to advise, you will turn in for a spell. Your night-watch has taken it out of you, and you look as if you needed rest."

Needed rest! As he left my side to go to someone who was beckoning to him, the sun seemed to be blotted out, and the voices and laughter around made a horrid blur in my ears like the "racing" of machinery when the main shaft breaks. To think that Aline—my sweet Aline, in the heyday of her youth and beauty, and in the height of our new-found happiness—was dying of consumption!

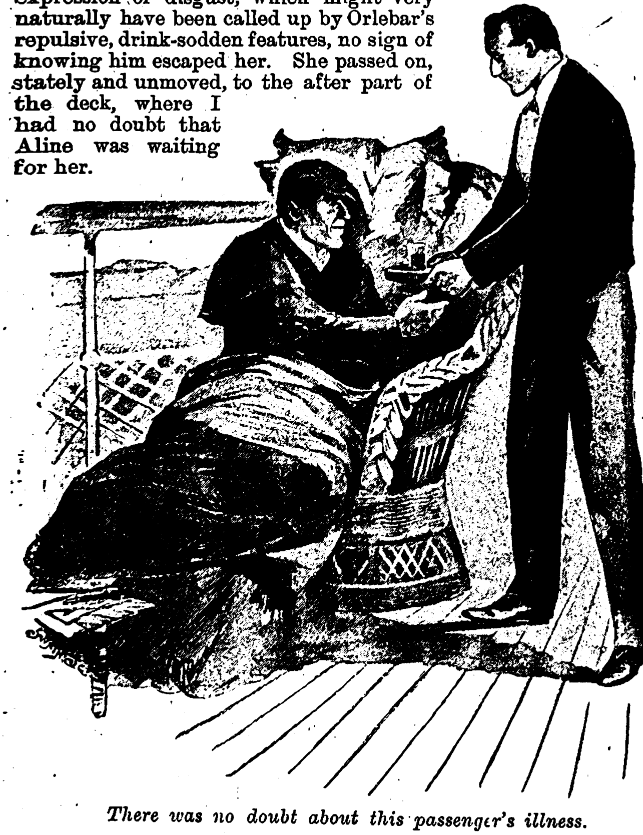
Then gradually the weight of sudden oppression was lifted, and, reaction setting in, I would not, could not, believe that the trouble existed at all. I recalled what Aline had said about the "wish being father to the thought" with Sir Simon, and I began to suspect that he had imagined what, probably from interested motives, he desired to become a reality. It was the first inkling of the truth, but how far short of it the events to be related must show.

The wind was light and steady from the East, and the glass high. We were clanking down Channel at an easy sixteen knots, with the massive front of the Main-bench cliffs glistening white in the sunlight five miles away on the starboard beam. There was nothing to keep me on deck, and having satisfactorily explained away the cause of my anxiety I decided to take Zavertal's advice and turn in till dinner time, leaving him to do the honours at the luncheon table.

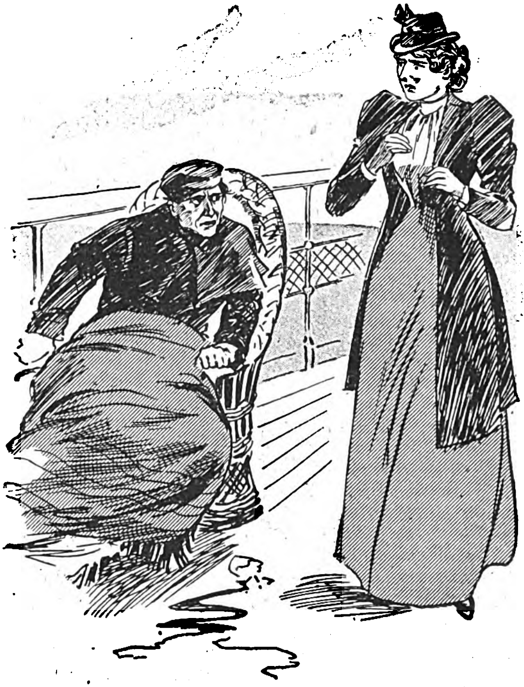
In going to my room I had to pass the spot where Mr. Orlebar's lounge was placed, and just as I was approaching it I met Aline's chaperon, as yet unknown to me, coming along the deck alone from the opposite direction. The sick man caught sight of her while I was within two feet of him, and the effect of her appearance upon him was as inexplicable as it was sudden. His shaking fingers dropped the now empty glass with a crash upon the deck, and I distinctly heard him murmur:

"Great Heaven, it's Ella!"

The recognition, if such it was to prove, did not appear to be mutual. Mrs. Brinkworth's attention was, of course, attracted by the falling glass, and she looked at the occupant of the lounge; but beyond a slight flush and a fleeting expression of disgust, which might very naturally have been called up by Orlebar's repulsive, drink-sodden features, no sign of knowing him escaped her. She passed on, stately and unmoved, to the after part of the deck, where I had no doubt that Aline was waiting for her.



There was no doubt about this passenger's illness.



"Great Heaven, it's Ella!"

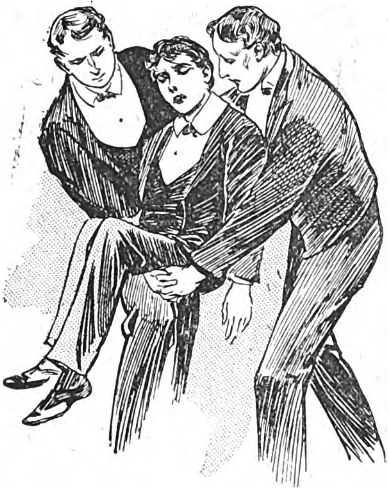
I had seen too many chance meetings on ship-board for the incident to make any impression on me, and I should have dismissed it altogether from my mind if one of the parties to it had not been so intimately connected with Aline. As it was I merely noted it mentally for future inquiry in the event of anything tending to show that Orlebar's presence on the ship would cause annoyance to a lady who had already won my dear girl's regard.

After a good sleep I awoke refreshed, and comforted with the reflection that after all, beyond specifying the nature of her imaginary illness, Zavertal had really said nothing more than Aline herself to confirm Sir Simon Crawshay's estimate of her health. The Doctor had not examined her chest, and his statement was based on nothing more substantial than a secondhand opinion which was probably all moonshine. I dressed therefore with every anticipation of a pleasant evening, and after a short visit to the bridge to see that all was right, I went down and mingled with the passengers, eventually making my way to where Aline was sitting with Mrs. Brinkworth.

I have the instinct common to most people of knowing a friend from an enemy at first sight, and something told me from that moment that the quiet, sad-faced woman was Aline's friend, and therefore mine. I think she had already guessed our secret, but if not she had every opportunity of doing so in the cheery half-hour we three spent together before the first gong sounded for dinner. We lovers were too confident in the future and in the freedom which Aline's majority would bring her in a few months, to affect more reserve than etiquette demanded in public. The shy and sentimental stage of courtship had been got over in the old Dahlia, and there was a very frank understanding between us.

When I sat down presently to preside for the first time in the saloon, I found that I had General Waldo for my left-hand neighbour, and on the other side an ancient dowager—Lady Carberry—who took the place of honour by right of her title. Aline and Mrs. Brinkworth were seated at my table, but some way down, and too far off for sustained conversation with them.

Parallel with mine was another table, at the head of which Doctor Zavertal presided, with the little Earl of Darranmore and the latter's tutor on one hand, and a financial magnate and his wife on the other. Mr. Desmond Orlebar was also placed at the Doctor's table, but some half-dozen seats away. The "captain's table," of course, accommodated those who were, or considered themselves, the élite of the ship, and it was not till I found myself at the head of the brilliant assemblage, and the most deferred-to personage in it, that I appreciated Nathan's compliment in selecting me for the job.



Lifted the young Earl's limp form.

Dinner proceeded gaily, and I worked hard to make up for lost time in cultivating friendly relations with the passengers. General Waldo kept our end of the table in a constant roar of laughter with comic descriptions of Western life, at which even the starchy old lady on my right had to unbend, and by the time dessert was reached I concluded that the social part of my duty was easier than I had expected. Things were going equally smoothly at the other table, where, with his quips and cranks, the young Earl was evidently establishing himself a general favourite. The interest in the merry youngster even spread to our table, his boyish laughter at Zavertal's good-humoured sallies causing many heads to be turned to look at him. General Waldo, who could see him as he sat, seemed to watch him unceasingly with the sympathetic attention due to a kindred spirit.

Suddenly, as the ladies were beginning to leave the saloon, Waldo plucked me by the sleeve, and exclaimed:

"Thunder, Captain! The swell of the ocean ought to be kinder to the swell on the ocean. What's up with our young aristocrat yonder?"

I thought at first that the veteran was merely cracking one of his copious wheezes, but I looked round to the head of the other table, and sure enough there was the Earl of Darranmore leaning back in his chair and gone deathly white, while Zavertal had risen and was deftly unbuttoning the boy's collar with one hand and feeling his pulse with the other. The night was dead calm, and save for the slight tremor caused by the pulsing of the engines the ship was as steady as a church. Waldo's suggestion of sea-sickness seemed, therefore, wide of the mark, and I recollected what the Doctor had said of the lad's weak heart in the morning.

At Zavertal's bidding a couple of assistant stewards lifted the young Earl's limp form and bore it away to his state-room, the Doctor himself following, but pausing as he passed out to say to me:

"It is only a faint. He will be all right to-morrow, but I fear this confirms the report I had of him—poor little chap!" And Zavertal hurried away tapping his broad waistcoat in the region of the heart, and repeating again: "Poor little chap."

The tables were already pretty well thinned, and in a couple of minutes the incident was forgotten by such as remained, Waldo resuming the thread of a yarn, in which he had been interrupted, about a Texan horse-thief, scoring all his points, bringing the story to a close, and thoroughly enjoying the applause that greeted the climax. For a moment or two, he sat as though meditating a fresh narrative, then suddenly jumped up and exclaimed:

"Pineapple, by Jove. I guess I'm a whale on pineapple," and before I could tell him that the steward should bring him some, he had crossed over to the now vacant table where Lord Darranmore had been sitting, and had seized a dish of the fruit that was there, coming back with it to his own place.

As he resumed his seat he looked at me. For the fraction of a second all the babbling fun in his face changed to stern scrutiny, and in that brief, steadfast gaze, remembrance came to me of someone quite different whom I had seen before—of Kennard, the American visitor to Nathan's office, who had forfeited his passage. The likeness was one of expression only, and was gone like a flash, as with one of his jokes Waldo set to upon the pineapple with a relish that justified his eagerness to secure it.

CHAPTER VII.

The Stowaway.

The next morning everyone was glad to hear that Zavertal's prediction had been verified, and that Lord Darranmore was not much the worse for his faint at the dinner-table. It got to be generally known about the ship that the boy's heart was affected, and when he came on deck during the morning, looking pale and seedy, he became the victim of a universal sympathy which didn't best please him.

"It's all rot," was his indignant reply when I met him and remarked that he would have to "go easy" and take care of himself. "There's nothing the matter with me—at least I never had anything the matter before. I expect I had too much of that meringue cream."

The weather continued fine and sunny, with just enough breeze to revive the jaded among the passengers without making them uncomfortable. Being now clear of the Channel, my presence on the bridge was seldom required, and I contrived to have several delightful chats with Aline, Mrs. Brinkworth discreetly making opportunities for a portion of them to be tête-à-tête.

At the same time I did not allow my love-affair to obscure my duties to the other passengers, and I worked hard to add to the general yacht-like life on board. All sorts of amusements in the musical and theatrical line were being projected, the Doctor showing untiring energy in discovering amateur talent where it might least have been expected. He even laid an embargo on General Waldo to give a character recitation from Rip Van Winkle at a variety entertainment that he was planning for the succeeding night. The Yankee veteran was discussing Zavertal's enterprise in a constitutional we took together before tiffin.

"Wonderful pushing fellow this Doctor of yours, Captain," he said, as we paced the deck. "You and he are just cut out for running a marine hydropathic show like this. He's an old partner of yours, I reckon."

"On the contrary; I've only known him a week," I replied. "This is my first voyage in the Queen, you must remember."

"Ah, but friend Zavertal hasn't always been at this game, I opine," returned Waldo, with an impatient gesture and one of his quizzical glances. "You can bet he qualified in a wider school than this. I guessed you might have pulled together previously."

"No, General," I said, wondering a little at his persistence after my first denial. "The Doctor and I are quite new acquaintances, though I must say that I hope we shall one day be old ones. He is a pleasant companion to sail with, and about the best man for the berth of ship's surgeon I ever came across."

"A responsible position—that of ship's doctor," remarked Waldo, more thoughtfully than as yet I had heard him speak. "It entails the powers of life and death—the perfectly unchecked power of life and death."

On the top of this conversation I was rather amused when Zavertal on the same afternoon took an opportunity of mentioning Waldo to me from much the same point of view.

"Fine specimen of the globe-trotting American, that neighbour of yours at the saloon table," he said. "You and he seem to hit it off together uncommonly well, sir."

"Oh, he is all right, up to date," I replied. "Perhaps one might get bored in time with his everlasting yarns of Western life."

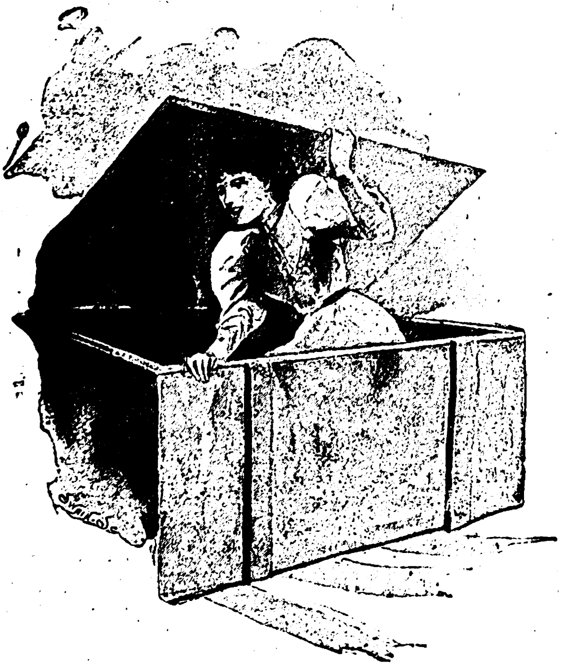
"I thought you might have met him before—you seemed so friendly," Zavertal said, in the careless tone of one who really wants to know.

"No, I never saw the General before on sea or land," I said. "He is not the sort of man one would forget either, seeing that he has a peculiarity. He strikes me as being a little more "twangy" than most Americans of his class nowadays."

"You are right," replied the Doctor, "and it is bound to be genuine. That is about the only thing an American wouldn't exaggerate purposely."

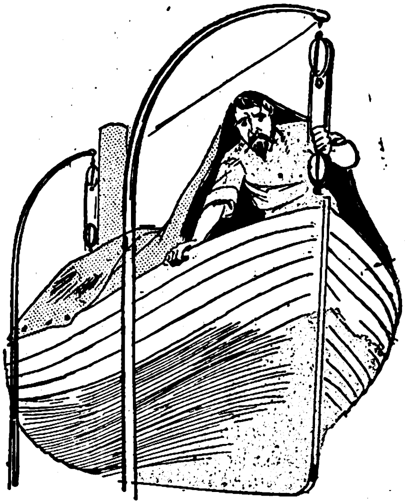
I had got pretty intimate with Zavertal during the four or five days we spent together before the ship sailed. I had told him of the American, Kennard, who had called at Nathan's office while I was waiting to be engaged, and I had since discussed with him his strange forfeiture of his passage, Zavertal remarking playfully that perhaps the gentleman with the pistol had met him again and had not been so forbearing. I was now on the point of mentioning casually how for half a second on the previous night Waldo's expression had reminded me of the absent passenger, when someone hailed me from the bridge and the subject dropped.

A little later on the afternoon of the third day out, Zavertal proposed a game of "hide-and-seek," and was soon surrounded by a number of younger passengers eager to join. Several of them hid in turn, and were found in more or less probable hiding-places—under the companion-stairs, and behind the piano in the music-room, while one adventurous maiden gave a longer chase than usual by stowing herself in the flag-locker behind the aft wheel-house. Then it was Lord Darranmore's turn to hide, and the searchers all retired to the dome, over the saloon stairs, while he concealed himself.



By stowing herself in the flag-locker.

Aline and Mrs. Brinkworth, in common with a number of other non-players, were sitting under the awning, watching the game, when it chanced on to the upper deck, and chatting to myself and to General Waldo, who by this time was on speaking terms with every living soul on the ship. Thus we four were together when Lord Darranmore came out of the deck-house to hide. The best places on the upper deck having already been exhausted by other players, the ladies expressed the opinion that he would have to go below if he was to show good sport.



A woebegone figure.

"With due submission, I guess not," remarked Waldo. "The young 'un has got a best bower to play, to judge by his manœuvres."

It seemed to me that the General was right. The boy did not hesitate for an instant, as if doubtful of where to go, but turned and went forward on the port side till he came nearly abreast of the Doctor's cabin, opposite which our steam launch was slung. The davits supporting it were turned inwards over the deck to prevent any risk of losing the launch in heavy weather, so that it was accessible without danger of falling overboard. It was covered with a tarpaulin, and to reach it it would be necessary to swarm up the davit, but these difficulties were evidently not going to deter an agile Eton boy from availing himself of a hiding-place so likely to be overlooked. Zavertal was standing in the door of the companion-way ready to give the word to the searchers, and he smiled and winked at us as the young Earl began to shin up the davit hand-over-hand.

Darranmore soon got a grip on the bulwarks of the launch, and we watched him raise the edge of the tarpaulin, duck his head beneath it, and slowly wriggle out of sight. As soon as he had disappeared, Zavertal gave the word to the seekers, and they came trooping out of the companion-way to commence the search. The quest had hardly begun in earnest when Lord Darranmore's head reappeared from under the tarpaulin, and it was seen that his face wore a comic expression of alarm or excitement.

"I say, this game's off," he cried out, clambering out of the launch. "There's a chap hiding in there already."

"Nonsense," said Zavertal, going up to him as he reached the deck. "You must be mistaken, Lord Darranmore. There can't be anyone there."

"I tell you I am not mistaken," retorted the lad hotly. "There's a man lying huddled up in the bows. I heard him breathing first, and then I put my hand out and felt him."

"We'll soon settle it," I said, joining the group with Waldo and a number of other passengers. "Here, Smith," I added to a quartermaster who was passing, "just take a look under that tarpaulin and see if you can catch a stowaway."

But before the order could be executed, the boy's statement was verified in a different way. The tarpaulin over the bows of the launch was raised, and a head covered with touzled black hair appeared, presenting such a woebegone figure that some of the passengers laughed. The apparition looked like a foreigner, and certainly did not belong to the ship. As for myself, I felt considerable annoyance, for a stowaway was a pest against which I had taken no precautions, it not occurring to me that anyone would try to sneak a passage on a ship not known as a regular "liner."

"Come down out of that," I said. "We will see if we can't find you better quarters in the hold, with a brace of anklets to steady you."

But the threat fell flat. "No spik Ingleese. Angry," moaned the stowaway.

"Poor fellow, he means that he is hungry. Don't be hard on him," pleaded Aline, who had come up with the rest, and to that sweet intervention the stranger owed the treatment that was meted out to him. By signs he was at length induced to leave the launch, and on reaching the deck he stood revealed as a tall, finely-built fellow, with features that, despite their extreme swarthiness, were by no means ill-looking. Zavertal, who was a master of many languages, tried him with several, and at last pronounced him to be a Spaniard, and a ship's steward by calling, who, failing to find a berth on a ship going to Spain, had taken this way of getting home.

"Very well," I said, "we will allow him to work his way; but he shall not get off too easy. He must go the round trip with us, and we will leave him at Gibraltar or Lisbon on the homeward voyage. Off with him forward, and give him some food."

My verdict having been translated to him, he was taken in charge by the quartermaster, bowing and scraping his thanks. The excitement lasted the passengers the rest of the afternoon, Lord Darranmore creating much amusement by taking all the credit of the capture. I heard Waldo drawing him on the subject of his discovery.

"I guess you were never smart enough to think of the launch to hide in yourself?" said the General.

"Well, not quite," admitted the boy reluctantly.

"And who might have been responsible for that bright idea?" asked the old gentleman.

"It was the Doctor who put me up to it," said Darranmore.

Waldo did not pursue the matter further, but walked away with a queer shrug of his shoulders.

That night at dinner the swarthy Spaniard, washed and brushed up, took his place among the assistant stewards who waited at Zavertal's table.

(To be continued.)

On Wednesday,
OCTOBER 9th,

We shall publish the first number of a new experiment in journalism to be called:

PEARSON'S
STORY TELLER

It will consist wholly of continued stories.

The opening chapters of eight entirely new novels will be found in the first number.

No other paper in the world will give its readers so many novels at one time as

Pearson's Story Teller.

This publication will be well illustrated, and be thoroughly healthy in tone. It will cater for every class of reader, and the whole realm of Fiction will be invaded. Arrangements are now being made with every well-known novelist in the English-speaking world to contribute to the pages of Pearson's Story Teller.

In, say, three months' time, the novels that will appear in its pages would cost you, if you bought them in book form, something like FIVE POUNDS. We give them to you for THIRTEEN PENCE, or a penny a number; and, as in most cases we are buying the entire copyright of these novels, they will never be published in book form at all.

The stories commencing in the first number are as follows:

"THE PRICE OF HIS SILENCE,"
By Iza Duffus Hardy.
Author of "In the Springtime of Love," etc., etc.

"THE KNIGHTS OF THE WHITE ROSE,"
A Romance of a Lost Cause,
By George Griffith.
Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "Golden Star," etc, etc.

"A STAKE WORTH PLAYING FOR,"
By Mrs. George Corbett.
Author of "The Adventures of an Ugly Girl," etc.

"BEHIND THE BARRIER,"
A Story of Mystery and Peril in the Antarctic Regions,
By George C. Wallis.

"THROUGH THE VALLEY,"
By Winifred Graham.
Author of "It came to Pass," "Miraculous Molly," etc.

"EVEN AS A DAUGHTER,"
By Jean Middlemass,
Author of "Dandy," etc., etc.

"BLOTTED OUT."
By "Ripple."
Author of "The Curse of Possession," etc., etc.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE CATACOMBS."
By Lillian Andrews.

◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆

Published Every Wednesday.

There is bound to be a great rush for the first number of "THE STORY TELLER."

If you want a copy you must go to a newsagent at once and order it.

DON'T FORGET THE DATE.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 9th.

The Price—One Penny.

Publishing Offices: PEARSON'S WEEKLY BUILDINGS, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C

A GRAND OFFER

TO READERS OF THE Story Teller

"PEARSON'S WEEKLY" will give, for a period of Thirty Days, from October 9th, A BEAUTIFUL ¾-LIFE-SIZE INDIA INK AND CRAYON PORTRAIT FREE to anyone who will bring or send them only 5s., and four consecutive coupons from the STORY TELLER.

These Portraits are of the Finest Artistic Merit: they are Absolutely Permanent, being finished by the Air Brush with Indelible India Ink, making them more permanent than any of the old styles of portraits, and they will last a lifetime.

They would cost you, if ordered through Artists, from THREE to FIVE GUINEAS!

Have you FATHER, MOTHER, SISTER, BROTHER, or CHILD'S PHOTO that you wish enlarged? We will enlarge and copy it into a Beautiful Portrait for you. Remember these Portraits are ABSOLUTELY FREE so far as we are concerned.

HOW CAN WE DO THIS?

We will tell you. We wish THE STORY TELLER to have a very large circulation such as it deserves. We know of no method whereby we can serve our subscribers better, and which will prove more popular than by making the offer we now do. We expect to make many thousands of Portraits.

SHALL WE MAKE YOURS?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer, and we are glad to be able to give it to you. We can copy from any photos., large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture. We copy all pictures bust style—head and shoulders only.

WHEN SENDING AN ORDER, inclose the picture you want copied in an envelope, and place your name and address on the back of the picture, and send the 5s. and four consecutive coupons from THE STORY TELLER to our paper, and you will receive the portrait copied for you as soon as possible. Have no fear of losing your small picture. It will be returned in as good order as received.

An example of the Portrait we offer to give you can be seen at the office of P.W.

Address:—"PORTRAITS,"
PEARSON'S WEEKLY OFFICE,
HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson, at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. A 6d. assorted sample box of any stationer.

AJAX BEST AND CHEAPEST

OVER ,000 New and Second-hand. Easy Terms—From 10s. per month. Lists (200 pages) and Testimonials post free. British Cycle Manufacturing Co., Liverpool; 45, Everton Road, and 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W. (close to Euston Road).

HAIR DESTROYED.

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Absolutely, permanently, painlessly (without extraction, or burning, or cutting off), and without injury to the skin, OR NO CHARGE MADE. Inquiries confidentially solicited. Particulars and testimonials from hospital nurses and others, free. Address

Mrs. E. GOULD,
129, New Kent Road,
London, S.E.

ONE BOX
OF
DR. MACKENZIE'S IMPROVED HARMLESS ARSENIC WAFERS

will produce the most lovely complexion that the imagination could desire. Clear, Fresh, freed from Blotch, Blemish, Coarseness, Redness, Freckles, or Pimples. Sent post free, 4s. 6d.

To whiten the hands and skin, use
Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap.
1s. per tablet, 3 for 2s. 6d. Postage, 3d.

S. HARVEY,
5, DENMAN STREET, LONDON BRIDGE, S.E.

Beware of injurious imitations.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, £20 to £2,000." Tobacconists' Outfitting Co., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. Myers.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

IMPORTANT TO LADIES. Valuable and never failing remedies for all irregularities and obstructions, however obstinate or long standing, and never fail to bring about the desired result. These really wonderful medicines are without parallel in medical science; they preserve health, and have saved thousands trouble, illness, and expense; heaps of unsolicited testimonials. Send at once stamped envelope for most invaluable particulars. (The only effectual remedy on earth.)

A. DASMAIL,
52, LANGDALE, WALTHAMSTOW.
(Established 1851.)

INDIA RUBBER STAMPS.

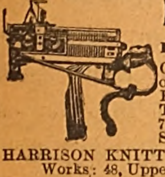
For heading Notepaper, endorsing Envelopes, Cheques, and Postal Cards, Marking Linen, etc. Monograms—two letters, 1s. each; three letters, 1s. 6d. each, full name in neat type, 1s. 4d. each. Postage, 3d. Self-inkers, from 2s. each.

Patterns and Price Lists post free.
Stamps are on brass mounts with black handles.

JOHN BERKLEY,
8, Livery Street, Birmingham.

New Harrison. Swift Gold Medal.

KNITTER



KNITS STOCKINGS (Ribbed or plain) GLOVES and CLOTHING in WOOL, SILK, or COTTON. INSTRUCTIONS FREE. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals for the "HARRISON" and "SUN" Machines.

HARRISON KNITTING MACHINE CO., Ltd.,
Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

BLUSHING.

A lady, whose daughter was cured of this in less than a month, will be happy to send particulars to anyone inclosing stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. WILLIAMS, No. 1, County Chambers B., Martineau St., Birmingham.

CAMBRIC POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS

Bordered.	per doz	Hem-stitched.	per doz.
Children's	1/3
Ladies',	2/3	Ladies',	2/9
Gents',	3/3	Gents',	3/11

Direct from the Manufacturers

"The Irish Cambrics of Messrs. Robinson & Cleaver have a world-wide fame."—The Queen.

Samples and Price Lists Post Free.

LINEN COLLARS, CUFFS, AND SHIRTS.

Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, 3/6 per doz.
Gents' 4-fold, 4/11 per doz.
Cuffs for Ladies or Gentlemen from 5/11 per doz.

Shirts, Best quality Long Cloth, with 4-fold Linen Fronts, 35/6 per ½ doz. (to measure 2/- extra).

"Exquisite quality, most moderate in price."—Myra's Journal.

(By Special Appointments to the Queen and Empress Frederick of Germany.)

ROBINSON & CLEAVER, BELFAST.

TOO STOUT.

Prof. Holt's "H.D." Pills for Fat People.

A rapid, permanent, and absolutely safe reduction, averaging 5 lbs. weekly, with improved Health and Figure, and without dietary restriction, guaranteed to all (either sex). Will reduce weight and cure corpulency in the most stubborn cases where other treatments have failed. They are small, entirely vegetable, agreeable, harmless, and highly recommended. Price, post free, plain wrapper, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box.—Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TO LADIES.

English Wives should send at once for Special Treatise and Price List of Surgical Appliances. Advised by the Medical Faculty throughout the world. Apply, inclosing stamped addressed envelope.—M. D., 217, Graham Road, London, N.E. Please name this paper.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home-cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

BLACKHEADS. I guarantee to cure the most stubborn cases when all else has failed. Book of particulars for an inexpensive, harmless, permanent, and certain home cure, post free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Mrs. V. EVANS, 18, Union Passage, Birmingham.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 2d.; 1lb., 2s.; 2lbs., 3s. 9d., including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

A BOON TO LADIES.

Collins' Marvellous Female Remedy.

Mr. COLLINS [who was 30 years a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England] will forward, free of Charge, full Particulars of a Remedy, which during an extensive practice both at home and in the Colonies he has never known to fail in the most OBSTINATE CASES of OBSTRUCTION and IRREGULARITIES. Send addressed envelope for full particulars, and waste no more time and money on useless Pills and so-called Remedies, etc., which, in the majority of cases, are nothing but PURGATIVES, and cause SICKNESS, PROSTRATION, and PAIN, without having the desired effect.

Letters to be addressed—
D. COLLINS,
Gothic House, 9, Erskine Street,
Liverpool.

RED NOSES

caused by Indigestion, etc. All who suffer from this distressing and disfiguring complaint should write to Dr. Howell, 22, Glasshouse Street, W., who guarantees a Cure in a few days. 2/6 per box.

MUCH BETTER THAN STEEL AND PENNYROYAL.

Ottey's Unlabelled strong FEMALE PILLS Quickly and Certainly remove all obstructions arising from any cause whatever. Invaluable for married women. Post free, under cover, for 14 and 33 stamps, from

THOMAS OTTEY, Chemist, Burton-on-Trent.

Please mention this paper.

RUBBER STAMPS
Free by Post.
AGENTS WANTED.
Liberal commissions.

Your Monogram, 2 letters, 1/2; 3 letters or Name in full, 1/8, including Box, Pad, and Ink, for Paper or Indelible Marking Ink for linen. All kinds of stamps. Illustrated Lists free.

S. S. IRETON & CO., Ltd.,
92, Gracechurch St., London, E.C.

THE BOTTOM PRINCIPLE.

NOTHING "merely happens so." Always keep that fact where you can see it. Whatsoever comes to pass has an adequate cause right behind it. I don't say this as though it were a new discovery. Not a bit. It is the bottom principle of all knowledge. But we are apt to forget it—that's the point; we forget it, and so have a lot of trouble there's no need to have.

Here is Miss Esther May whom we are glad to hear from, and to know. In the matters set forth in her short letter, she speaks not for herself only, but for two-thirds of the women in England.

"In July, 1890," she says, "I had an attack of influenza, which left me in a weak, exhausted condition. I felt languid and tired. Everything was a trouble to me. The good appetite that is natural to me was gone; and when I did take a little food it gave me a dreadful pain in the chest. There was also a strange sensation in my stomach. I felt as if I had eaten too much when perhaps I had scarcely eaten anything.

"Then, after a time, I began to have a dry, hacking cough, and to break out in cold, clammy sweats. Not very long afterwards my ankles began to puff up and swell, so that when I stood on my feet it was very painful.

"I gradually got worse and worse. The medicines given me by the doctors seemed to have no effect. I lost flesh like one in consumption, and I feared I should never be any better.

"In March, 1893, a gentleman told me about Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and said he believed it would help me. Although I had no faith in it I sent for the Syrup and began taking it. One bottle relieved me and gave me some appetite. I ate and enjoyed my food as I had not done for years. I gained strength every day.

"I am now as healthy and hearty as I ever was in my life, and I owe it to Mother Seigel's Syrup. (Signed) Esther May, Buckingham Road, Northfleet, Kent, September 8th, 1893."

"In the spring of 1887," writes another correspondent, "my wife got into a low state of health. She complained at first of feeling tired and weary, and could not do her work as usual. Her mouth tasted badly; she couldn't eat, and she had a deal of pain in her chest and back.

"Later on her legs began to swell, and soon the swelling extended to her body. With all this her strength failed more and more, until she could just go about the house in a feeble fashion, and that was all. No medical treatment did more than to relieve her, as you may say, for the moment.

"This was her condition when Mother Seigel's Syrup first came under our notice. We read of it in a book that was left at our house. After she had taken the Syrup only a few days she was decidedly better. And, to conclude, by a faithful use of the medicine the swelling went down, her appetite came back, and she was soon as well and strong as ever. Seeing what the Syrup had done for my wife, I began to take it for indigestion and dyspepsia, which had troubled me for years, and it completely cured me. (Signed) J. Heath, Orotava House, Alpha Road, Cambridge, June 15th, 1893."

We were speaking of nothing happening without a cause. The cause of all the suffering of these two women was one and the same—indigestion and dyspepsia. Men have it often enough, but this disease is especially the bane of women—with chronic constipation as one of its worse features. It is the cause of nearly all the ills and ailments they suffer from. Let every woman get a book which Mr. Heath speaks of, and learn all about it. They can thus find out what the first symptoms are, and take Mother Seigel's Syrup the very day they appear.

32 PAGES. STORIES OF ALL SORTS FOR ALL PEOPLE. 32 PAGES.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY
C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 354. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 12TH, 1895. [ONE PENNY.

A WONDERFUL MEDICINE!

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS
BEECHAM'S PILLS

ARE universally admitted to be worth a Guinea a Box for Bilious and Nervous Disorders, such as Wind and Pain in the Stomach, Sick Headache, Giddiness, Fulness and Swelling after Meals, Dizziness and Drowsiness, Cold Chills, Flushings of Heat, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Costiveness, Scurvy and Blotches on the Skin, Disturbed Sleep, Frightful Dreams, and all Nervous and Trembling Sensations, &c. The first dose will give relief in twenty minutes. Every sufferer is earnestly invited to try one Box of these Pills, and they will be acknowledged to be

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

For females of all ages these Pills are invaluable, as a few doses of them carry off all humours, and bring about all that is required. No female should be without them. There is no medicine to be found equal to Beecham's Pills for removing any obstruction or irregularity of the system. If taken according to the directions given with each box, they will soon restore females of all ages to sound and robust health. This has been proved by thousands who have tried them, and found the benefits which are insured by their use.

For a Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion, and all Disorders of the Liver, they act like magic, and a few doses will be found to work wonders on the most important organs in the human machine. They strengthen the whole muscular system, restore the long-lost complexion, bring back the keen edge of appetite, and arouse into action with the rosebud of health the whole physical energy of the human frame. These are FACTS testified continually by members of all classes of society, and one of the best guarantees to the Nervous and Debilitated is,

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Have the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

BEING SIX MILLION BOXES PER ANNUM.

Prepared only by THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens Lancashire.

And Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere, in boxes, 9½d., 1/1½, and 2/9 each, with full directions.

THE 1/1½ BOX CONTAINS FIFTY-SIX PILLS.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC PORTFOLIO.

JUST PUBLISHED, VOLUME 8, containing—

She wore a wreath—Kathleen—John Anderson—Around the old Camp—Hymn of Eve—Watching for Pa—Teddy O'Neale—Friar John—Ecoutez-moi—Canadian Boat Song—Edelweiss Song—Old Arm Chair—Rose Softly Blooming—Friends Were Saying—By the Sad Sea Waves—Baby Mine—Mary of Argyle—Riding on a Load—Kate Kearney—Love was Once—Cock Robin—Merry Elves Polka—Down by the Old Abbey—I Have Heard Sweet Music—There's a Beautiful Land—Tell Me Mary How to Woo Thee—When Sorrow Sleepeth—Old Log Cabin—Rock a-bye Baby—Good Rhein Wine.

Volumes 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, may also be had.

To be obtained from all Newsagents for 2d. per volume, or will be sent post free for 3d. per volume from

THOMAS BEECHAM (Proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS and BEECHAM'S TOOTH PASTE), ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's

EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE

FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

THE JOHN NOBLE
HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES

John Noble Ltd Half Guinea

Direct from the Largest Firm of Costume Manufacturers in the world, at less than Half Ordinary Prices.

Over 1,000 Well-Paid Workers employed in John Noble's own Factories, under the strictest conditions of Sanitation and cleanliness.

Highest Diploma & Gold Medal Awarded British & Colonial Industrial Exhibition.

These Costumes are made in the John Noble Cheviot Serge (the same quality worn by Miss Böcker at the time of her rescue from the disastrous Wreck of the "Elbe," and sold at 7/6 the Dress Length). They are trimmed bold silk cord, and supplied complete for the ridiculous price of 10/6 each, packed in box and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra. Ordinary stock sizes fit any figure up to 38ins. round bust under arms; larger sizes 1/6 extra.

10/6

The JOHN NOBLE MODEL COSTUMES have secured beyond a doubt

THE ADMIRATION OF THE WORLD.

They are far and away ahead of all other Costumes on the market for style, cut, make, finish and quality; the skirts are wider and the sleeves fuller than in the slop-made "skimpy" looking garments generally sold at low prices and often produced by ill-paid workers in the lowest sweating dens, therefore ladies can with confidence place their orders with John Noble Ltd., The Warehouse, Manchester.

KNOCKABOUT FROCKS FOR GIRLS are also supplied in the John Noble Cheviot Serge, with saddle top, long full sleeves, and pocket, at the following low prices: From 1/6 each.

Lengths	21	24	27	30	33	ins.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	ea.
Lengths	36	39	42	45		ins.
Prices	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6		ea.

Postage 4½d. extra.

NOBLE'S NOVELTIES
IN DRESS FABRICS.
From 4½d. to 4/6 per yard.

Large Box containing over 1,000 Patterns post free on approval.

Every purchaser delighted. The lengths stated are from top of neckband to bottom of skirt in front.

COLOURS: The above garment can be supplied in Black, Navy, Brown, Myrtle, Bronze Green, Electric Blue, Ruby, Tan, Grey, or Drab.

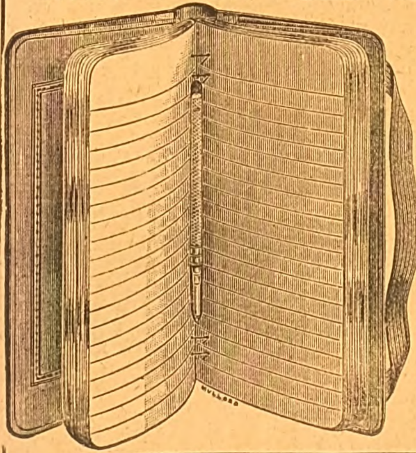
PATTERNS, also "THE BOOK OF THE SERGE," and FASHION SHEETS of up-to-date Costumes, Blouses, Mantles, etc., sent Post Free on application.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS, which are always inferior, and remember that John Noble Ltd. have no agents, no travellers, or branch shops, and the genuine goods can only be obtained direct from their Manchester establishments.

Please mention "Short Stories" when ordering.

JOHN NOBLE LTD., The Warehouse, MANCHESTER.

COLLINS'
"AYE, READY!" NOTE-BOOK.
WITH PATENT "SELF-REGISTER."



THE HANDIEST AND THE BEST. THE SIMPLEST AND THE CHEAPEST.

As will be seen from the Illustration, this Note-Book has a hollow "rest" cut into the back, into which the Pencil falls and is securely held, while by means of an ingenious contrivance called a "Self-Register," the person using the Book can at once open it where he was last writing. A reference to any page in the front, the middle, or the end is also materially assisted by the "Self-Register"

In Leather Bindings, Round Corners, Gilt Edges, from 1s. upwards, or with Re-fills from 3s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.

WM. COLLINS, SONS & CO., LIMITED,
Bridewell Place, London, E.C.;
139, Stirling Road, Glasgow.

A SIGNAL SUCCESS.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success, but we'll do more, Sempronius, we'll deserve it."

THE

PEARSON POTTERY CO.,
HANLEY.

Are Selling Fast the Most Wonderful Package of Crockery in the World.

100 PIECES

FOR £1 1s.

A beautiful Dinner Service of 50 pieces is guaranteed Worth the Guinea alone, consequently a Charming China Tea Service, and a useful Collection of Crockery, are given FOR NOTHING.

Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given.

The Secret of the Success.—THE PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The PEARSON POTTERIES have nearly 2,000 feet frontage to the town of Hanley.

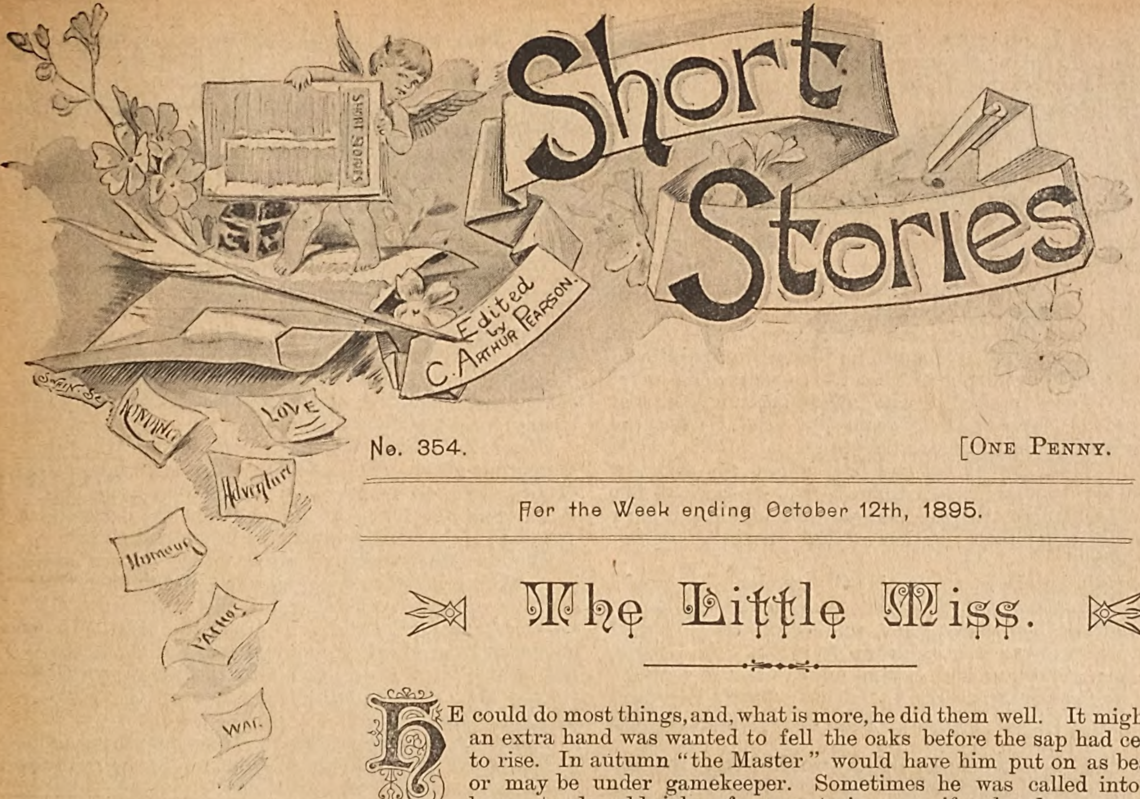
Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

The Thirty Shilling Bazaar Parcel is selling well.

APPLY AT ONCE.

Send a Post Card for Particulars. You will never regret it. Freedom from breakage guaranteed. All letters to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.



Short Stories
Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 354. [One Penny.

For the Week ending October 12th, 1895.

The Little Miss.

He could do most things, and, what is more, he did them well. It might be an extra hand was wanted to fell the oaks before the sap had ceased to rise. In autumn "the Master" would have him put on as beater, or may be under gamekeeper. Sometimes he was called into the house to do odd jobs of carpentering; or, if a hand were wanted in the stable, it was Gilroy who filled the vacancy.

Possibly it was his militia training that made him even wheel a barrow differently from the other men; anyway, he had always been a favourite with "the Master," and when "the little Miss" came to live at the house it seemed only natural that Gilroy should be deputed to teach her to ride, and fire straight, to throw a fly, and manage a boat.

"If she ain't a boy, she shall have the same chances," the old man would say, "and," he would add, "she will make none the worse woman for that."

Seated on his cob, he watched her learn to ride and jump in the ten-acre meadow; or listened from the bank to the even voice of Gilroy reiterating: "Wrists back, keep the elbows in, lean well back," as he taught her to scull on the lake.

It was Gilroy who taught her the names of flies and the mysterious lore of fishing, how to tell a bird by its flight, and showed her where to find their nests. It was to Gilroy she confided her distaste for lessons, and her distaste at the arrangement of Providence in having destined her to be a girl. And Gilroy, by teaching her to do what boys do, reconciled her to her adverse fate.

And so in time she learnt to ride "the Master's" bay, to wield the heavy salmon rod, to throw a fly, and sail a boat, and shoot a pheasant on the wing. And then "the Master" realised that she must learn to be a woman, and "the little Miss" was sent to school abroad. And Gilroy was told to look to it that "the little Missie's" gun and fishing tackle were kept in order against her coming home.

* * * * * * *

And things went on about the same as usual. In regular succession the flowers replaced each other in the trim kept beds, whilst in the orchard ripe apples thudded unnoticed to the ground. In autumn "the Master" shot the coverts, and rode to hounds in winter, and when Lent came round looked up his book of flies.

* * * * * * *

It was three years later, when the trees were all in blossom, that "the little Miss" came home.

Gilroy was busy in the garden potting out. He saw her walk across the lawn the same as ever, by "the Master's" side, just as she'd used to, except that now "the Master's" hand rested on her arm, instead of holding her hand in his.

She came straight up to Gilroy where he worked, and spoke to him "as nice as anythink." She was still "the little Miss"—yet different, being now "a woman grown." Gilroy straightened himself and touched his hat, and said "as he was glad to see her back," and hoped "as she was well." In rapid questions she asked after her pets—the boat, her rods, and gun—and laughingly said she must be very out of practice, and that Gilroy would have to teach her all again, and smiling she passed on down the path.

"Grandad," she said, "he is splendid, like a young Greek God who has been condemned to leave Olympus in order that he may learn to till the earth. I should like to paint him, to try and get that rich warm tone of wind and sun-tanned flesh, the outline of those muscles, and the whole expression of manly courage in his face and bearing. Do you think he would sit for me?" she asked.

All rights reserved.]

The old man patted the girl's arm, and thought perhaps young Gilroy might be persuaded to take the part of model if she asked him to.

And so it came about that Gilroy, somewhat loth, posed daily for "the little Miss." The while she roughly sketched him in, she talked of places she had seen, of paintings, and of lovely music she had heard. Just as in days gone by she had told him, in the same bright way, of fairies, gnomes, and dwarfs.

And as she talked of this or that great man—of one who rose from shepherd boy to be the leading painter of his age; and how one spoilt his art to please his wife; and of a deaf musician who made such music that it would not cease to echo down the ages—he felt the distance widening that lay between him and his "little Miss." When he pulled the boat about the lake, or helped her bait her hook, or land a fish, he did it as her servant, and almost wished she would not thank him in the voice, whose very tone and accent raised her so far above him.

At his work in summer, in the garden, he would watch her talking to the guests who visited the house. He could see her ready smile, and catch the pleasant laugh as she passed from group to group. And, later, when the carriages had driven off, she would saunter round the garden with Mr. Launcelot—maybe he would take her on the lake, or just sit quietly on the terrace.

On such days as these, Gilroy would listen for the striking of the stable clock that set him free, and wonder that the heat had made him feel so tired.

They would take him with them in the boat when they went fishing, and, as he slowly rowed them on the lake, sunk deep between the hills where only sheep-bells broke the silence, and where the passing clouds made purple shadows on hills and lake—he would listen to their easy talk of men, and things, and books, and he would wonder at the way in which they turned each other's sayings into fun, and lightly laughed the time away. So different were they from himself, they seemed creatures of another world.

From time to time they would speak to him; Mr. Launcelot would tell him of rivers he had fished in Norway or in Canada; or perhaps it might be some piece of news out of the daily papers. And sometimes when "Miss Enid" had not been so lucky, she would take the oars in order that Gilroy off her rod might make up the deficiency. And when they landed Gilroy would stay behind to see to the boat, the fish, and tackle. He would stand and watch them out of sight, Miss Enid's slight little figure beside the man's, and would dimly wonder at the distance that divided him from them.

* * * * * *

The First was to "the Master" still a great event, and shooting superseded fishing.

Once more, in short cloth skirt and gaiters, with her gun, "Miss Enid" seemed "the little Miss" of long ago. "The Master" liked to have her with him, and with a buoyant ease she tramped across the fields and meadows, heedless of heavy dews and straggling blackberry trails.

The woods were scarcely touched with autumn, only stillness and the robin's song suggested closing summer. The drives in the hazel coppice were still crudely green, the underwood grew thickly, and in damp places toadstools gleamed redly amongst newly-fallen leaves.

"The Master," towards the close of September, suggested they should shoot the coppice, taking stray shots at any game that was disturbed.

Gilroy, to whom the order was given, thought it dangerous sport. He had in his time known more than one accident occur precisely in that very hazel coppice, but it was not his place to question the decision, and guns and dogs were ready at the appointed time.

The day went well, and already the sun was getting low, making it difficult, amongst the lights and shadows of the coppice, to correctly mark the game, when Gilroy noticed a partridge rise and cross the drive. He saw a gleaming barrel raised, and realised that Mr. Launcelot, not seeing Miss Enid hidden by the undergrowth, was taking aim, whilst she, unconscious of the gun, was looking at the bird.

There was no time to speak. He was not near enough to knock the gun aside. A shout might be misunderstood. There was but one thing to be done—to step into the drive and intercept the charge. He did not stop to calculate the nearness of the gun, nor reckon that the bird was flying fairly high. He only knew "Miss Enid" was in danger. That was enough.

The firing of the charge was followed by the startled flight of birds and fluttering to the earth of yellow leaves, and then a stillness.

"Oh, Launcelot! have you missed?"

Her voice rung clearly in the autumn air as, with an eager look, she stepped into the sunlight.

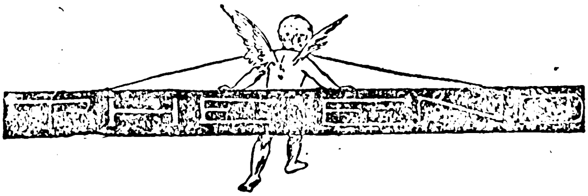
The smoke had lifted, and at her feet, lying across the drive, was Gilroy—dead.

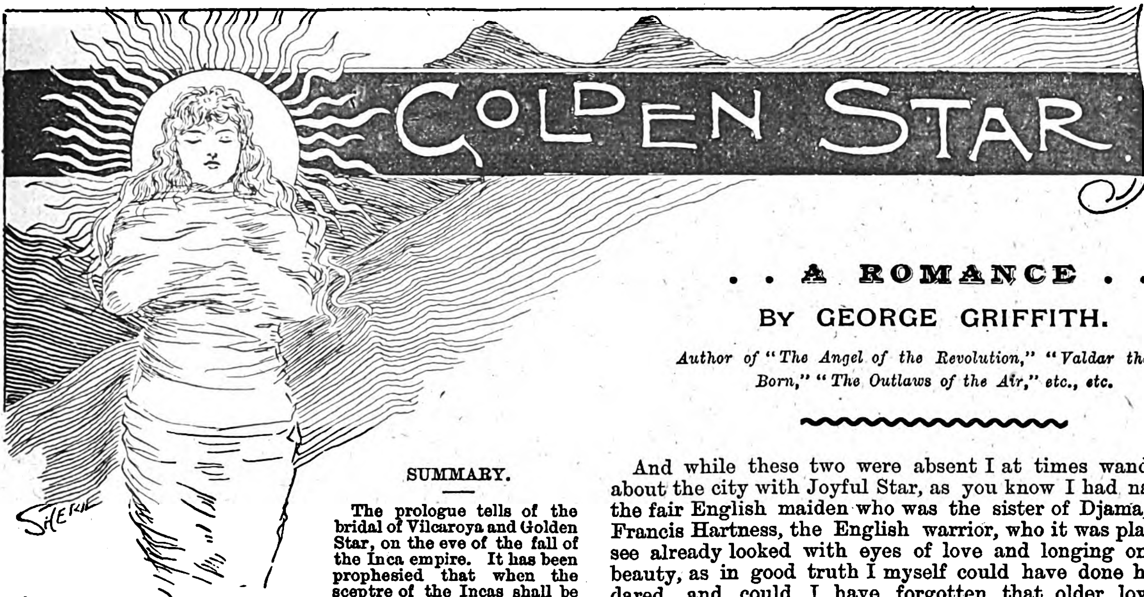
* * * * *

It was in the winter they were married. The churchyard path was swept and carpeted, whilst on either side the snow lay thick, obliterating in one glistening whiteness all unevenness in mounds and levelled graves.

Inside the church the waiting guests grew silent, as on a brass they read engraved the story tersely told of how a man laid down his life to save a friend.

Edith Escombe.





GOLDEN STAR

. . A ROMANCE . .

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Valdar the Oft-Born," "The Outlaws of the Air," etc., etc.

SUMMARY.

The prologue tells of the bridal of Vilcaroya and Golden Star, on the eve of the fall of the Inca empire. It has been prophesied that when the sceptre of the Incas shall be grasped by the hand of one who has been dead, and is alive again, the ancient glories of their empire shall be restored, and they dare the ordeal together. Three hundred years later Professor Martin Lamson brings to England a mummy from Peru. Laurens Djama undertakes to restore it to animation. The mummy is removed to Djama's laboratory, and in a week he shows the Professor his mummy alive. The Professor learns that he is the Vilcaroya of the legend. He asks for Golden Star, and they tell him that she has been dead for over three hundred years. He promises them that if they will restore her, too, to life he will give them untold treasures. He rapidly regains health and strength, and in six months the party embark for Peru. They meet in Panama a friend of Professor Lamson, Captain Hartness, who joins their party. On the way Hartness is told the whole story, and throws in his lot with the Inca. With Book II. begins Vilcaroya's personal narrative of his return to his own country and the events which resulted from it.

CHAPTER IX.

Brothers of the Blood.

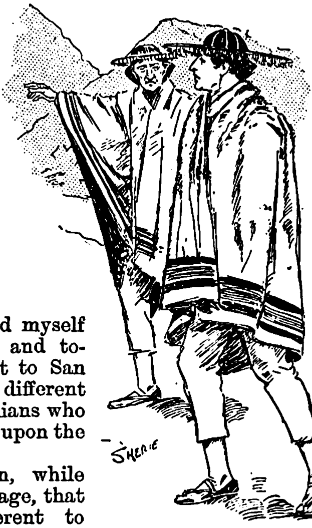
I shall not weary you who perchance may some day read this story of mine by dwelling on the sorrow and shame that filled me as I entered the foul, unlovely streets, and saw the filthy refuse in the squares of the city that I remembered so pure and bright and beautiful; nor yet of the feelings that possessed me when I saw the poor remains of our desecrated temples, the places where our vanished palaces had stood, and the dismantled ruins of that mighty fortress of Sacsahuaman, which I had last seen standing palace-crowned and throned in all its grandeur high up above the city.

All this and more you who read must picture for yourselves, for I have greater things to tell of than the poor sorrows of a wanderer who had left his own age and his own kindred far behind him, and who had come back into a strange world to find his country a wilderness and the children of his people the slaves of strangers.

It had been settled amongst us that for the purpose for which we had come it would be necessary to hire a house that should be at once commodious for our work, sufficiently removed from the city for privacy, and capable of defence against intruders if need be. The Professor, being already known in Cuzco as a man of science and seeker after antiquities, and possessing, moreover, a special permit from the Government in Lima to travel and dwell in the interior and make such searches as he thought fit, undertook the business of finding such a house. He made many journeys in quest of what he sought, and on these journeys Djama always accompanied him, since he had to see that the house chosen contained a chamber suitable for that precious work that he had undertaken to do in return for the share of treasure that I was to give him.

And while these two were absent I at times wandered about the city with Joyful Star, as you know I had named the fair English maiden who was the sister of Djama, and Francis Hartness, the English warrior, who it was plain to see already looked with eyes of love and longing on her beauty, as in good truth I myself could have done had I dared, and could I have forgotten that older love of mine, who, as I believed, still lay cold in her death-sleep in the cave by the lake yonder over the mountains to the westward, whither I had already cast so many longing glances. But at other times I left them to go upon my own ways, for I had work of my own on hand which, for the present, did not concern them.

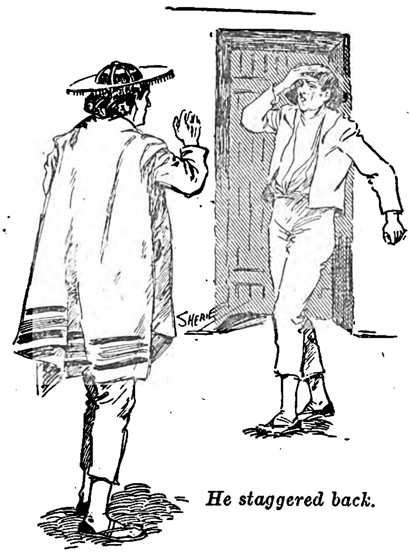
I had by this time met and conversed with many of my people in their own language, which was that of the labouring classes of my own times, and from them I had learned that at a village called San Sebastian, through which we had passed, about two leagues to the south of the city, there still dwelt many families of Ayllos—that is to say, the descendants of those of the old noble Inca lineage, who had been permitted by their conquerors to settle here. So one morning I went to visit an old Indian—as they now called all our people—named Ullullo, with whom I had made acquaintance, and at his house I dressed myself in the native fashion, in an old shirt and short trousers, with sandals on my feet, and a broad brimmed fringed hat on my head, and covered myself with a faded poncho, and together we went on foot to San Sebastian, I looking no different from the rest of the Indians who were passing to and fro upon the road.



Together we went on foot to San Sebastian.

I had already seen, while riding through the village, that the people were different to those of all other villages that we had come through on the way. They were taller in stature, prouder in carriage, and fairer of face. The blood showed red in their cheeks through the light brown of their skin, and these signs had told me that if any remnant of the pure Inca race was left these must be they, and I was soon to have proof that it was so, although the children of those who had lived in palaces were now dwelling in huts of mud and reeds.

Ullullo led me first to the house of a man named Tupac-Rayca, who was chief among the Indians of the town. He was great grandson of that ill-fated Tupac-Amaru, who, as you know, had revolted many years before against the oppressors of his race, and for this, after being forced to watch the brutal murder of his wife in the square of Cuzco, had himself been torn to pieces by horses.



He staggered back.

We found him alone in a bare room in one of the better houses of the village. As he stood up to salute us it needed but a glance to tell me that in his veins at least the ancient blood of our race flowed well-nigh as purely as it did in my own. Had it not been for the meanness of his clothing and the dull brooding look on his noble features—the stamp of generations of oppression—I could have pictured him with the yellow Llautu* on his brow, the golden image of the Sun on his girdled tunic, and the rainbow banner in his hand, standing amongst the guards of the great Huayni-Capac himself.

I asked Ullullo to leave us alone for a little while, and when he had gone I stepped forward and, drawing myself up to my full height, I looked him in the eyes, and said in the tongue that was spoken only by those of the divine Inca race:

"Tell me, Tupac-Rayca, does a remnant of the Children of the Sun still dwell in the Land of the Four Regions, and are they still faithful to the traditions of their race, and the faith of their ancestors?"

As the words left my lips he staggered back a pace or two with his hands to his forehead, staring at me from under them as though—as in very truth it was—some spirit of the past stood re-embodied before him. Then, coming forward again and scanning me eagerly from head to foot, he whispered in the same tongue—by the Lord of Light how those familiar accents thrilled my ears as I heard them after so long!

"Who are you, a stranger, that comes in the image of those long dead, to ask me such a question in the tongue that may only be spoken when none save those of the Blood are present?"

"One who is of the Blood himself," I answered, taking a stride towards him, and stretching out my hand. "Fear not, Tupac-Rayca, son of him that suffered, I am a friend, and have come from afar to work as a friend with you and others of the Blood that may still be left in the land, with a great and holy purpose, of which you shall know ere long."

He grasped my hand and bowed over it in silence for a while. Then he stepped back and looked at me again, murmuring:

"Can it be so? Has the divine Manco come back from the Mansions of the Sun to save the remnant of his children, or has Vilcaroya broken the bonds of his death-sleep and come to fulfil the oath he swore with Golden Star before the altar in the sanctuary? I know all the Children of the Blood that are left in the land, and I have never seen your face before, yet you are of the Blood. Who are you—Lord?"

The last word seemed forced from his lips by some power other than his own will, and it sounded most pleasant to me, for it told me that, without knowing my name, and seeing me only as a stranger, he had recognised the stamp of my divine ancestry, and this promised well for the progress of the work I had in hand. I answered him kindly, and yet as one speaking to another who is scarce his equal, and said:

"My name matters not now or here, Tupac, for we are but two, and I might lie to you, and you would have no proof of my truth or falsehood. But if you will do as I bid you, to-night you shall know and all shall be made plain and with ample proof. Are you willing to give me your aid?"

He picked up a rude hoe that stood in a corner of the room, and, laying it across his shoulders after the manner of one who bears a burden, bowed his head and answered:

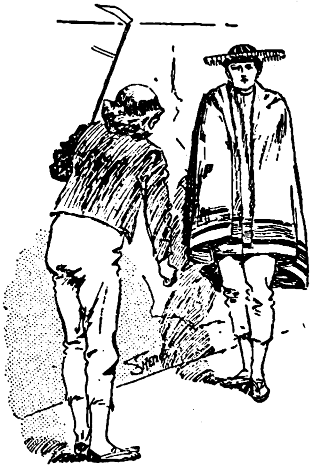
"The Son of the Sun has but to speak, and I and all his slaves will obey."

What he had done was an act of homage, which, in the olden time, was paid only to him who wore the imperial Llautu, and proved to me how faithfully the old traditions had been preserved in secret.

"That is well said, Tupac," I replied, speaking now as a Sovereign might speak to a faithful subject, "and in the days to come fear not that I shall forget this your first act of unasked-for homage. Now, hear me. Are there twenty men of the Blood in this village, men who are faithful and can be trusted even to the death?"

"There are five hundred here, Lord, and as many thousands within the valley, whose blood has flowed pure from the olden times, unpolluted by a single stain of Spanish dirt. What would you with them?"

"I asked not for hundreds or thousands," I said, right glad at heart to hear such good tidings. "For the present I need but a score, so do you chose me twenty of the noblest blood and the best judgment, and an hour before midnight let them be with you on the plain behind the Sacsahuaman. Let them come well provided with torches or candles, and tools, levers, and hammers and spades. Tell them what has passed between us, but nothing of the guesses that you may have made in your own mind when we have been talking, and leave the rest to me. Can you do that?"



He picked up a rude hoe.

"It shall be done, Lord," he answered, still bending before me with the shaft of the hoe across his shoulders, "and we will wait and toil in patience till the Son of the Sun shall please to reveal himself to the eyes of his servants."

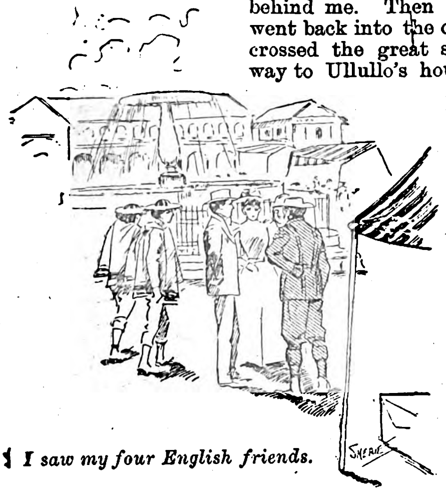
"Nor shall you have to wait long," I said. "Now put that off your back and take my hand again, for we are not Inca and servant yet, only two men of the Blood, and brothers of a fallen race who are joined together to perform a holy work. Now farewell, Tupac, till to-night. Choose your companions well, and fear not but that your services and your faithfulness shall have their due reward.”

---

* The yellow Llautu, or fringed turban of wool, worn on the brows, was the distinguishing mark of the sacred Inca race. The scarlet was worn only by the reigning Inca—"Son of the Sun." Its fringe, called the "borla," was mingled with threads of gold.

He put his hand humbly and tremblingly into mine, bowing low over it, and so I left him, standing there with bent head, not daring to look up until the door closed behind me. Then Ullullo and I went back into the city, and as we crossed the great square on our way to Ullullo’s house I saw my four English friends standing among the market people by the fountain in the centre. We passed close to them, and I heard my name spoken by Joyful Star to her brother, who answered her and said:

“I dare say we shall find he is making friends again with some of these filthy Indian compatriots of his.”



I saw my four English friends.

I hated him from that moment for his bitter words, and swore in my heart that some day he should pay for them, for I loved my people, and pitied them in their misery and degradation. I stopped beside them, and my heart was beating hard as I listened for what Joyful Star would say, and I have remembered her words, even as I have remembered his. She looked at him with the light of anger in her eyes, and said:

“For shame, Laurens! I couldn’t have believed that you would have said such a thing. If you belonged to a race that had been enslaved and plundered by these brutes of Spaniards and Peruvians for three centuries and a half, do you think you would be any better than these poor fellows? And, besides, whatever they are, they are Vilcaroya’s people, and he is our friend.”

I could have fallen on the stones and kissed her feet for those sweet words of hers, and I moved away quickly for fear I should betray myself, and went with a swelling heart and mingled tears of love and anger in my eyes to old Ullullo’s house, where I changed my clothes again, and then, as it was nearly dinner time, which, as you know, is in the evening in Spanish countries, I went back to the house where we were lodging, wondering what they would think if they could have understood the words that had passed between Tupac-Rayca and myself.

CHAPTER X.

Wife or Sister?

When I met my friends and the man who, as the warning voice in my heart already told me, would one day be my enemy, I saw that they would willingly have learned what had become of me during the day, but I answered their inquiries by telling them nothing more and yet a great deal less than the truth, and saying that I had spent the day revisiting old scenes, and learning what I could of the present condition of my people. This satisfied them outwardly at least, though I saw a look in Djama’s eyes which told me that he suspected more of the truth than it suited my purpose to tell him.

Then our conversation turned to the matter of procuring a house, such as I have spoken of, and the Professor told me that he had heard of a hacienda, well built and solid, and standing in its own domain, about three leagues across the valley to the westward, on a secluded little plain among the hills, which would serve our purpose excellently; but the owner of it wished to sell it, and “with the stupidity of these Peruvians,” as he said, would not hire it out to us but would only sell it, and the price was twenty thousand soles, or dollars of Peru, which was two thousand pounds in English money.

“It is a great pity,” said the Professor, when he had finished telling me about it, “for it doesn’t seem as though there was another house in the neighbourhood of Cuzco that would suit our purpose, and this one would do perfectly.”

“Of course, if the fellow won’t let it there’s no use thinking any more about the matter, for two thousand pounds is entirely out of the question. It seems to me that the expedition will be quite expensive enough without the luxury of buying houses at fancy prices.”

It was Djama who spoke. No one else at our table could have spoken like that. I heard him in silence, for I could not trust myself to speak for the anger that was rising within me. I saw Joyful Star raise her eye-lids and look at him with a swift glance that meant much, but she, too, said nothing, and then, looking at me, he spoke again and said:

“Of course, if his Highness”—for so he always spoke of me when no strangers were present—“would just unlock one of those treasure-houses of his, the matter would be easy enough, but I suppose that’s outside the contract.”

I still kept silence, knowing as I did what the night was to bring forth. But Francis Hartness answered for me, and said:

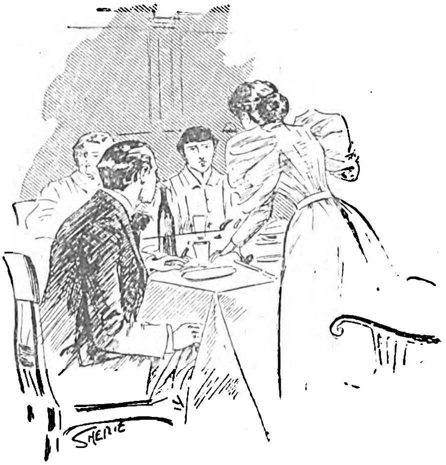
“I don’t think you can quite put it that way, Djama, if you’ll excuse me saying so. If I am not mistaken, it has been clearly understood that the first treasure-house to be unlocked is the one that holds Vilcaroya’s greatest treasure, his wife, and what you say seems to suggest——”

“It is enough,” I said, unconsciously speaking in my growing anger in the same imperious tone that I had used but a few hours before to Tupac. “Let the house be bought. I will charge myself with the cost, and I will be the debtor of my friends no longer.”

They stared at me as I spoke, for hitherto I had spoken to them as a child rather than as a man, as an inferior rather than as an equal. I saw a smile that was not pleasant to look upon pass swiftly over Djama’s mouth, but he kept silence, and the Professor said to me:

“Are you really in earnest, Vilcaroya? You know according to our bargain we have no claim on you until our part of the work is done first. None of us have any desire to learn your secrets.”

“I am not talking of secrets,” I said, breaking into his speech, “and one of my race does not speak to make a liar of himself. What I say I can do and will, for I wish the work to begin at once. Do you think I have not waited long enough for my beloved, my sister and my wife?”



Rising suddenly from her seat.

"Your what!" cried Joyful Star, rising suddenly from her seat and staring at me with fixed and wide-opened eyes. "Your sister! Oh, Vilcaroya, surely that is not true," and as she said this I saw her cheeks grow pale and her lips tremble.

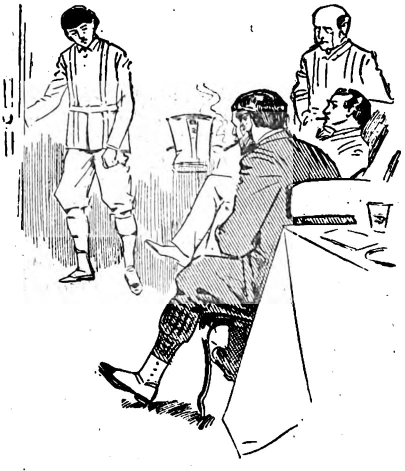
"Yes," I answered, "it is true. Why should I lie to my new sister and friend, Joyful Star? Golden Star was the daughter of my father, the great Huayni-Capac, though our mothers were not the same."

I had no time to finish my speech, for with a look of unutterable horror in her eyes, which pierced me to the heart and seemed to sever it in twain, she cried:

"Oh, no, no; that is too horrible! I can hear no more. I will go back to England to-morrow. Laurens, come to my room, I want to speak to you at once."

So saying she went to the door and opened it and went out, followed by her brother, who looked at me as he passed me with a look which I never forgot or forgave, for it was like the words that I had heard him say to her in the square.

"What is this?" I said to the Professor when the door had closed behind them. "What have I said or done that Joyful Star should look with horror upon me and say such cruel words?"



Bowing farewell to the others.

I saw him exchange glances full of meaning with the English soldier before he answered me; and then, leaning his arms on the table in front of him, he said, in that quiet calm voice of his:

"My dear Vilcaroya, it is a very strange thing, and, as far as Miss Djama is concerned, perhaps, a very great pity that this has never come out before, for without knowing it you have given her a shock that may have very painful consequences. No, don't interrupt me now, for the sooner I can make you understand the meaning of your words to her the better. It is in this way: we know, of course, that in your day and among your people sister-marriage was held to be the most sacred of all marriages. We know that from such a marriage only might spring the wearer of the imperial Borla. No other descent was held to be pure enough for the Son of the Sun; but to us the idea of such a marriage is so unutterably horrible and revolting that of all the crimes that could be committed by one of our race that would be the most fearful. It is a thing that does not even permit itself to be discussed amongst us. It cannot be discussed. It should not even be spoken of, and yet you, in the most perfect innocence, have spoken of it in the presence of—— Good Heavens, Hartness! what is to be done? Do you think Miss Djama was really in earnest when she talked of going back to England to-morrow? It is impossible—it would ruin everything."

I kept silence, for my sorrow and wonder were too great for words, but I listened eagerly for what Francis Hartness would say in reply.

"She was in earnest when she spoke," he said, as quietly as the Professor had spoken; "but if the Doctor has as much sense as I give him credit for, she will have seen the thing in a different light by this time. Of course, she has read Prescott, and she really knows as much about the marriage customs of the ancient Incas as we do. In fact, to tell you the truth"—and as he said this I saw him frown, and an angry light came into his eyes that I had never seen in them before—"I really can hardly understand how, knowing that as she does know it, she can have been as horrified as she certainly was. She knows perfectly well that Vilcaroya has come at a single step, as it were, from his age into ours, and so must have brought all the ideas and beliefs of his time and his people with him. Depend upon it a little reflection will very soon show her that horrible and all as the idea must naturally have appeared to her at the first shock of hearing it, she will see that from Vilcaroya's point of view there is nothing in it but what is perfectly natural and proper. Now, to my mind, the matter is much more sad and serious for Vilcaroya himself than for anyone else."

As he said this he turned from the Professor to me and went on, addressing me in a tone so frank and kindly that ever afterwards I looked upon him as my friend and my brother:

"It's not a pleasant thing for me to say, and it must, of course, be a very painful one for you to hear; still, it's got to be said some time or other, and, unless I am wrong in what I think of you, I believe you are man enough to hear it and to agree with me that it had better be said now than later on, when the saying of it might be tenfold more painful both to you and us."

"Say on," I said shortly. "Your tongue is straight and your eyes look into mine as those of a friend should look. I am listening."

"I would wish for no better friend than you, Vilcaroya, after that, for I know what you mean. Now, what I have to say is this. We know, of course, that you look upon yourself as doubly married to this love of yours, who is dead, and, like you, may yet be alive again. You are bound to her, not only by a marriage which in the time that it took place was perfectly lawful and natural, but also by the oath that you took together. But you have come back to the world in another age and among another people, and now that marriage is, by the common consent of all civilised humanity, not only unlawful, but, as the Professor has just said, unnatural and horrible beyond conception.

"Therefore, if Golden Star is restored to life, for you to love her, save as a brother, or for you to perpetuate the union, which, as you have told us, began and ended before the altar of the Sun, would be to make not only yourself, but your—your sister, Golden Star, as well, looked upon with horror and loathing by every civilised man and woman that knew your story. I am speaking strongly because it is necessary.

"You might succeed in all your aims, you might realise every ambition of your life, and yet I tell you it is Heaven's own truth, that if you took Golden Star to sit beside you on the throne of the Incas as your wife and queen, you would place her upon a pinnacle of infamy that men would spit upon and women turn their backs on. The reward of all your labours, the price of all your treasures, no matter how great they might be, would be nothing but a curse that would fall heavily on you, but a thousand times more heavily on the woman that you have loved best in all the world."

He stopped, and they both sat and looked at me in silence, awaiting for me to answer him. As for me, I felt my spirit wandering over a bare wilderness where all was dark.

I knew that he had spoken truth, strange as the truth seemed to me, for no man could have heard his voice and seen the steady light in his eyes without knowing that he was a true man, and so spoke the truth. The moments passed, and I could still find no words to say. Then the silence was broken by the opening of the door, and Djama came in and said:

"My sister wishes you to excuse her coming back to the table. Of course, I have explained matters to her, and I think she now sees them in a different light, but for some reason or other she seems strangely shaken. You know how extremely sensitive she is, and so, as her doctor, as well as her brother, I have sent her to bed. She wasn't really fit to come back after what has happened, and a night's rest will be the best thing in the world for her. I suppose you two have explained things to his Highness as well, eh?"

"Yes," I said, rising from my seat. "It has been explained to me. I do not understand all now, but I must think, and think alone, so I will go."

Then I went to Francis Hartness and held out my hand to him and said, after the fashion of the English:

"Good-night, Captain Hartness. You have wounded me sorely with your words, yet you have spoken them as only a friend could speak them. From now till the day of my death or yours, Vilcaroya Inca is your friend, and all his people are your servants."

Then I took my hand from his, and bowing farewell to the others, walked swiftly out of the room and got my cloak and went out into the city to think in silence by myself over the strange and terrible things that I had heard, and to calm my spirit before I went to do the work which in a few hours would be awaiting me on the hills behind the Sacsahuaman.

(To be continued.)

A WOMAN'S HONOUR.

IT was a snowy, blustering December night. Young Percy Padgett had arrived by an evening train from Oxford. Fresh from college, and scarcely twenty-two, he had come in the vanity of his youth to make himself an actor in the metropolis. It is true he is a successful architect now, and his name is not enrolled among the famous ones of the stage, but to make the public acknowledge his histrionic genius was then the first aspiration of his soul.

Before presenting his letters of introduction to the managers, and allowing them to fight out between themselves which should have him, he determined to devote a day or two to the inspection of the great city, which he now saw for the first time. So, after a hasty meal at the hotel, he sauntered out to mingle with the throng in the brilliant thoroughfare. Wearying of the glitter of Regent Street, he at last turned into one of the darker streets, to make his way towards Piccadilly, his curiosity impelling him thitherward, although the wind began to blow nippingly and the snow to come in thicker clouds.

The buildings were, as usual in these side streets, uniform, tall, and very exclusive in their frowning stateliness.

In several, however, there were bright lights, and from one especially there came the sounds of music and the merry laughter of children.

Homesick, lonely, and, truth to say, somewhat abashed by his first experience with the great world which he had thought so easy to conquer, he felt his heart glow under the inspiration of this mirth, and an uncontrollable curiosity seized him. The window curtains were drawn aside, and from the opposite side of the street a full view of the parlours and of the young merry-makers might be had.

The wanderer crossed, and, ascending the steps of the opposite house—a grand, but gloomy, unlighted mansion, and sheltering himself from the wind and snow under the projecting stonework about the doorway, enjoyed the moving spectacle with a zest that was brightened by his lonely position and dismal surroundings. He had been snugly ensconced in the doorway less than a minute, however, when the door suddenly opened behind him, nearly precipitating him into the hall.

A hand seized his arm, he was drawn in, and the door closed behind him.

"Hush! Follow me!" came a whisper in a woman's voice. All was dark save the faint light that made its way from a heavily-shaded library lamp in a back room, the door of which was open. Padgett would have asked for an explanation, but the female figure was already gliding up the stairs, and, being young and self-reliant, he reflected that he would prefer to follow out the adventure, even if he should have his choice, which he had not by any means, so far as the affair had gone.

The explanation might be made as well upstairs as down, he reasoned; so he pursued the mysterious figure. It flitted before him noiselessly, and then disappeared through a doorway on the second floor, through which a faint light came out to struggle ineffectually with the darkness.

Without further hesitation, he followed into an elegantly-furnished boudoir. The guide paused at a centre table, and turned up the shaded lamp, which had been burning dimly. Before him, with the table between them, stood a lovely woman, queenly in stature and grace of bearing, and attired with a taste that was in keeping with the refined air and haughty manner of the wearer.

No sooner did the increased light enable her to distinguish his features than the woman gave a stifled cry, and a look of horror distorted her beautiful face.

"What's this? You are not Walter Vane?" she cried.

"No, madam; I'm Percy Padgett, an actor in search of an engagement. What can I do for you?" replied the involuntary guest, with a desperate assurance.

"What are you doing here? Go; leave me! You should not have come," moaned the lady, wringing her hands.

"If you will be cool and think a little, madam," he replied, "you'll recollect the fact that I am not to blame for being here—that I was, in fact, dragged in."

"I mistook you for another person. Now go away," said the unwilling hostess, in great terror.

"Fear nothing. I understand the mistake," said the young man, "although I must say it was a strange one."

"Go! Go!" she cried.

He bowed, and moved towards the door.

A sound made him pause. The woman heard it too. It was the opening and shutting of a heavy door to the hall. A step was ascending the staircase.

She sprang forward and laid her hand on his arm.

"Someone is coming," she whispered, in great agitation. "You cannot go now. Stay if you would save a woman's honour———"

"Anything to be obliging; but really my first evening in London is a lively one," assented the young man, as coolly as ever; "and where——"

Escape to the hall was impossible. The footsteps were drawing near, and in another moment the newcomer, cautiously as he was advancing, would be in the room.

Acting on the impulse of the moment, the visitor darted into a cupboard, the only hiding-place at hand, and had barely closed the door behind him when the second visitor arrived.

The cupboard door had, however, been left slightly ajar by Padgett in the haste of his retreat, and he had a partial view of what went on in the apartment after his retirement. He kept his eyes open to events, for his position was far from reassuring.

The new comer entered the apartment with some caution. He was not, then, the husband of the lady, as the would-be actor had supposed. What was going to happen now? He began to wish himself out of the scrape. Might he not find an opportunity to steal out, glide down the stairs, and so into the street? To be taken for a thief if caught in this plight? No, that would never do. He would stay where he was and trust to luck.

The last visitor was a tall handsome man, of soldierly bearing, blonde, blue-eyed, elegant in dress and manners, and not far beyond thirty. He cast a suspicious glance about him.

"We are alone?" he inquired.

The woman, who received him standing at the opposite side of the table, answered with a cold nod. Her air was more haughty and frigid than before.

"I was surprised that you risked leaving the door ajar for me. I took it for a good omen, Clara. Was I right?" remarked the guest.

The lady thus familiarly addressed started as if stung by the inference of his free tone, and replied deliberately, her petulance disappearing as her earnestness asserted itself:

"Mr Vane, this is the first interview we have had in three years."

"Yes, since the eve of your wedding, when you promised to elope with me. When I appeared at the rendezvous, you refused to keep your promise, and said you were simply amusing yourself with me. Then your marriage was hastened, and took place while I was waiting at another trysting place for you to keep your promise. So you made my humiliation complete. Oh, I don't forget it," interrupted the handsome visitor throwing open his fur-lined overcoat, and throwing himself nonchalantly into an easy chair.

The woman remained standing, pale with resolution, and resumed:

"I was a silly girl. I foolishly toyed with your affections, and Heaven knows I have had cause to regret my cruel folly. Since my marriage I have never known peace. You have pursued me everywhere with letters—abroad and at home. My servants have been bribed to hand me your missives in my husband's house, and strangers have thrust them into my hands in the streets, at the opera, or in the restaurant, forcing on me a secret correspondence that is my terror."

There was a slight sound from the cupboard. It was Padgett, making a desperate effort to restrain his desire "to hit that fellow just once," as he expressed it in a whisper. The visitor received this accusation coolly, and replied:

"True, but if you suffer, imagine my state. Is it nothing to lose the one woman you love? You may have pretended affection; I did not; I loved you in earnest, with all my heart, for ever."

The woman shuddered at the intensity of his tone. There was something alarming in it.

"Is he going to kill her?" thought Padgett, watching every movement keenly.

There was indeed a blaze of insanity in the eyes of the guest that would have alarmed the stoniest heart. The lady quailed a moment before him, but by a strong effort of the will recovered her self-possession and continued:

"You have demanded a personal and private interview that I may be still further compromised."

"Yes, I have asked this for years, confident that if I might speak with you and plead my suffering your own heart would judge me favourably," replied the visitor with a fierce earnestness.

"I? Another man's wife?" There was a preceptible softening in the tones of the woman's voice, despite the effort she made at indignation.

"His wife? No—he stole you! You are mine by right. A foolish impulse, a girlish prank made you his. Your heart is mine!"

The ferocity with which the man said this startled even Padgett, who was following the dramatic scene with eager attention from his place of concealment. The visitor had, for the moment, the air of a madman.

The woman shuddered and grew pale with terror, but with a mighty effort seemed to shake off her fear, and regained her self-possession. She went on, in her former cold and haughty tone:

"Finally, to effect your purpose, you had recourse to threats. You reminded me that during my girlish flirtation I had written you letters——"

"Yes, avowing your love, and agreeing to our elopement," interrupted the man bitterly.

The young wife trembled visibly at this reminder of her folly, but with an effort continued:

"You threatened to send those letters to my husband; but you seem to have relented, for I, though doubting you, have given you this rendezvous on the offer on your part to return my letters and cease this torture," said the lady, twitching her fingers nervously, as if eager to lay hands on the fatal missives.

"And I have kept my promise," returned her handsome guest. "Here they are."

He drew a packet from a pocket of his coat and placed it on the table. The woman bounded forward with the air of a tigress, and laid her hand on them. He still retained them with a firm hold, however, and thus they remained.

"One moment," said he. "Remember, when you take these they are my gift, in the hope that pity may assert itself in your heart, that you may be led to a similar generosity in restoring me my happiness as I restore you yours."

Her eyes met his with a soft, languishing expression. He released the packet, and she drew it to her eagerly. Tearing off the wrapping she ran her eyes over the dozen dainty little billets with a hungry glare, casting each into the flame of the open grate, where the fire was sending up its bright and cheering flames. The last she set on fire, holding it in her hand until it was consumed, and fell in ashes at her feet. A glitter of triumph shone in her eyes, and her form straightened up proudly. Fixing on her guest a look of mingled scorn and hate, she exclaimed:

"Fool! My long slavery is at an end! You are disarmed, and I am free!"

"I am not disarmed!" he cried, suddenly changing his manner from soft humility to violent command. "I had not faith in you, I suspected your false heart. Here, I have retained the most compromising of all your letters—that proposing the elopement three years ago. It bears no date, and no one could prove that it was not written yesterday. Here it is, sealed in this stamped envelope, and bearing the club address of your husband."

The woman grew pale.

"I held this," he resumed moodily, as he replaced the letter in his pocket, "in the hope of forcing your heart to awaken to the old love; but you have shown me how false it is. Such a heart as yours, madam, is not worth the leading away, as I might lead it by the chain I hold here. But my sufferings at your hands must be avenged, and your cruel heart must have a bitter punishment. This is my revenge."

He took from his pocket a carefully-folded paper, and shaking a greenish powder into a glass half filled with water, which stood on the table, swallowed the mixture at a gulp.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the lady, regarding her visitor with a look of intense horror.

"I mean that I have taken poison," he replied wildly; "that in a few minutes I shall be a corpse. When your husband and your friends return account for my presence as you may. Reflect that you have wrecked my life, that you have been the cause of my death!"

As he said the last words his speech became thick, his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets, he staggered, balanced a moment erect, with a horrible smile on his twitching and distorted features, and then pitching forward, fell to the floor on his face, with a dreadful thud, and lay there motionless. The lady gave a shriek, and rushed forward to save him. She only caught his arm, however, and the weight of his body brought her to her knees beside him. She put her arms about him and turned his face up to the light.

"Dead! dead!" she cried frantically, dropping the head of the corpse in her terror. Then, on a sudden impulse, she began an eager search of the body, ending in the production of the sealed letter the dead man had so boastfully displayed. Tottering forward towards the grate she flung it into the fire, and, with an hysterical laugh, watched it burn.

As she turned she found herself face to face with young Padgett. He was pale and evidently horror-stricken. She trembled violently at the sight of him. In the excitement of the terrible scene she had quite forgotten the presence of the unbidden witness.

She shrank from him as from an accuser.

Pointing to the corpse, she cried: "They will say I murdered him!" and fell to the floor in a deep swoon.

Padgett stood for a moment bewildered between the living and the dead; then, suddenly arousing himself, exclaimed: "He was a crazy scoundrel, and he did the right thing to kill himself. But to do it here! What an awful revenge if it be carried out to the end! But it shan't be if I can help it!"

The rash young Padgett made his way down the stairs, opened the street door wide, stepped out, and looked up and down the street. Not a soul was visible. The snow was coming down in a blinding cloud, and the wind was driving it into heavy drifts. Returning to the apartment where he had passed an hour of such terrifying captivity, he, without more ado, seized the contorted corpse of the crazy lover, and shouldering it, staggered down the staircase with his gruesome burden. Out into the drifts he made his way, and through the storm-torn mists of the night.

The next morning the body of Walter Vane was found some distance away, lying in a snow drift near the haunt of the bad characters who frequent one of the side streets. It seemed plain to the coroner that the young man had been drugged and robbed.

Padgett had no inclination to reveal the truth, so he did not appear to correct the error. He had saved the honour of a woman, and defeated the ends of a villain or a maniac. The woman he never met or heard of again; but a month later, when led to her home with his curiosity, he found the house vacant, and on inquiring of a servant lounging at the gateway of an adjacent residence, he learnt that the occupants, an invalid lady and her husband, had gone abroad, and the dwelling was for sale.

Annie Davis.

KILLED BY MISTAKE

"I TOLD you I left Bradley's, didn't I?" he began, after a pause, and then continued in a dull, monotonous voice, as though repeating a lesson, "well, that was in '60, and from there I joined a large circus and menagerie that travelled about from place to place, stopping at the large towns, or where we were likely to get an audience. I got on very well with them, for in those days it was something out of the common to see performances on the trapeze, and I took immensely.

"I was dressed in skins to resemble a cat, with a tail all complete, and only my face was left exposed; and here, for the first time, I found my strong arms and small light body an advantage, for as the children—little guessing the reason—used to declare, I looked 'exactly like a cat'; and as the money taken increased nightly, I naturally rose into high favour with the circus-master.

"There was only one other in my line, and that was a girl—Lizzie. She was very beautiful, and she was very good, and from the first she took a curious liking for me, which astonished no one more than it did myself. Partly we were thrown very much together, for of course we practised a good deal, and then there were new tricks to be learned, and so on; partly she was a quiet, gentle sort of girl, very different from the rest of the troupe, and then I knew she pitied me, and pity, they say, leads to love.

"From the first moment that I saw her sweet, serious face I had worshipped her as the loveliest and purest thing that had ever come into my hard and miserable life, so when, after two years' patient waiting, Lizzie taught me the words that otherwise I should never have dared to utter, I spoke them in all thankfulness, and held her to me with such a sense of rapturous bliss that angels might have envied. And so we were married, and one short month after, a third performer, Wintle by name, came to join us.

"How intensely I grew to loathe that man no words can tell. He was a fine, tall man, with a quiet wit, and steady nerve, and strong as a giant. When Lizzie came flying through the air—for we had new tricks now, of which he was the mainstay—he would catch her in his arms and run with her up the ropes, while I, poor cripple, knew were I to attempt it it would mean death to us both.

"I stood below, envying him for his strength, and hating him for the power it gave him. Lizzie liked him. She told me so many times, never dreaming of the jealous, watchful gaze; I looked after them as they dived, and flew, and swung together; and so the weeks went on.

"At last, Bates (the manager) arranged a regular little play to be acted by us three while we were in the air, and every one predicted it would be an enormous success. I was to retain my famous part, by which I had gained my name of the cat-clown; Lizzie, with her sweet face and innocent, child-like eyes, was to be queen of the fairies; Robert Wintle was to be her earthly lover; and the first performance was to take place on the fifth of November.

"One of my great hits was to be counterfeiting terror at a position in which I had been placed by the queen's orders. It was an immense height, almost at the top of the building, and far away from any staves or ropes, so that after the rope which conveyed me there was withdrawn, I was utterly powerless to descend.

"The way I hung on to the bar, and my ludicrous efforts to maintain my seat, were declared inimitable by the manager and the ground clowns, and I anticipated a splendid piece of business on the grand night. We were three weeks rehearsing it, and it was during that time I first noticed a secret understanding between my Lizzie and Wintle.

"He seemed uneasy, embarrassed, most unlike his usual self, but he followed Lizzie like her shadow, and I followed him. I saw it all now, but alas! too late. Bitterly I reproached myself with having let her marry me through pity, and it was the thought that it was only pity I had won that was the hardest sting of all. But none the less surely did I hate the man who had succeeded where I had failed, and none the less was I set on my revenge.

"At last I overheard some words of theirs, not many. A few gentle words from Wintle—a kiss—a sigh—a murmur of 'Robert, I am so happy' in a girl's voice, and then, as I drew back from the darkness, my wife came from the room and passed me, with a glad smile upon her lips. I followed her. Not to accuse her. I left that for others to do, when my work should have succeeded, but I went straight to the circus and clambered up the ropes to the platform from which we started.

"There were no men about to interrupt me. Even had there been no one would have dreamed of interfering, for it was my daily business to see to every catch and rope, and bar, before the performance took place, and it now wanted but an hour to the time, and the grand night, too, as I thought, with fiendish glee, as I scrambled over the netting and felt it all with care; I gave very particular care to one bar, and then I descended and looked up.

"One of the grandest bits of this fairy scene was towards the end, when Lizzie, as the queen, was flying at the left side of the netting, and Wintle, at the extreme right, was executing some wonderful gymnastics on the horizontal bar. He wound up by jerking himself off into space, and then, after turning a somersault, catching by his knees to another bar which hung some twelve feet below. It was a very difficult trick, and one over which he was nervous, for should the lower bar by any miraculous chance give way, nothing could prevent him falling, and as in such a position it was impossible to calculate distances, he would be quite as likely to fall outside as inside the net.

"The entertainment was half over, the Peruvian horses had been duly admired, and the jugglers' tricks were finished, when the band struck up an inspiriting march, composed in our honour, and before the applause which greeted our entrance had subsided, we were hanging on the central rope, and bowing our acknowledgments—the new play had begun.

"They cheered us to the echo. Never had fairy looked more lovely than Lizzie in her silver dress; the prince was charming, the cat superb, every one declared, and then following on the applause came a breathless silence as they awaited the grand finale.

I was swung up to my lofty perch, and the 'courtship,' as we called the coquetting on the tight-rope, soon began below me.

"Lizzie advancing from the right and Wintle from the left, they were to cross each other in the centre and each to go to the opposite end, and then to begin those 'fairy flights' which brought the play to a conclusion. Seated there, while continuing my own business of mock fright and dismay, my straining eyes were fixed upon those two—the wife who had betrayed me, and the man who had dared to win her from me.

"Wilder and wilder grow my actions as I dodge to and fro on my perch for fear I should lose one movement of theirs; and the laughter rings from below as bright eyes fix upon me. 'Look at the clown! look at his antics!' they cry, and I—I am nearly blinded by my whole soul rushing to my eyes as I hang there waiting—waiting to see him fall. See, now he waves the fan, the signal she should pass him.

"Now, Lizzie, gently! Why, what is this? She draws back, whispering something; her lips move. I cannot catch the words, but I know their meaning. 'She hasn't the nerve,' she says, 'to-night; she cannot pass him,' and—am I blind? Am I falling? She turns back the same way, to the right, to his side! 'Lizzie!'

"In good earnest I hang forward, now collecting my strength for a warning cry—'Lizzie!' Is it my voice that sounds in that half-choked agonised whisper that scarcely stirs the air about me? I turn my eyes to the audience below, gesticulating wildly for the help that in a few minutes will be too late, but they laugh back their answers to me. How splendidly I am acting to-night!

"I must get down a rope—Where is my rope?—and I turn to clutch at the support which carried me up just as she reaches the topmost bar—I—I forgot. They took it away. My hand closes on empty air, and then—a few minutes of awful, sickening terror, while the ringing cheers burst forth afresh, and the fairy swings gaily to and fro—and, then, a frightful scream, a rush of horror-stricken people towards the useless net, and in their midst, there, on the cruel floor, Lizzie—my Lizzie—dead!

"I do not know how I got down, I don't know anything that happened after that, except that I saw Wintle married. He married a girl belonging to the troupe; and she told me it was Lizzie who had arranged it all quietly for them, and that it was to her, and not to Lizzie, that the kiss and the words had been given. But somehow," added the man wearily, "I don't seem to be able to think of that.

"It's now ten years ago to-day," he began again, presently; and when, after a few words of sympathy, I was obliged to leave him, he was still mechanically repeating the words which had just attracted me, "Lizzie, killed by mistake."

W. H.

On WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 9,
We shall publish the First Number of a New Weekly Paper, to be called:

Pearson's
STORY TELLER.

It will consist wholly of continued stories. The opening chapters of eight entirely new novels will be found in the first number.

A GRAND OFFER TO READERS OF THE
STORY TELLER.

PEARSON'S WEEKLY will give, for a period of thirty days from October 9, a BEAUTIFUL ¾-LIFE-SIZE INDIA INK AND CRAYON PORTRAIT FREE to anyone who will bring or send them only 5s. and four consecutive coupons from THE STORY TELLER.

These portraits are of the finest artistic merit. They are absolutely permanent, being finished by the Air Brush, with indelible India Ink, making them more permanent than any of the old styles of portraits, and they will last a life-time.

They would cost you if ordered through Artists from Three to Five Guineas!

Have you FATHER, MOTHER, SISTER, BROTHER, or CHILD'S photo that you wish enlarged—perhaps some dear one who has passed away—whose likeness is now fading, and should be preserved before it is too late. We will enlarge and copy it into a beautiful portrait for you. Remember these portraits are Absolutely Free so far as we ar concerned.

HOW CAN WE DO THIS?

We will tell you. We wish THE STORY TELLER to have a very large circulation such as it deserves. We know of no method whereby we can serve our subscribers better, and which will prove more popular, than by making the offer we now do. We expect to make many thousands of portraits.

SHALL WE MAKE YOURS?

You will get an unheard-of bargain by availing yourself of this grand offer, and we are glad to be able to give it to you. We can copy from any photos, large or small, tin-types, or any kind of glass picture. We copy all pictures bust styles—head and shoulders only.

When Sending an Order inclose the picture you want copied in an envelope, and place your name and address on the back of the picture, and send the 5s. and four consecutive coupons from THE STORY TELLER to our paper, and you will receive the portrait copied for you as soon as possible. Have no fear of losing your small picture. It will be returned in as good order as received.

An example of the portrait we offer to give you can be seen at the Offices of P.W.

Address:—PORTRAITS,
Pearson's Weekly Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C

Apartments to Let.

It must be said that Anatole Pluchin was on the eve of getting married. These things may happen to anybody, and I don't mention the fact in order to ask your pity on his behalf, because his fiancée was a charming girl. Her name was Andree—delightful name! She was blonde. She was twenty years and seven months old—attractive age! She belonged to a family that was worthy of all respect—a fact to be considered.

That rogue Anatole! He knew the young girl was in love with him—madly in love with him. Had she not confessed to him that she would die rather than marry another? I know well that these things are often said and rarely executed. But in this case, although Andree was a blonde, she was the owner of an energetic and decided character.

Doubtless it was this strong temperament that prevented her parents from making any objections, and placing any obstacles in her way. It was no use talking to Andree!

"You know, mamma," she repeated again and again, "I want this matter to be finished quickly."

"But, my dear child, there are certain delays and certain formalities——"

"The delays can be hurried."

"That is true."

"And the formalities can be simplified."

"I have no objections, dear, if it will give you pleasure."

"Then, mamma, let us consider the engagement as settled."

"Settled! Your lover has only exchanged a very few words with your father."

"You know that my father does what you wish; let us waste no more time discussing it. I shall be married on the 10th of next month. Let us start the campaign."

"Start the campaign? What do you mean?"

"Find apartments."

"Yes; but——"

"To-morrow morning, then, we will start out. To-morrow, directly after breakfast, for apartments are sometimes difficult to find. Now, mamma, let me give you a kiss, you are so good."

She spoke the truth. Her mother was an excellent creature, and Anatole Pluchin was—well, his mother, her future mother-in-law, was of the kind that are nowadays seldom to be found.

The day following, at the appointed hour, Andree was ready to attack Paris and ransack it from end to end in her endeavours to find the nest—that is, the apartments—of her dreams. Her valiant mother was prepared to accompany her. The poor old woman had burned her throat with her coffee, and had nearly choked herself over the sugar at the bottom of the cup.

Young and inexperienced Andree little knew what a terrible thing it is to hunt for rooms in Paris; to climb up dozens and dozens of steps, and to undergo the searching questioning of zealous concierges and indiscreet portieres.

After an hour and a half of this exercise, the unfortunate girl was exhausted. And her mother! She followed her daughter, puffing like a grampus, and dragging her legs after her as if they were logs of heavy timber. "Ouf! Ouf! Ouf!"

Then at length: "Mamma, look at that pretty house with a view from the back windows over the gardens. Let us ask the price. I have an idea that it will be just the thing."

The price was just what the girl had judged reasonable for herself and her future husband.

"Let us go upstairs," cried Andree, who was delighted. "We can see over it, can we not?" she asked the concierge.

"Certainly, mademoiselle."

"Is any one living here now?" asked the mother.

"A young widow, madame."

"Ah!" remarked the mother, "and doubtless she wishes to leave a house that has painful memories for her."

A flashily dressed girl opened the door in answer to their ring.

"These ladies desire to see the apartments," explained the concierge.

The girl made a remark in a low voice, that escaped the others' ears. It was accompanied by an expressive shrug of the shoulders.

"Entrez!" she said aloud.

Andree and her mother walked in. Everything most comfortable. Quite a discovery, in fact. The furniture was commodious and elegant, and placed each piece in the corner where it suited best. And the appointments! And the cupboards! And the kitchen! And the arrangement of the light! The visitors were completely charmed.

As they turned a corner of the corridor the mother looked in the direction of Andree, and said:

"Andree, I think it must be your good star that guided us here."

But she stopped suddenly.

"Why, where are you, Andree? Where can she have gone to? Andree!"

A distant and sorrowful cry came in answer.

"Andree! What's the matter?" cried her mother alarmed.

This is what had happened. Andree, inquisitive little girl that she was, had turned down a passage, and suddenly opened a door. She was curious to see what the room was like.

The door, it so happened, was that of a private boudoir. Inside, as she stood, pretty as a fairy, in the doorway, she saw a velvet sofa. On the sofa she saw, half reclining, a very pretty young widow with black eyes and a demurely sweet face. Kneeling on the soft Turkish rug beside her, with his hand upon his heart and an expression of eternal love upon his face, was a young man.

Andree heard no words, but the noise of opening the door caused the young man to spring to his feet and face her.

"Ah! ma foi! Andree!"

It was indeed Anatole.

* * * * * *

Andree possessed a resolute character, as we know. She never saw Anatole again, and the amount the courts granted her for breach of promise of marriage is not exactly known.

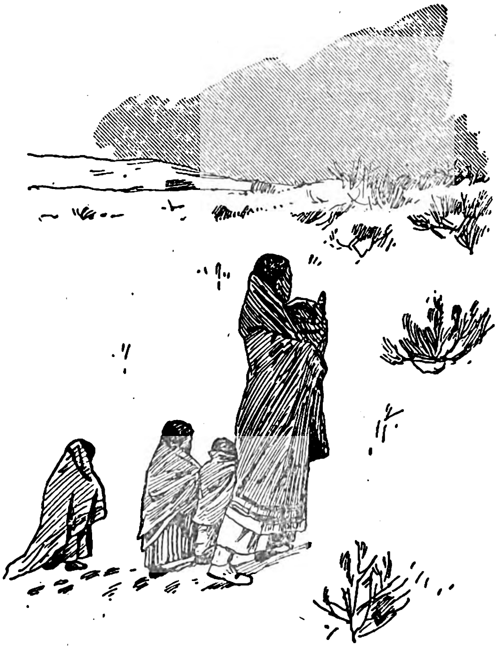
In this way a mother-in-law who was anxious to do all she could for her son-in-law only succeeded in bringing about results that were a hundred times worse than the most bitter hostilities.

Such is the irony of fate, and doubtless it was best for the happiness of la belle Andree. B. S. K.

ZEE-WEE

I.

Zee-Wee and her twin sister, Wauska, resembled each other like two peas. They were the daughters of the Dacotah chief, Don't Know How. Their mother was named Minona, and she was the wife of her husband. Altogether, she was the prettiest squaw in the village, and there were those who declared that her match for beauty was not to be found in the whole Dacotah nation. Much was said, too, about the exorbitant price that was paid for her—being a fleet horse, a six-barreled Colt revolver, and three blankets. She was, indeed, a woman of rare worth.



Wandered away to the nearest Government agency.

Twins were infrequent in the Dacotah nation, and Don't Know How was none too well pleased when Minona presented him with two girls. One of them always seemed to him superfluous, but he could never decide which, as he had no way of telling them apart. Even the mother had her doubts as to which was Zee-Wee and which Wauska, until they were four or five years old, and the dominant spirit of the one differentiated her from her gentle sister.

It may have been Wauska who was the enterprising one, and Zee-Wee who imitated her; but the mother, either by chance or guided by a deeper instinct, decided differently. The name Zee-Wee gradually attached itself to the adventurous maiden, and the shy and docile sister became identified as Wauska.

Two more children were born to Minona in the course of years, and they were both girls. Then Don't Know How became seriously alarmed, and took unto himself two more wives. These were much cheaper than Minona had been, so he could afford to indulge himself.

But when they had borne each a man-child, and felt their position assured, they leagued themselves against the favourite and drove her out of the tepee. There was a hot battle outside, and the chief sat calmly and looked on, while Minona was beaten, scratched, torn, and knocked down, and trampled upon.

It was not his habit, he said, to mix in woman's business. Even when Minona arose, bruised and bleeding from the snow, he sat imperturbable, with crossed legs and made no motion to help her. Her children were thrown out to her, one after another, by her victorious rivals, and she picked up the youngest in her arms, and gathering the rest around her, wandered away to the nearest Government agency. There the doctor put plasters and salves upon her wounds, and she was well cared for.

The white folks were kind to her, and she was warm and comfortable. When, therefore, the missionary asked her for one of her little girls, promising to have her educated like the pale-faces, she pushed over to him the one she believed to be Wauska; and it was not until the next day she discovered that it was Zee-Wee with whom she had parted. She wanted to rectify her mistake (for Zee-Wee, in spite of the confusion of identity, was the apple of her eye,) but it was too late. Zee-Wee had been sent with a dozen other children to the Lyleham Institute, in charge of the missionary.

The next day Don't Know How came to the agency and demanded his wife. She was reluctant to go with him, until he guaranteed her revenge and protection. But back she went at last; and she sat perfectly unmoved, with her feet drawn up under her, while the two cantankerous wives got their beating.

She was not a little afraid that she might be called to account for parting with Zee-Wee without his consent. But her mind was soon at rest. A month elapsed before her husband referred to Zee-Wee's absence, and when she explained, somewhat timidly, what had become of her, he only said, "How," and never referred to her again.

II.

Fourteen years had passed, and Zee-Wee was twenty years old. She was the cleverest Indian girl that had ever been graduated from the Lyleham Institute. During the last years of her stay she had acted as a teacher to the younger children of her race; and she had been so successful in this work that there was a prospect of her obtaining a permanent engagement.

But Zee-Wee's heart yearned for her own people. Her mission, she said, was to spread the light of civilisation among the Dacotahs. Her father, the chief, of whom she had scarcely the dimmest recollection, appeared to her fancy as a stern and noble savage, sage and eloquent, of kingly mien and bearing, ruling his tribe with paternal despotism.

She would go back to this father, who must have sorely missed her during all these years, and would be a daughter to him in very truth, guessing his desires and ministering to his wants. She felt herself as a princess of the forest, and there was something touchingly pathetic in her situation which appealed mightily to her. Not once, but a hundred times, had the teachers of the Institute impressed upon her and her fellow pupils their solemn responsibility to their savage kinsmen. They were to be the torch-bearers of light in the dusk of the primeval woods, and the future of the whole Indian race (which otherwise would be doomed to extinction) depended upon them.

There was among the teachers at the Lyleham Institute an enthusiastic young lady named Marion Gallaudet, who had conceived a passionate friendship for Zee-Wee. She was one of those restless women who are always hungering for a mission, and professing a great contempt for those who have none.

Zee-Wee was not deep enough, perhaps, to be aware that she herself presented herself to Miss Gallaudet in the light of a mission. Far less could she make allowance for the exaggeration of a mind thus constituted. It was to Miss Gallaudet's unwearied efforts that she owed her own mission—her resolution to devote her life to the redemption of her tribe from the degradation of savagery.

Many and many an evening she sat with Miss Gallaudet in her neat and pretty little room, weaving the romances of their futures, embellishing them with fresh touches, borrowed from Cooper, Chateaubriand, and Longfellow.

Zee-Wee would marry, of course, an Indian chief, and the more savage the better, in order that she might lift him up to her level, or, as her friend phrased it, permeate his savage nature with the sweetness of her pure womanhood. Her instructress, too, had made up her mind to bestow her precious self upon a proud son of the forest; and while she sat in her luxurious easy chair, toasting her toes before her fire, would descant in enraptured tones upon the soul-expanding freedom of woods and prairies, and the wholesome discipline of hardship.

III.

The Indian village, consisting of forty or fifty wigwams, was pitched about four miles from the Government agency. It was early in September, and the heat was oppressive.

Everybody seemed asleep. Even the dogs were disinclined to stir; only now and then one of them rose, with lolling tongue, stretched himself lazily, and after a sleepy survey of the surroundings, lay down again with his head between his forepaws. Smoke rose only from a single wigwam, over the entrance to which was an unpainted board, bearing an inscription in lamp black:

D. K. HOW, TRADER.

The article which D. K. How traded in (although only surreptitiously) seemed to have affected his powers of locomotion; for he lay snoring heavily in the hot sun in front of his tepee in a place and position which he scarcely would have chosen with deliberate intent.

The sound of hoof-beats upon the prairie startled the dogs, and half-a-dozen of them, conquering their lethargy, began to bark in a languidly perfunctory fashion. The hoof-beats came nearer, and some more dogs awoke and joined in the chorus of salutation. A well-grown and rather good-looking Indian girl put her head out of the opening of D. K. How's wigwam to ascertain the cause of the disturbance.

What she saw was a young woman of her own race, accompanied by a sergeant in uniform from the Government post. She rode on a side-saddle, and was dressed like a white lady, with shoes on her feet and a straw hat with feathers on her head. There was something dainty and neat about her which greatly impressed the occupant of the wigwam.

"Do you know where I can find the chief, Don't Know How?" she asked, vigorously smoothing down her skirts (for she was not in riding habit) and fidgeting with a parasol which she had apparently been using as a whip.

The savage maiden stared from the sergeant to her questioner, as if she did not comprehend.

"Why, miss," the sergeant exclaimed, as he caught sight of the sleeping figure at his horse's feet, "that's him; that's Don't Know How."

Zee-Wee, who had carefully backed her pony in order to avoid stepping on the sleeper, leapt from the saddle, and stood long regarding him with a look of anxious scrutiny.

"Is he ill?" she asked.

"No; only drunk," replied the sergeant reassuringly.

Zee-Wee had told herself many times on the way that she must not pitch her expectations too high; she had tried to prepare herself for a possible disappointment. But how far were all her imaginings from the reality that confronted her! With a sinking heart she stooped over the prostrate man, and gently shaking him, cried in his ear: "Father! It is I—Zee-Wee—who have come back to you."

With an embroidered handkerchief (which was a present from Miss Gallaudet) she brushed the mosquitoes from his face, and wiped away the beads of perspiration from his forehead. She could not repress a little shiver of disgust at the alcoholic fumes which enveloped him. She saw his heavy, drunken eyes open with a look of sullen stupor; but she bravely conquered her impulse to run, and, kneeling at his side, she repeated, sweetly:

"Father! It is I—Zee-Wee. Don't you know me—Zee-Wee, your daughter?"

Don't Know How gave a savage growl, as if he resented being disturbed, then raised himself into a sitting posture, and began to rub his eyes with the backs of his grimy hands. The sergeant, who had lost all patience with the brute, gave him a kick, and cried: "Get up there, quick. You'll get the jimjams if you go to sleep in the sun, like a pig."

The chief gave another sullen growl, and, discarding Zee-Wee's proffered hand, struggled into an approximately perpendicular position. Thus he remained for a minute or more, swaying slightly to the right and to the left, doubtful whether to trust his legs in an experiment of locomotion. His features wore a meditative air, which made the sergeant laugh and Zee-Wee shudder. The former, as his presence definitely penetrated Don't Know How's consciousness, aroused in his mind a dim suspicion. Pulling himself together, he reeled past him, and, making a random dive for the entrance to the tepee, disappeared in the dusk within.

A greyish pallor suffused Zee-Wee's brown cheeks. Her breath came in spasmodic gasps, her eyes dilated, and from her lips issued a half-stifled sound, which was half a moan and half a sigh. She looked forlorn, forsaken, bitterly disillusionised. The sergeant felt sorry for her, and remarked, by way of consolation:

"Could have told you before, miss, that that Indian trash wasn't worth looking up. Get into the saddle again, and we'll ride back to the agency."

He held out his hand to swing her into the saddle, but she stood gazing at him dismally, and made no motion to accept his offer. Her limbs seemed numb, her faculties paralysed. She was afraid to think, and bit her lips in the effort to keep the thoughts at bay.

Presently the same face that ten minutes ago had obscured the opening reappeared, and the same comely Indian girl, in scant attire, stood eyeing Zee-Wee with an air of timid deprecation. One of her shoulders was bare, and a much dilapidated garment of some cheap striped stuff hung, loosely suspended, from the other. The dull fatigue in Zee-Wee's glance suddenly vanished at the sight of her; a new emotion flared up and visibly struggled in her features.

"Wauska?" she asked, a little awkwardly. "Are you my twin sister, Wauska?"

She was obviously afraid of being rebuffed, and therefore strove to restrain her agitation.

"Wauska — yes. Me Wauska," answered the other, nodding vigorously.

"I am Zee-Wee. You know Zee-Wee?"

"Me know Zee-Wee—yes."

"Where is my mother, Wauska?" she asked tremulously.

Wauska looked blank, and only nodded vaguely, when the question was repeated.

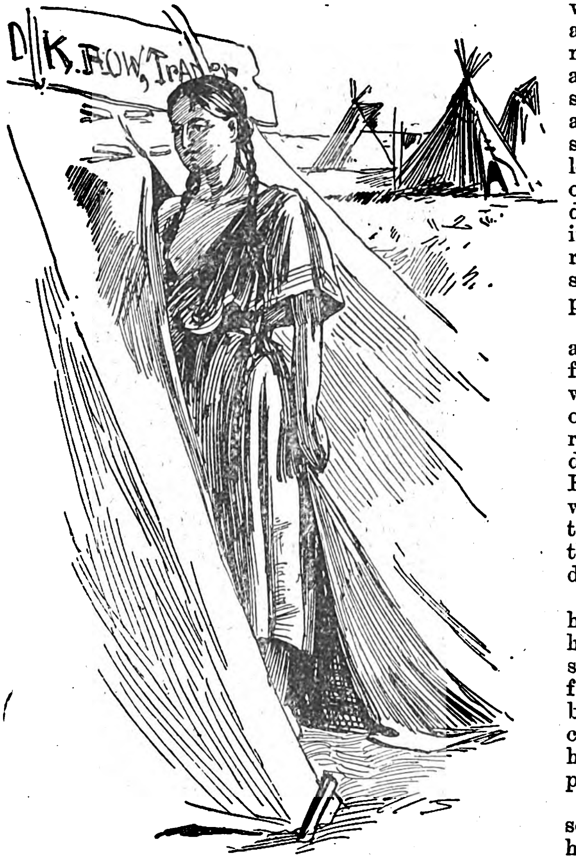
"Where is Minona—my mother—your mother?" Zee-Wee reiterated slowly, and with much emphasis on each syllable. Wauska, without a shadow of emotion, turned to the sergeant, addressing to him a few strangely guttural sounds in her own language.

"Wauska says that her mother has been dead for many years," explained the latter in English. "She wants to know whether her sister has forgotten her Indian speech."

"I am sorry, Wauska, that I have," wailed Zee-Wee.

An oppressive sense of helplessness, of boundless impotence and weariness, crept over her like a cold chill, which was now followed by a dull, stinging pain in the region of the chest. Her heart felt heavy as lead. She was too sad to weep. Should she return with the sergeant to the agency, and weakly abandon her mission? Her face betrayed to him but little emotion, and when, to precipitate the issue, he mounted his horse, she still stood irresolute.

"Well, Zee-Wee," he said, seizing the bridle of her pony, "toss up a penny. Head, Indian; tail, white."



Wauska.

Suiting the action to his words, he flung a coin into the air; but the horse, mistaking the meaning of the gesture, backed and stepped on the coin. "Sure it was tail," he cried; "come along, now, or you'll regret it."

He looked at her with cheery encouragement; but, as she slowly shook her head, he whipped up both horses and rode away.

IV.

As soon as the sergeant was out of sight, Wauska stepped out from the tepee, and, with true Indian stolidity, stood staring at her sister. It was a summer wigwam, about twenty feet wide, and surrounded by a raised platform, the width of which was about six feet. Two mongrel dogs, which had been viewing Zee-Wee with suspicion, now came up and smelt her, and, having made sure of her respectability, withdrew, peevishly stretched themselves, yawned, and lay down to resume their slumber in the shadow of the lodge. Two naked children of five or six years had also discovered Zee-Wee, and stood in the middle of the road, regarding her, like images of stone, with imperturbable composure.

The sense of oppression, anxiety—nay, of helpless fright—which had hovered with its icy breath on the outskirts of her mind, now reasserted itself, and a sudden faintness came over her. Her knees tottered; her head was in a whirl. She staggered towards the platform where the dogs were lying, and sat down on the edge of it.

Now that she had cut off her retreat, she felt as if she had surrendered herself to some terrible unknown power from which no mercy was to be expected. Again she clasped her head tightly in her hands, and strove desperately to conquer her fear.

Looking up, she saw Wauska seated on the ground before her; but her placid features evinced neither curiosity nor interest, far less sympathy or affection. Her black, bead-like eyes glittered uneasily, as if she, too, had some apprehension of danger. For fully an hour they sat thus, silently gazing at each other, each trying to explore the other's soul.

Meanwhile the shadow of the tepee had swung round until the platform was exposed to the full glare of the sun. Zee-Wee arose. She had fought the battle to the bitter end. Her mind was clear and calm. "Wauska," she said, "I'm going to speak to my father."

The uneasy light in Wauska's eyes brightened, and she sprang up and grasped her sister's hand.

"Zee-Wee, no go," she ejaculated, in a breathless staccato. "Chief drunk now—Zee-Wee wait! Chief sober——"

"No," Zee-Wee answered, turning her unfaltering eyes upon her astonished sister; "I must go now."

The old heroism had come back to her. Doubt and weakness had fled. She could have gone to the stake unflinchingly, cheerfully; torture and death had lost their terrors.

Don't Know How had awakened from his drunken sleep, and sat peevishly scratching his head, when his daughter confronted him.

"I have come to stay with you, father," she said with lofty serenity; "I have been away from you for fourteen years. Now I want to be a help and comfort to you, if you will let me."

The chief sat with his immobile face peering into the dusk, in which the figure of his daughter dimly defined itself against the uncovered opening.

"How!" he exclaimed, whether by way of greeting or as an expression of surprise she could not determine—"how!"

"You surely remember Zee-Wee, your daughter?" she continued, in a voice of entreaty—"Zee-Wee, Minona's child, who went away with the white missionary to be educated? Now she has come back, and wants to teach her Indian kin."

"Zee-Wee come back—Minona's papoose," he jerked forth.

The memory of the half-forgotten incident was obviously revived, and a vague expression of intelligence passed over his features.

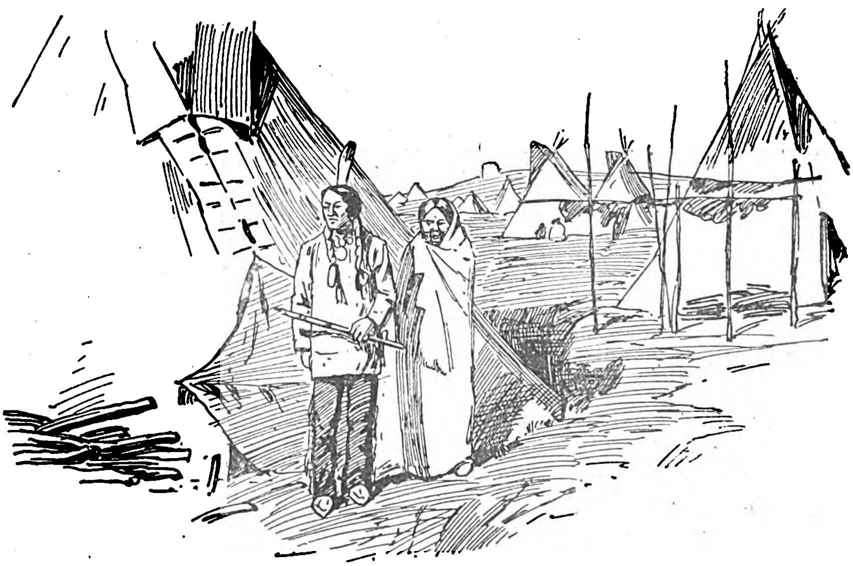
"Yes, yes," cried Zee-Wee, delighted; "and you are glad to see Zee-Wee again—glad that she has come back?"

"Wehakha not like Zee-Wee. Wehakha beat Zee-Wee; Wehakha drive Zee-Wee away," he observed, after a meditative pause.

"Wehakha?"

She was about to add: "Who is Wehakha?" when it dawned upon her that Wehakha was probably her father's wife. The presence of a stepmother, and especially one who might be expected to beat her, was not an agreeable prospect to Zee-Wee, but she conquered herself and answered, in her sweetest tones: "But my father will protect Zee-Wee. Zee-Wee will not provoke the anger of Wehakha."

The chief plainly regarded this as a problematic proposition. He vouchsafed no reply, but began to scratch his head once more, with a look of sulky preoccupation. The heat within the wigwam and the foul odour which pervaded the air made Zee-Wee anxious to terminate the interview, and she seized this opportunity to withdraw and rejoin Wauska outside.



"Crooked Gun—that his squaw—Small Pigeon."

V.

Zee-Wee had been five or six hours in her father's wigwam before food was set before her. When, tortured by hunger, she had asked Wauska about the time for dinner, she had learned that there was no definite hour for any meal, but that people ate when they were hungry. It was at six or seven o'clock in the evening, when the sun was near setting, that food was offered her, consisting of hominy and dried beef. As the rank odour inside the tepee almost nauseated her, she begged leave to sit on the outer platform, and, as her father nodded his head in token of assent, she made her escape as quickly as possible, and with difficulty forced down the unappetising morsels.

It was while she was thus occupied that she became aware of a broad-shouldered, squat young Indian, who was standing before the opening of the opposite lodge, regarding her with the sort of attention with which a cat watches the movements of a bird up in a tree.

There was something hard, wooden, impenetrable in its stolid inexpressiveness, and yet there seemed to be lurking in his eyes a feline alertness which made her shiver. He wore trousers with ornamental fringes, and a shirt which came down to his knees.

A young squaw, who looked cowed and frightened, came out of the wigwam and spoke to him, and Zee-Wee seemed to feel that he was inquiring about her. She heard repeatedly the words: "How, how!" and, though she could understand nothing, she yet listened with a nervous tension, as if her own fate were involved in that conversation. An insidious chill stole over her, and her former visions of frenzied dances, accompanied by savage yells, tortures, and agonised screams, returned to her.

Zee-Wee was interrupted in her reflections by Wauska, who came out and again seated herself on the ground in front of her, with her feet pulled up on the right side. The two sisters gazed at each other regretfully, each yearning to confide in the other. There was tenderness in Zee-Wee's glance, and in Wauska's a dawning light of admiration and half-embarrassed affection. She extended her hand repeatedly with the desire to touch the little gold cross which depended from a string of amber beads about Zee-Wee's neck; but each time her embarrassment got the better of her courage, and she slowly withdrew her hand, with a smile of sheepish deprecation.

"Wauska," said Zee-Wee, when this pantomime had continued for several minutes, "who is the man that stands before the wigwam opposite? Tell me his name, please."

She made a slight motion with her head to indicate the direction.

"Crooked Gun," answered Wauska.

"Crooked Gun—is that his name?"

"Crooked Gun—that his squaw—Small Pigeon," she added, by way of amplification.

Whether Crooked Gun divined that he was the subject of discussion, or he had a definite errand, he presently crossed the road and paused in front of the sisters. He addressed some questions in the Indian tongue to Wauska, glancing sideways at Zee-Wee, whose heart began to beat with so tumultuous a throb that she wondered whether he could not hear it.

Twice she lifted her grave eyes to his face with a mute appeal, but each time she recoiled from the sight, and the pitiless immobility of his features again chilled her blood with fear. It was especially his low, beetling brow and his evil, thin-lipped mouth that repelled her; while his narrow, gleaming eyes, surlily fixed upon her, filled her with a nameless apprehension.

When Wauska had satisfied his curiosity, Crooked Gun slouched his heavy shoulders forward, and, turning upon his heel, entered the wigwam. Instantly the conversation, which had recently flagged, revived, and the harsh croak of Wehakha's voice was heard above the quiet deliberations of the men. A dull flush of excitement glowed upon Wauska's dusky cheeks, and her eyes began to glitter with an unnatural brightness.

"What is it, Wauska?" asked Zee-Wee anxiously.

Wauska responded with a lively mimic injunction to keep silent. She sat immovable, with her hand to her ear, a dilated stare in her fixed bead-like eyes.

"Oh, Wauska, Wauska, what is it?" cried Zee-Wee, with a thrill of panic. "Does he want to kill me?"

"Crooked Gun—he marry Zee-Wee," Wauska replied, in a whispered staccato.

"Oh, no, no, Wauska! It isn't possible! He has a wife already."

"Indian have two wife—three wife—as much wife he like," Wauska obligingly explained.

"But he doesn't know me, Wauska. He has never seen me until to-day. You are mistaken, surely. It is you he wants to marry."

Wauska was too much absorbed in listening to pay any heed to these exclamations; and it was not until her sister had repeated them in a voice of tremulous entreaty that she observed, placidly: "Crooked Gun no marry Wauska."

Zee-Wee sat long—stunned, bewildered. She felt wounded in her pride, revolted in her sense of propriety, outraged in her womanhood. Should she permit herself to be disposed of like a chattel to the first savage who made a bid for her? She writhed with an anguish of humiliation at the thought of all the sentiments she had wasted upon this father who was now bartering her away for a horse, or a rifle, or half-a-dozen blankets. She could hear within the bargaining of the two men and the occasional croaking of Wehakha, who was either objecting to the price or urging its acceptance.

There are no wounds more stinging than those of vanity. Zee-Wee's self-esteem shrank woefully during that torturing half-hour. She felt in one moment paltry, cowed, and insignificant; but in the next wrath came to her assistance, and her courage rebounded. She would fight to the last ditch. She would never, never, never submit.

VI.

The next morning Zee-Wee was curtly informed by her father that she was to marry Crooked Gun that very day; and she learnt incidentally from Wauska that the price her suitor was to pay for her was a Winchester rifle, a powder-horn, and five blankets. He had ridden to the agency at an early hour for the purpose of procuring the rifle by theft or by barter, and he was expected back at noon.

Zee-Wee walked about, dumbly wringing her hands in tearless torture and shivering apprehension. She was well aware that she was watched, and that an attempt at escape would be futile. She implored and entreated her father to be permitted to return to the Government post, and pledged herself to send him handsome presents from the Institute, where she would be able to earn money; but he evidently distrusted promises extorted by fear, preferring one modest bird in the hand to ten gorgeous ones in a very remote bush.

It was two hours past noon when Zee-Wee's suitor presented himself in front of the wigwam, followed by his squaw, Small Pigeon, who was carrying the purchase price of her future rival. The rifle was duly delivered, and was found to be in good order; likewise the five blankets; but the powder-horn was missing. Crooked Gun offered some excuse, asserting that it was an oversight, and promised that, if the bride was sent to his wigwam, he would make good the deficiency on the morrow.

But Don't Know How was not to be fooled by such subterfuges. He insisted upon the literal fulfilment of the contract; and when the brave began to bargain afresh, declaring that he had but one powder-horn, which he could not spare, the chief returned the accepted goods, and gave him twenty-four hours in which to meet his obligations, or to take the consequences.

The heat had grown sultrier and more oppressive during the afternoon, and a fantastic play of heat-lightning was fitfully illuminating the western horizon. The sun had set in a sanguinary blaze of colours; the clouds sent long phantasmal arms towards the zenith, and the first premonitory mutterings of thunder were heard on the outskirts of the wide plain.

Gradually, as the dark curtain spread northward, southward, westward, a desolating wind began to wander over the prairie, making all sorts of aimless excursions, marked by the bending of the sage-brush and the faint whistling of the arid stalks. A few hesitating drops of rain fell, big and heavy; and in a trice the heavens were blotted out in a mighty downpour, which swept with a splendid impetuosity across the sun-parched plain.

Zee-Wee was sitting, with her ear pressed against the wall of the wigwam, listening to the rhythmic roar of the storm and the wild rhetoric of the thunder. With one eye she was also observing Wehakha, who was squatting before the fire, shelling corn, while with the other she was keeping watch of the door, through the crack of which the rain was beating in, forming a large, slowly widening puddle.

Though this puddle seemed for the moment a matter of much interest to Zee-Wee, it was merely her external sense which was occupied in its contemplation. Out of her soul there arose an anxious query, which was repeated and repeated with a quivering intensity, until it became half mechanical, and she had to rouse herself again in order to realise that happiness or misery—life and death—depended upon it. She had spent the whole afternoon in tremulous excitement, asking herself with a wearisome reiteration: "Will he come? Will he give up the powder-horn?"

It was too ludicrously absurd, and yet tragically humiliating, that her fate, in this moment, depended upon a powder-horn.

It was three hours after sunset. The chief and his sons were snoring peacefully in their corners, and, beside Zee-Wee, only Wehakha and Wauska were awake. The fire in the middle of the wigwam was flaring up fitfully, only to lapse again into a slumberous flapping about the glowing coals. The raindrops which fell through the open smoke-hole sizzled in the smouldering embers, and the smoke writhed tortuously along the floor.

Then all of a sudden there was a shriek—a loud, wild, frenzied shriek. Something dashed down the smoke-hole—a fierce, phantasmal something—whirling live coals and cinders in a maddening dance through the air; then all was still. The fire was out. Darkness and confusion filled the wigwam. It took a long while before a light could be struck, and, when the fire once more blazed up, the chief discovered that Zee-Wee was gone. Wrapping a blanket about him, he was about to plunge out into the night, but bumped in the doorway against Crooked Gun, who stood, dripping wet from top to toe, triumphantly lifting above his head a powder-horn.

Without a word, Don't Know How pushed past him and ran towards the end of the village, where the horses were grazing. Wehakha roused her sons and bade them join in the search; and Wauska, smothering a shout of joy, slipped out of the door and was swallowed up in the abysmal gloom.

She ran a few steps, and then flung herself flat on the ground. She could hear the frightened trampling of the horses, and concluded that her father and Crooked Gun were having trouble in capturing their ponies, for it was not the rhythmic gallop of one or two animals, but the continuous trooping hither and thither of a panic-stricken herd.

Cautiously she raised her head again and called: "Zee-Wee!" She knew her sister could not be far away, and she knew, too, that unless she could find her and show her the way to the agency she would surely be captured. Wauska crawled along for some minutes on hands and feet, feeling the soil with her fingers, and finally found the path. A momentary flash on the horizon revealed to her, under a clump of sage-brush, a crouching form, which moved and half rose up, only to cower again in helpless terror.

"Zee-Wee," she cried, flinging herself down upon the prostrate form, "Zee-Wee!"

"Wauska," screamed Zee-Wee, clutching her in a smothering embrace. "You will not betray me?"

"No. Wauska help Zee-Wee."

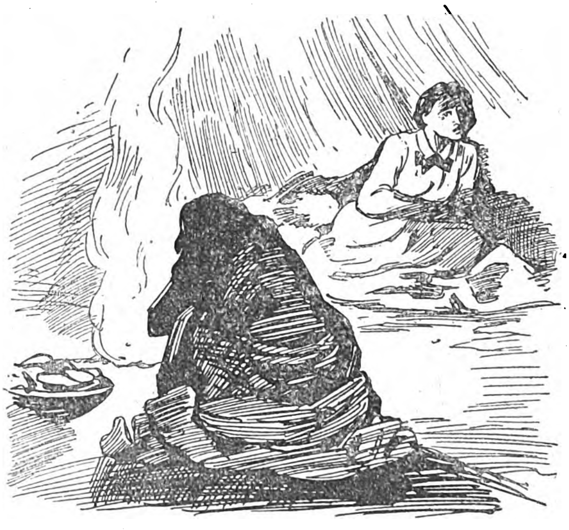
And, lifting her up by main force, she started forward again, trusting to an instinct in her feet rather than to intelligence. "Zee-Wee, hurry," she whispered, breathlessly. "Don't Know How hunt Zee-Wee."

She paused to listen for the sound of hoof-beats; but, hearing none, she broke again into a swift, impetuous flight, which took small note of obstacles. The arm which was wound about Zee-Wee's waist was scratched and bleeding, and often her bare feet slid over toads and vermin which the rain had lured out from their holes. There was something in this rapid, sure, silent run which, instead of exhausting Zee-Wee, by reviving her courage restored her vigour.

She was about to open her mouth to speak, when suddenly she heard voices behind her, and the hoof-beats of horses. But before a sound escaped her lips the heavens were rent from zenith to horizon by one fierce, straight, terrifying blast of flame, followed in the same instant by an ear-splitting crash—dead, flat, stupefying.

Wauska had dropped to the ground like a stone, pulling her sister with her. For two or three minutes she lay tremulously still, while the aerial artillery overhead discharged a series of deafening salvoes. Suddenly Wauska, who had been cautiously groping with her fingers, exclaimed: "Me help Zee-Wee. Wauska hide Zee-Wee quick."

And, giving her an admonitory nudge, she crawled eagerly forward in the dark intervals between the flashes of lightning, dropping quickly upon the ground at the first hint of an illumination. It was a hazardous experiment, and not always successful; but she had reason to hope that they were yet undetected, when, at the end of five minutes' laborious progress, they tumbled into a deep hollow. It was an excavation recently made by a party of emigrants that had crossed the plains, when a season of bad weather had prevented their travelling. It was more than half full of water, but up under the edge of the projecting turf there was a dry and comparatively sheltered nook, into which the two girls shiveringly wedged themselves.



Zee-Wee was sitting, with her ear pressed against the wall of the wigwam.

Through the perpetual rumble of the thunder they could distinctly hear the shouts of men and the galloping hither and thither of horses. They recognised plainly their father's voice, and that of Crooked Gun calling to him from the distance. They seemed all to have taken different directions, beating systematically over the prairie, so that no inch of ground should escape them.

Zee-Wee held her breath; she heard her heart hammering in her throat. She was by turns burning hot and shivering. Nearer and nearer came the hoof-beats; a horse whinnied frantically; another answered far away in the gloom.

Suddenly Wauska became aware of two figures on horseback at the edge of the pool; it was her father and Zee-Wee's discarded wooer. Swiftly she withdrew her head, and, clutching Zee-Wee in her arms, shut her eyes tightly. She could hear the turbulent heart beat within the breast that was pressed against her own, and almost the surging of the hot blood as it sped through the veins with the impetus of fright.

Zee-Wee knew by Wauska's abrupt movement, and by the tightening of her clutch, that they were on the verge of being discovered. She heard the sound of voices, but could comprehend nothing. An icy chill of terror rippled down her spine; a sound of rushing water filled her ears. She expected every moment to feel a rude grip on her arm—nay, she felt it again and again, and shuddered.

It seemed an infinitely long time she lay thus. The sound of hoof-beats which dimly penetrated her sense receded farther and farther. Then she felt a chill stream of water steal down her back, and she had a sensation that her hair was full of earth.

"Are they gone, Wauska?" she whispered.

"Zee-Wee, wait!"

It must have been fully half an hour before she dared repeat her query. Then Wauska cautiously descended into the pool, the water of which reached to her hips, and, creeping up to the edge, endeavoured to take a survey of the prairie. But it was now pitch dark, except for an occasional faint flash of lightning on the western sky-line.

"Zee-Wee, come," she said, and, grasping her sister's hand, she pulled her up the steep bank.

"Why did they go away?" asked Zee-Wee, when the fresh air restored her respiration.

"Crooked Gun, he say 'Water.'"

"They didn't think we could be there, because the excavation was full of water."

As Wauska made no objection to this theory, Zee-Wee concluded that it must be correct.

They had walked perhaps two hours, groping their way over the trail; dropping flat upon the ground whenever their agitated vision conjured a horseman out of the gloom; hearing the dismal howls of the coyote, singly and in chorus; struggling with the pestiferous sage-brush which threatened to put out their eyes whenever they strayed from the path. But it was yet long before dawn, and Wauska, who had often heard of Indians being shot by sentries, did not dare approach the agency until morning.

Being weary unto death, they lay down at the roadside, watching the eastern horizon for the first flicker of the light. The rain had now ceased, and a chill night wind was careering over the prairie. In their wet clothes they shivered until their teeth chattered. Zee-Wee was numb all over, and the black insects that swarmed in the grass filled her with disgust. Another hour and another they waited. Then the east brightened into a translucent grey, which became faintly flushed with pink and green and saffron. The Government post (which was a dismounted fort) lay before them, with its large barn-like barracks inclosed within a tall adobe wall.

Wauska warily scanned the plain before she rose from her recumbent position. The chances were ten to one that their father, anticipating their intention, would attempt to intercept them before reaching the agency. While she was cautiously lifting her head, her large deerlike eyes suddenly dilated. She saw in the grey twilight two horses grazing scarcely a mile away. It was better to trust to the mercy of the sentries than to that of the Indians. Beckoning to Zee-Wee to follow her, she began to creep on hands and feet towards the gate. But scarcely fifty rods had they advanced when a wild yell rent the air, and the air seemed to throb with a vague, rhythmical thud.

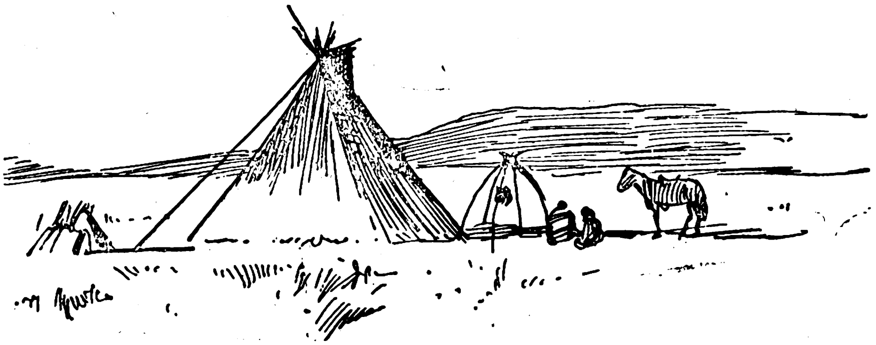
"Run, Zee-Wee, run!" cried Wauska, grabbing her sister's arm as she rose, and dashing forward in the direction of the gate. Faster they ran, and faster; the stronger sister's right arm wound about the weaker one's waist.

Nearer the hoof-beats came, nearer and nearer. Zee-Wee felt her knees tottering, and strange noises rang in her ears. But yet her feet moved with a wild, nightmarish speed; and it seemed as if, in spite of weakness and fright, they must keep on thus—running, running—faster and faster—for ever. Now she swayed, and was on the point of falling, but something upheld her; her breath stuck in her throat, and all things seemed blurred to her sight.

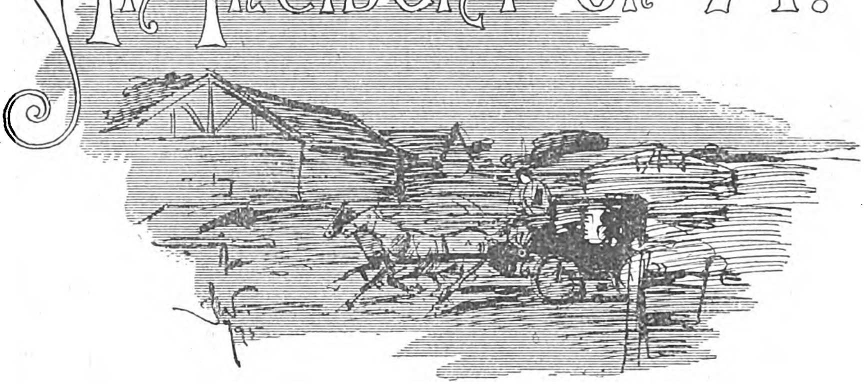
Wauska screamed aloud—screamed madly, frantically—to someone who appeared to be moving on the top of the wall; but behind her came a wilder scream—a terrible, blood-curdling yell—which made her heart stand still. The hoof-beats were now close behind her, or in front of her—all round her. But, just as they seemed about to trample her down, a great black something swung open, and she fell in a heap, with Wauska on the top of her, within the gate of the United States agency.

There was a great commotion about her; strange and familiar voices commingled, now very near, now far away. She was carried by strong men, and, when she opened her eyes, she lay upon a beautiful white bed. Someone was sitting at her side, gazing at her with affectionate solicitude. Her heart gave a bound of joy as she recognised Marion Gallaudet, and she flung herself weeping into her arms.

H. H. Boyesen.



An Incident of '71.



THE carriage was going at a terrific pace. The horses, unusually excited, dashed through the air, which whistled past their ears. Their hoofs resounded loudly on the hard, frozen road. The two carriage lanterns shone in the night like the glowing eyes of some huge, prehistoric monster.

The mad, furious course in the darkness had something strange about it; something mysterious, sinister, and all the more so, perhaps, that it was taking place in the terrible year when the Germans were in Alsace.

The carriage, like a vessel in distress on a raging sea, oscillated from left to right and from right to left.

When the vehicle, which had been flying down the slopes of Ottrot, raced through the village, passing like an express train the houses with their little low roofs, on which the moon cast a silvery light, the good women, suddenly frightened, made the sign of the cross with a trembling of the knees and a whispered prayer.

The fact was, the Prussians, for several weeks past, had been cruelly ravaging the country.

The flying carriage contained some German officers, who were the bearers of secret orders to S——.

"Faster, faster," they cried, whipping up the poor horses, which were already breathing fire and smoke out of their nostrils. The wretched driver, terrified, obeyed mechanically.

"Tonnerre!" he growled, "my horses will die when they reach their stable, if they do not break their necks going round one of these steep curves." But the strokes of the whip redoubled, and the dizzy course became still more reckless.

* * * * * *

That afternoon the enemy had taken possession of the village of Ottrot, and, as their custom was, had installed themselves in the people's homes.

Four officers were domiciled with the Mayor. They sat there in the middle of his best drawing-room, talking loudly, and smoking their long pipes of porcelain, while they dried their boots at the hot fire blazing in the grate.

Their unwilling host, a tall old man, with a white beard, served them with drinks as graciously as he could. His eye passed sadly from one to the other, his venerable head shaking melancholy, as if to say: "It is the right of the strongest; what can one do against a hundred?"

Perhaps his mind was dwelling on the past. Perhaps he was looking forward to revenge—thinking, it may be, of the time when his countrymen would be victorious, and offering mercy to these very officers, his guests.

He was recalled to the present by a gentle knock at the door, and almost immediately afterwards, he saw in the porch the tall powerful frame of Lux, who was the foreman of the Mayor's servants, and a model Hercules. He was agile as a deer and as strong as an ox, and could break a coin between his fingers quite as easily as he would break an egg shell.

The neck of a bull rose out of the flannel shirt carelessly fastened across the throat by a cotton necktie. He was a man terrible in anger, but in repose, gentle as a lamb, and as docile.

"What is the matter?"

"There is this the matter: another officer wants to quarter himself upon us here. Shall I strangle him?"

These words coming from such lips made one shudder.

"No, my old Lux, keep calm, that would do no good, and would only bring worse upon us. Let him in; he probably wishes to speak with his colleagues."

Lux did as his master told him, much against his inclination. It would have given him such a huge amount of pleasure to twist one of those German necks with his great sinewy fingers.

The new arrival burst into the drawing-room. The four Prussian officers uttered cries of surprise.

They rose at once in a body, and saluted with great respect the stranger who had come to disturb their peace.

"Be seated, and let us talk," said the new arrival, in German, and in a voice of command.

"You will set out at once," he said, "and take this sealed message to the Prince of X——, at S——," and he drew out of the pocket of his long military cloak, white with snow, a large white envelope, and handed it to one of the officers.

"Go, all four of you, and place yourselves at the disposition of the Prince. Further orders will be given to each of you later. You must get horses and carriage and start at once. Is it understood? Then hasten!"

Then, turning to the host, he said in French:

"Please accommodate these gentlemen with a carriage and two fresh horses. General's orders!"

Lux, who had remained standing at the door during this scene, anticipated his master's reply.

"It is well, Monsieur l'officier; you shall be accommodated as you desire."

He spoke in a peculiar tone of voice. Only his master, however, noticed it.

A mad thought had been born in his brain, something superhuman, preposterous. Anyone who could have read it in his mind would have been shocked, terror-stricken.

While a farm hand harnessed the horses to the carriage, Lux put a saddle on Barka, an Arab horse.

faithful animal which he loved and cared for himself with his own hands.

He spoke to it as he spoke to a friend, and the noble creature seemed to understand. When Lux mounted into the saddle he was trembling with joy.

A mysterious dialogue seemed to commence between the man and the horse, which, suddenly sending the sparks flying from beneath its four feet, vanished into the darkness like a phantom.

Barka, like some great mythological creature with wings, devoured space. His fine, nervous legs hardly seemed to touch the earth, and Lux kept him going at his utmost speed.

At length they stopped. Barka was white with foam, and Lux covered him with his cloak. He did not feel the cold, for the awful thought in his mind kept his whole body warm and tingling.

"It is yonder," he said to himself in a deep-voiced growl. "It is there that they are to perish."

At this point the road made a sudden turn, and apparently came to an abrupt end. As a matter of fact, however, it did not terminate, but continued in a steep, terrible slope. On the right was a dark mysterious wood, and on the left a deep and dizzy precipice such as are often seen by mountain roads.

Children were afraid to pass it by. The Gulf of Death, as it was called, had its legend. The old folk said that it was within its gloomy depths the monsters lived that ravaged the country at night.

"If my calculations are correct," said Lux in a low voice, "they will be here in ten minutes."

He tied Barka to a tree stem on the border of the wood, and a strange smile passed over his lips.

An extraordinary scene might then have been witnessed. Lux knelt down in this solitary, haunted spot, in the night time, and turned his face to heaven. It looked like a sinner asking forgiveness for his sins, rather than one planning an awful deed for the satisfaction of his rage and hate.

Not a sound was to be heard in the surrounding country. All seemed dead or asleep. Only a murmur of the wind in the pines.

Lux placed his ear to the ground, as the Indians do in the wilderness, and hearing a faint sound of hoofs in the distance, striking the hard ground, he raised his head. His face was transfigured!

"At last I shall have my revenge," he hissed.

Then he crouched down on his hands and knees and waited.

A few seconds more, and the carriage with the four German officers would be upon him.

He uttered a terrible cry of "Vive la France!" to which Barka replied with a joyful neigh.

The carriage, which had been approaching at tremendous speed, came to a sudden stop, as if arrested by an irresistible force, and remained there standing.

Lux had not moved an inch. He was not a man, but a stone wall.

He made a last and supreme effort, and raised himself upon his legs. Then with a terrific heave, he pushed over the dizzy brink, horses, carriage, and men.

An awful noise rose on the still night air. A sound of crashing, and of men and horses screaming. Then there was a silence, heavy, complete, tragic!

The man rose and peered over the edge into the black gulf of death. He saw nothing. Then he sprang into his saddle, and disappeared like a shadow into the night.

Le Vier.

The Love of His Life.

THE light crept dimly into the house. Romano's big eyes were bloodshot as he paced his room restlessly, beating his brow with his hands.

He paused, drew the blind aside, and peeped out at the glaring day. Venice bathed in sunshine looked black to Pietro Romano.

His gaze rested a moment on the church of S. Maria della Salute, erected to commemorate the passing away of the plague, then turned towards a golden ball, the vane of the Custom House, with a gilded figure of Fortune standing gracefully upon it. But even as he looked Fortune faded, flooded into fog by Pietro's tears. Faintly he discerned, as through a mist, the canal losing itself in a small arm of the sea. The blind fell back, and Romano was once again alone in the abode of death.

But two men below had noticed the bloodshot eyes peering round the blind.

"What is the matter with Pietro Romano?" asked one.

"He has lost his sweetheart-wife," replied the other.

They passed on.

Pietro went below. The air was heavy with the scent of flowers. He looked at the floral offerings of friends disdainfully.

"May they not be taken up?" asked a timid voice.

Pietro turned angrily to the servant. "No flowers shall lie on her coffin but mine."

Then he remembered that his wife's mother arrived from Paris that morning to look for the last time on Juliette.

Pietro hastened upstairs.

She had left a shower of lilies, a cross, and three wreaths on his wife's bed. The wreaths were from her three sisters. He seized the flowers in a frenzy, flung them away and trampled them under foot.

"Only mine," he muttered fiercely, "every blossom in Venezia, but from me, from me!"

Pietro returned to the foot of the bed, having drawn back the covering from the dead face, and feasted his eyes on the wondrous beauty of Juliette's marble features. How suddenly the end had come! Three days ago she walked with him on the Piazza San Marco. He could hear even then, in the presence of that still, stiff effigy, the murmuring of voices, and the music of the bands borne over the waters. For two days he had neither slept nor eaten. On the third his wife was dead.

He dropped his head in his hand. Sleep crept over him. He dreamt that he descended into the dark prisons of the condemned. Juliette was alive and well, lounging in a gondola, hung with coloured lanterns, listening to Venetian and Neapolitan songs, while he had been shut away in a fearfully narrow den, far from the sunshine, life, and brightness of Venice.

He fancied he was taken over the Bridge of Sighs, dragged below to the dungeons, and strangled. Then his body was put on a gondola, carried out, and cast into the sea. Pietro woke in a cold perspiration to face his dead wife. She was the one to go; he must be left! Steps outside startled him. Men had come to measure.

Ah! What sacrilege! Strangers entering the sacred presence of eternal sleep? Pietro rushed to the door, and faced them haughtily.

"I will do your work!" he said. They exchanged a looked that seemed to say: "The Signor is mad—his grief has turned his brain."

But Pietro Romano seized the tape, and closed the door.

With trembling fingers he measured the slim figure of his girl-wife.

"Plenty of room," he muttered to himself—"room for the six large crosses I shall lay at your side. Your arms shall be outstretched, as when you basked in the sunshine on your couch. Plenty of room for my angel!—my life!"

"So large?" said the men, when Pietro returned.

"Yes, and beautiful as large! The plate without must be solid gold—the handles, too. No funeral in all Europe should be more magnificent than that of the fair Juliette Romano!"

They went their way, and Pietro returned to his silent watch by the cold figure.

Presently a voice whispered low without. The door opened softly; Juliette's mother crept in.

"I said I would not see you," cried Pietro, crouching to the ground. "Go—leave me alone with my wife!"

She took no heed of his wild words.

"Why do we live—you and I?" he muttered. "What good are we without Juliette?"

The mother's tears fell like rain. She looked pityingly at the haggard, despairing man.

"You are ill, Pietro," she said gently; "let me watch by her awhile. Go and eat and sleep."

"I will taste nothing till she is laid in the ground. She goes with you to the home of her childhood; she will rest for ever in Père la Chaise."

"You will faint by the way," replied Juliette's mother, taking up her position near the bed.

He grew so uneasy at her presence that at last she was obliged to leave.

"Poor Pietro!" she sighed, in the midst of her own grief; "he is more mad than ever in this hour of bitterest trial."

The great, handsome coffin came at last, with the golden plate, on which was inscribed:

"Juliette,
"Love of my Life.
"Buried in the Heart of Pietro Romano."

"They must not see her," he said, "those coarse, rough men."

So he drew the white curtains about the bed, as they brought the coffin in. "To-night," he told them, "I will place her myself in her last bed, and close the coffin lid. Come early in the morning and screw it down. The vulgar gaze shall never rest on dead Juliette."

Before moving the body, Pietro bade her mother say farewell to the calm, sweet face.

"Why did she shudder when kissing those icy lips?" he wondered. "Juliette was beautiful in death as in life. There was nothing to fear."

Then he sent her away.

An hour later Juliette lay in her magnificent coffin. The lid was closed. The following morning they had screwed it down, and Juliette was taken to the home of her fathers.

Strangely enough, though all arrangements had been previously made by Pietro, after his final farewell of the body, he mysteriously vanished.

The funeral party were obliged to leave without him, active search in the meanwhile being made.

"I believe the poor Signor is mad," declared Juliette's mother. "He has rushed away to hide himself. But the dead cannot wait. We must go."

So they laid the beautiful Juliette in Père la Chaise, and her husband was seen no more.

Whence had he fled—that wild, impassioned man, distracted by grief?

None could tell, and his wife's mourners waited in vain by the grave to see if he would come.

Some weeks later a letter reached the mother in Pietro's familiar hand.

She tore it open eagerly. The words paralysed her.

"Death was by poison. Do not seek for me—you can never find Pietro Romano."

The message, which came from America, fell like a thunderbolt upon Juliette's family. The idea that he had poisoned her seemed incredible, but they were determined to prove if this were truth, or merely the ravings of a maniac.

Permission was obtained to exhume poor Juliette.

As the massive lid opened a gasp of wondering horror escaped the witnesses. Two bodies locked in each other's arms met their astonished gaze. One the fair form of Juliette disfigured by decay, the other the crumbling remains of Pietro Romano. Clutched in his hand were the following words:

"I sleep with my Juliette—good-night! To bed for the last time. Our lips meet—we are one in death as in life. I have posted a letter which will be forwarded from America to Paris by a friend. Poison indeed lies buried with Juliette, but in the body of her devoted husband."

Winifred Graham.

* * *

AN OLD FOOL.

WHEN Colonel Starforth married Vera Harrington people said that he was an old fool, and, truth to tell, he had some misgivings upon the subject himself. John Starforth was sixty; vigorous, indeed, and erect of figure; kindly, chivalrous, and handsome still, in spite of his white hairs, but still sixty. And Vera was only twenty-two.

Of course he had money, and equally, of course, she had none. They had met just after the Colonel's return from India, and he, an old bachelor, whose only love had been his profession, fell and worshipped like a boy of eighteen. Vera liked him well enough. He was kind and gentle, and, above all, rich, and her life had been dull and void of those good things which make life's happiness. For it is only when we have them that riches are not everything.

And so they were married, and, in a way, were happy. The Colonel did not expect too much; it was enough that he might call this sweet flower his own, enough that his wife did not shrink from his caresses, half timid but wholly adoring. And Vera could not but feel affection for the man who lavished upon her all that his wealth could obtain, could not but be happy in the luxury that surrounded her. It was all so strange and beautiful—for a time.

For riches are only everything when we have them not.

The inevitable happened at last. Vera tired of her husband and fell in love with a young man. Perhaps she fell in love with a young man and tired of her husband.

Age was evidently beginning to tell upon the Colonel. He was quieter than of yore, and the grey hair had taken a whiter tinge. He did not rest well, and at length continued sleeplessness made him weak and ill—weak enough to endanger a man of his age. He bore up bravely, like the gallant old soldier that he was, but he had to confess himself vanquished in the end.

Vera nursed him devotedly. There is a latent instinct that makes every woman a tender nurse: a sweet sense of motherhood that brims with kindness for any helpless object. So, woman-like, she tended him with unselfish devotion and gentle, loving kindness.

One day she looked idly at the prescription the doctor had left. Chloral hydrate, chloral hydrate? Why, she had some of that upstairs. Chloral hydrate!

And then some horrible fiend came into her heart, driving out the tenderness, the loving kindness, the very woman in her. She might be so happy, but for the old man lying there half-helpless in his bed. What right had he to spoil her young life and all the happiness that might come to her?

It was time for his sleeping draught, but Colonel Starforth slept when his wife entered the room, noiselessly as a practised nurse. The old man looked so wan and haggard that Vera half-stooped to kiss him, then started back hastily, and poured something into the glass she held. She looked at her husband again, and her hands shook a little as she drew another little bottle from her pocket and added its contents to the measure in the glass.

Suddenly she rushed from the room, and then stopped trembling. The sick man had moved. What if he had seen her? Her limbs gave way beneath her; the blood lashed and throbbed in her ears. Then she recovered a little; the beating in her ears died away like the distant thud of a horse's hoofs. She rose up, still weak, but firm and unflinching once more. She had left that bottle upon the table, and she must fetch it away.

At the threshold she lingered and peered into the room. All was well, after all. The Colonel lay there quietly, and she went in and secured the incriminating bottle. As she stood there the Colonel opened his eyes.

"Is that you, my dear?" he asked gently.

"Yes, I—I came to give you your sleeping draught."

"Thank you, Vera." He raised himself painfully and took the glass from her, clasping her hand as he did so.

"My child," he said, "have I made it very hard for you?"

"I—I do not understand."

"Yes you do, Vera, and I would willingly take this from you if I thought it would help your happiness. But you would be sorry afterwards—and I would not have you sorry. Stay, my child, I know everything; your love for young Fordyce. And, Vera, I saw you measure out this draught. Shall I drink it now?"

"Oh, no, no! Only forgive me."

"My dear, I have little to forgive. I should not have brought the cloud of my old age across the sunshine of your youth. But I won't trouble you long—and Hawks has my will. Everything is yours, child, of course; I have made you pay hardly enough for it."

"Why, my little girl—there, there, you must not cry. Kiss me and run away; I would rather be alone for a little while."

Vera's tears rained hot salt into his eyes as she kissed him, and when she was alone there came upon her a loathing of self that was more bitter than any grief. How vile a thing had she been! And he, how noble and how kind!

Fordyce! Surely she had not done this thing for Fordyce? Why, she hated him. It had all been some horrid madness which was gone now, never to return. For she loved her husband now—the fire of those few moments had burned away all save the purity from her heart. Dear husband, how happy they would be, he in her love and she in her atonement and his love as well. How happy they would be, how happy!

Upstairs her husband lay as she had left him. Some time he lay, till presently something hot trickled down a little furrow that had come but lately in his bronzed cheek, and a stifled sob broke from him. A little longer he lay, and then, still sobbing, staggered weakly from the bed and took up the glass his wife had left upon the table.

E. C. WAGGENER.

The Lottery Ticket.

CELIA BONNER, coming over the hill from Gatesborough to West Gatesborough in the teeth of a keen November storm, wondered why this particular storm affected her so disagreeably. Generally in such weather she beguiled the way with cheerful thoughts and calculations, all overspread by calm complacency that she had at last gained this position as teacher, so long coveted; but to-night she found herself wishing that the school were at West Gatesborough instead of at Gatesborough, or else that her mother and the small house and farm which was their sole estate could be moved nearer to the school.

This wishing was all so unlike Celia's matter-of-fact nature in general that she sought hard for the reason why she should be taken with such a desire. She soon found it in the fact that she was undeniably hungry.

She was wet, cold, and bedraggled, but most of all she was hungry, with the keen, uncompromising hunger of healthy young girlhood. Surely this of itself was enough to induce gloomy thoughts and futile wishes.

"I was silly not to think of it sooner," she half-laughed to herself. "I had begun to forget that I had a very small lunch this noon. But never mind, mother will have a hot supper waiting for me."

Then she turned the last bend in the road, and seeing the light in her mother's kitchen, stumbled along more quickly than ever. A feeble light it was, and typical in a measure of everything within the house, from the mother down, except when Celia was there. Even the fires Mrs. Bonner kindled had a trick of burning weakly and uncertainly.

When, a few minutes after she saw the light, Celia burst into the kitchen, with her cloak and umbrella held out before her, the savoury supper she had so keenly anticipated was in no way apparent to her senses. The table was provided with no other edibles than hard biscuits, a very few slices of cold corned beef, and half a Dutch cheese.

Heedless now of the drip which bespattered the carpet, Celia stood still.

"Mother, you don't mean to say this is all you have for supper?" Affecting intense preoccupation with the tea-kettle, her mother responded:

"I don't see but it's pretty good, Celia."

"But, mother, we've had nothing for the last week, and I told you I was starving for something hearty and warm. I gave you money this morning to buy a steak."

"Well, you see there's so many other things to get," Mrs. Bonner pleaded weakly. There was something so furtive and insincere in her manner that Celia, without difficulty, jumped to a conclusion.

"Mother, I believe you've spent that money for another foreign lottery ticket."

This abrupt statement revealed the skeleton which had stood in the closet of this poor little household for more than a year. It was a subject so repulsive to Celia that she hated to speak of it, but so dear to the mother that she loved to enlarge upon it.

"And supposing I did, Celia?" she said, more confidently. "Fortune's going to turn sometime, and I'll be bound you'll be glad enough if we come into fifteen hundred pounds all at once, as that young man did up in Manchester."

The lines of the argument were all wearily familiar to Celia, but hunger gave an added vigour to her protest.

"I might be demoralised by it," she said, "but I'd never be glad. Whether you gain or lose, the principle is the same. It's nothing but gambling, and though you'd feel pretty badly to hear that our Joe in London had become a gambler, you think it no harm to be one yourself."

Mrs. Bonner remained silent a little while, and then began to cry softly.

"It's too bad for you to scold in that way, Celia," she said, "when all I'm thinking of is your good and Joe's. I don't see that I'm committing any sin."

"You've never been the same, mother, since you bought that first ticket two years ago. It's like drinking; you want to keep on at it. I don't mean to be unkind; but I can't make it seem anything less than wicked."

The stern young preacher softened a little here, and a plaintive sniffle, by way of acknowledgment, prefaced Mrs. Bonner's reply:

"I don't believe I'll ever need to go into them again, Celia. I feel it that I'm going to get something this time. I had a dream last night, and in it I was counting out fifteen bags of gold!"

It was useless to argue further. Celia moodily set about clearing away the dishes, and said no more.

A few weeks later, coming over the hill in a snow-storm, Celia found the little light absent from her mother's window. Filled at once with a vague alarm, she hurried over the remaining part of the road and into the house, calling as she went: "Mother! Where are you, mother?"

No answering voice greeted her, but groping to the mantel, she lighted a lamp. Then turning to examine the room, she saw her mother sitting in her accustomed chair by the window.

"Why?" Celia began, half-relieved, half-provoked, and then the question which was to follow died on her lips, for it became apparent that, though death did not yet confront her, she was looking upon its strange similitude—paralysis.

Her mother's whole body was rigid and motionless. The poor hands, quieted for ever, hung down beside it. The tongue, whose irrelevancy had often wearied poor practical Celia, was now for ever still.

For what seemed an hour, though in reality it was hardly more than a moment, Celia stood almost as motionless; then, running down the road to their nearest neighbour, she brought her back, pitying and exclaiming as she came.

Together they lifted the limp figure to the lounge, upon which they wheeled Mrs. Bonner to the bed in the room off the sitting-room. Only when they laid her there did Celia, bending over her in agonised appeal, discover that the eyes alone were instinct with life. They looked up to Celia with pitiful intelligence, seeming to respond to her cry. Then wandering through the door in their gaze, they fixed themselves on Mrs. Denny with a total change of expression.

Celia turned round in startled surprise, to discover that the kindly neighbour, with the instinct of a housekeeper, was "tidying up" the sitting-room, and, as part of the effort, was now examining an envelope. Celia remembered that she had seen this lying on the floor beside her mother's chair, but she had been too sadly lacking in curiosity to examine it.

"What is it, Mrs. Denny?" she now asked. Then she covered her face with her hands, as Mrs. Denny replied:

"For mercy's sake! The poor thing! If it isn't one of those foreign lottery lists! Now, that's what's given her this stroke, I suppose. She's been disappointed again, and she set so much store by it. Shall I burn it, Celia?"

"Yes," Celia answered, with sorrowful energy, and then corrected herself as the haunting eyes on the pillow caught hers with a sudden fierce protest.

"No, Mrs. Denny. She doesn't want it burnt, I think. Put it in the top left-hand drawer, please."

Soon after, and all through the days which intervened before the end came, that mournful gaze concentrated itself most of all on the old family Bible which rested on a stand in the corner of the room where she lay, and this, too, Celia interpreted.

"She wants me to read the Bible to her. Oh, poor mother, you know now, don't you, that your truest riches are in that?"

So hour after hour during the few short weeks in which her mother lingered on, the daughter read and re-read the promises which relate to eternal life. Sometimes peace fell like a veil upon the dim windows of that fast-darkening tabernacle, and again such restless entreaty looked out from them that Mrs. Denny interrupted the reading.

"Celia, she's got something on her mind that we don't know of yet. It seems sometimes as though her eyes would pierce through that Bible as you sit there reading, and when you ain't at it, she's still staring at it."

But always Celia's reply was the same:

"It's only that she's growing more eager for it all the time. It seems the greatest comfort I have that she loves it so. Yes, mother, I'll read more!"

The final summons came very quietly at last. Celia, going away for a much-needed nap, had smiled down upon her, saying:

"Good-bye, mother! I'm going to lie down just for a little while. God bless you, mother dear!"

The poor, pathetic eyes had seemed almost to smile in return, but when Celia awoke from her nap they were closed in their last long slumber. Whatever was the secret they had yearned to disclose, all opportunity was now for ever gone by.

Two days later they laid Mrs. Bonner in the old churchyard, and Celia returned to her teaching, with a new tombstone as the immediate object of her ambition. The blinds were closed in the old house, and the doors locked up, and for the present Celia boarded at Gatesborough.

The weeks wore on until the winter term was nearly over. Then Celia's brother Joe wrote from London, begging her to join him there. He was well, and was lonely. Why should not Celia let or sell the old place, and come to keep house for him. He was getting on well, and could make her comfortable.

The little house under the hill could never be the same to her again. Whether there or in Gatesborough, her living was but scanty at best, and most of all she longed to be with dear old Joe. Almost as soon as the wish was expressed, a tenant was found for the house, whereupon Celia with Mrs. Denny's help began the task of clearing away and putting things in order. Mrs. Denny offered to take care of any such relics as Celia chose to keep.

"If I have room in my trunk," Celia said, "I shall certainly take the old Bible. I can't bear to leave that behind."

Then, being alone and somewhat tired, she began to turn over the pages of the sacred book, stopping to read here and there. She opened, all unaware, at two pages where she was not accustomed to read; and there, between them, lay a lottery ticket bearing the number—68,498.

Celia looked down upon it for a moment with the half-fascinated and yet wholly disgusted gaze which she might have bestowed upon an intruding snake. Then suddenly a thought which she found almost equally venomous darted into her mind.

"Was this the reason mother used to look so longingly at the Bible?" she thought. "Oh! surely not."

Then, leaving the book open on the stand, she rushed in a tumult of fear and apprehension to the other side of the room, and opened the top left-hand drawer.

There, where Mrs. Denny had placed it, still lay the well-remembered fatal envelope. Opening it Celia scanned the list of numbers which had won the principal prizes at the December drawing—32,413, 59,162, 44,122, 58,227; and then, dancing before her eyes, 68,498.

The poor futile dream had come true. The fifteen hundred pounds, represented by the fifteen bags of gold, had for one moment flashed before the dreamer's eyes; and then, before her feet could carry her from one room into the next, before her eager hand could grasp the small blue slip, the hand of death had arrested her.

Just in the first painful shock of her discovery, Celia wondered if her conscience could stand the strain. It seemed as if Fate, not Providence, had been at work, and had wrought this bitter piece of irony.

For a long hour she groped amid darkened thoughts. Then she rose, and again, as on that fatal night, groped her way to the mantel. She lighted the lamp, and stood looking down into the smouldering logs upon the hearth. While she looked, a new thought came to trouble her, a new though a very feeble temptation assailed her.

"Your mother wanted it most of all for Joe and you," the tempter whispered. "She would have been happier dying if she thought you would have had it."

But, with some of the old fire in voice and eyes, Celia answered aloud, as though to a visible opponent:

"I will not do it! It was like one of those poisonous marsh damps which lure people on to death. It led her there; she would have been alive now if this weakness had not taken hold of her. And I would rather die than profit by it now. I will burn the thing, so that the temptation may not come to me again."

In another moment the small blue strip of paper curled and shrivelled over the dying logs, then burst into a mocking flame, and in a moment more was a thin little sheet of ashes.

N. N.

THE - CHLORAL - EATER.

AT the club it had been known for years that he ate chloral. The characteristic ashen complexion, the dull, lifeless expression of his lustreless eyes, the parchment-like appearance of his harsh, dry skin, the tremor of his palsied hand, and his general lackadaisical and irresponsible actions pointed unquestionably to the chloral habit.

More than this, he didn't deny it, and nightly he consumed large quantities of the seductive drug. He would seek some remote corner of the club-room, and under the influence of this powerful narcotic, taken in liberal doses, pass the entire evening in a state of absolute stupor.

Smith, for that was his plebeian name, was only forty-five, but judging from his prematurely aged appearance he was quite sixty.

On this particularly stormy night in January, of which I write, it was after twelve o'clock, and one by one the members of the club had deserted their wine and billiards and disappeared, not without considerable hesitancy and imprecations on the turbulent weather, however, into the howling wind and blinding snow.

Smith sat dozing in his favourite corner; Dr. Dunbar and Captain Dickinson still lingered over a half-emptied bottle of Médoc.

"I say, Dunbar, he's a queer old duck over there in the corner. I wonder how he began it? He seems to be unusually saturated to-night. Let's pump him."

"Better let him alone," growled Dunbar, who was in a bad humour on account of his enforced stay at the club; "I wish this infernal storm would permit a man to go home without running the risk of being frozen to death. It seems to me it's about time to kick him out of the club. He's a nuisance, and shouldn't be allowed to come here with his wretched chloral."

At this juncture, Smith arose and staggered across the room to where the two men sat. He languidly sank into the remaining vacant chair at the table, and for a moment vaguely looked about him. Then fumbling in his pocket, he drew forth a half-emptied bottle, from which he poured out into the palm of his hand about a teaspoonful of the shining crystals, the whole of which he swallowed, with an unsteady tilt of the head, at one gulp.

The effect of the drug seemed to stimulate him to consciousness.

"Ten doses like that to-night," he said, "and I can scarcely feel it. I can't keep this up much longer, it's power is going. I'll cut my throat when this fails to affect me."

"What is it?" inquired Dickinson, by way of making conversation, although every man in the club knew Smith's habit.

"Chloral."

"Chloral?" repeated Dickinson.

"Yes."

"How long have you been eating it?"

"About fifteen years."

"Began like all the rest, I suppose, for medicinal purposes?"

Smith looked uneasily about the room. It was deserted, save by the three men seated round the table; a diabolical gleam shone from his glazed eyes.

"I took it to commit suicide," he slowly said, as he glanced in the direction of Dunbar.

"Suicide?" echoed Dickinson.

"Yes; but I didn't take enough, and the effect was so delightful, that I concluded life with chloral wasn't half bad after all. So, as long as the alluring influence of the delicious drug lasted, I decided to live; when it ceases to soothe me, I will carry into effect my solemn vow; then"—drawing his skinny hand across his throat, with a suggestive shrug of his shoulders—"I'll follow her—and him.

"He was a student when he met Lida. Let me see, that was in '75—yes, that's right. It was twenty years ago, Lida was only sixteen, and that infamous villain still lives.

"Poor girl," he continued, as a deep-red spot burnt into his sunken cheek. "She was more successful. Lida never woke, and the doctors, fools that they were, said it was heart failure. Yes, they said she died from mitral insufficiency, which the unsuspecting and credulous public accepted without questioning. Mitral insufficiency, indeed!" And he gave a weird, gruesome chuckle to himself, as he sarcastically repeated the learned diagnosis.

"We parted at twelve o'clock on Christmas Eve. The following morning found Lida dead! I alive, and oblivious to all sorrow and care. I revelled in a Utopia of bliss, in fields Elysian; my joy was unspeakable, my dream surpassingly felicitous. I longed to live on and on in this ecstatic state, with never a heartache or a pain, without the shadow of grief or affection. It was chloral! I had discovered the panacea of all human ills, the charm for every mortal misery, a boon and a blessing to heart-broken and suffering humanity. From that day I have never been without it."

It was apparent that the topic was distasteful to Dr. Dunbar, who insisted on talking of the latest club gossip instead; but Dickinson's curiosity was aroused, and Smith seemed to be in an unusually frank and talkative mood, so the subject was continued.

"Must have been an unhappy love affair?" Dickinson ventured to ask, by way of eliciting Smith's story, which promised unusual interest. Not heeding this last remark, Smith fixed his unsteady gaze on Dr. Dunbar as he continued:

"That was a long time ago, and he still lives. But I'll kill him yet—yes, I'll kill him, the scoundrel! He won't live long. I'll be the last of the three to die. I have shadowed him for years. I know him, the villain! I'll kill him yet!"

He seemed to be gloating over the imaginary tragedy, as he rubbed his shrunken hands together in ghoulish glee.

"He was a medical student when he won Lida's love, her confidence, and her trust, and put her through a mock marriage ceremony. When he graduated he left her. For weeks she waited in vain to hear from him. But no word came to her despairing soul. Still loath to believe he meant to forsake her, she wrote to the address he left, but the letter came back. No one by that name was there. The awful truth prostrated her, and the overstrained thread of life all but snapped. I met her two years afterwards. I was irresistibly attracted by her sad, sweet face and her gentle, resigned manner. I loved her as only a man in the possession of a clear conscience and the knowledge of an upright life can love. I asked her to be my wife, to share with me life's joys and sorrows, life's trials, triumphs, and tribulations; that with her the rugged path of existence would become smooth and joyous. She was sobbing violently.

"'No, no,' she cried, in the agony of despair, 'don't break my heart, don't ask me that.' Then she told me all. At first I refused to believe her, but I saw she was terribly in earnest. I saw the truth of her pathetic story indelibly written in her tear-stained face. I was too much stunned to answer. I was as one suddenly bereft of reason, and I left her. What occurred during the next two days I don't remember. It was in the middle of the night when I first realised that my life was wrecked, and I burst into a fit of uncontrollable weeping.

"After this I grew calmer. I saw her night after night, but it was no use. We could never be happy. She never heard of the wretch who had destroyed her life's happiness and mine. Existence became unbearable. On Christmas Eve we parted, pledged to end our miserable lives that night. The next morning they found her cold and lifeless. I had discovered the elixir of human happiness, and I determined to live—to live to avenge that dead girl's wrongs, to live for the satisfaction of sending that scoundrel's treacherous soul to the shades of oblivion.

"Not until I kill him will I die contented. I know him, I have found him, the beast, and I'll kill him. He yet lives, but not for long. Ha! ha! I know him, and have for years. Ha! ha! ha! the villain, I think he knows now who I am. This will do it, my charmer, my faithful; this will do it, my trusted avenger. Ha! ha! ha!" and laughing like a fiend he drew a revolver from his pocket and carelessly brought it down upon the top of the table. Dr. Dunbar, who was sitting opposite, drew back, and was about to rush from the room, but too late.

Whether from accident or intentionally, we never knew, but as the revolver struck the top of the table, it was discharged, the ball piercing Dr. Dunbar's heart. Smith, laughing like a demon, fled from the room and disappeared in the blinding storm. The next morning he was found half buried in snow, the empty chloral bottle by his side.

SIGEL ROUSH.

THE QUEEN OF NIGHT

All rights reserved
by Author.

BY HEADON HILL,

(Author of "Guilty Gold," "Zambra the Detective," "The Rajah's Second Wife," etc., etc.)

SUMMARY.

Gaston Vizard gives Sir Simon Crawshay an introduction to the agent of the vessel Queen of Night, in order that he may make special arrangements with regard to the trip of his wealthy ward, Miss Challenor. Dr. Zavertal calls on Vizard, and informs him that a new captain will be wanted before the next cruise.

The Queen of Night, under the guise of a popular pleasure boat, is used in reality by a set of unscrupulous adventurers for the purpose of doing away with objectionable relatives.

In Chapter I. Cyril Forrester receives his dismissal from the Flower Steamship Company for breaking the regulations while saving the life of Miss Aline Challenor. He applies for and obtains from Nathan and Co., of Fenchurch Street, the vacant command of the ocean yacht, Queen of Night.

Becoming engaged to Miss Challenor (who comes in for a quarter of a million on attaining her majority), he obtains an interview with Sir Simon Crawshay, who promptly refuses a consent to his engagement, and informs him that his ward will be out of his way for the next six weeks, as she is about to take a cruise on board the Queen of Night! On going on board he is introduced to Dr. Zavertal, among whose patients are Miss Challenor, the Earl of Darranmore (a boy of fourteen coming into £40,000 a year), and Desmond Olebar.

A stowaway is discovered who works as an assistant steward.

CHAPTER VIII.

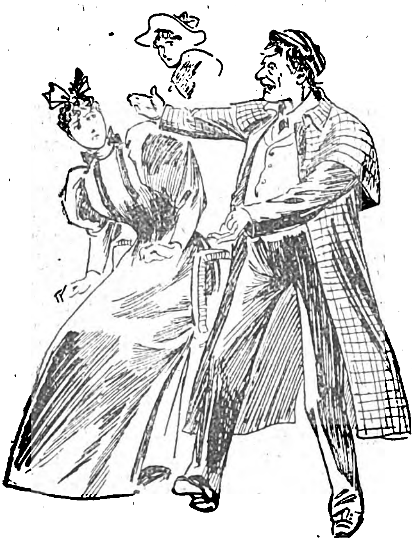
THE FIRST DEATH.

THE run across the Bay of Biscay was accomplished in fine weather, and on the morning of the fifth day out, when the passengers came on deck, Gibraltar was in sight right ahead. By the time breakfast was over we had threaded our way through the coal hulks, and the Queen of Night lay at anchor a quarter of a mile from the New Mole. In a twinkling she was surrounded by the usual medley of shore boats manned by the jabbering hucksters of water melons and grapes. Away on the Rock the bugles were sounding merrily for morning parade, and even from our anchorage the great grey mass with the straggling town at foot was seen to be as gay as a geranium bed with the blaze of British scarlet.

My instructions from the owners were to allow a clear twenty-four hours at this port, to enable the passengers to go ashore and explore it thoroughly. Numerous parties had already been formed for the purpose, and our boats were soon busily engaged in transporting sightseers to the landing place.

Among the first to start was a boatload personally conducted by Zavertal, comprising Lord Darranmore and his tutor, Mr. Orlebar being also with the party. The latter had been drinking heavily ever since he came on board, and I heard the Doctor trying to induce him to remain quietly on the ship under the pretext that the excitement of a day's outing would be injurious to him. But this representation only had the effect of increasing his determination to go, and Zavertal yielded—somewhat too readily, I thought.

Aline and Mrs. Brinkworth had arranged to join a party which was going under the escort of General Waldo, and, at the last moment, finding that there was nothing to keep me on board, I decided to accompany them. On landing we strolled through the Main Gate and up the steep street to the post-office for letters and telegrams. Entering the building, we were met by the Doctor's party just leaving after making a similar call. His convoy were mostly busy with their correspondence, but Zavertal himself crammed a cablegram he was reading into his pocket and came up to me, looking worried and anxious.



Causing alarm to the half-dozen ladies of our party.

"That infernal fellow Orlebar has given us the slip," he said. "Perhaps I ought to have been more careful, but as he gets all he wants on the ship I didn't think that he would seize upon the chance of a shore racket. I expect he's soaking himself in some wine-shop by this time."

"I shouldn't trouble about it," I replied. "The man is a free agent, and so long as he doesn't make himself personally offensive to others we can't very well control him."

But, as it turned out, the contingency I mentioned was just what we had to reckon with. Zavertal's party and mine separated again, his to go through the galleries and mount to the flag-staff, while we preferred to loiter away the day in the Spanish shops and among the quaint byways of the old town. We lunched at the hotel, and later on we were sitting in the public gardens, having what Waldo called "a high old time," when that worthy veteran, who was next me, touched my arm and whispered:

"Here comes the black sheep. Look out for squalls, Captain; he appears to be on a thundering out-West tear."

Following the direction of his eyes, I saw Orlebar coming towards us, and his demeanour certainly warranted the General's warning. His bloodshot eyes glared with drunken ferocity, and his wild gesticulations, as he made straight for us, were already causing alarm to the half-dozen ladies of our party. Mrs. Brinkworth especially, who was sitting on the other side of the General, turned as white as a sheet, and I remembered the recognition of her by Orlebar which I had noticed on the first day out.

It was quickly shown that Aline's companion was indeed the cause and object of the dipsomaniac's singular demonstration. Rushing up to her, he commenced a flood of incoherent abuse from which, before Waldo and I laid hands on him, it was only possible to gather that he meant to imply that she was his divorced wife. Realising that the wretched creature was not master of his actions we handled him gently, and taking an arm each led him to the garden gates. There I gave him to understand that he would be handed over to the police if he returned to annoy the ladies further, adding that his baggage and his man-servant would be sent ashore the moment I got back to the ship, as it was impossible that I could risk a repetition of his outrageous conduct by permitting him to continue the voyage. I was worked up into a fine white heat, and did not stop to consider whether the owners would approve a course which would entail their refunding the price of his ticket.

Orlebar went cursing away towards the town, and Waldo and I walked back to the others. We had collared the drunken man so promptly that we had had no time to note how the victim of his diatribes received them, and it was reassuring to find that, though still very pale, Mrs. Brinkworth was quite composed. Aline with generous vigour had taken up the cudgels on her companion's behalf, and was explaining to the other ladies that far from Orlebar having divorced his wife she had in truth divorced him for gross cruelty and misconduct.

"Ella has shown me copies of the Times containing the report of the trial," the fair young champion was saying, as we resumed our seats. "She has nothing to be ashamed of or to conceal."

"Perhaps it would have been better if I had let it be known that my late husband was on board," said the injured woman sadly, "but I was aware that he had married again, and I thought that he would have been the first to want to keep our former relations secret."

"And so he would, I guess, if he could have controlled himself," said Waldo. "It is the condition he is in that we have to thank for to-day's outbreak. I can't think what our usually astute doctor is up to—leaving him on the rampage about the town."

The ladies of the party, as indeed, all throughout the ship, were already prejudiced against Orlebar, and Aline's advocacy effectually nipped in the bud any tendency they might have had to look askance at Ella Brinkworth because of the unpleasant occurrence. In fact, they treated her with the greatest sympathy, and when the poor thing began to explain that the name she was known by was really her maiden name, they begged her not to distress herself by referring further to the matter.

"Just a word with you, Captain."

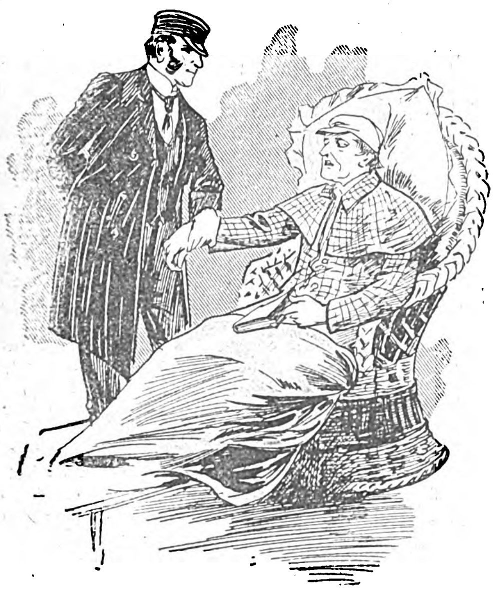
We had arranged to return to the ship for dinner, and the scene in the public gardens having rather damped our ardour, I do not think that anyone was sorry when it was time to go down to the boats. In taking a short cut to the landing-place I piloted the party through one of the narrow streets in the lower town, where every other house was a sailors' drinking den, either under the pretentious title of wine shop, or as an avowed cabaret, and we had nearly reached the end of the not very reputable thoroughfare, when a man hurrying out of an open doorway almost ran against me. His apologies were cut short at the very commencement by mutual recognition. It was Doctor Zavertal, and I had a pretty good inkling of what he was up to.



Felt his patient's pulse.

"Pray don't think that I am on the spree, ladies," he laughed in response to the looks of astonishment cast at him. "I must hope to be able to clear myself later, but—just a word with you, Captain," and he drew me aside, while the others, in obedience to my gesture, went slowly on towards the landing-place.

"You are looking for Orlebar?" I said.

"Yes," he replied. "I fully expected to find him at Saccone's, but he must have got among the less respectable boozing-kens. I am sure to unearth him somewhere hereaway, though."

"I shouldn't waste time on him," I replied, and then I briefly recounted what had happened, concluding with my determination to send Orlebar's luggage ashore, together with his valet, and to leave the lot behind. Zavertal listened with every appearance of genuine annoyance to the story of the wretched man's behaviour, but the moment I mentioned the course I was going to take I felt that he disapproved of it, though his face expressed nothing more than respectful concern.

"You have quite made up your mind that this will be best, Captain Forrester?" he said, and I fancied that his eyes hardened as he spoke.

"Certainly," I replied. "We can't have a drunken blackguard on board insulting people with reckless lies. What other 'best,' as you call it, can there be?"

He looked at me thoughtfully before answering, not as if in any doubt as to his purpose, but rather with a cold, measuring glance that strove to fathom the lengths to which he could safely go with me. So at least it seemed to me, and the prying scrutiny galled me into impatience.

"Come," I said, looking significantly up the street to the corner round which Aline and the rest had now disappeared, "have you any objection, Doctor Zavertal?"

He came a step nearer, and spoke so straight, that once again a budding suspicion, ridiculous in its vagueness and born of what then looked like merest trifles, faded into the background.

"As you ask me the direct question, sir," he said, "it is my duty to say that I have the very gravest objection to leaving Mr. Orlebar behind. He has been entrusted to me by—his relatives, as a patient in serious danger of his life. How can I reconcile myself to leaving him stranded here, where he will probably do himself to death in a week? What shall I say to his people on my return, and what of my professional reputation? I do not see how you can expect me to endorse your decision, and I trust sincerely that you will reconsider it. And surely, sir, the credit of the ship as a safe resort for invalids should weigh with you."

From his point of view I quite saw the force of his argument. His appeal, too, was couched so strongly and yet so modestly that almost before I knew it I was debating whether I could yield to his wishes without loss of dignity. I remembered Nathan's instruction to defer to him in all matters affecting the passengers, and I was the more ready to do so as he had made no attempt to avail himself of an authority which he doubtless knew he possessed.

Moreover, if I held out, and he cabled home to the owners for confirmation of his wishes, I should look a good deal more foolish than if I gave in now, in the very probable event of their backing him up. As it was, no one besides Waldo and Orlebar himself knew of what I had intended.

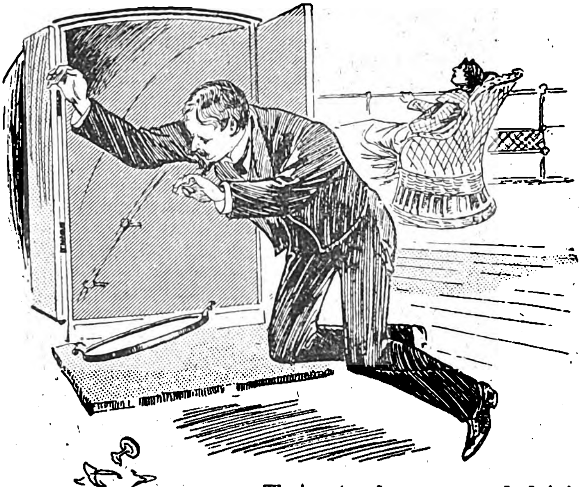
"We appear to be both working to the same end, Doctor—the welfare of the passengers," I said. "Supposing that I cancel the arrangement to oblige you, can you give me any sort of assurance that the man shall not repeat his conduct?"

"You shall have my personal guarantee that nothing of the sort shall happen again," was the reply. "I cannot engage to cure the fellow, either of his disease or of his propensities, but you shall have my entire co-operation in putting any restraint upon him that may be necessary. I don't care so long as I have him on the ship for treatment, and, between you and me, sir, I think that death will relieve us of his presence before long."

"So let it be, then," I said, and leaving him to continue the search, I hurried down to the boat to find the others embarked, and waiting for me in some curiosity as to the cause of my delay. I said nothing, however, during the pull out to the boat, out of consideration for Mrs. Brinkworth, but confided the change of plan to Waldo as soon as we were on board and the ladies had gone to their cabins. To my satisfaction, he abstained from chaffing me on my being over-ruled by the Doctor, and he even assented that "second thoughts were often best."

Orlebar was brought on board by Zavertal while dinner was on in the saloon, and being taken straight to his stateroom to bed, he gave rise to no further uneasiness that night. We weighed anchor the next morning at ten o'clock, and shortly afterwards he appeared on deck, to the surprise of everybody, seeming better rather than worse for the escapade of the previous day. He had his lounge placed in its usual position under the lee of the smoking-room, but, instead of perpetually sending to the bar for "pegs," according to his habit, he amused himself quietly with a novel. Aline and Mrs. Brinkworth naturally gave him a wide berth, but he evinced no sign of noticing his former wife's presence on deck.

There was a good deal of shipping about in the Straits, and, in consequence, for several hours after leaving the Rock, I remained upon the bridge, whence I had a clear view of all that went on below. Eight bells had just announced noon, when I saw Aline and Mrs. Brinkworth gather up their books and work and go down the saloon stairs. A few moments later Doctor Zavertal, who had been paying great attention to Orlebar all the morning, came out of the surgery, and, going aft, felt his patient's pulse, carefully timing the result with his chronometer. He came away immediately, his face very grave, and then he, too, disappeared down the saloon stairs, after stopping on the way to answer some remark which General Waldo, whom he met, made in passing. After parting from the Doctor, Waldo went on and chatted for a moment or two with Orlebar—somewhat to my surprise, considering the man's conduct on the day previous—and then he joined a group of passengers further aft.



The empty glass was smashed into half-a-dozen pieces.

At the end of five minutes Enriquez, the stowaway, now serving as an assistant steward, came on deck with a tray on which was a glass of dark liquid that looked like port wine. He took it to Orlebar, who drank it at a gulp and replaced the glass on the tray. Enriquez then started to return below, but as he was nearing the companion-way he tripped and fell, dropping the tray on to the deck with such violence that the empty glass was smashed into half-a-dozen pieces. Regaining his feet in an instant, he collected the bits of broken glass and tossed them overboard, after which he proceeded on his way and disappeared down the stairs.

During the next few minutes I was occupied with the navigation of the vessel, and paid no attention to what was happening on deck. When I again turned my eyes that way I saw that there was a commotion in the neighbourhood of Orlebar's lounge. Zavertal was pushing his way through a number of male passengers who had gathered round it, while the ladies were all looking that way with frightened faces.

A minute later a messenger came to me from the Doctor to say that Mr. Orlebar was dead.

CHAPTER IX.

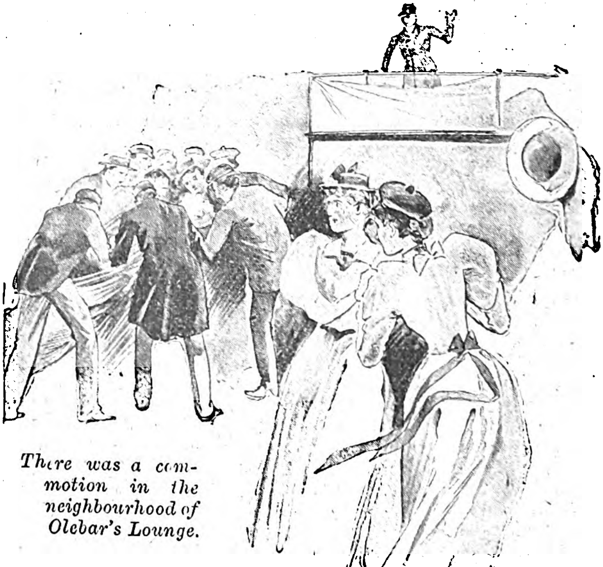
A Mysterious Communication.

The stir caused by Desmond Orlebar's death soon quieted down, hardly lasting, in fact, longer than the end of luncheon, which was luckily announced shortly after the occurrence. Zavertal saw to all the necessary arrangements for the funeral, which he advised, for excellent reasons, should take place the same afternoon, and as he professed himself able to certify the death as due to natural causes, it was not for me to put obstacles in the way. I myself conducted the short ceremony with which the body was committed to the sea from the fo'c'sle—well away from the passengers, very few of whom knew what was going on forward.

Orlebar's habits had made him so unpopular on board that the only sentiments which I heard expressed about his decease were of the "serve-him-right" order. All the sympathy evoked was reserved for the unfortunate woman who, by a strange coincidence, had found herself brought face to face with the miserable creature whom she might reasonably have expected to have gone out of her life for ever. Mrs. Brinkworth kept to her state-room for the rest of the day, but Aline, who was constant in her kindness, told me that she did not pretend to feel regret for a man who had ceased to be anything to her but a shameful memory.

A musical entertainment had been arranged for in the saloon that evening, and, true to the policy which our philosophic bo'sun had suggested, the event of the morning was regarded by Zavertal as a reason for holding rather than postponing it. Finding that he was backed in his opinion by a great majority of passengers, I offered no objection, though to me, who had never sailed in a pleasure cruiser before, it seemed a little callous. However, as the affair was to come off, I thought it would be foolish to excite controversy by absenting myself, and I confess that, apart from the absence of Aline, who was sitting with Mrs. Brinkworth in her cabin, I passed a very festive evening.

After the improvised curtain had fallen on the last "turn," I spent an hour or two on the bridge. When at length I went to my room to turn in, the passengers had all retired for the night, and, save for the throbbing of the engines, the ship was as quiet as a church. The electric arc in my cabin had been switched off as usual the last thing by my steward, and such light as there was came from an oil lamp which I kept burning all night in case I was suddenly called.

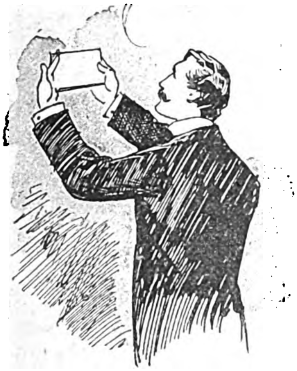


There was a commotion in the neighbourhood of Olebar's Lounge.

My table stood almost beyond the reach of the lamp's feeble rays, and therefore it was not till I prepared to undress that I noticed a sealed letter lying on the top of my blotting pad. The envelope itself was enough to pique curiosity, being addressed to me in large printed capitals that suggested a desire for disguise. Tearing it open this is what I read, written in the same obviously unnatural hand:

To Captain Forrester.
Dear Sir,—

I am not one who believes in anonymous letters except in exceptional circumstances. It is because I believe that the circumstances in which I write are very exceptional that I adopt a mode of communication that I ordinarily despise. I the more readily do so since in a few days I may have the pleasure of confiding in you personally.



The envelope itself was enough to pique curiosity.

At present my object is to warn you against the man Enriquez who was found hidden on board on the third day of the voyage. I can give no reasons for my warning as yet, but in all sincerity I say that in my belief you will have serious cause for regret if you disregard it. If a certain theory which has been forced upon me turns out to be correct, this man's presence on board may mean the difference between life and death to some of those entrusted to your charge.

The next port of call in the programme of the trip is Genoa; I would suggest that en route you should suddenly make some excuse for running into Barcelona, and there put Enriquez ashore without first giving him any hint of your intention. In order to secure the full advantage of my proposal it is also imperative that you preserve absolute silence with regard to this letter and its subject, trusting in no one, however worthy to be consulted on such a matter anyone may appear. One of my reasons for not speaking to you in person about it is the necessity—the vital necessity—of my interference being kept secret from certain persons on the ship, and that end would be defeated if we were seen putting our heads together. There are sharp eyes and ears on the Queen of Night.

In conclusion, you will see that if I am wrong in my theory—hunting a mare's nest, in fact—no harm will have been done by landing a stowaway in the country to which he professed to be anxious to go. If his account of himself is true he will be the first to thank you. On the other hand, if my conjectures are correct, you will have at least thrown obstacles in the way of cruel and designing men.

There was a nice production for a tired ship captain to receive at the close of a rather worrying day. It ended abruptly, without signature of any kind, the usual vulgar noms de guerre of anonymous letter writers, such as "A Friend" or "A Well-wisher," being despised by my correspondent. This fact, in conjunction with the earnest tone of the language, which was at least that of a person of education, weighed with me in his favour, and made me disposed to credit the writer with genuine motives. At any rate, the letter did not emanate from a jealous or quarrelsome fellow-servant of the man attacked.

We should not be off Barcelona till late on the following night, so I decided to sleep on the matter before coming to a conclusion how to act. Our course, which in any case lay close to the northern Spanish port, would not have to be altered till the last moment in the event of my wishing to run in, and there would therefore be no need for anyone to know that we were going to touch there till after everyone but the watch on deck had retired to rest. As to the letter itself, I recognised from the first that it would be useless to puzzle over its origin. It was too carefully disguised to admit of the handwriting being traced, and it was not likely that the person who placed it on my table would have entered my room while anyone was looking. All I had to do was to decide whether or no to heed the warning.

In the morning, as often happens when one goes to bed with some knotty question in doubt, I awoke with a settled mind. I would adopt the mysterious writer's suggestion, and land Enriquez at Barcelona, and the argument that prevailed was the principal, nay, the only, one in the letter—that if there was nothing about the man he would be the last to complain. Anyhow, it would be better than running risks, and as we were not steaming "on time," the delay of an hour or so would harm no one.

All that day we steered north-eastwards under the coast of Spain, running in near enough to give the passengers a view of the ruined Moorish castles and nestling villages among the vine-clad slopes. Fine weather still prevailed, and Aline and her companion emerged from their brief retirement, Mrs. Brinkworth being evidently grateful for the universal kindness that ignored her connection with Orlebar.

In looking over my private log of the voyage I find that two items pertinent to the story are entered under that day's date, though at the time they seemed of such slight importance that it is only by chance that I recorded them. One was that General Waldo was confined to his state room with an attack of gout, and would see no one but his bedroom steward, not even the Doctor, who, of course, proffered his services.

The other item was that the young Earl of Darranmore, while skylarking as usual on deck after breakfast, had another fainting fit very like the first, except that it lasted longer and left him much more prostrate. Zavertal was most assiduous in his attentions to the lad, and brought him round in time to take his place at the dinner-table.

